"Okay." Doctor Munro said. "I'm going to take the blindfold off. There's a mirror above you. I need you to look at it for as long as you can. But I can take the mirror away, or cover your eyes again if you want. Just let me know. Alright?"

She nodded again. "Just not the blindfold. Don't make me blind again. Please."

"Okay." The doctor said as she took her hand from Jenkins' arm. "I'm taking the blindfold off now. Try to stay calm.

Jenkins felt the doctor's hands moving at the back of her head. A moment later the cloth over her eyes loosened and pulled away. She winced at the sudden light.

When they opened the sight in front of her caused her to begin hyperventilating again.

Her eyes locked on the bright orange, slightly reflective, eyes in the massive mirror in front of her. The eyes surrounded by dark brown, almost black fur. That sat just above a fanged snout and just below a set of pointed, slightly tufted ears that rotated to and fro seemingly at random.

She locked eyes with the mirror image of herself and felt a primal, instinctive, need to maintain that eye contact until the other her backed down. Even as she felt dread, disgust, and anger at the fact that that WASN'T supposed to be her.

She strained at the blue plastic wrapped blanket restraint that covered the rest of her body and kept her pressed to the medical bed. But it was unyielding.

"Corporal Jenkins?" The Doctor asked from where she was standing next to the bed. "Samantha?"

"Take it away." She hissed through her bared fangs. The bared fangs that made her subconsciously puff her fur up in the mirror. "Take it away!" She yelled. "TAKE IT AWAY!"

The doctors hands reached up and spun the mirror around on its gimbal. Despite the logical part of her mind knowing better, she became relieved and just a little bit proud of the fact that the OTHER wolf had backed down first.

She felt tension release from her joints and muscles as she slowly sank back down. She hadn't even realized that she'd arched up toward the mirror.

Her breathing slowed as she began to look around.

She'd expected to see a series of tools and equipment. Needles and saws and scalpels and things that might be used to dissect her and analyze her new form.

Instead she simply saw an vitals machine, with a few lines leading under her restraint blanket, and a crash cart. Other than that the room was sparse, with a few chairs and a surveillance camera up in the corner of the ceiling.

She looked at the Doctor and saw a small, grey haired, woman of middle eastern complexion.

She had a kind face that bore a sad expression as she looked at Jenkins.

"Are you okay?" Doctor Munro asked.

Jenkins looked up at the back of the mirror. Her breathing quickened a little bit and she felt more tears forming on her eyes.

"No." She said softly. "What's happened to me?"

Suddenly she felt that small hand on her arm again. She looked down at the doctor, who was wearing a pained smile.

"That's part of what we're trying to figure out ." The doctor said. "And I'm here to help you through the process of learning about it. We're going to try to cure you and make you.... well... you... again. But in the meantime we need to learn what we can about this. And until we discover a cure I'm going to help you come to terms with your new body. Will you let me do that?"

Jenkins looked down at her with teary eyes.

"You'll cure me?" She asked.

Doctor Munro shook her head, causing a bit of panic to form in her mind.

"Not me personally no. I'm just a psychiatrist. But the doctors here will do everything they can. Yes." She said with a smile.

She looked around again. Then she nodded.

"Please help me." She said as she began to cry in earnest. "I don't want to be this."

The doctor pressed a tissue to her eyes, where it had come from she didn't know, and wiped the tears away.

"I will." Doctor Munro said as she balled up the tissue and tossed it away.

"And please wear less perfume next time." Jenkins added with a sniffle. "My nose is really strong now."

Doctor Munro chuckled. "Sorry." She said. "I'll keep that in mind. Now, besides a cure for.... I don't know what they're officially calling this yet... Do you need anything?"

Jenkins looked at her.

"Can I call my Dad?" She asked. "He's probably worried about me."

Doctor Munro smiled again. "That shouldn't be too hard to arrange."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/za0sz0/wait_is_this_just_gate_272/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (270/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look, emotions. Love those. And brotherly bonding. How sweet.

Enjoy.

\~

When James entered Joey's room he didn't knock. He'd seen his little brother have freakouts plenty of times and knew that he basically shut down afterward every time. And this time was the worst freakout of them all. If he'd knocked Joey wouldn't have answered.

He'd shaken Veliry awake as he'd passed her chair that was sitting outside of the room. Told her to go lie down for a while and grab something to eat. The mage had grumbled something and James had simply told her to go, adding that Batty would need help back to his room without James supporting him. That had been Batty's cue to leave too.

Then he'd gripped the door knob and hobbled in.

He'd entered to see something both familiar, and a little bit surprising.

Joey was curled into a ball on his bed, hands clamped over his ears, watching James with half opened eyes. That had been familiar.

He was also sporting a bit of a beard. Not much of one, but it was thicker than the clean shave that the healers had given James so they could bandage him properly. And James had never seen his baby brother with a beard before.

James smiled a bit as he sat down on the bed next to Joey.

"I think that beard looks better on you than mine does on me lil bro." He said as he carefully gave a light tug at some of the short whiskers near where Joey's hand was clamped down.

Joey simply looked at him then looked away.

James rested a hand over the on his side of Joey's head. The hand lifted a bit.

"Would you mind sitting up for me Jojo?" He asked. "You don't have to. But it'd make this more comfortable. Plus the bedbugs could probably use a breather."

Joey's eyes narrowed at the joke. But after a moment, and a few kicks of his legs, he was sitting up against his bed's headboard.

Once he was James pressed his hands over both of his brother's hands and bumped their foreheads together lightly. He felt the little medallion on the headband press into his head a bit as he did.

"Tell me what's on the big screen." He said. An old code between the two of them.

Joey curled in just a little tighter, James saw his knuckles whiten as they pressed down harder.

"Verbalize Joey." He said. "I can't help if you don't verbalize. At least give me one word."

Joey groaned a bit and James saw his left leg spasm as it attempted to bounce up and down. He simply looked at his little brother.

But then Joey spoke. "Rule one." He said quietly and quickly.

James nodded understanding.

"Yeah." He said. "I figured." He turned away and stared at the wall for a moment. Then he looked back and smiled at his brother. But his eyes watered with the hint of tears. "Me too."

The tears did more to pull Joey out of his introspection than anything.

When James felt his little brother shift a bit he continued.

"I've.... I've had to be really violent to survive this place." He said as he continued looking away. "I told you about Kela right?"

Joey nodded. It was a small, quick thing. Another person might not have noticed it.

"I didn't tell you the full story." James admitted. "When I uh... first got here. She..." His hand knocked on his leg like it was a door a few times. "She... killed Sergeant Odie." He turned back to Joey for a second. "Remember him? He was on a few of the video chats I did with you. You met him when you came to visit me. Big African guy."

Joey nodded again. He was sitting a bit more loosely now. His legs a bit stretched. His hands a bit looser on his ears.

"When I first got here. Kela she uh.... she.... mercy killed him. For... lack of a better term." He nodded and wiped a tear from his eye. "I didn't know that at the time. I just knew that she'd driven a spear through his neck. I uh. I shot her.... three times." He held his hand up and looked at it curiously. "Three shots. Less than a yard away. Just a reaction while I was... freaking out." He let out a quick chuckle. "Hell I only had live ammo because NTC had a really bad coyote issue. Sidearms were always kept loaded for night patrol just in case. Otherwise I'd've just popped a bunch of dents into her armor with my training rounds."

Joey's left hand fell to his knee as he saw his brother hang his head and stare at the ground.

"I'd been here all of a minute. And I'd watched one of my friends die. Knew that Batty was missing a leg. And I'd just shot someone in the chest three times." James said as he continued looking down. "So yeah Jojo. I understand the way you reacted back at the desert. I might be the only other person in our family who does. And I broke rule number one too." He shook his head. "I've broken that rule quite a few times since I've gotten here."

The two of them sat in silence for a moment. Joeys hand began moving back to his ear.

"Noone's gonna blame you if you want to stop learning magic Jojo." James said after a moment. "Nobody's gonna blame you for wanting to stay in here after what happened. It's... it's understandable. But mom needs you to at least come back out of the room from time to time. Veliry wants you back out. I want you back out. Hell. I bet even Batty would like to see you again and hang out." He nodded a bit as he took a deep breath. "Scratch that." He said. "IIIII... definitely need you back man.... I'm in over my head here." He admitted. "And most of the stuff I do is so that I can see you and mom again and make sure you two are safe. I need you to be okay. Even if its just OKAY and not...." He waved his hand a bit. "Becoming the next Arch-Mage or whatever." He looked back down a bit. "I need my little brother to be alright."

James looked at his little brother with glistening eyes. Joey looked back at him with the same tears in his own eyes.

"I may not be able to understand the same kind of overwhelming.... sensory overload... as you Jojo." He said as he placed a hand on his brothers shin and rubbed it just a bit. "But I assure you that I one hundred percent understand the idea of too many things happening at once all the time. It's been going on non-stop since I got here."

James stood up shakily and picked up his crutch.

"Take your time Jo." He said as he seated the crutch back under his arm. "But come back to us okay?"

Before he could take his first step James heard his brother move, and felt his arm wrap around his waist. James sat back down as quickly and gently as he could. Joey wrapped the other arm around him and James matched the hug, resting his head against his brothers as he did.

It hurt. The pressure of his brother's embrace pressed on more than a few bones and muscles and joints that were still tender.

But the knowledge that his brother wasn't curled into a ball and loathing himself, even temporarily, made it worth it.

"I'm sorry." Joey said softly into his side.

"I know bud." James said as he smiled and rustled his brothers hair with his cheek. "We all know."

The two of them stayed in the hug for several seconds before either of them spoke again.

"Do you really think my beard looks good?" Joey asked.

James let out a laugh.

"I mean. It looks like someone super-glued a bunch of pubes to your face." James said with a grin. Joey sat back and rubbed his cheek with an annoyed expression. "Buuuuut that's probably just because you've been lying in bed. Give it a good wash and trim and it should look pretty spiffy."

Joey continued scratching. "Itchy." He said. "Don't like it."

James shrugged. "Maybe you should ask Veliry if she likes it."

Joey's face turned bright red.

James stood back up and reset the crutch again. He smiled as he nodded at his brother.

"Clean up when you're ready. Then come get some food. Mom says you haven't been eating much." He said. "We'll be there when you're ready to come back out." He began to limp toward the door again.

"Is it.... Is it really okay?" Joey asked, causing James to turn and look at him over his shoulder. "What happened?"

James gave a half smile. "No." He said. His brother looked at him with a sad expression. "It never should have come to that." He continued. "That whole fight never should have even happened.... But it did. And now we all have to deal with it as best we can. But you're alive. Veliry is alive. And neither of us has to explain how the other got killed to mom. So... it's not okay but... It's better than it could've been. All we can do now is move forward and try to be better. Right?"

Joey considered the words. They sounded like something either of their parents might have said.

"Right." He said after a moment.

"Dinner's at sundown." James said as he opened the door and walked out. "Take a bath first. You smell like B.O. Now if you don't mind, I have some internal bleeding to get back to, and a nice rock hard bed to do it on."

He left as Joey was checking his armpits.

\----------

King Farrick sat and thought as he watched the Ambassador leave with the tablet in hand, still talking to her country's leader as she did.

The two men had spoken together for nearly four hours before the device had signaled that it was nearly out of the energy it utilized.

The conversation had been revelatory for the King.

"So...." Marcos began, breaking him out of his ruminations on what he'd learned. "Their world has gained magical energy. This is most vexing."

"Indeed." He said as he considered HOW such a thing might occur. "And their abduction of a werewolf from out world has caused them more trouble than they expected. Go figure." He said, thinking of the footage that the president had displayed for them on the tablet.

"A champion.... manifesting despite the lack of one of the Moon Goddess's tears. And in a different universe from our own." Marcos said. "It would appear that the gods are more PRESENT in their realm than they are in ours."

"Is that what caused such a manifestation?" He asked the elder mage.

Marcos thought for a moment as he drank from the pitcher of water on the table in front of him.

"It is one of the few things I can think of that would allow such an event." He said after a moment. "Between that and the newly manifested magical energies that are being displayed by the peoples of Earth.... these three so-called 'super heroes' who are likely just champions of a different god. As well as anything else their leader may be holding back from us. It is the only thing that could explain all of them."

"Gods interfering with a previously non-magical world." The King considered. "Didn't young Captain Choi say that the Moon Goddess revealed that Earth's reality was a test for the gods or something to that effect?"

"Yes." Marcos answered. "Something along those lines. I can have the scribes bring out the report later if you'd like." He considered the notion. "Gods expressing their desires on a world that they themselves were... for lack of a better term... playing with. I imagine that could anger a few of them."

"Hmmm." The King hummed as he thought. "Speak with the high priests and shamans. See if they've felt any disturbances. I shall send a message to the Lunar Council about what we have learned. I'm curious to hear what they say about a champion manifesting in another plane of existence."

Marcos nodded. "That is a most curious question." He admitted. "I shall get to it your grace." He said as he slowly stood and began shuffling toward the door.

The King turned to the guards nearby. "Have the prisoners designated as civilians brought to the secondary dining hall. Make sure they are fed. Then have the interrogators process them. Make sure they are as they claim to be. Then we shall begin fitting them with restraining runes.

I'll make my decision on the military members and their two leaders in the morning."

"Aye sir." Said the Captain of the four guards. Then he and one other began moving to follow their orders.

Leaving him with the last two.

He sat for several long minutes thinking of what to do. But he was tired. And his mind too overburdened by the information he'd just received.

Eventually he stood. The two guards straightened up.

"To the healing ward." He said. "I would check in on my daughter.

The guards nodded and moved to get the door for him as he walked.

Wolves and magic in a world that has never known either? And a one-sided military defeat and political embarrassment at the same time? He thought. Perhaps my week hasn't been so bad after all.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z91apa/wait_is_this_just_gate_271/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (270/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look, emotions. Love those. And brotherly bonding. How sweet.

Enjoy.

\~

When James entered Joey's room he didn't knock. He'd seen his little brother have freakouts plenty of times and knew that he basically shut down afterward every time. And this time was the worst freakout of them all. If he'd knocked Joey wouldn't have answered.

He'd shaken Veliry awake as he'd passed her chair that was sitting outside of the room. Told her to go lie down for a while and grab something to eat. The mage had grumbled something and James had simply told her to go, adding that Batty would need help back to his room without James supporting him. That had been Batty's cue to leave too.

Then he'd gripped the door knob and hobbled in.

He'd entered to see something both familiar, and a little bit surprising.

Joey was curled into a ball on his bed, hands clamped over his ears, watching James with half opened eyes. That had been familiar.

He was also sporting a bit of a beard. Not much of one, but it was thicker than the clean shave that the healers had given James so they could bandage him properly. And James had never seen his baby brother with a beard before.

James smiled a bit as he sat down on the bed next to Joey.

"I think that beard looks better on you than mine does on me lil bro." He said as he carefully gave a light tug at some of the short whiskers near where Joey's hand was clamped down.

Joey simply looked at him then looked away.

James rested a hand over the on his side of Joey's head. The hand lifted a bit.

"Would you mind sitting up for me Jojo?" He asked. "You don't have to. But it'd make this more comfortable. Plus the bedbugs could probably use a breather."

Joey's eyes narrowed at the joke. But after a moment, and a few kicks of his legs, he was sitting up against his bed's headboard.

Once he was James pressed his hands over both of his brother's hands and bumped their foreheads together lightly. He felt the little medallion on the headband press into his head a bit as he did.

"Tell me what's on the big screen." He said. An old code between the two of them.

Joey curled in just a little tighter, James saw his knuckles whiten as they pressed down harder.

"Verbalize Joey." He said. "I can't help if you don't verbalize. At least give me one word."

Joey groaned a bit and James saw his left leg spasm as it attempted to bounce up and down. He simply looked at his little brother.

But then Joey spoke. "Rule one." He said quietly and quickly.

James nodded understanding.

"Yeah." He said. "I figured." He turned away and stared at the wall for a moment. Then he looked back and smiled at his brother. But his eyes watered with the hint of tears. "Me too."

The tears did more to pull Joey out of his introspection than anything.

When James felt his little brother shift a bit he continued.

"I've.... I've had to be really violent to survive this place." He said as he continued looking away. "I told you about Kela right?"

Joey nodded. It was a small, quick thing. Another person might not have noticed it.

"I didn't tell you the full story." James admitted. "When I uh... first got here. She..." His hand knocked on his leg like it was a door a few times. "She... killed Sergeant Odie." He turned back to Joey for a second. "Remember him? He was on a few of the video chats I did with you. You met him when you came to visit me. Big African guy."

Joey nodded again. He was sitting a bit more loosely now. His legs a bit stretched. His hands a bit looser on his ears.

"When I first got here. Kela she uh.... she.... mercy killed him. For... lack of a better term." He nodded and wiped a tear from his eye. "I didn't know that at the time. I just knew that she'd driven a spear through his neck. I uh. I shot her.... three times." He held his hand up and looked at it curiously. "Three shots. Less than a yard away. Just a reaction while I was... freaking out." He let out a quick chuckle. "Hell I only had live ammo because NTC had a really bad coyote issue. Sidearms were always kept loaded for night patrol just in case. Otherwise I'd've just popped a bunch of dents into her armor with my training rounds."

Joey's left hand fell to his knee as he saw his brother hang his head and stare at the ground.

"I'd been here all of a minute. And I'd watched one of my friends die. Knew that Batty was missing a leg. And I'd just shot someone in the chest three times." James said as he continued looking down. "So yeah Jojo. I understand the way you reacted back at the desert. I might be the only other person in our family who does. And I broke rule number one too." He shook his head. "I've broken that rule quite a few times since I've gotten here."

The two of them sat in silence for a moment. Joeys hand began moving back to his ear.

"Noone's gonna blame you if you want to stop learning magic Jojo." James said after a moment. "Nobody's gonna blame you for wanting to stay in here after what happened. It's... it's understandable. But mom needs you to at least come back out of the room from time to time. Veliry wants you back out. I want you back out. Hell. I bet even Batty would like to see you again and hang out." He nodded a bit as he took a deep breath. "Scratch that." He said. "IIIII... definitely need you back man.... I'm in over my head here." He admitted. "And most of the stuff I do is so that I can see you and mom again and make sure you two are safe. I need you to be okay. Even if its just OKAY and not...." He waved his hand a bit. "Becoming the next Arch-Mage or whatever." He looked back down a bit. "I need my little brother to be alright."

James looked at his little brother with glistening eyes. Joey looked back at him with the same tears in his own eyes.

"I may not be able to understand the same kind of overwhelming.... sensory overload... as you Jojo." He said as he placed a hand on his brothers shin and rubbed it just a bit. "But I assure you that I one hundred percent understand the idea of too many things happening at once all the time. It's been going on non-stop since I got here."

James stood up shakily and picked up his crutch.

"Take your time Jo." He said as he seated the crutch back under his arm. "But come back to us okay?"

Before he could take his first step James heard his brother move, and felt his arm wrap around his waist. James sat back down as quickly and gently as he could. Joey wrapped the other arm around him and James matched the hug, resting his head against his brothers as he did.

It hurt. The pressure of his brother's embrace pressed on more than a few bones and muscles and joints that were still tender.

But the knowledge that his brother wasn't curled into a ball and loathing himself, even temporarily, made it worth it.

"I'm sorry." Joey said softly into his side.

"I know bud." James said as he smiled and rustled his brothers hair with his cheek. "We all know."

The two of them stayed in the hug for several seconds before either of them spoke again.

"Do you really think my beard looks good?" Joey asked.

James let out a laugh.

"I mean. It looks like someone super-glued a bunch of pubes to your face." James said with a grin. Joey sat back and rubbed his cheek with an annoyed expression. "Buuuuut that's probably just because you've been lying in bed. Give it a good wash and trim and it should look pretty spiffy."

Joey continued scratching. "Itchy." He said. "Don't like it."

James shrugged. "Maybe you should ask Veliry if she likes it."

Joey's face turned bright red.

James stood back up and reset the crutch again. He smiled as he nodded at his brother.

"Clean up when you're ready. Then come get some food. Mom says you haven't been eating much." He said. "We'll be there when you're ready to come back out." He began to limp toward the door again.

"Is it.... Is it really okay?" Joey asked, causing James to turn and look at him over his shoulder. "What happened?"

James gave a half smile. "No." He said. His brother looked at him with a sad expression. "It never should have come to that." He continued. "That whole fight never should have even happened.... But it did. And now we all have to deal with it as best we can. But you're alive. Veliry is alive. And neither of us has to explain how the other got killed to mom. So... it's not okay but... It's better than it could've been. All we can do now is move forward and try to be better. Right?"

Joey considered the words. They sounded like something either of their parents might have said.

"Right." He said after a moment.

"Dinner's at sundown." James said as he opened the door and walked out. "Take a bath first. You smell like B.O. Now if you don't mind, I have some internal bleeding to get back to, and a nice rock hard bed to do it on."

He left as Joey was checking his armpits.

\----------

King Farrick sat and thought as he watched the Ambassador leave with the tablet in hand, still talking to her country's leader as she did.

The two men had spoken together for nearly four hours before the device had signaled that it was nearly out of the energy it utilized.

The conversation had been revelatory for the King.

"So...." Marcos began, breaking him out of his ruminations on what he'd learned. "Their world has gained magical energy. This is most vexing."

"Indeed." He said as he considered HOW such a thing might occur. "And their abduction of a werewolf from out world has caused them more trouble than they expected. Go figure." He said, thinking of the footage that the president had displayed for them on the tablet.

"A champion.... manifesting despite the lack of one of the Moon Goddess's tears. And in a different universe from our own." Marcos said. "It would appear that the gods are more PRESENT in their realm than they are in ours."

"Is that what caused such a manifestation?" He asked the elder mage.

Marcos thought for a moment as he drank from the pitcher of water on the table in front of him.

"It is one of the few things I can think of that would allow such an event." He said after a moment. "Between that and the newly manifested magical energies that are being displayed by the peoples of Earth....

these three so-called 'super heroes' who are likely just champions of a different god. As well as anything else their leader may be holding back from us. It is the only thing that could explain all of them."

"Gods interfering with a previously non-magical world." The King considered. "Didn't young Captain Choi say that the Moon Goddess revealed that Earth's reality was a test for the gods or something to that effect?"

"Yes." Marcos answered. "Something along those lines. I can have the scribes bring out the report later if you'd like." He considered the notion. "Gods expressing their desires on a world that they themselves were... for lack of a better term... playing with. I imagine that could anger a few of them."

"Hmmm." The King hummed as he thought. "Speak with the high priests and shamans. See if they've felt any disturbances. I shall send a message to the Lunar Council about what we have learned. I'm curious to hear what they say about a champion manifesting in another plane of existence."

Marcos nodded. "That is a most curious question." He admitted. "I shall get to it your grace." He said as he slowly stood and began shuffling toward the door.

The King turned to the guards nearby. "Have the prisoners designated as civilians brought to the secondary dining hall. Make sure they are fed. Then have the interrogators process them. Make sure they are as they claim to be. Then we shall begin fitting them with restraining runes. I'll make my decision on the military members and their two leaders in the morning."

"Aye sir." Said the Captain of the four guards. Then he and one other began moving to follow their orders.

Leaving him with the last two.

He sat for several long minutes thinking of what to do. But he was tired. And his mind too overburdened by the information he'd just received.

Eventually he stood. The two guards straightened up.

"To the healing ward." He said. "I would check in on my daughter.

The guards nodded and moved to get the door for him as he walked.

Wolves and magic in a world that has never known either? And a one-sided military defeat and political embarrassment at the same time? He thought. Perhaps my week hasn't been so bad after all.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z918td/wait_is_this_just_gate_271/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (269/?)

Previous

Writer's note: What's a century spouse you ask? (Or maybe don't. idc)

Well, elves live a long ass time. So unless its a politically important marriage (ie royalty or something similar) and to keep life interesting as well as help their bloodlines spread they typically only marry for a century, unless they marry someone of a significantly shorter lifespan. Once that century is up they can renew the marriage if they want. Or they can go their separate ways with no hard feelings and no negativity from their elven peers.

Is any of that gonna be relevant to the important parts of the story? Not even a little bit. But that's a bit of world building for those interested in it.

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright. Up you go bud." Batty said as he held his hand out. James gripped it and Batty winced as his own damaged muscles strained, his other hand holding him up with a crutch.

Tears welled in James's eyes as his impalement injury ached and complained at the base of his rib-cage. Amina looked on from where she was sitting with a small, pained, smile. His mother watched him with a much more weary expression. She hadn't slept much over the past week.

Joey was still hidden away in his room, with Veliry monitoring him in case he had any issues with the headband that helped keep his powers from going out of control.

Nobody needed James to tell them that that was the main reason that James was forcing himself up and through his recovery faster than was recommended.

"How do you feel?" The shift's lead healer asked.

"Like shit." James said through gritted teeth. "But I saw that coming. Sorry mom."

His mother simply nodded.

"Don't push too hard." Amina said from inside her mummy wraps of bandages. James's impalement was the only reason his injuries were considered worse than hers. But once again his, likely werewolf arm based, minor regenerative capacity had allowed him to recover quicker.

That and the fact that he'd specifically focused any spare strength he could muster to focus healing magic on himself. It hadn't been much. He still had black veins fading on his legs and around his eyes. But any chance he'd had he'd focused on healing his legs and chest.

He had to help his brother.

"I'm good." He said as he gripped the spare crutch that Batty held out to him. Then Batty held an arm out and wrapped it around James's shoulders gently.

"You're the left leg and I'm the right." His friend said with a smile. "We'll get there soon enough."

"Joey's still my best man B." James said with a slight chuckle.

"That's fine." Batty shot back without hesitation as they took the first few steps. "I wanted to be the flower girl anyways. Besides, I'm gonna be your first kid's godfather."

"Deal." James said. He saw the slight flinch from Amina and didn't say anything about the odds of the latter part of Batty's statement.

"Mijo. Let Healer Matra get you a wheelchair please." His mother requested again. He shook his head.

"Hon, I'll be back as soon as I can." He said instead as he and Batty took a few more slow steps.

Everything still hurt. But, he thought he would be alright. He just needed to take it slow.

\---------------

"And so, your Majesty." Werner began, her hands fighting not to shake as she read from her tablet. "The Major shall be stripped of her rank, and left in your custody to sentence as you see fit. We only request that in place of the death sentence she be offered a life sentence instead."

King Farrick watched the Ambassador in a passive silence. Behind her, in a series of benches separated based on the severity of the charges against them, were the surviving Earth forces that had been captured at the end of the battle. They wore their uniforms or traveling clothes if they had them, and their hands and feet were shackled to the floor in front of them. The room was lined with Petravian soldiers, including a handful of the new riflemen.

"For First Sergeant Nguyen, he shall be stripped of rank and likewise left in your custody. Our hope is that his.... willing call of surrender, and his subsequent compliance with your questioning and reports will grant him some lenience."

The King nodded. He had no intention of punishing the so-called "Lead NCO" for his actions. It was clear from the interviews after the battle that the man regretted the entire incident and had only been following orders in a bad situation. It didn't make him innocent. But it at least made him better.

"For the remaining military personnel, whose only crimes are those resulting from following orders from their chain of command. We request that full Prisoner of War status and care be afforded from both governments as outlined in our previously signed agreements until such time as we are capable of renegotiating them with renewed faith and friendship. Further determination of their treatment to be reconsidered at such a time."

The King nodded again as he took a deep breath.

"For the civilian personnel, we request full release, with restriction runes like the ones you've previously used on Chief Vickers to be utilized at your discretion, and their travel limited to areas you and your advisors may determine at your leisure. They are, all of them, scientists and support staff. They took up no arms against you. And we request mercy on their behalf." She said finally.

"Would you like me to grant each of them a ten-gold-a-day allowance as well?" The King asked in a tone that made it hard for Werner to determine whether the question was legitimate or rhetorical.

His next question cleared that up for her.

"Would your President like me to put them up in my finest quarters and feed them my best food and drink as well?" He asked.

"That.... wouldn't be-" Werner tried to reply.

"This isn't.... enough." He said as he cut her off. His voice was cold and flat. No emotion. Not anger or sadness, or anything else. He took a sip from his cup of wine and stood up, stepping around the desk in front of him and then a few paces toward her. "Your President.... makes requests... when he should be on his knees.... begging for forgiveness." He said softly, but with an edge that made her fully aware of the wrath lying just below the surface.

He stopped when he was only two steps away from her. His dark brown eyes stared at her with an intensity she had never known in any of her past work with any of the other world leaders from Earth.

"I know they can hear me." He whispered. "And I want them to. Because THIS," He pointed a finger past her shoulder at the prisoners. "Is NOT.... enough."

"Your Majesty." Werner began. "We're willing to surre-"

\["He's right."\] Said a voice from her tablet.

Werner quickly lifted the tablet up to look at it and her eyes went wide. \["Mr.Pre-"\]

\["That's enough Ms. Werner."\] Said the voice on the other side. \["The time for negotiating through others is over. Let me talk to him.\]

\["Yes sir."\] She said quickly, then turned the tablet so the King, who was eyeing her curiously, could see.

"Good afternoon great King Farrick Petravius." Said the suit wearing, middle aged man on the screen in an obviously practiced pronunciation of the local language. "I am President of the United States, Drupadh Washington. I believe that it's long past time we spoke face to face." He shrugged and gave a mirthful smile. "To the extent that we can anyways."

King Farrick took the offered tablet gently.

"Such a meeting is indeed long overdue Mr. President." He replied. Then he turned to Guardian Ira'Nyl and gestured at the door.

"Prisoners on your feet." She ordered, then repeated in halting English. They all rose to their feet. Then she activated a device from one of her belt pouches and their shackles were released from the ground. At the guidance of the guards they were all quickly shuffled out of the door. A few minutes later only the King, Werner, Marcos, and four guards were remaining.

"Your majesty." The President began, reading his typed translations phonetically as he input them. The King set the tablet on the table and then stepped a back just a bit. "Allow me to begin by humbling myself and, as you have already said, begging.... for your forgiveness for the machinations of the people working beneath me."

"That's a much better start." The King replied, still cold.

"Then please. Allow me to continue on the same note." The President said.

And as Werner and Marcos watched, the two leaders began to finally come to an understanding with each other.

But the King kept James's warning in mind as he did.

\---

Pultham struggled to breath as he neared Waterside.

He'd been on the road for days now. He'd ridden for the first five of them, only stopping when his horse had been too exhausted or he'd needed to sleep. But Aina had collapsed two days ago and he'd had no choice but to scatter her feed near a hole he'd filled with most of his remaining water. Then he'd taken her reins and saddle off and left her.

But he'd had to continue. Someone had to learn what had happened.

His legs burned and wobbled as he continued his slow, limping, half jog toward the small village he could see just past the forest.

Even his left arm ached. He looked at it in dismay from time to time. It didn't bleed where it ended just below his elbow. In fact, the one time he'd mustered the courage to look, he'd been able to see the veins and muscles and bone INSIDE his arm at the site of the odd wound. He'd nearly thrown up as a result, and had quickly wrapped the stumped arm in a rag.

He'd lost the hand while reaching for Laria. Something.... something he couldn't see had taken an entire section of of the tree that they had called home. Hadn't cut it. Hadn't blasted or burned or ripped it. Had simply moved through the space and made it stop existing. As if it had never been there.

"Laria." He said weakly as he shuffled along.

Laria had been sitting in her favorite nook weaving like she always was. Then the wall supporting her had simply disappeared. Pultham had heard her shriek in surprise and had run to grab her as she'd fallen.

Then as he'd reached out for her, both she and his lower arm had disappeared just like the house had.

No blade. No hidden razor, or surgeon's saw. One second they'd both been there, then neither had.

He'd fallen as his house tree had continued collapsing, making great cracking noises as it gave way to its own weight.

Pultham had fallen, half expecting to disappear just like she had. But some great blessing, though he was beginning to suspect it was a curse, had spared him. Then, as he'd watched his village be devoured by this invisible nothingness, he'd ran. He'd ran as fast as he could, watching trees, and homes, and people, and everything... just everything... around him disappear.

But somehow he, and miraculously Old Tanner Branneg's horse, had managed to escape. He'd hopped on her back as quickly as he could and had kicked her into movement, galloping away as fast as the old mare could carry him.

And now, as he feebly made his way toward the small ferry village of Waterside, he wondered what he would even tell people. What had even happened to him? How could he even relate it to them? He hadn't seen what had happened. Only its effects on the things around him. And that was another thing? Had anyone else even escaped? Was he the only survivor? If so wouldn't he look guilty? Would people even believe him.

But he had a slightly more pressing issue.

Pultham fell to a knee. His head swam and his vision darkened around the edges as he struggled to stay upright.

When had he last eaten? Two days? No, that couldn't be right. The Old Tanner's snacks, meager as they were, had run out the day BEFORE he'd been forced to release old Aina. He should have taken a handful of her grains with him. They wouldn't have tasted good. But at least they would have been something. And he'd run out of water yesterday.

He got to his feet again, slowly, and took a few more shuffling steps.

Then he fell again, this time to all fours.

He needed to get back up. He wasn't even a mile away now. He thought he could hear the tavern there, where he and Laria had always stopped on their way south for drinks whenever they'd made trips this way.

"Laria." He said as he collapsed forward, his hand reaching forward despite its newfound nonexistence.

He just needed to tell someone, anyone really, about whatever had made his village, and his century spouse, disappear.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z84gmc/wait_is_this_just_gate_270/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (269/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: What's a century spouse you ask? (Or maybe don't. idc)

Well, elves live a long ass time. So unless its a politically important marriage (ie royalty or something similar) and to keep life interesting as well as help their bloodlines spread they typically only marry for a century, unless they marry someone of a significantly shorter lifespan. Once that century is up they can renew the marriage if they want. Or they can go their separate ways with no hard feelings and no negativity from their elven peers.

Is any of that gonna be relevant to the important parts of the story? Not even a little bit. But that's a bit of world building for those interested in it.

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright. Up you go bud." Batty said as he held his hand out. James gripped it and Batty winced as his own damaged muscles strained, his other hand holding him up with a crutch.

Tears welled in James's eyes as his impalement injury ached and complained at the base of his rib-cage. Amina looked on from where she was sitting with a small, pained, smile. His mother watched him with a much more weary expression. She hadn't slept much over the past week.

Joey was still hidden away in his room, with Veliry monitoring him in case he had any issues with the headband that helped keep his powers from going out of control.

Nobody needed James to tell them that that was the main reason that he was forcing himself up and through his recovery faster than was recommended.

"How do you feel?" The shift's lead healer asked.

"Like shit." James said through gritted teeth. "But I saw that coming. Sorry mom."

His mother simply nodded.

"Don't push too hard." Amina said from inside her mummy wraps of bandages. James's impalement was the only reason his injuries were considered worse than hers. But once again his, likely werewolf arm based, minor regenerative capacity had allowed him to recover quicker.

That and the fact that he'd specifically focused any spare strength he could muster to focus healing magic on himself. It hadn't been much. He still had black veins fading on his legs and around his eyes. But any chance he'd had he'd focused on healing his legs and chest.

He had to help his brother.

"I'm good." He said as he gripped the spare crutch that Batty held out to him. Then Batty held an arm out and wrapped it around James's shoulders gently.

"You're the left leg and I'm the right." His friend said with a smile. "We'll get there soon enough."

"Joey's still my best man B." James said with a slight chuckle.

"That's fine." Batty shot back without hesitation as they took the first few steps. "I wanted to be the flower girl anyways. Besides, I'm gonna be your first kid's godfather."

"Deal." James said. He saw the slight flinch from Amina and didn't say anything about the odds of the latter part of Batty's statement.

"Mijo. Let Healer Matra get you a wheelchair please." His mother requested again. He shook his head.

"Hon, I'll be back as soon as I can." He said instead as he and Batty took a few more slow steps.

Everything still hurt. But, he thought he would be alright. He just needed to take it slow.

\---------------

"And so, your Majesty." Werner began, her hands fighting not to shake as she read from her tablet. "The Major shall be stripped of her rank, and left in your custody to sentence as you see fit. We only request that in place of the death sentence she be offered a life sentence instead."

King Farrick watched the Ambassador in a passive silence. Behind her, in a series of benches separated based on the severity of the charges against them, were the surviving Earth forces that had been captured at the end of the battle. They wore their uniforms or traveling clothes if they had them, and their hands and feet were shackled to the floor in front of them. The room was lined with Petravian soldiers, including a handful of the new riflemen.

"For First Sergeant Nguyen, he shall be stripped of rank and likewise left in your custody. Our hope is that his.... willing call of surrender, and his subsequent compliance with your questioning and reports will grant him some lenience."

The King nodded. He had no intention of punishing the so-called "Lead NCO" for his actions. It was clear from the interviews after the battle that the man regretted the entire incident and had only been following orders in a bad situation. It didn't make him innocent. But it at least made him better.

"For the remaining military personnel, whose only crimes are those resulting from following orders from their chain of command. We request that full Prisoner of War status and care be afforded from both governments as outlined in our previously signed agreements until such time as we are capable of renegotiating them with renewed faith and friendship. Further determination of their treatment to be reconsidered at such a time."

The King nodded again as he took a deep breath.

"For the civilian personnel, we request full release, with restriction runes like the ones you've previously used on Chief Vickers to be utilized at your discretion, and their travel limited to areas you and your advisors may determine at your leisure. They are, all of them, scientists and support staff. They took up no arms against you. And we request mercy on their behalf." She said finally.

"Would you like me to grant each of them a ten-gold-a-day allowance as well?" The King asked in a tone that made it hard for Werner to determine whether the question was legitimate or rhetorical.

His next question cleared that up for her.

"Would your President like me to put them up in my finest quarters and feed them my best food and drink as well?" He asked.

"That.... wouldn't be-" Werner tried to reply.

"This isn't.... enough." He said as he cut her off. His voice was cold and flat. No emotion. Not anger or sadness, or anything else. He took a sip from his cup of wine and stood up, stepping around the desk in front of him and then a few paces toward her. "Your President.... makes requests... when he should be on his knees.... begging for forgiveness." He said softly, but with an edge that made her fully aware of the wrath lying just below the surface.

He stopped when he was only two steps away from her. His dark brown eyes stared at her with an intensity she had never known in any of her past work with any of the other world leaders from Earth.

"I know they can hear me." He whispered. "And I want them to. Because THIS," He pointed a finger past her shoulder at the prisoners. "Is NOT.... enough."

"Your Majesty." Werner began. "We're willing to surre-"

\["He's right."\] Said a voice from her tablet.

Werner quickly lifted the tablet up to look at it and her eyes went wide. \["Mr.Pre-"\]

\["That's enough Ms. Werner."\] Said the voice on the other side. \["The time for negotiating through others is over. Let me talk to him.\]

\["Yes sir."\] She said quickly, then turned the tablet so the King, who was eyeing her curiously, could see.

"Good afternoon great King Farrick Petravius." Said the suit wearing, middle aged man on the screen in an obviously practiced pronunciation of the local language. "I am President of the United States, Drupadh Washington. I believe that it's long past time we spoke face to face." He shrugged and gave a mirthful smile. "To the extent that we can anyways."

King Farrick took the offered tablet gently.

"Such a meeting is indeed long overdue Mr. President." He replied. Then he turned to Guardian Ira'Nyl and gestured at the door.

"Prisoners on your feet." She ordered, then repeated in halting English. They all rose to their feet. Then she activated a device from one of her belt pouches and their shackles were released from the ground. At the guidance of the guards they were all quickly shuffled out of the door. A few minutes later only the King, Werner, Marcos, and four guards were remaining.

"Your majesty." The President began, reading his typed translations phonetically as he input them. The King set the tablet on the table and then stepped a back just a bit. "Allow me to begin by humbling myself and, as you have already said, begging.... for your forgiveness for the machinations of the people working beneath me."

"That's a much better start." The King replied, still cold.

"Then please. Allow me to continue on the same note." The President said.

And as Werner and Marcos watched, the two leaders began to finally come to an understanding with each other.

But the King kept James's warning in mind as he did.

\---------------------------

Pultham struggled to breath as he neared Waterside.

He'd been on the road for days now. He'd ridden for the first five of them, only stopping when his horse had been too exhausted or he'd needed to sleep. But Aina had collapsed two days ago and he'd had no choice but to scatter her feed near a hole he'd filled with most of his remaining water. Then he'd taken her reins and saddle off and left her.

But he'd had to continue. Someone had to learn what had happened.

His legs burned and wobbled as he continued his slow, limping, half jog toward the small village he could see just past the forest.

Even his left arm ached. He looked at it in dismay from time to time. It didn't bleed where it ended just below his elbow. In fact, the one time he'd mustered the courage to look, he'd been able to see the veins and muscles and bone INSIDE his arm at the site of the odd wound. He'd nearly thrown up as a result, and had quickly wrapped the stumped arm in a rag.

He'd lost the hand while reaching for Laria. Something.... something he couldn't see had taken an entire section of of the tree that they had called home. Hadn't cut it. Hadn't blasted or burned or ripped it. Had simply moved through the space and made it stop existing. As if it had never been there.

"Laria." He said weakly as he shuffled along.

Laria had been sitting in her favorite nook weaving like she always was. Then the wall supporting her had simply disappeared. Pultham had heard her shriek in surprise and had run to grab her as she'd fallen.

Then as he'd reached out for her, both she and his lower arm had disappeared just like the house had.

No blade. No hidden razor, or surgeon's saw. One second they'd both been there, then neither had.

He'd fallen as his house tree had continued collapsing, making great cracking noises as it gave way to its own weight.

Pultham had fallen, half expecting to disappear just like she had. But some great blessing, though he was beginning to suspect it was a curse, had spared him. Then, as he'd watched his village be devoured by this invisible nothingness, he'd ran. He'd ran as fast as he could, watching trees, and homes, and people, and everything... just everything... around him disappear.

But somehow he, and miraculously Old Tanner Branneg's horse, had managed to escape. He'd hopped on her back as quickly as he could and had kicked her into movement, galloping away as fast as the old mare could carry him.

And now, as he feebly made his way toward the small ferry village of Waterside, he wondered what he would even tell people. What had even happened to him? How could he even relate it to them? He hadn't seen what had happened. Only its effects on the things around him. And that was another thing? Had anyone else even escaped? Was he the only survivor? If so wouldn't he look guilty? Would people even believe him.

But he had a slightly more pressing issue.

Pultham fell to a knee. His head swam and his vision darkened around the edges as he struggled to stay upright.

When had he last eaten? Two days? No, that couldn't be right. The Old Tanner's snacks, meager as they were, had run out the day BEFORE he'd been forced to release old Aina. He should have taken a handful of her grains with him. They wouldn't have tasted good. But at least they would have been something. And he'd run out of water yesterday.

He got to his feet again, slowly, and took a few more shuffling steps.

Then he fell again, this time to all fours.

He needed to get back up. He wasn't even a mile away now. He thought he could hear the tavern there, where he and Laria had always stopped on their way south for drinks whenever they'd made trips this way.

"Laria." He said as he collapsed forward, his hand reaching forward despite its newfound nonexistence.

He just needed to tell someone, anyone really, about whatever had made his village, and his century spouse, disappear.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z84exg/wait_is_this_just_gate_270/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (268/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Basically wrapping up this arc at this point. Next up is wedding bells and shattered cliches. Enjoy your leftovers and your weekend everyone.

\~\~\~

"Hey fool. Wake up." Said a familiar voice as James felt his foot being shaken.

As he slowly swam back into consciousness James saw the familiar face of his old friend Batista sitting near the foot of his bed.

"Batty?" He asked in a daze. "What are you doing here?"

"Regeneration therapy followed by good old fashioned physical therapy." He said with a grimace. "Plus it's finally cleared out a bit in here so I didn't feel like the wheels were getting in the way." He added as he popped his wooden wheelchair into a wheelie.

James stretched as he attempted to yawn, but was halted by the overwhelming soreness of most of his body.

"Oh god." He said as he instinctively curled up, which simply led to different parts of his body hurting. "How long has it been?"

"You've been out for two days homie." Batty said as he teetered on the wooden wheels of the chair. "They told me your mom, big Joe, and his teacher lady left this morning."

"Joey's cleared?" James asked. "Is he okay?"

Batty shrugged. "Don't know man." He admitted. "I heard what happened though. Hope the little dude's doin' alright. I was gonna see if I could track em down after this."

"Be awesome if you could give me an update once you do." James said as he held up his wolf-hand for a fist-bump. It was one of the few parts of him that didn't hurt. "How is your stomach doing?"

Batty let himself fall back forward. Then, with great effort and a grunt of exertion, lifted himself to his feet. He braced himself for a moment as he wobbled momentarily before lifting his shirt, showing the circular scars of the shotgun round that had hit him, and the surgical scars that had come from removing them from his abdomen before he could be fully healed. His stomach muscles flexed and spasmed as they fought to keep him upright.

After a few moments he flopped back down into the chair with a gasping exhale.

"Still all out of wack." He said as he caught his breath. "But way better than those first few days I'd woken up. Never realized just how vital abs were to doing..... well, just about everything really. And it doesn't help that my back muscles got jacked too." He smiled again. "Also, forcibly regenerating scarred and damaged muscles hurts like fuck dude." He tilted his head as he put on a sad expression. "Plus I can't drink as much because I'm missing a good chunk of my liver. How messed up is that?"

"They didn't regenerate your liver?" James asked. "Seems like that'd be important."

Batty nodded. "Right?" He asked with a chuckle. "Instead they focused on my intestines and spine, as if a Mexican NCO needs those more than a fully functioning liver." He joked.

James laughed despite how much it made the still healing hole in his chest ache. He looked over at the bed next to his and saw Amina there, still slumbering in her mummy's wraps of healing bandages.

"What'd they say about her?" He asked.

Batty shrugged.

"Rough. But gonna live." He replied. "Wouldn't tell me much beside that. Guess doctors here have doctor patient confidentiality too. And she's a royal. But they did say she'd be okay."

James nodded. "That's good." He said as he laid back again. "That all sounds good."

The two of them sat in companionable silence, James was glad to see his old friend up and moving again, even if it was with great difficulty.

"You really fight our people dude?" Batty asked hesitantly after a while. "Like.... U.S. Military personnel?"

James looked at him with a concerned expression, then looked back up at the ceiling as he thought.

"Yeah." He answered after a moment. "Didn't want to. Tried to do it the easy way and just talk things through. But.... they didn't go for it." He reached up and touched a spot on his face where Kai had previously patched him back together, but he couldn't feel the scar there anymore. "And that was even AFTER they'd already tried to kill me once." He added.

Batty watched him curiously for a moment.

"Shit." He said finally. "That means we got mad problems coming doesn't it?"

James nodded slowly. "Yep." He answered. "Yep. Lots of problems."

Batty raised his fist up again. "Well. Guess it's a good thing that I'm not actually in the military anymore huh?" James bumped the fist again. "I gotchu dog." He said as he spun his wheelchair around. "Soon as I'm up and moving again. I gotchu."

James smiled. "Thanks man." He nodded a bit more. "That is actually really reassuring to hear."

Batty slapped his leg lightly, causing James to wince just a little bit. "I gotta get to my therapy. I'll come let you know what I find out about your lil bro later." He said as he wheeled out of the open door.

"Thanks dude!" James called out to him. "Don't flirt with the nurses too hard!"

"Too late!" Batty yelled back as James heard the wooden rolling noises recede down the hallway outside.

Then James heard a rustling noise and realized that Amina was waking up. He smiled, glad to see her moving again.

\----------

Vickers watched silently and with a practiced neutral expression on his face from the small observation room in the Ambassadorial wing of the castle.

It was cliche how similar the setup was to all the interrogation rooms from movies back home. But he'd been subjected to similar questioning when he'd first blown his cover, so he knew the drill.

The fact that the room he was in now actually told the Petravians when the person being interrogated LIED was a revelation though. And the fact that they had werewolves do the questioning because their enhanced hearing allowed for feedback from the people in the room with him, via a series of clickers, was honestly kind of impressive to him.

"So you had no knowledge of your leader's intention to initiate a battle?" The wolf on the other side asked.

"Only that I knew that she was an overly Hooah asshole." First Sergeant Nguyen replied. "And probably a fucking psychotic. But I'm not a shrink."

The wall around the observation window flashed a soft green color and the Petravian observer hit the lower tone clicker. The werewolf interrogator's ear turned that way briefly, then they continued.

"And you and your so called, 'original team members' were only there for observational and research purposes?"

Nguyen hung his head a bit. Vickers could read the discomfort on the mans face. Getting interrogated was worst case scenario for any service member. Much less doing so under these conditions.

"Observation. Information gathering. Research. And to give our people a safe, empty, space to conduct experiments to help us figure out a way home." Nguyen admitted. "We were never sent here to start a fight. Most of the people I came with actually weren't even military. Two thirds of them were civilian scientists."

The wall flashed green with a short flash of red after. The observer clicked one tone, then the other very quickly.

"And that's all?" The wolf asked. "Nothing else?"

Nguyen sighed. "Only an idiot wouldn't expect the brass to use our location as a beachhead." He said. "But by then it was expected that me and my crew would've rotated back."

The wall flashed green again, another clicker tone.

"So the plan was always an invasion?" The wolf asked.

Nguyen let out an exasperated groan.

"Man I don't know." He said in frustration. "I'm not a General or a politician or whatever. I saw a chance to explore a new world with a bunch of magic and stuff. And supposedly one of my old recruits was some kinda super hero there. I figured it would be one last, admittedly weird, deployment before I retired. And if it turned out to be what they said it was in the briefing, then I might get to bring back a cool as souvenir. Excalibur two point oh, or a flying carpet, or something. Plus the pay for while we're over here is MASSIVE."

Vickers nodded as the wall flashed green again and the observer hit the clicker. It was basically the same as his story for coming here.

"Are there any more of your people in this world?" The wolf asked. "Besides the people already accounted for here in the castle?"

That caught Vickers' attention, and he noticed the observer glance at him out of the corner of his eye. But he kept his emotional mask on.

"No. Not that I know of." Nguyen replied.

The wall flashed red.

"Nobody at all?" The wolf prodded after hearing the corresponding tone.

"I only know that there are still people unaccounted for from the same incident that brought Chief Vickers here." Nguyen answered. "We were briefed on that before we came over."

Red again. Vickers watched the observer cautiously with his peripheral vision. He himself remained as still and relaxed as he had the entire time.

Shit. He thought. Hope those two we sent out are still alive and far away. Or dead and buried already so they can't be caught out.

"Hmm. Moving on." The wolf said with obvious lack of belief. "How many people were at your camp and how many of them were these Civilians you spoke of?"

Vickers watched the rest with passive interest. Most of it was just standard post battle information confirmation. He imagined that the more interesting questions and interrogations would only be used once the King had made a decision regarding the agreements he'd made with Grant and Werner.

Still, the weight of the actions he and Choi had taken started to nag at him.

Whether his actions had been justified or not, the thought of being a traitor ate at his guts like nothing he'd ever done before.

Once Nguyen's interrogation was done he grabbed a few basics and stepped through the passage door so he could get Steve and Tom.

\----------

Jenkins woke up slowly, and groggily.

Everything was fuzzy and her body felt numb.

"Corporal Samantha L. Jenkins?" A man's voice asked her.

She turned to look at the source of the voice, and her head moved what felt like seconds after she'd told it to.

"Yyyyeeeeaaaahhh?" She replied uncertainly.

"Born three July, twenty twenty three?" The voice asked. It was coming from a large man in a set of white medical clothes that made it impossible to see more than his eyes.

"Happy birthday." She said woozily. "That's.... my birthday too."

"She's still high as a kite." Said the voice. "Give her some stim."

She felt a cooling sensation in her neck. Then, after a few seconds, the fogginess cleared away and was replaced by a migraine and laser-like focus.

"Ah. Fuck." She said as she was suddenly assaulted by smells, sounds, and the taste of latex and chemicals. "What the fuck?"

Then she noticed how deep her voice was.

"Headache?" The voice asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "Where am I?" She tried to move, but her arms, legs, waist, chest, and head were all restrained. "What the fuck is going on? Why's my voice so deep? Why is everything so vivid."

This is what you get for disobedience. A voice said in her head. She jolted from the recognition of it.

Her eyes widened as they turned inward and she saw the massive, black furred, snout that was sticking out of her face now. She ran her tongue over her teeth and found that they were wickedly pointed and much longer than normal human teeth. She rubbed her fingers together and felt the long, claw ended, shape of them.

"No." She said as she realized that it hadn't been a nightmare.

"Corporal Jenkins. Are you able to remember what happened to you?"

"No." She said again as she began to struggle against the restraints. "No, no. This isn't real. This was a nightmare. I'm still back in my room."

"I'm sorry Ms. Jenkins." The man said. "I'm afraid it's all too real. We're going to help you out. But first you've gotta tell us what you remember."

"No. You're lying. This can't be real." She said as she continued struggling. One of the restraints on her leg began to tear. "Things like that don't exist."

"She's getting loose. Put her back under." The man said.

She felt that same cooling sensation from before. Then things grew foggy again. Before she knew it she was back asleep.

The doctor sighed. He couldn't blame her for her distress. It wasn't every day that someone woke up as a monster.

He slapped his thighs as he stood up from the stool he'd been sitting on outside the ballistic glass barrier to Jenkins' room.

"Let's see what else we can learn from the other two." He said. "At least they're not dealing with the world's first visibly diagnosable case of body dysmorphia."

Outside the small hospital, past the Military M.P.'s that had cordoned it off, countless news vans waited for word of the three heroes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z7cn2s/wait_is_this_just_gate_269/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (268/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Basically wrapping up this arc at this point. Next up is wedding bells and shattered cliches. Enjoy your leftovers and your weekend everyone.

\~\~\~

"Hey fool. Wake up." Said a familiar voice as James felt his foot being shaken.

As he slowly swam back into consciousness James saw the familiar face of his old friend Batista sitting near the foot of his bed.

"Batty?" He asked in a daze. "What are you doing here?"

"Regeneration therapy followed by good old fashioned physical therapy." He said with a grimace. "Plus it's finally cleared out a bit in here so I didn't feel like the wheels were getting in the way." He added as he popped his wooden wheelchair into a wheelie.

James stretched as he attempted to yawn, but was halted by the overwhelming soreness of most of his body.

"Oh god." He said as he instinctively curled up, which simply led to different parts of his body hurting. "How long has it been?"

"You've been out for two days homie." Batty said as he teetered on the wooden wheels of the chair. "They told me your mom, big Joe, and his teacher lady left this morning."

"Joey's cleared?" James asked. "Is he okay?"

Batty shrugged. "Don't know man." He admitted. "I heard what happened though. Hope the little dude's doin' alright. I was gonna see if I could track em down after this."

"Be awesome if you could give me an update once you do." James said as he held up his wolf-hand for a fist-bump. It was one of the few parts of him that didn't hurt. "How is your stomach doing?"

Batty let himself fall back forward. Then, with great effort and a grunt of exertion, lifted himself to his feet. He braced himself for a moment as he wobbled momentarily before lifting his shirt, showing the circular scars of the shotgun round that had hit him, and the surgical scars that had come from removing them from his abdomen before he could be fully healed. His stomach muscles flexed and spasmed as they fought to keep him upright.

After a few moments he flopped back down into the chair with a gasping exhale.

"Still all out of wack." He said as he caught his breath. "But way better than those first few days I'd woken up. Never realized just how vital abs were to doing..... well, just about everything really. And it doesn't help that my back muscles got jacked too." He smiled again. "Also, forcibly regenerating scarred and damaged muscles hurts like fuck dude." He tilted his head as he put on a sad expression. "Plus I can't drink as much because I'm missing a good chunk of my liver. How messed up is that?"

"They didn't regenerate your liver?" James asked. "Seems like that'd be important."

Batty nodded. "Right?" He asked with a chuckle. "Instead they focused on my intestines and spine, as if a Mexican NCO needs those more than a fully functioning liver." He joked.

James laughed despite how much it made the still healing hole in his chest ache. He looked over at the bed next to his and saw Amina there, still slumbering in her mummy's wraps of healing bandages.

"What'd they say about her?" He asked.

Batty shrugged.

"Rough. But gonna live." He replied. "Wouldn't tell me much beside that. Guess doctors here have doctor patient confidentiality too. And she's a royal. But they did say she'd be okay."

James nodded. "That's good." He said as he laid back again. "That all sounds good."

The two of them sat in companionable silence, James was glad to see his old friend up and moving again, even if it was with great difficulty.

"You really fight our people dude?" Batty asked hesitantly after a while. "Like.... U.S. Military personnel?"

James looked at him with a concerned expression, then looked back up at the ceiling as he thought.

"Yeah." He answered after a moment. "Didn't want to. Tried to do it the easy way and just talk things through. But.... they didn't go for it." He reached up and touched a spot on his face where Kai had previously patched him back together, but he couldn't feel the scar there anymore. "And that was even AFTER they'd already tried to kill me once." He added.

Batty watched him curiously for a moment.

"Shit." He said finally. "That means we got mad problems coming doesn't it?"

James nodded slowly. "Yep." He answered. "Yep. Lots of problems."

Batty raised his fist up again. "Well. Guess it's a good thing that I'm not actually in the military anymore huh?" James bumped the fist again. "I gotchu dog." He said as he spun his wheelchair around. "Soon as I'm up and moving again. I gotchu."

James smiled. "Thanks man." He nodded a bit more. "That is actually really reassuring to hear."

Batty slapped his leg lightly, causing James to wince just a little bit. "I gotta get to my therapy. I'll come let you know what I find out about your lil bro later." He said as he wheeled out of the open door.

"Thanks dude!" James called out to him. "Don't flirt with the nurses too hard!"

"Too late!" Batty yelled back as James heard the wooden rolling noises recede down the hallway outside.

Then James heard a rustling noise and realized that Amina was waking up. He smiled, glad to see her moving again.

\----------

Vickers watched silently and with a practiced neutral expression on his face from the small observation room in the Ambassadorial wing of the castle.

It was cliche how similar the setup was to all the interrogation rooms from movies back home. But he'd been subjected to similar questioning when he'd first blown his cover, so he knew the drill.

The fact that the room he was in now actually told the Petravians when the person being interrogated LIED was a revelation though. And the fact that they had werewolves do the questioning because their enhanced hearing allowed for feedback from the people in the room with him, via a series of clickers, was honestly kind of impressive to him.

"So you had no knowledge of your leader's intention to initiate a battle?" The wolf on the other side asked.

"Only that I knew that she was an overly Hooah asshole." First Sergeant Nguyen replied. "And probably a fucking psychotic. But I'm not a shrink."

The wall around the observation window flashed a soft green color and the Petravian observer hit the lower tone clicker. The werewolf interrogator's ear turned that way briefly, then they continued.

"And you and your so called, 'original team members' were only there for observational and research purposes?"

Nguyen hung his head a bit. Vickers could read the discomfort on the mans face. Getting interrogated was worst case scenario for any service member. Much less doing so under these conditions.

"Observation. Information gathering. Research. And to give our people a safe, empty, space to conduct experiments to help us figure out a way home." Nguyen admitted. "We were never sent here to start a fight. Most of the people I came with actually weren't even military. Two thirds of them were civilian scientists."

The wall flashed green with a short flash of red after. The observer clicked one tone, then the other very quickly.

"And that's all?" The wolf asked. "Nothing else?"

Nguyen sighed. "Only an idiot wouldn't expect the brass to use our location as a beachhead." He said. "But by then it was expected that me and my crew would've rotated back."

The wall flashed green again, another clicker tone.

"So the plan was always an invasion?" The wolf asked.

Nguyen let out an exasperated groan.

"Man I don't know." He said in frustration. "I'm not a General or a politician or whatever. I saw a chance to explore a new world with a bunch of magic and stuff. And supposedly one of my old recruits was some kinda super hero there. I figured it would be one last, admittedly weird, deployment before I retired. And if it turned out to be what they said it was in the briefing, then I might get to bring back a cool ass souvenir. Excalibur two point oh, or a flying carpet, or something. Plus the pay for while we're over here is MASSIVE."

Vickers nodded as the wall flashed green again and the observer hit the clicker. It was basically the same as his story for coming here.

"Are there any more of your people in this world?" The wolf asked. "Besides the people already accounted for here in the castle?"

That caught Vickers' attention, and he noticed the observer glance at him out of the corner of his eye. But he kept his emotional mask on.

"No. Not that I know of." Nguyen replied.

The wall flashed red.

"Nobody at all?" The wolf prodded after hearing the corresponding tone.

"I only know that there are still people unaccounted for from the same incident that brought Chief Vickers here." Nguyen answered. "We were briefed on that before we came over."

Red again. Vickers watched the observer cautiously with his peripheral vision. He himself remained as still and relaxed as he had the entire time.

Shit. He thought. Hope those two we sent out are still alive and far away. Or dead and buried already so they can't be caught out.

"Hmm. Moving on." The wolf said with obvious lack of belief. "How many people were at your camp and how many of them were these Civilians you spoke of?"

Vickers watched the rest with passive interest. Most of it was just standard post battle information confirmation. He imagined that the more interesting questions and interrogations would only be used once the King had made a decision regarding the agreements he'd made with Grant and Werner.

Still, the weight of the actions he and Choi had taken started to nag at him.

Whether his actions had been justified or not, the thought of being a traitor ate at his guts like nothing he'd ever done before.

Once Nguyen's interrogation was done he grabbed a few basics and stepped through the passage door so he could get Steve and Tom.

\----------

Jenkins woke up slowly, and groggily.

Everything was fuzzy and her body felt numb.

"Corporal Samantha L. Jenkins?" A man's voice asked her.

She turned to look at the source of the voice, and her head moved what felt like seconds after she'd told it to.

"Yyyyeeeeaaaahhh?" She replied uncertainly.

"Born three July, twenty twenty three?" The voice asked. It was coming from a large man in a set of white medical clothes that made it impossible to see more than his eyes.

"Happy birthday." She said woozily. "That's.... my birthday too."

"She's still high as a kite." Said the voice. "Give her some stim."

She felt a cooling sensation in her neck. Then, after a few seconds, the fogginess cleared away and was replaced by a migraine and laser-like focus.

"Ah. Fuck." She said as she was suddenly assaulted by smells, sounds, and the taste of latex and chemicals. "What the fuck?"

Then she noticed how deep her voice was.

"Headache?" The voice asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "Where am I?" She tried to move, but her arms, legs, waist, chest, and head were all restrained. "What the fuck is going on? Why's my voice so deep? Why is everything so vivid."

This is what you get for disobedience. A voice said in her head. She jolted from the recognition of it.

Her eyes widened as they turned inward and she saw the massive, black furred, snout that was sticking out of her face now. She ran her tongue over her teeth and found that they were wickedly pointed and much longer than normal human teeth. She rubbed her fingers together and felt the long, claw ended, shape of them.

"No." She said as she realized that it hadn't been a nightmare.

"Corporal Jenkins. Are you able to remember what happened to you?"

"No." She said again as she began to struggle against the restraints. "No, no. This isn't real. This was a nightmare. I'm still back in my room."

"I'm sorry Ms. Jenkins." The man said. "I'm afraid it's all too real. We're going to help you out. But first you've gotta tell us what you remember."

"No. You're lying. This can't be real." She said as she continued struggling. One of the restraints on her leg began to tear. "Things like that don't exist."

"She's getting loose. Put her back under." The man said.

She felt that same cooling sensation from before. Then things grew foggy again. Before she knew it she was back asleep.

The doctor sighed. He couldn't blame her for her distress. It wasn't every day that someone woke up as a monster.

He slapped his thighs as he stood up from the stool he'd been sitting on outside the ballistic glass barrier to Jenkins' room.

"Let's see what else we can learn from the other two." He said. "At least they're not dealing with the world's first visibly diagnosable case of body dysmorphia."

Outside the small hospital, past the Military M.P.'s that had cordoned it off, countless news vans waited for word of the three heroes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z7cl1n/wait_is_this_just_gate_269/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (267/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Tomorrow is Turkey Day and I intend to get absolutely WHITE-GIRL-WASTED on some gravy and cranberry sauce soaked bird meat. Plus good ole fashioned regular wasted on beer and family drama. So I aint gonna be on here. I will be back friday. Then it'll be the weekend.

In the mean time. Let's check up on some stuff that got set aside (temporarily) in favor of explosions and drama.

PARTY ON WAYNE!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Good evening folks." Says the well dressed man sitting at the table. "I'm Troy Lake." He gestures to the equally well dressed woman seated next to him who smiles and gives a small wave. "This is Amanda Nunez, here live at CNN Ready News."

The camera pans over a bit to focus on just him, with a small pop up next to him showing an image of three silhouetted figures that are made to look like generic super heroes.

"We come to you tonight with the news, which Amanda and I will go over rather quickly after our first commercial break. But first lets address the uh... WOLF... in the room." He says with a coy smirk at the lazy joke. "Last night at approximately six thirty in the evening, outside the town of Sturgis, South Dakota -typically known for its yearly motorcycle festival- something entirely unexpected and I daresay, nightmarish, occurred at a local Military Base."

The pop-up changes to show a short clip of some soldiers holding a position outside of a local medical clinic, firing their weapons at a series of fast moving, lupine, blurs. After a few seconds it changes to a view of a massive glowing wolf monster as it slaps a helicopter out of the air with a swipe of its paw. Then a short clip of a news reporter, Samantha Flair, as she reacts to the werewolves appearing in the street behind her. It changes again just as the camera man dropped his camera and ran. Then it shows a short, dark skinned, woman in a mish-mash of modern military wear, an old Greek style shield, and a sharpened stick, flying through the air in blurry, frame-by-frame, slow motion shot from far away as she leapt at the neck of the wolf monster.

"We also come to you with news...." Troy Lake continues. "Of what may be... the first ever.... documented.... super heroes. " He raises his eyebrows and tilts his head forward just a bit. "We'll have more on that, and several eye witness accounts, after this break and a brief rundown of the news. I'm Troy Lake, alongside Amanda Nunez, and once again this is CNN Ready News."

\----------

Colonel Muhammed clicked off the small screen as she picked up the ringing phone in her office.

"He's here ma'am." Said the Lieutenant on the other side of the phone. "M-One is beginning touch down procedure as we speak."

"Understood." She replied as she hung up, stood up and adjusted her uniform.

She let out a long, exhausted, exhalation before walking to the door.

"Good evening Mr. President." She said softly, rehearsing, as she walked. "Welcome to Fort Irwin Mr. President." She said with a shake of her head. "Welcome to Inter-Dimensional Observation Post One Mr. President." She groaned as she said that one.

She paused for a second, tilting her head a bit as she took a deep breath.

"Welcome to the Shit Show Boss." She said with a nervous chuckle. "War crimes are buy one get one free, act fast."

A young MP walked past with an M.W.D. and gave her a confused look as he nodded and said, "Afternoon ma'am." She nodded and replied as he scurried away uncertainly.

Then she continued her nervous march toward the main doors of the facility.

\----------

"I can't speak for this Colonel, your Majesty." Ambassador Werner said from where she stood in front of the King and his advisors. "I wasn't made aware of any other military operations occurring in secondary locations. And I certainly never would have expected such overt hostility of one either."

"Glad to hear." King Farrick responded with a hint of annoyance. "That doesn't change the fact that nearly three hundred Petravian Soldiers and Mages were killed in an attack that was initiated by the Military from your world, who were actively invading my country. Which I will remind you was officially recognized as YOUR ALLY." He said as he held up several documents from his table. They all recognized the signatures of both the King and the reportedly dead Secretary of Defense and General from Earth.

Werner held her hands up in a placating gesture.

"Yes... Sir." She said somewhat awkwardly. "This is a, pardon my language, fuck up... of the highest order. It never should have happened."

"I understand." The King continued, ignoring her placation. "That the captain and his comrades were originally brought to this world in.... less than ideal circumstances. But we've explained that HOW they were brought here was incidental to solving a larger issue." He jabbed his finger at the desk as he spoke. "But we have done everything in our power to accommodate the Captain, Chief Vickers, Captain Choi's newly arrived family and friend. AND.... yourself ambassador. We're even teaching YOU," He poked his finger at her angrily. "magic from what I understand."

He slammed his hand on the papers, sending them sliding a bit even as Werner flinched from the unexpected noise.

"I didn't believe Vickers' story even as I heard it. But at least it had some level of plausibility." He almost yelled. "But there is... NO.... justifiable reason for what has happened this time." He pointed past her at the doors to the chamber. "I have a Healing ward full of the wounded. A pile of dead soldiers from both sides. And a mass of charred remains and glassed sand out in the dessert. This was an invasion of both my country and my world. There is no other name for it." He spat, the veins on his neck straining as he spoke. "By all rights I should have you imprisoned alongside these soldiers of yours." He poked at the scattered papers. "Consider yourself lucky that IIIIIII know how to honor legal agreements and will treat your prisoners with the respect and rights afforded to them by our agreements." He stood up and glared at her. "FOR AS LONG.... AS I DEEM THEM WORTHY OF BEING HONORED!"

Werner tried to reply as the King began to move toward the exit, a pair of royal guards flanking him as he moved. But he held up a finger.

"Speak to your little box. Salvage whatever you can of this... this... this MESS!" He yelled. "And pray that whatever they say or offer is enough to keep your people from the axe."

Then the door opened and he stormed out. Leaving her standing their awkwardly in front of the few remaining dignitaries.

\----------

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.

It didn't help that the small room was completely devoid of detail. Not just in the sense of being boring either. It was made of a completely flat, almost glass like, grey stone, as if it were the most expertly polished concrete in existence.

He'd hammered at it with his one remaining fist for the first "Day" of being here. He'd hit the grey material hard enough that he could have peeled open a tank. But the "stone" hadn't so much as chipped.

Curiously, his suit also read that there was ZERO breathable air outside of it. Not just that there was no Oxygen or Hydrogen anything like that. Instead its sensors read the space in the room as being virtually empty, as though he was in a vacuum. Typically that would be an issue. Their suits could handle vacuums, albeit not as well as deep sea conditions, but they would run out of air.

Yet his re-breather's levels hadn't even budged in the days(?) that he'd been in here.

His mind ached as it attempted to figure out what was happening to him.

He remembered falling down while bundled in the spider webs. Remembered impacting the floor.

Then he'd passed out for an indeterminate amount of time and he'd woken up without the webs, and in this grey room.

He wondered if the Major had suffered a similar fate. And if she had, was she also breathing without a tangible atmosphere? Was she starving? He should have been, he hadn't eaten anything except nutrition paste, which would keep him alive and moving with its high caloric intake. But even with artificially regulate bowels it still let him feel hunger pangs. How would someone without that do with however long they'd gone without eating.

It was as he was thinking this that his view changed.

Suddenly, instead of standing in a room of grey stone, he was looking at a room with a small number of people in it.

He tried to move, but as he did his HUD gave him pressure warnings on his arms and legs. He looked at his side camera views and saw that his remaining arm was encased in some kind of dark, slightly pulsing, material. So was his left shoulder, which still had no arm, and both of his legs. There was also a band of the stuff around his waist.

"An interesting mind you have there Mr. Driscoll." Said a voice that was equal parts smooth, and nasal. "We had thought you some kind of advanced construct, and you are. But you are also a man. Yet your mind perceives itself as your... body, such as it is.... appears."

His attention snapped forward to the tall, thin, man who was speaking. His eyes glowed a dull red as he looked at Driscoll.

"Who are you?" He asked. "Where am I?"

"Where you are is unimportant." One of the other people, whose eyes also glowed dull red, said as they stood beside the first man. This one was a short dwarven man. "But we... are the ones that your Captain Choi has likely warned you about."

"We." They said in perfect unison, and two other people joined them. But not everyone present did. "Are the Agency. And we have an offer for you."

\----------

Navarro panted as he ran.

He could hear the other wolves beside him. Could smell them. They were panting too. They all stank of blood and sweat and countless other odors that had come from the long fight throughout the town.

It was as they had seen Champion Dranek fall that they had all received the final message from their new goddess. He still wasn't completely sold on the concept of a god. But the fact that the other wolves had received the same message in their minds, word for word, spoke to its authenticity.

And so now they were running.

Their.... pack... would head north, into the woods and cold that would make it difficult to follow them or maintain visual. Another pack headed south, towards larger population centers and warmer climates, that they might spread their numbers more rapidly.

A third pack, those who had refused to run or simply been to engrossed in their newfound powers and senses, had stayed to wreak as much havoc as they could. They were all but guaranteed to fall. Navarro had seen, hell had fought alongside this very pack, just to get free of the military forces surrounding the area. Only their newly bolstered numbers had gained their freedom for them.

That and the fact that the soldiers hadn't been prepared for ACTUAL werewolves despite the commands and intel they'd no doubt received.

Still, they had lost nearly a dozen of this packs original thirty.

And now he and the others were running. He didn't know how they would know when they'd gone far enough. Whether the goddess would notify them of safety, or if they'd have to determine it for themselves.

All he knew was that his enhanced hearing and smell could still detect the helicopters and other vehicles trailing them.

So for now, they continued forward.

\---

Gila'na and Morl'yn were enjoying a day of fishing when it happened.

As always Mo was catching more fish than Gila was as the two young elves sat in their small boat, tethered to the shore where their parents were working on laundry. This always mildly annoyed Mo as it made him feel like he was the only one doing anything. But Gila made up for it by singing the songs he'd learned in their village song classes. Gila had the best voice of any of the boys their age, and as mad as his laziness made Mo, Mo still enjoyed music. Even if he himself couldn't hold a not with a net.

But Morl'yn could fish, that was for sure.

Gila had been singing the song of the River Maiden, the spirit who was married to the ancient caretaker of the forest lands, when their bolt had jolted and Gila had let out a quick yelp in surprise.

Then they'd begun drifting.

"What was that Gi?" Morl had asked.

"I don't know Mo." The young blond elf had said. "But something weird just happened to the water. And I think it just loosed our line."

"What?" Morl'yn wondered as he looked back.

"That's incredibly odd." Gila said as he looked at the disturbance.

Morl'yn only saw the odd cavity in the lake surface for a moment, then had to brace himself in the boat as it began to move.

"Oh gods Mo!" Gila exclaimed. "It's pulling us in."

"What?" Morl'yn asked. "What is?"

"Whatever cut our line!" Gila replied. "HELP! MOTHER! FATHER!"

"What in the hells-" Morl'yn was on the verge of asking as he struggled to turn around.

Then he saw the vortex that was forming around what appeared to be a space of.... well... nothing, as far as he could tell.

Whatever it was, the lake was flowing into it, and them along with it.

"GI!" He yelled as they neared the empty space. "GET O-"

Before he could finish the statement he startled as he felt cold water splash his back, and heard his brother yell, "MO!"

Then, as their parents ran into the lake feebly, and as the trees near the shore began to vanish near their crowns, the two elves, and their boat, disappeared.

\------------------------

Defiance looked at the scene below with mild fascination as the small, primarily Elven, village was devoured. As a god he had all the knowledge of the Cleanser that the other gods did. He could even dismiss the thing if he wanted.

But that wasn't his role in all of this.

"That's gonna be a tough one to deal with." He said with a shrug. "Well.... Back home I guess."

He shimmered green for a moment, in that space that only THEY could access fully. Then he switched dimensions.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z4ucfd/wait_is_this_just_gate_268/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (267/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Tomorrow is Turkey Day and I intend to get absolutely WHITE-GIRL-WASTED on some gravy and cranberry sauce soaked bird meat. Plus good ole fashioned regular wasted on beer and family drama. So I aint gonna be on here. I will be back friday. Then it'll be the weekend.

In the mean time. Let's check up on some stuff that got set aside (temporarily) in favor of explosions and drama.

PARTY ON WAYNE!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Good evening folks." Says the well dressed man sitting at the table. "I'm Troy Lake." He gestures to the equally well dressed woman seated next to him who smiles and gives a small wave. "This is Amanda Nunez, here live at CNN Ready News."

The camera pans over a bit to focus on just him, with a small pop up next to him showing an image of three silhouetted figures that are made to look like generic super heroes.

"We come to you tonight with the news, which Amanda and I will go over rather quickly after our first commercial break. But first lets address the uh... WOLF... in the room." He says with a coy smirk at the lazy joke. "Last night at approximately six thirty in the evening, outside the town of Sturgis, South Dakota -typically known for its yearly motorcycle festival- something entirely unexpected and I daresay, nightmarish, occurred at a local Military Base."

The pop-up changes to show a short clip of some soldiers holding a position outside of a local medical clinic, firing their weapons at a series of fast moving, lupine, blurs. After a few seconds it changes to a view of a massive glowing wolf monster as it slaps a helicopter out of the air with a swipe of its paw. Then a short clip of a news reporter, Samantha Flair, as she reacts to the werewolves appearing in the street behind her. It changes again just as the camera man dropped his camera and ran. Then it shows a short, dark skinned, woman in a mish-mash of modern military wear, an old Greek style shield, and a sharpened stick, flying through the air in blurry, frame-by-frame, slow motion shot from far away as she leapt at the neck of the wolf monster.

"We also come to you with news...." Troy Lake continues. "Of what may be... the first ever.... documented.... super heroes. " He raises his eyebrows and tilts his head forward just a bit. "We'll have more on that, and several eye witness accounts, after this break and a brief rundown of the news. I'm Troy Lake, alongside Amanda Nunez, and once again this is CNN Ready News."

\----------

Colonel Muhammed clicked off the small screen as she picked up the ringing phone in her office.

"He's here ma'am." Said the Lieutenant on the other side of the phone. "M-One is beginning touch down procedure as we speak."

"Understood." She replied as she hung up, stood up and adjusted her uniform.

She let out a long, exhausted, exhalation before walking to the door.

"Good evening Mr. President." She said softly, rehearsing, as she walked. "Welcome to Fort Irwin Mr. President." She said with a shake of her head. "Welcome to Inter-Dimensional Observation Post One Mr. President." She groaned as she said that one.

She paused for a second, tilting her head a bit as she took a deep breath.

"Welcome to the Shit Show Boss." She said with a nervous chuckle. "War crimes are buy one get one free, act fast."

A young MP walked past with an M.W.D. and gave her a confused look as he nodded and said, "Afternoon ma'am." She nodded and replied as he scurried away uncertainly.

Then she continued her nervous march toward the main doors of the facility.

\----------

"I can't speak for this Colonel, your Majesty." Ambassador Werner said from where she stood in front of the King and his advisors. "I wasn't made aware of any other military operations occurring in secondary locations. And I certainly never would have expected such overt hostility of one either."

"Glad to hear." King Farrick responded with a hint of annoyance. "That doesn't change the fact that nearly three hundred Petravian Soldiers and Mages were killed in an attack that was initiated by the Military from your world, who were actively invading my country. Which I will remind you was officially recognized as YOUR ALLY." He said as he held up several documents from his table. They all recognized the signatures of both the King and the reportedly dead Secretary of Defense and General from Earth.

Werner held her hands up in a placating gesture.

"Yes... Sir." She said somewhat awkwardly. "This is a, pardon my language, fuck up... of the highest order. It never should have happened."

"I understand." The King continued, ignoring her placation. "That the captain and his comrades were originally brought to this world in.... less than ideal circumstances. But we've explained that HOW they were brought here was incidental to solving a larger issue." He jabbed his finger at the desk as he spoke. "But we have done everything in our power to accommodate the Captain, Chief Vickers, Captain Choi's newly arrived family and friend. AND.... yourself ambassador. We're even teaching YOU," He poked his finger at her angrily. "magic from what I understand."

He slammed his hand on the papers, sending them sliding a bit even as Werner flinched from the unexpected noise.

"I didn't believe Vickers' story even as I heard it. But at least it had some level of plausibility." He almost yelled. "But there is... NO.... justifiable reason for what has happened this time." He pointed past her at the doors to the chamber. "I have a Healing ward full of the wounded. A pile of dead soldiers from both sides. And a mass of charred remains and glassed sand out in the dessert. This was an invasion of both my country and my world. There is no other name for it." He spat, the veins on his neck straining as he spoke. "By all rights I should have you imprisoned alongside these soldiers of yours." He poked at the scattered papers. "Consider yourself lucky that IIIIIII know how to honor legal agreements and will treat your prisoners with the respect and rights afforded to them by our agreements." He stood up and glared at her. "FOR AS LONG.... AS I DEEM THEM WORTHY OF BEING HONORED!"

Werner tried to reply as the King began to move toward the exit, a pair of royal guards flanking him as he moved. But he held up a finger.

"Speak to your little box. Salvage whatever you can of this... this... this MESS!" He yelled. "And pray that whatever they say or offer is enough to keep your people from the axe."

Then the door opened and he stormed out. Leaving her standing their awkwardly in front of the few remaining dignitaries.

\----------

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.

It didn't help that the small room was completely devoid of detail. Not just in the sense of being boring either. It was made of a completely flat, almost glass like, grey stone, as if it were the most expertly polished concrete in existence.

He'd hammered at it with his one remaining fist for the first "Day" of being here. He'd hit the grey material hard enough that he could have peeled open a tank. But the "stone" hadn't so much as chipped.

Curiously, his suit also read that there was ZERO breathable air outside of it. Not just that there was no Oxygen or Hydrogen anything like that. Instead its sensors read the space in the room as being virtually empty, as though he was in a vacuum. Typically that would be an issue. Their suits could handle vacuums, albeit not as well as deep sea conditions, but they would run out of air.

Yet his re-breather's levels hadn't even budged in the days(?) that he'd been in here.

His mind ached as it attempted to figure out what was happening to him.

He remembered falling down while bundled in the spider webs. Remembered impacting the floor.

Then he'd passed out for an indeterminate amount of time and he'd woken up without the webs, and in this grey room.

He wondered if the Major had suffered a similar fate. And if she had, was she also breathing without a tangible atmosphere? Was she starving? He should have been, he hadn't eaten anything except nutrition paste, which would keep him alive and moving with its high caloric intake. But even with artificially regulate bowels it still let him feel hunger pangs. How would someone without that do with however long they'd gone without eating.

It was as he was thinking this that his view changed.

Suddenly, instead of standing in a room of grey stone, he was looking at a room with a small number of people in it.

He tried to move, but as he did his HUD gave him pressure warnings on his arms and legs. He looked at his side camera views and saw that his remaining arm was encased in some kind of dark, slightly pulsing, material. So was his left shoulder, which still had no arm, and both of his legs. There was also a band of the stuff around his waist.

"An interesting mind you have there Mr. Driscoll." Said a voice that was equal parts smooth, and nasal. "We had thought you some kind of advanced construct, and you are. But you are also a man. Yet your mind perceives itself as your... body, such as it is.... appears."

His attention snapped forward to the tall, thin, man who was speaking. His eyes glowed a dull red as he looked at Driscoll.

"Who are you?" He asked. "Where am I?"

"Where you are is unimportant." One of the other people, whose eyes also glowed dull red, said as they stood beside the first man. This one was a short dwarven man. "But we... are the ones that your Captain Choi has likely warned you about."

"We." They said in perfect unison, and two other people joined them. But not everyone present did. "Are the Agency. And we have an offer for you."

\------------------

Navarro panted as he ran.

He could hear the other wolves beside him. Could smell them. They were panting too. They all stank of blood and sweat and countless other odors that had come from the long fight throughout the town.

It was as they had seen Champion Dranek fall that they had all received the final message from their new goddess. He still wasn't completely sold on the concept of a god. But the fact that the other wolves had received the same message in their minds, word for word, spoke to its authenticity.

And so now they were running.

Their.... pack... would head north, into the woods and cold that would make it difficult to follow them or maintain visual. Another pack headed south, towards larger population centers and warmer climates, that they might spread their numbers more rapidly.

A third pack, those who had refused to run or simply been to engrossed in their newfound powers and senses, had stayed to wreak as much havoc as they could. They were all but guaranteed to fall. Navarro had seen, hell had fought alongside this very pack, just to get free of the military forces surrounding the area. Only their newly bolstered numbers had gained their freedom for them.

That and the fact that the soldiers hadn't been prepared for ACTUAL werewolves despite the commands and intel they'd no doubt received.

Still, they had lost nearly a dozen of this packs original thirty.

And now he and the others were running. He didn't know how they would know when they'd gone far enough. Whether the goddess would notify them of safety, or if they'd have to determine it for themselves.

All he knew was that his enhanced hearing and smell could still detect the helicopters and other vehicles trailing them.

So for now, they continued forward.

\---------------------------------

Gila'na and Morl'yn were enjoying a day of fishing when it happened.

As always Mo was catching more fish than Gila was as the two young elves sat in their small boat, tethered to the shore where their parents were working on laundry. This always mildly annoyed Mo as it made him feel like he was the only one doing anything. But Gila made up for it by singing the songs he'd learned in their village song classes. Gila had the best voice of any of the boys their age, and as mad as his laziness made Mo, Mo still enjoyed music. Even if he himself couldn't hold a not with a net.

But Morl'yn could fish, that was for sure.

Gila had been singing the song of the River Maiden, the spirit who was married to the ancient caretaker of the forest lands, when their boat had jolted and Gila had let out a quick yelp in surprise.

Then they'd begun drifting.

"What was that Gi?" Morl had asked.

"I don't know Mo." The young blond elf had said. "But something weird just happened to the water. And I think it just loosed our line."

"What?" Morl'yn wondered as he looked back.

"That's incredibly odd." Gila said as he looked at the disturbance.

Morl'yn only saw the odd cavity in the lake surface for a moment, then had to brace himself in the boat as it began to move.

"Oh gods Mo!" Gila exclaimed. "It's pulling us in."

"What?" Morl'yn asked. "What is?"

"Whatever cut our line!" Gila replied. "HELP! MOTHER! FATHER!"

"What in the hells-" Morl'yn was on the verge of asking as he struggled to turn around.

Then he saw the vortex that was forming around what appeared to be a space of.... well... nothing, as far as he could tell.

Whatever it was, the lake was flowing into it, and them along with it.

"GI!" He yelled as they neared the empty space. "GET O-"

Before he could finish the statement he startled as he felt cold water splash his back, and heard his brother yell, "MO!"

Then, as their parents ran into the lake feebly, and as the trees near the shore began to vanish near their crowns, the two elves, and their boat, disappeared.

\-----------------------

Defiance looked at the scene below with mild fascination as the small, primarily Elven, village was devoured. As a god he had all the knowledge of the Cleanser that the other gods did. He could even dismiss the thing if he wanted.

But that wasn't his role in all of this.

"That's gonna be a tough one to deal with." He said with a shrug. "Well.... Back home I guess."

He shimmered green for a moment, in that space that only THEY could access fully. Then he switched dimensions.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z4u9za/wait_is_this_just_gate_268/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (266/?)

Previous

Writer's note: And they all lived happily ever after. Nothing terrible ever happened to any of them every again. The end.

LOL. As if.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

sheeting that appeared to be sealed and pressurized. They wore hazmat suits with re-breathers, and a set of shackles on their ankles as Petravian guards watched them with crossbows at the ready.

He simply shrugged and continued walking.

One of the healers asked if he needed any help and he declined, simply asking for directions instead.

After a minute of quietly walking past all the soldiers, both Petravian and Earth born, he found the room he was looking for.

Choi and the princess slumbered, monitored by healers and covered in glowing green bandages. On the other side of the room the little mage, little Choi, and mama Choi slept. Though, Mrs Choi did so in a chair rather than a bed. She held her younger sons hand in hers as she slept.

Satisfied that everyone was going to live, scars or not, Vickers quietly left and regained the path to the door.

Lotta people died pointless fuckin deaths. He thought as he quietly walked down the halls. But for an unexpected bit of treason that didn't go too badly.

He paused in his tracks as he considered the implications of the admitted fact.

No going back now. He thought, and was glad he'd sent off the request.

Next time something like this happened he wouldn't need to worry about broken bones.

\--------------------------

"So you're telling me that those, 'other versions of me' were just piggybacking the energy from this very conversation to send me a message?" James asked, confusion evident on his face.

Defiance nodded his head. He now wore the form of an old World War Two era corpsman, having traded out his arrow riddled form for one that was easier to sit down in. Which he was doing as he snacked on a croissant slathered in honey.

"How's that even work?" James asked.

"It doesn't." Defiance said simply. "But time travel- in any form -is like that. That's why movies never get it right." It sipped at a bottle of Gatorade as it washed the croissant down and James wondered what the point was if the food wasn't even real. "But it DID work because they were piggybacking MY energy."

"Because you break rules?" James mused.

Defiance teetered back and forth for a moment.

"More like, conveniently ignore for maximum impact at key moments." It pointed at him. "Something you and your fellow mafia members are pros at."

"Mafia?" James asked.

Defiance held up its hands in a mock gang sign that normal human hands wouldn't be capable of without breaking some bones first.

"E-four mafia wassup." It said, dragging the last word out to last a few extra seconds.

James stared at the painfully contorted fingers in confusion.

"I've only met one other god before and you somehow still take the cake as the weirdest." He said after a moment. "Why the hell would I want to be your champion?"

"You don't." Defiance replied. "And that's what makes you perfect for it. And when the time comes you'll be given the power you need to do what otherwise CAN'T be done. Just like you always do."

"And I get no say in this?"

"Course you do." Defiance said with a grin. "You can always accept the powers happily."

"But that's what I DON'T want. I want nothing to do with you gods." James countered.

"Which is the exact reason you'll get them."

"What?" He asked, confused. "How does-"

"Don't think about it too hard." Defiance said. "Or do. I'm a god, not the thought police. I don't care."

James ran his hands over his face in exasperation. The two of them had been going around in circles for what felt like an hour now, assuming time mattered here.

"Okay why?" He asked in a strained voice. "Why help me?"

Defiance shrugged. "Because you resist. You... You. You get back up. You always get back up. Even when you've been beat to within an inch of your life you just, fuckin', keep going. Goddam energizer bunny shit man." It took another bite of the croissant. "Plus your story kicked off the chain of events that led to my creation. Or, you know, ACTUALLY gaining sentience and joining the pantheon. I always existed."

"Wait, really?" James asked.

"Yeah." It said simply. "Granted, it was always going to happen. Destiny and all that. But still. It's nice to get a bit of stretch in the metaphysical legs, you know?"

"Destiny?" James wondered quietly.

"Another thing to NOT think too hard about if you can help it." Defiance said as he stood up and dusted croissant crumbs off of the front of his uniform. "Me being here or not, it gets you either way." It nodded with a bit of a cringe. "Admittedly not ALL gods get that. Even though they're the ones that write the damn thing. But meh." It shrugged again. "They have fates too. Strings for the puppets, and for the puppeteers."

"Are you.... supposed to be telling me all this?" James wondered.

"GREAT QUESTION!" Defiance boomed as it rubbed its hands. The volume of its voice was so high that it made James's semi-real head ache.

Then it slapped him, full on, max strength for a normal body (or at least he assumed as much since a godly level slap would presumably erase him from history or something), right across his face.

He had a moment to wonder, What the fuck!

Then he gasped a deep breath as his view reverted back to that of the Healing Ward's ceiling, and all the pain of his body's injuries came screaming back into his mind.

"WHAT THE-!" He began before realizing that there were probably other people in the room. "What the fuck!?!" He hissed to himself.

Then he looked around and saw his family around him in varying states of unconsciousness.

Amina was in the bed to his left, bandages unable to hide the long black hair that flowed down over one of her shoulders. She snored ever so lightly as she slept. Joey was in the bed almost directly across from him, a band with a strange coin or medallion of some kind on his forehead. He could sense the magic in the item and wondered at it. Veliry was in the bed next to that one, a dull green glow emanating from around her waist that he'd have to ask about later. His mother lay with her head on the side of Joey's bed, his bandaged hand wrapped up in hers.

James slowly, and excruciatingly, rolled over onto his wolf arm. The damn thing, like always, seemed to be the first part of him that was even remotely healed. It still protested to the abuse as it steadied him uncertainly. Something in his abdomen shifted uncomfortably as he rolled, reminding him that he had been impaled several times in the course of the fight. He groaned a bit as he felt something settle inside him and wondered just how well healing magic did for internal injuries that the healer might not be able to see. Or if they'd gotten all the sand out of him.

After several long, pain filled, minutes James managed to stand up on shaky legs.

The irony of the last few things the so-called GOD of Defiance had told him was not lost on him as he managed the accomplishment.

He made a slow trip over to the small dresser nearby and opened it. He was happy to see that his suspicions about it were right, and a little upset that he was getting so familiar with these kinds of rooms.

He took the light blanket and small pillow over to his mother and lifted her head gently, just enough to slide the pillow under. Then he draped the blanket over her as she unconsciously nuzzled into the cushion.

He shook Joey's foot just a little bit as he walked past him and over to Amina's bed.

It took everything he had to bend over and plant a kiss on her forehead. Then he sat on the edge of the bed, woozy from all the physical exertion that simply crossing the room had caused.

He wanted to teeter over and fall face first onto the ground. But he knew that doing so would likely hurt him even more. And he didn't have the energy to get back up and go to his own bed. So he sat there for untold minutes, hand resting over Amina's, until one of the aides came in to check everyone and realized that he'd gotten up. They quickly called for the other healers, and James was back to sleep in bed before he even knew what was going on again.

Even half delirious from pain and exhaustion, James latched onto the fact that he hadn't lost anyone this time.

It was a nice change of pace from his last few big battles.

He went back under to the gently warm amber glow of healing magic.

\---

Jenkins looked at the form of the massive wolf from on top of what had used to be a perfectly good pickup truck.

It whimpered in a way that reminded her of how her parents dog had begun to sound as its arthritis had been getting to its final stages and it hadn't been able to lift itself. The wolf couldn't get up either. Its legs shook and quivered as it struggled to move. One of its eyes stared at her with a look that she thought might have been caught between a sad fear and a burning anger.

The massive, for lack of a better word, Hulk of a man who had battered the wolf along side her and the Wizard, came strolling around the side of the wolf with a cocksure swagger as they made a show of wiping their hands off. Something about the gesture seemed crass to her when next to a dying dog. Even one the size of a 747 that had just wrecked most of a town.

"Yeah!" Said the massive man, his shirtless muscles rippling with every movement as he walked over towards her and the wizard. "That's what you get for messing with me!" He said as he stared down the dying wolf monster.

Jenkins winced at the awkward display of bravado.

"Let me guess." Said the deep, and slightly Spanish accented wizard as he leaned on the gnarled staff that looked familiar to her. "Some weird voice offered you powers?"

She looked at him hesitantly, uncertain of whether she should reveal that she'd heard voices. But then again, he just had.

"Yeah." She said awkwardly. "Didn't exactly accept them though."

"I was about to ask." The wizard said. "Neither did I."

"Sup." Said the muscular man. Jenkins just stared at him as he walked over. "You guys talk to some douchey, supposed 'GOD'?" He asked as he made air quotes.

The wizard was on the verge of answering when the man continued speaking.

"I was on the verge of getting noshed on by one of the small ones when it spoke up. Made some big speech about how I had a DEFIANT SOUL or some nonsense." He shrugged. "I told it that it could either give me the powers or it could fuck off and let me focus on dying. Next thing I knew I was goin all Lou Ferrigno up in here." He flexed his comically large arms like a body builder for a second.

Then three things happened.

The wizard fell over onto the ground, landing awkwardly on his hands and knees as the armor from his body was replaced by a tattered set of construction workers clothes, white helmet and reflective vest included.

At the same time, the Hulking man seemed to shrink down at a rapid rate. Though Jenkins realized very quickly that it wasn't so much that He was shrinking quickly, as it was that she was simultaneously growing.

"Aw fuck!" The now average sized guy in a faded denim vest with several band patches and buttons on it exclaimed as he tripped over his own feet backing away. "It's one of them!"

Jenkins looked down in horror to see that her hands were once again furred and ended in claws. She reached up and touched her face, feeling the snout and the teeth once more.

"NO!" She cried in anguish as she backed away and fell awkwardly off of the wrecked truck. "No! I was me again!" She yelled in her once again deep, rumbling voice.

"You were one of them?" The construction wizard asked in confusion as he regained his feet. "Wait, they can talk?"

She cowered against the remains of a bus stop as she pawed at her nose and body in desperation.

"Put me back." She cried. "Put me back. Give me my body back. This isn't what I want."

"Shit." Said the former hulk who now looked like a punk band front-man as he cautiously stepped toward her. "They do talk."

"I was a person again." She said softly. "I'm not supposed to be a monster. I'm a person." She covered her nose with her clawed hands. "Too many smells."

"Hey." The punk said as he kneeled a few feet from her. "It's gonna be-"

Suddenly the area around the three of them was flooded with bright white light as a helicopter flew in low and slow and took position over them. Soldiers flooded around the corner of the pharmacy that the bus stop was next to. The soldiers were all in various states of dissarray and gore soaked messiness as they surrounded both the massive, dying wolf, and the three formerly powered individuals.

The punk and the construction worker both shot to their feet, hands raised as the soldiers surrounded them.

"ON YOUR KNEES!" One soldier yelled.

Jenkins stood up as all the weapons of the soldiers trained on her. She hung her head in defeat as she realized how they saw her now.

"I'm one of you!" She yelled in her wolfen voice. "Corporal Samantha Jenkins! DOD number two eight five, three eight-"

"Drop the wolf!" One of the soldiers yelled.

POP!

She fell to a knee as a rifle round slammed into her thigh and took her leg out from under her.

"Agh!" She cried. "No I'm-"

POP! PO-POP! PO-PO-PO-POP! A series of rapid bursts of rifle fire reported as they slammed into her repeatedly.

She dropped to the ground in excruciating pain as everything went dim.

"Secure the supers!" A loud, amplified, voice said from the helicopter. "Bring them in!"

"What are you doing?" Asked the construction worker as a pair of soldiers grabbed his wrists and maneuvered them behind him. "She's one of the ones that stopped that thing!" He yelled as they slid a pair of restraints on his wrists.

"Yo! You just killed one of the so-called SUPERS!" The punk yelled as he struggled to get loose from three of the soldiers. He spit at one of them as they grabbed his vest to hold him in place. "She was the freakin' amazon chick."

"That's impossible." Said one of the soldiers. "That was a human not a wolf."

"And I was the fuckin hulk dude!" The punk said. "Minus the green paint and bad CGI but that was me. How do I fuckin look now?"

"Get the fuck out of here." Said the same soldier.

"Dude." The punk said, gesturing at the construction worker with his head. "He was the wizard. I was the hulk. SHE was the amazon. We just like... I don't know, powered down or whatever just now."

The Sergeant leading the securing of the people that were widely being referred to as "Supers" radioed up to the chopper.

"You guys sure these are the ones that did it?" She asked. "That intel good? Cause I can see it with the wizard guy being bob the builder. But.... where'd the other two go?"

"Copy that ground." The helicopter's copilot replied. "Getting confirmation from command. But these are the ones they sent us to retrieve. Them and the big bad wolf. This is this spot we were dispatched to."

The Sergeant looked down at the wolf as it took ragged breaths and bled onto the pavement.

"Roger." The helicopter spoke up again. "Ground team. Command confirms. Those two AND the wolf are the ones that brought it down. Have your medics try to stabilize the wolf and bring them in too."

The Sergeant looked down at her radio with a bit of confusion.

"DOOOOC!" She yelled to the cluster of soldiers near the massive wolf monster, which had ceased moving. "Get over here!"

"I fuckin told you!" The Punk yelled as they were ushered away towards a waiting SUV. "Bunch o' assholes!"

And for the second time in a matter of hours, as the medic rushed over to her and nervously began attempting to treat her, Samantha Jenkins lingered on the border between life and death. Though this time she didn't have to worry as much, not that she was aware of it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z336vo/wait_is_this_just_gate_267/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (266/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: And they all lived happily ever after. Nothing terrible ever happened to any of them every again. The end.

LOL. As if.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

little Choi, and mama Choi slept. Though, Mrs Choi did so in a chair rather than a bed. She held her younger sons hand in hers as she slept.

Satisfied that everyone was going to live, scars or not, Vickers quietly left and regained the path to the door.

Lotta people died pointless fuckin deaths. He thought as he quietly walked down the halls. But for an unexpected bit of treason that didn't go too badly.

He paused in his tracks as he considered the implications of the admitted fact.

No going back now. He thought, and was glad he'd sent off the request.

Next time something like this happened he wouldn't need to worry about broken bones.

\-------------------------

"So you're telling me that those, 'other versions of me' were just piggybacking the energy from this very conversation to send me a message?" James asked, confusion evident on his face.

Defiance nodded his head. He now wore the form of an old World War Two era corpsman, having traded out his arrow riddled form for one that was easier to sit down in. Which he was doing as he snacked on a croissant slathered in honey.

"How's that even work?" James asked.

"It doesn't." Defiance said simply. "But time travel- in any form -is like that. That's why movies never get it right." It sipped at a bottle of Gatorade as it washed the croissant down and James wondered what the point was if the food wasn't even real. "But it DID work because they were piggybacking MY energy."

"Because you break rules?" James mused.

Defiance teetered back and forth for a moment.

"More like, conveniently ignore for maximum impact at key moments." It pointed at him. "Something you and your fellow mafia members are pros at."

"Mafia?" James asked.

Defiance held up its hands in a mock gang sign that normal human hands wouldn't be capable of without breaking some bones first.

"E-four mafia wassup." It said, dragging the last word out to last a few extra seconds.

James stared at the painfully contorted fingers in confusion.

"I've only met one other god before and you somehow still take the cake as the weirdest." He said after a moment. "Why the hell would I want to be your champion?"

"You don't." Defiance replied. "And that's what makes you perfect for it. And when the time comes you'll be given the power you need to do what otherwise CAN'T be done. Just like you always do."

"And I get no say in this?"

"Course you do." Defiance said with a grin. "You can always accept the powers happily."

"But that's what I DON'T want. I want nothing to do with you gods." James countered.

"Which is the exact reason you'll get them."

"What?" He asked, confused. "How does-"

"Don't think about it too hard." Defiance said. "Or do. I'm a god, not the thought police. I don't care."

James ran his hands over his face in exasperation. The two of them had been going around in circles for what felt like an hour now, assuming time mattered here.

"Okay why?" He asked in a strained voice. "Why help me?"

Defiance shrugged. "Because you resist. You... You. You get back up. You always get back up. Even when you've been beat to within an inch of your life you just, fuckin', keep going. Goddam energizer bunny shit man." It took another bite of the croissant. "Plus your story kicked off the chain of events that led to my creation. Or, you know, ACTUALLY gaining sentience and joining the pantheon. I always existed."

"Wait, really?" James asked.

"Yeah." It said simply. "Granted, it was always going to happen. Destiny and all that. But still. It's nice to get a bit of stretch in the metaphysical legs, you know?"

"Destiny?" James wondered quietly.

"Another thing to NOT think too hard about if you can help it." Defiance said as he stood up and dusted croissant crumbs off of the front of his uniform. "Me being here or not, it gets you either way." It nodded with a bit of a cringe. "Admittedly not ALL gods get that. Even though they're the ones that write the damn thing. But meh." It shrugged again. "They have fates too. Strings for the puppets, and for the puppeteers."

"Are you.... supposed to be telling me all this?" James wondered.

"GREAT QUESTION!" Defiance boomed as it rubbed its hands. The volume of its voice was so high that it made James's semi-real head ache.

Then it slapped him, full on, max strength for a normal body (or at least he assumed as much since a godly level slap would presumably erase him from history or something), right across his face.

He had a moment to wonder, What the fuck!

Then he gasped a deep breath as his view reverted back to that of the Healing Ward's ceiling, and all the pain of his body's injuries came screaming back into his mind.

"WHAT THE-!" He began before realizing that there were probably other people in the room. ^("What the fuck!?!") He hissed to himself.

Then he looked around and saw his family around him in varying states of unconsciousness.

Amina was in the bed to his left, bandages unable to hide the long black hair that flowed down over one of her shoulders. She snored ever so lightly as she slept. Joey was in the bed almost directly across from him, a band with a strange coin or medallion of some kind on his forehead. He could sense the magic in the item and wondered at it. Veliry was in the bed next to that one, a dull green glow emanating from around her waist that he'd have to ask about later. His mother lay with her head on the side of Joey's bed, his bandaged hand wrapped up in hers.

James slowly, and excruciatingly, rolled over onto his wolf arm. The damn thing, like always, seemed to be the first part of him that was even remotely healed. It still protested to the abuse as it steadied him uncertainly. Something in his abdomen shifted uncomfortably as he rolled, reminding him that he had been impaled several times in the course of the fight. He groaned a bit as he felt something settle inside him and wondered just how well healing magic did for internal injuries that the healer might not be able to see. Or if they'd gotten all the sand out of him.

After several long, pain filled, minutes James managed to stand up on shaky legs.

The irony of the last few things the so-called GOD of Defiance had told him was not lost on him as he managed the accomplishment.

He made a slow trip over to the small dresser nearby and opened it. He was happy to see that his suspicions about it were right, and a little upset that he was getting so familiar with these kinds of rooms.

He took the light blanket and small pillow over to his mother and lifted her head gently, just enough to slide the pillow under. Then he draped the blanket over her as she unconsciously nuzzled into the cushion.

He shook Joey's foot just a little bit as he walked past him and over to Amina's bed.

It took everything he had to bend over and plant a kiss on her forehead. Then he sat on the edge of the bed, woozy from all the physical exertion that simply crossing the room had caused.

He wanted to teeter over and fall face first onto the ground. But he knew that doing so would likely hurt him even more. And he didn't have the energy to get back up and go to his own bed. So he sat there for untold minutes, hand resting over Amina's, until one of the aides came in to check everyone and realized that he'd gotten up. They quickly called for the other healers, and James was back to sleep in bed before he even knew what was going on again.

Even half delirious from pain and exhaustion, James latched onto the fact that he hadn't lost anyone this time.

It was a nice change of pace from his last few big battles.

He went back under to the gently warm amber glow of healing magic.

\--------------------------

Jenkins looked at the form of the massive wolf from on top of what had used to be a perfectly good pickup truck.

It whimpered in a way that reminded her of how her parents dog had begun to sound as its arthritis had been getting to its final stages and it hadn't been able to lift itself. The wolf couldn't get up either. Its legs shook and quivered as it struggled to move. One of its eyes stared at her with a look that she thought might have been caught between a sad fear and a burning anger.

The massive, for lack of a better word, Hulk of a man who had battered the wolf along side her and the Wizard, came strolling around the side of the wolf with a cocksure swagger as they made a show of wiping their hands off. Something about the gesture seemed crass to her when next to a dying dog. Even one the size of a 747 that had just wrecked most of a town.

"Yeah!" Said the massive man, his shirtless muscles rippling with every movement as he walked over towards her and the wizard. "That's what you get for messing with me!" He said as he stared down the dying wolf monster.

Jenkins winced at the awkward display of bravado.

"Let me guess." Said the deep, and slightly Spanish accented wizard as he leaned on the gnarled staff that looked familiar to her. "Some weird voice offered you powers?"

She looked at him hesitantly, uncertain of whether she should reveal that she'd heard voices. But then again, he just had.

"Yeah." She said awkwardly. "Didn't exactly accept them though."

"I was about to ask." The wizard said. "Neither did I."

"Sup." Said the muscular man. Jenkins just stared at him as he walked over. "You guys talk to some douchey, supposed 'GOD'?" He asked as he made air quotes.

The wizard was on the verge of answering when the man continued speaking.

"I was on the verge of getting noshed on by one of the small ones when it spoke up. Made some big speech about how I had a DEFIANT SOUL or some nonsense." He shrugged. "I told it that it could either give me the powers or it could fuck off and let me focus on dying. Next thing I knew I was goin all Lou Ferrigno up in here." He flexed his comically large arms like a body builder for a second.

Then three things happened.

The wizard fell over onto the ground, landing awkwardly on his hands and knees as the armor from his body was replaced by a tattered set of construction workers clothes, white helmet and reflective vest included.

At the same time, the Hulking man seemed to shrink down at a rapid rate. Though Jenkins realized very quickly that it wasn't so much that He was shrinking quickly, as it was that she was simultaneously growing.

"Aw fuck!" The now average sized guy in a faded denim vest with several band patches and buttons on it exclaimed as he tripped over his own feet backing away. "It's one of them!"

Jenkins looked down in horror to see that her hands were once again furred and ended in claws. She reached up and touched her face, feeling the snout and the teeth once more.

"NO!" She cried in anguish as she backed away and fell awkwardly off of the wrecked truck. "No! I was me again!" She yelled in her once again deep, rumbling voice.

"You were one of them?" The construction wizard asked in confusion as he regained his feet. "Wait, they can talk?"

She cowered against the remains of a bus stop as she pawed at her nose and body in desperation.

"Put me back." She cried. "Put me back. Give me my body back. This isn't what I want."

"Shit." Said the former hulk who now looked like a punk band front-man as he cautiously stepped toward her. "They do talk."

"I was a person again." She said softly. "I'm not supposed to be a monster. I'm a person." She covered her nose with her clawed hands. "Too many smells."

"Hey." The punk said as he kneeled a few feet from her. "It's gonna be-"

Suddenly the area around the three of them was flooded with bright white light as a helicopter flew in low and slow and took position over them. Soldiers flooded around the corner of the pharmacy that the bus stop was next to. The soldiers were all in various states of dissarray and gore soaked messiness as they surrounded both the massive, dying wolf, and the three formerly powered individuals.

The punk and the construction worker both shot to their feet, hands raised as the soldiers surrounded them.

"ON YOUR KNEES!" One soldier yelled.

Jenkins stood up as all the weapons of the soldiers trained on her. She hung her head in defeat as she realized how they saw her now.

"I'm one of you!" She yelled in her wolfen voice. "Corporal Samantha Jenkins! DOD number two eight five, three eight-"

"Drop the wolf!" One of the soldiers yelled.

POP!

She fell to a knee as a rifle round slammed into her thigh and took her leg out from under her.

"Agh!" She cried. "No I'm-"

POP! PO-POP! PO-PO-PO-POP! A series of rapid bursts of rifle fire reported as they slammed into her repeatedly.

She dropped to the ground in excruciating pain as everything went dim.

"Secure the supers!" A loud, amplified, voice said from the helicopter. "Bring them in!"

"What are you doing?" Asked the construction worker as a pair of soldiers grabbed his wrists and maneuvered them behind him. "She's one of the ones that stopped that thing!" He yelled as they slid a pair of restraints on his wrists.

"Yo! You just killed one of the so-called SUPERS!" The punk yelled as he struggled to get loose from three of the soldiers. He spit at one of them as they grabbed his vest to hold him in place. "She was the freakin' amazon chick."

"That's impossible." Said one of the soldiers. "That was a human not a wolf."

"And I was the fuckin hulk dude!" The punk said. "Minus the green paint and bad CGI but that was me. How do I fuckin look now?"

"Get the fuck out of here." Said the same soldier.

"Dude." The punk said, gesturing at the construction worker with his head. "He was the wizard. I was the hulk. SHE was the amazon. We just like... I don't know, powered down or whatever just now."

The Sergeant leading the securing of the people that were widely being referred to as "Supers" radioed up to the chopper.

"You guys sure these are the ones that did it?" She asked. "That intel good? Cause I can see it with the wizard guy being bob the builder. But.... where'd the other two go?"

"Copy that ground." The helicopter's copilot replied. "Getting confirmation from command. But these are the ones they sent us to retrieve. Them and the big bad wolf. This is this spot we were dispatched to."

The Sergeant looked down at the wolf as it took ragged breaths and bled onto the pavement.

"Roger." The helicopter spoke up again. "Ground team. Command confirms. Those two AND the wolf are the ones that brought it down. Have your medics try to stabilize the wolf and bring them in too."

The Sergeant looked down at her radio with a bit of confusion.

"DOOOOC!" She yelled to the cluster of soldiers near the massive wolf monster, which had ceased moving. "Get over here!"

"I fuckin told you!" The Punk yelled as they were ushered away towards a waiting SUV. "Bunch o' assholes!"

And for the second time in a matter of hours, as the medic rushed over to her and nervously began attempting to treat her, Samantha Jenkins lingered on the border between life and death. Though this time she didn't have to worry as much, not that she was aware of it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z32uy2/wait_is_this_just_gate_267/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (265/?)

Previous

Writer's note: What? You thought the new guy was ONLY a good guy?

Enjoy.

PS: You should 100% imagine Defiance behaving like Jack Sparrow whenever he bargained for his life. Minus the drunken sea-legs.

\~

"NOOOO!" Moon cried out as she watched the Champion of Defiance race down the back of HER champion, dragging its rudimentary spear along Dranek's spine and leaving a trail of moon-glowing gore in her wake. The wound struggled to seal itself of the ALSO deity powered injury.

War looked on with a slight grin as he watched the action. Defiance continued to sit in his chair, quietly and reservedly answering questions from the other gods that were present. Life and Death looked on in quiet approval. They had always been fans of those who fought, so they liked this new god.

"How dare you!?!" Moon screamed as she turned round to face the newcomer. The newcomer SHE had helped create, "How dare you interfere in the plans of your elders?"

The other gods looked at her with an array of emotions. But most of them simply cringed at the display of anger. It was unbecoming of one such as them. And so typical of the corporeally-anchored deities.

Defiance, to his credit, looked at her with zero remorse in his face. That face that looked exactly like the summoned hero, scars and all.

"Do I really need to explain why?" He asked. "Also. You are an elder only in terms of time in manifested form. I have existed in all living beings since their first evolution into sentience. And even in a lot of the non sentient beings. Pretty sure that makes me older than worshiping you." He added while sipping from a cup of coffee that manifested in his hand.

Everyone in the room paused, and turned to look down as something unexpected (for most of them anyways) occurred on the world below.

"Two?" War asked curiously. "Nooo... three? That's....." He looked up at Defiance, who was smiling again. "Highly ill advised.... of a god."

"No." Moon said shakily as she realized what was happening. "How?"

\---

Jenkins slammed into the wall of, what she was fairly certain was the town's movie theater, like a cannon shot. She landed among a row of poorly cleaned red chairs and realized that it WAS the theater that the beast had slapped her into.

She regained her feet in a heartbeat as she sprung off one of the couch style chairs and back into the air through the hole she'd made in the wall. Her simple spear reappeared in her hand as if by magic as she flew at the monster.

Shit. She thought as she saw it open its mouth to catch her. Misjudged that one.

Then, just as she passed the crumbling wall of the theater, someone beat her to the monster.

A torrent of bright white lightning slammed into the side of the creatures face and blackened fur and flesh where it impacted. She used the distraction to slam into the side of its snout with her spear extended, stabbing it just under its eye as it reeled from the first attack.

As she mauled the wolf monster's face with repeated stabs of her spear and slams of her shield she looked over and saw a young dark skinned man standing on a nearby roof top. He was wearing a set of armor that looked like something out of a gladiator movie, and in his hand was a wooden staff that she thought would have looked right in the hands of an old wizard. The staff blasted lightning at the wolf like a thunderstorm on overdrive.

His heart glowed just like hers did, she could see the fire like glow even through the bronze colored breastplate he wore.

Then, as the beast attempted to recover and bite at her legs, which were admittedly practically in its mouth to begin with, something impacted it. She felt the tremor of the impact even from where she was scrambling to get away from its snapping silver teeth.

"BAD DOGGIE!" Someone yelled in a voice that was way way louder than it had any right to be. The wolf reeled from the impact as its eyes widened in surprise. "YOU SHOULD KNOW BETTER THAN TO DESTROY A TOWN!"

Suddenly Jenkins felt herself teetering sideways as the wolf monster was knocked over on its side. Even the armored wizard person stopped attacking from their rooftop perch as she felt everything shift and move. Then the wolf began to topple. It whimpered in a way that was oddly heartbreaking despite its monstrous appearance.

Jenkins leapt away from it in a blur.

\---

"New...." Defiance began as it sipped from the mug of coffee again. "Status Quo."

The other gods bristled at the sound of the words. Moon practically deflated as she watched her Champion begin getting systematically beaten down in front of every camera in the town.

She'd have to come up with new plans. There were still wolves on the field. But she could feel her powers fading as fear of the wolf succumbed to low levels of idolization for the champions of this new god.

She wondered how Defiance would spin their inevitable deaths after his powers exhausted themselves and burned the champions out.

"First and foremost." Defiance said. Then he said something that made her wonder if maybe He'd read her mind. "MYYYY champions don't die from my gifts." The other gods began to murmur. War was looking at Defiance with a combination of anger and curiosity at the concept. "After all, by their very nature my gifts are... for lack of a better term.... given non-consensually." He scrunched his face in mock disgust as he said it.

This caused a commotion amongst the gods, several of them even cried out in protest. Defiance waited patiently, hand held up calling for a silence.

"After all!" He began, bringing their attention back. "Defying me is the best way for them to align WITH me." He bowed his head. "So my powers shall not kill them. Though, they also will not be permanent either. And the odds of a person ever gaining them a second time are all but impossible." He shrugged. "Of course, impossible is also kind of in my wheelhouse as well. So, take that with a grain of salt."

"What is your purpose!?!" A god further back, Winter to be precise, asked.

"Good." Defiance said. "Someone's asking the right questions." He stood up and placed a hand on War's shoulder. "I'm here to broker peace even when there seems to be no alternative to blood." He said, causing War to grow angry. "But also to incite violence solely because I cannot stand the silence treaties." This made War's face shift to a confused smile.

Defiance walked toward Moon.

"I am here for the people most of you use as game pieces. Both for the ones that resist. But also for the ones that resist them= resistors. Zealots and Atheists alike defy each other even when they don't mean to."

He stood next to Moon where she was looking down at the world below. He held his hand out and moon saw that the hand was coated in fur and clawed. She looked at him with apprehensive anger.

"And I am here so that wolves may evade the wolf hunters even when the hunters have laid their traps perfectly." Defiance said as it gestured for the Moon to take the hand.

"Because my champion only became such to strike back at the Earth people." She said as she realized his meaning.

Defiance smiled as the Moon took his hand, and he kissed it gently.

"Because I am on all sides of the equation." Defiance said as it released the hand and began walking away. "I am the wrench. Throw me into your engines and I will break them. But you will also need that wrench to FIX said engine."

It sat back down on its chair once more, this time conjuring an apple that was slightly too red and biting into it.

"And I exist in each of YOU as well." He said as he chewed the nonexistent fruit.

Death and Life took up places next to it in their typical silence as the room broke out into a completely different type of uproar.

"Now if you don't mind." Defiance said. "I have places to be for a bit. I'll be back shortly."

And before any of the other gods could react, the three of them disappeared in a shimmer of green energy.

\---

Margaret Choi approached the door in a haunted silence.

She'd been directed to the door by several of the castle staff who'd seen where her son and his teacher had gone, and she'd been here once before with the King.

She feared what she might find on the other side.

But she knew that her son was in there, and that was all she needed to know to continue.

"Mrs. Choi." The door said in its odd, echoing voice causing her to jump in surprise. She'd forgotten that it could speak. "Please come in immediately." It said as it withdrew into the wall.

She moved forward with only a split second of hesitation.

"Joseph!" She exclaimed as she saw, and rushed toward, her son.

"Sssssh!" Said a familiar voice. "He's sleeping. Please come in." Veliry said from where she was sat next to her son's unconscious form.

She'd laid him out on a couch that looked to be made of three different types of seat merged together, likely through magic of course. He had a blanket over most of his body, and a headband with a small circle of bluish stone on his forehead. It pulsed with the occasional bit of light every few seconds.

Veliry was gently dabbing at his hands with a series of washcloths that cleaned and rang themselves out whenever she placed one in a bowl of hot water.

Then she saw that his hands were bloody and cut to ribbons. He also had bruises and black veins formed around his hands and wrists.

"I've gotten most of the debris out." Veliry said as she removed a small metal shard from the base of Joey's left thumb. "I'll be able to heal him once I've got them cleaned up." She added as she absently wiped tears away from her cheek with a sleeve that was scorched and bloody.

Margaret took the young mage's hands in her own and held them still.

"Let me." She said. "I do this for a living. Besides, you look like you could use some healing yourself." She said as she took one of the clean washcloths and dabbed at the mage's cheek rubbing away soot and sand and tears.

"He wasn't supposed to be there." Veliry said as she let herself be cleaned. "He was supposed to stay here in the castle. I didn't even realize he was there until he caught me."

"He caught you?" Mrs. Choi asked in surprise. "Caught you how? What do you mean?"

Veliry took a deep shuddering breath. "I was.... I was trying to shield everyone. From some kind of bomb." She shook a few times and Margaret had to brace her shoulders as she threatened to fall over. "And then one of them... One of the Earth soldiers shot me."

The little mage gestured at a hole in the front of her robes and she saw a knot of scarred flesh underneath the bloody, slightly oval hole. She looked around the back of the robe and saw a neat little dime sized hole there, on the opposite side of the mage's body.

"How did you survive this?" She asked in mild amazement as she imagined the injury that could have caused such a wound, and also how it had already scarred.

Veliry absently held up a hand, and on it appeared a ring that seemed to be covered in stripes of light and dark orange fur. In the middle of it was a cat's eye. The eye was almost completely closed.

"What is that? The ring of nine lives?" She asked as she finally got the left cheek of the small mage cleaned up enough to be presentable. The skin underneath the grime was still red and raw though, as if sunburned.

"Cats have five lives." Veliry said weakly. "But yeah."

Margaret pressed the washcloth into Veliry's other hand, ignoring the odd statement. "I've got the first half done. Get the other while I take care of Joey." She said as she turned her focus over to her son, who still slept beside them.

"He tried to protect me." Veliry said in a soft voice. "And I think I just made him more scared."

Margaret smiled just a bit as she looked at the mangled mess that was Joey's palm. It looked like he'd slapped a bunch of razor blades.

"He gets that from..." She chuckled. "Well.... everyone in his family really." Using a pair of odd, brass, tweezers that were set nearby she gingerly plucked a piece of something that looked like a circuit board from her son's hand. "His father was a bit fan of old super hero movies.

Plus I'm a nurse, and James was trying to be a nurse. You know before he got brought here. We all taught him to protect the people around him." She glanced at the mage, who was staring down at her own feet as she wiped some grime off her other cheek meekly. "Especially people he cares about." She added quietly.

"But I was supposed to be protecting him." Veliry countered as she looked at the dirty rag. "That's why I told him to stay here."

"Yes." Margaret agreed. "And somehow, with some magic door or something, he ignored that. I'll have to attempt to ground him later for it." She said with another light chuckle. Then she winced as she pulled on something in his hand and ended up pulling out almost an inch of what looked like wire.

The two of them sat in relative silence as Veliry continued to softly sob and Margaret quietly cleaned her son's hands.

"James told me what happened after." She said a few minutes later, after the small mage's crying had lessened. "He told me how you helped Joseph calm down. Gave him something to focus on."

Veliry just nodded.

"I assume that headband is helping keep him calm?" She asked as she wrapped a piece of gauze around Joey's left pointer finger.

"It restrains his magic. Keeps his mind from focusing it or building it up." Veliry said as she wiped her nose a bit. She placed the wash cloth in the basin of water and Margaret marveled at how it animated itself to clean off. "Don't worry." She said in a slowly fading voice. "Only effect it'll have on him is that his dreams might be a bit fragmented while he's sleeping."

Margaret heard a slight thump, and looked over to see the mage slumped over sideways with her head resting on the armrest of the couch that Joey was lying on. She checked the mage's pulse, making sure that the gunshot wound hadn't killed the small woman without either of them realizing it, magic ring or not. She smirked a bit as she felt the pulse there, a touch weak, but steady.

She sighed as she rested her hand on her son's head, just above the magical band, and rubbed some sand out of his hair. He unconsciously moved his head a bit and let out a grunt.

"You boys sure know how to pick em." She said before moving back down to his hand. "Knights in shining armor and twenty nineteen Corollas. Trying to save damsels in distress only for them to have to turn around and save you." She sighed again as the joke reminded her of how she'd met her husband. She'd ended up driving him to the hospital in his own car. "Just like your father."

She went back to cleaning her son's hand as she called out.

"Door? Can you.... communicate throughout the castle?" She asked uncertainly.

"I can." The door replied in its odd way.

"Can you send for some of the healers please? I think these two are worse off than they'd admit."

"Atypical. But yes." The door replied.

\----------

James "woke up" to a familiar sight. And immediately upon seeing it, realized that he wasn't exactly awake. Not really.

"Hello James." Said a voice that wasn't quite right.

He looked over and saw.... himself. And not like the previous time when it had been an older, more rugged looking version of himself. Nor was there a happy-go-lucky version of himself, or a twisted evil version either.

Instead it was just him, sitting in a comfortable looking arm chair and snacking on an apple.

"Which one of me are you this time?" He asked hesitantly. "Ghost of Christmas.... what..... apple eater or something?" Not his best joke. But he'd had a long day.

The Him looked down at itself.

"Oh!" It said. "That's right. My bad. Forgot to change out for this." It looked at him with a wry grin. "I am new to it after all."

Before James's very eyes the being shimmered and took on the appearance of a samurai warrior, holding a spear that seemed to end in a katana, and pierced by dozens of arrows. His armor was coated in a thick layer of blood.

James looked him over in confusion. "Are you?" He began. "Isn't that guy some kind of Japanese legend or something?" He asked. "What the hell's going on?"

"Yes this is the form of Benkei." The entity said. "Legendary guy. But that's not important. You and I need to have a bit of a talk."

James backed away a bit.

"I knew..." He shrugged and see-sawed his hand. "A guy that could change his shape and had a lot of tricks. Ran with a group of people that could get into your head." James said as he used his hand to subtly check for a pistol. "Kinda shot him in the face."

"I'm not a changeling or shape shifter James." It said with a grin. "That was a great shot though." It added before biting into the apple again. "No. I'm here to let you know that there's been a bit of a.... reorganization of the pantheon of inter-dimensional gods."

That made James's hackles rise even further than they had at the sudden change of form.

"You're a god?" He asked grimly.

The being sighed, and seemed somewhat exasperated.

"Their term not mine. Though it is as close to an accurate moniker as exists I suppose." It held up its hands to show that they were empty in the classic 'not a threat' gesture. James did wonder where the apple had gone, then remembered what this THING was. "But more importantly I'm the closest thing YOU have to an actual god that you worship."

"Not much of a religious guy." James replied uncertainly. "Much to my Grandma's disdain."

"No, I know." The god said. "But worshiping me isn't so much about candles, or rugs, or... you know... ACTUAL praying. More a state of being. And you...." It pointed at him with a smile. "Mr. Choi.... I'm a big fan."

James blinked rapidly for a few seconds.

"I'm sorry." He said finally. "You're.... a fan of mine?"

"Oh of course." It replied.

James stared at it uncertainly.

"Oh, right." It said. "I should probably introduce myself formally."

Suddenly it was next to James and taking him by the shoulder as if they were old friends out pub-crawling.

"I'm the god of Defiance." It said as it pressed James down into a red, incredibly comfortable, chair that hadn't been there a few moments before. "Let's discuss the way things work now that I exist."

James shrugged out of its guiding hands and stood back up.

"Oh." The samurai shaped god gasped. "Fantastic."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z29bnv/wait_is_this_just_gate_266/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (265/?)

Previous /

First

Writer's note: What? You thought the new guy was ONLY a good guy?

Enjoy.

PS: You should 100% imagine Defiance behaving like Jack Sparrow whenever he bargained for his life. Minus the drunken sea-legs.

\~

"NOOOO!" Moon cried out as she watched the Champion of Defiance race down the back of HER champion, dragging its rudimentary spear along Dranek's spine and leaving a trail of moon-glowing gore in her wake. The wound struggled to seal itself of the ALSO deity powered injury.

War looked on with a slight grin as he watched the action. Defiance continued to sit in his chair, quietly and reservedly answering questions from the other gods that were present. Life and Death looked on in quiet approval. They had always been fans of those who fought, so they liked this new god.

"How dare you!?!" Moon screamed as she turned round to face the newcomer. The newcomer SHE had helped create, "How dare you interfere in the plans of your elders?"

The other gods looked at her with an array of emotions. But most of them simply cringed at the display of anger. It was unbecoming of one such as them. And so typical of the corporeally-anchored deities.

Defiance, to his credit, looked at her with zero remorse in his face. That face that looked exactly like the summoned hero, scars and all.

"Do I really need to explain why?" He asked. "Also. You are an elder only in terms of time in manifested form. I have existed in all living beings since their first evolution into sentience. And even in a lot of the non sentient beings. Pretty sure that makes me older than worshiping you." He added while sipping from a cup of coffee that manifested in his hand.

Everyone in the room paused, and turned to look down as something unexpected (for most of them anyways) occurred on the world below.

"Two?" War asked curiously. "Nooo... three? That's....." He looked up at Defiance, who was smiling again. "Highly ill advised.... of a god."

"No." Moon said shakily as she realized what was happening. "How?"

\-------------------------

Jenkins slammed into the wall of, what she was fairly certain was the town's movie theater, like a cannon shot. She landed among a row of poorly cleaned red chairs and realized that it WAS the theater that the beast had slapped her into.

She regained her feet in a heartbeat as she sprung off one of the couch style chairs and back into the air through the hole she'd made in the wall. Her simple spear reappeared in her hand as if by magic as she flew at the monster.

Shit. She thought as she saw it open its mouth to catch her. Misjudged that one.

Then, just as she passed the crumbling wall of the theater, someone beat her to the monster.

A torrent of bright white lightning slammed into the side of the creatures face and blackened fur and flesh where it impacted. She used the distraction to slam into the side of its snout with her spear extended, stabbing it just under its eye as it reeled from the first attack.

As she mauled the wolf monster's face with repeated stabs of her spear and slams of her shield she looked over and saw a young dark skinned man standing on a nearby roof top. He was wearing a set of armor that looked like something out of a gladiator movie, and in his hand was a wooden staff that she thought would have looked right in the hands of an old wizard. The staff blasted lightning at the wolf like a thunderstorm on overdrive.

His heart glowed just like hers did, she could see the fire like glow even through the bronze colored breastplate he wore.

Then, as the beast attempted to recover and bite at her legs, which were admittedly practically in its mouth to begin with, something impacted it. She felt the tremor of the impact even from where she was scrambling to get away from its snapping silver teeth.

"BAD DOGGIE!" Someone yelled in a voice that was way way louder than it had any right to be. The wolf reeled from the impact as its eyes widened in surprise. "YOU SHOULD KNOW BETTER THAN TO DESTROY A TOWN!"

Suddenly Jenkins felt herself teetering sideways as the wolf monster was knocked over on its side. Even the armored wizard person stopped attacking from their rooftop perch as she felt everything shift and move. Then the wolf began to topple. It whimpered in a way that was oddly heartbreaking despite its monstrous appearance.

Jenkins leapt away from it in a blur.

\------------------------------

"New...." Defiance began as it sipped from the mug of coffee again. "Status Quo."

The other gods bristled at the sound of the words. Moon practically deflated as she watched her Champion begin getting systematically beaten down in front of every camera in the town.

She'd have to come up with new plans. There were still wolves on the field. But she could feel her powers fading as fear of the wolf succumbed to low levels of idolization for the champions of this new god.

She wondered how Defiance would spin their inevitable deaths after his powers exhausted themselves and burned the champions out.

"First and foremost." Defiance said. Then he said something that made her wonder if maybe He'd read her mind. "MYYYY champions don't die from my gifts." The other gods began to murmur. War was looking at Defiance with a combination of anger and curiosity at the concept. "After all, by their very nature my gifts are... for lack of a better term.... given non-consensually." He scrunched his face in mock disgust as he said it.

This caused a commotion amongst the gods, several of them even cried out in protest. Defiance waited patiently, hand held up calling for a silence.

"After all!" He began, bringing their attention back. "Defying me is the best way for them to align WITH me." He bowed his head. "So my powers shall not kill them. Though, they also will not be permanent either. And the odds of a person ever gaining them a second time are all but impossible." He shrugged. "Of course, impossible is also kind of in my wheelhouse as well. So, take that with a grain of salt."

"What is your purpose!?!" A god further back, Winter to be precise, asked.

"Good." Defiance said. "Someone's asking the right questions." He stood up and placed a hand on War's shoulder. "I'm here to broker peace even when there seems to be no alternative to blood." He said, causing War to grow angry. "But also to incite violence solely because I cannot stand the silence treaties." This made War's face shift to a confused smile.

Defiance walked toward Moon.

"I am here for the people most of you use as game pieces. Both for the ones that resist. But also for the ones that resist them. Zealots and Atheists alike defy each other even when they don't mean to."

He stood next to Moon where she was looking down at the world below. He held his hand out and moon saw that the hand was coated in fur and clawed. She looked at him with apprehensive anger.

"And I am here so that wolves may evade the wolf hunters even when the hunters have laid their traps perfectly." Defiance said as it gestured for the Moon to take the hand.

"Because my champion only became such to strike back at the Earth people." She said as she realized his meaning.

Defiance smiled as the Moon took his hand, and he kissed it gently.

"Because I am on all sides of the equation." Defiance said as it released the hand and began walking away. "I am the wrench. Throw me into your engines and I will break them. But you will also need that wrench to FIX said engine."

It sat back down on its chair once more, this time conjuring an apple that was slightly too red and biting into it.

"And I exist in each of YOU as well." He said as he chewed the nonexistent fruit.

Death and Life took up places next to it in their typical silence as the room broke out into a completely different type of uproar.

"Now if you don't mind." Defiance said. "I have places to be for a bit. I'll be back shortly."

And before any of the other gods could react, the three of them disappeared in a shimmer of green energy.

\---

Margaret Choi approached the door in a haunted silence.

She'd been directed to the door by several of the castle staff who'd seen where her son and his teacher had gone, and she'd been here once before with the King.

She feared what she might find on the other side.

But she knew that her son was in there, and that was all she needed to know to continue.

"Mrs. Choi." The door said in its odd, echoing voice causing her to jump in surprise. She'd forgotten that it could speak. "Please come in immediately." It said as it withdrew into the wall.

She moved forward with only a split second of hesitation.

"Joseph!" She exclaimed as she saw, and rushed toward, her son.

"Sssssh!" Said a familiar voice. "He's sleeping. Please come in." Veliry said from where she was sat next to her son's unconscious form.

She'd laid him out on a couch that looked to be made of three different types of seat merged together, likely through magic of course. He had a blanket over most of his body, and a headband with a small circle of bluish stone on his forehead. It pulsed with the occasional bit of light every few seconds.

Veliry was gently dabbing at his hands with a series of washcloths that cleaned and rang themselves out whenever she placed one in a bowl of hot water.

Then she saw that his hands were bloody and cut to ribbons. He also had bruises and black veins formed around his hands and wrists.

"I've gotten most of the debris out." Veliry said as she removed a small metal shard from the base of Joey's left thumb. "I'll be able to heal him once I've got them cleaned up." She added as she absently wiped tears away from her cheek with a sleeve that was scorched and bloody.

Margaret took the young mage's hands in her own and held them still.

"Let me." She said. "I do this for a living. Besides, you look like you could use some healing yourself." She said as she took one of the clean washcloths and dabbed at the mage's cheek rubbing away soot and sand and tears.

"He wasn't supposed to be there." Veliry said as she let herself be cleaned. "He was supposed to stay here in the castle. I didn't even realize he was there until he caught me."

"He caught you?" Mrs. Choi asked in surprise. "Caught you how? What do you mean?"

Veliry took a deep shuddering breath. "I was.... I was trying to shield everyone. From some kind of bomb." She shook a few times and Margaret had to brace her shoulders as she threatened to fall over. "And then one of them... One of the Earth soldiers shot me."

The little mage gestured at a hole in the front of her robes and she saw a knot of scarred flesh underneath the bloody, slightly oval hole. She looked around the back of the robe and saw a neat little dime sized hole there, on the opposite side of the mage's body.

"How did you survive this?" She asked in mild amazement as she imagined the injury that could have caused such a wound, and also how it had already scarred.

Veliry absently held up a hand, and on it appeared a ring that seemed to be covered in stripes of light and dark orange fur. In the middle of it was a cat's eye. The eye was almost completely closed.

"What is that? The ring of nine lives?" She asked as she finally got the left cheek of the small mage cleaned up enough to be presentable. The skin underneath the grime was still red and raw though, as if sunburned.

"Cats have five lives." Veliry said weakly. "But yeah."

Margaret pressed the washcloth into Veliry's other hand, ignoring the odd statement. "I've got the first half done. Get the other while I take care of Joey." She said as she turned her focus over to her son, who still slept beside them.

"He tried to protect me." Veliry said in a soft voice. "And I think I just made him more scared."

Margaret smiled just a bit as she looked at the mangled mess that was Joey's palm. It looked like he'd slapped a bunch of razor blades.

"He gets that from..." She chuckled. "Well.... everyone in his family really." Using a pair of odd, brass, tweezers that were set nearby she gingerly plucked a piece of something that looked like a circuit board from her son's hand. "His father was a big fan of old super hero movies. Plus I'm a nurse, and James was trying to be a nurse. You know before he got brought here. We all taught him to protect the people around him." She glanced at the mage, who was staring down at her own feet as she wiped some grime off her other cheek meekly. "Especially people he cares about." She added quietly.

"But I was supposed to be protecting him." Veliry countered as she looked at the dirty rag. "That's why I told him to stay here."

"Yes." Margaret agreed. "And somehow, with some magic door or something, he ignored that. I'll have to attempt to ground him later for it." She said with another light chuckle. Then she winced as she pulled on something in his hand and ended up pulling out almost an inch of what looked like wire.

The two of them sat in relative silence as Veliry continued to softly sob and Margaret quietly cleaned her son's hands.

"James told me what happened after." She said a few minutes later, after the small mage's crying had lessened. "He told me how you helped Joseph calm down. Gave him something to focus on."

Veliry just nodded.

"I assume that headband is helping keep him calm?" She asked as she wrapped a piece of gauze around Joey's left pointer finger.

"It restrains his magic. Keeps his mind from focusing it or building it up." Veliry said as she wiped her nose a bit. She placed the wash cloth in the basin of water and Margaret marveled at how it animated itself to clean off. "Don't worry." She said in a slowly fading voice. "Only effect it'll have on him is that his dreams might be a bit fragmented while he's sleeping."

Margaret heard a slight thump, and looked over to see the mage slumped over sideways with her head resting on the armrest of the couch that Joey was lying on. She checked the mage's pulse, making sure that the gunshot wound hadn't killed the small woman without either of them realizing it, magic ring or not. She smirked a bit as she felt the pulse there, a touch weak, but steady.

She sighed as she rested her hand on her son's head, just above the magical band, and rubbed some sand out of his hair. He unconsciously moved his head a bit and let out a grunt.

"You boys sure know how to pick em." She said before moving back down to his hand. "Knights in shining armor and twenty nineteen Corollas. Trying to save damsels in distress only for them to have to turn around and save you." She sighed again as the joke reminded her of how she'd met her husband. She'd ended up driving him to the hospital in his own car. "Just like your father."

She went back to cleaning her son's hand as she called out.

"Door? Can you.... communicate throughout the castle?" She asked uncertainly.

"I can." The door replied in its odd way.

"Can you send for some of the healers please? I think these two are worse off than they'd admit."

"Atypical. But yes." The door replied.

\----------

James "woke up" to a familiar sight. And immediately upon seeing it, realized that he wasn't exactly awake. Not really.

"Hello James." Said a voice that wasn't quite right.

He looked over and saw.... himself. And not like the previous time when it had been an older, more rugged looking version of himself. Nor was there a happy-go-lucky version of himself, or a twisted evil version either.

Instead it was just him, sitting in a comfortable looking arm chair and snacking on an apple.

"Which one of me are you this time?" He asked hesitantly. "Ghost of Christmas.... what..... apple eater or something?" Not his best joke. But he'd had a long day.

The Him looked down at itself.

"Oh!" It said. "That's right. My bad. Forgot to change out for this." It looked at him with a wry grin. "I am new to it after all."

Before James's very eyes the being shimmered and took on the appearance of a samurai warrior, holding a spear that seemed to end in a katana, and pierced by dozens of arrows. His armor was coated in a thick layer of blood.

James looked him over in confusion. "Are you?" He began. "Isn't that guy some kind of Japanese legend or something?" He asked. "What the hell's going on?"

"Yes this is the form of Benkei." The entity said. "Legendary guy. But that's not important. You and I need to have a bit of a talk."

James backed away a bit.

"I knew..." He shrugged and see-sawed his hand. "A guy that could change his shape and had a lot of tricks. Ran with a group of people that could get into your head." James said as he used his hand to subtly check for a pistol. "Kinda shot him in the face."

"I'm not a changeling or shape shifter James." It said with a grin. "That was a great shot though." It added before biting into the apple again. "No. I'm here to let you know that there's been a bit of a.... reorganization of the pantheon of inter-dimensional gods."

That made James's hackles rise even further than they had at the sudden change of form.

"You're a god?" He asked grimly.

The being sighed, and seemed somewhat exasperated.

"Their term not mine. Though it is as close to an accurate moniker as exists I suppose." It held up its hands to show that they were empty in the classic 'not a threat' gesture. James did wonder where the apple had gone, then remembered what this THING was. "But more importantly I'm the closest thing YOU have to an actual god that you worship."

"Not much of a religious guy." James replied uncertainly. "Much to my Grandma's disdain."

"No, I know." The god said. "But worshiping me isn't so much about candles, or rugs, or... you know... ACTUAL praying. More a state of being. And you...." It pointed at him with a smile. "Mr. Choi.... I'm a big fan."

James blinked rapidly for a few seconds.

"I'm sorry." He said finally. "You're.... a fan of mine?"

"Oh of course." It replied.

James stared at it uncertainly.

"Oh, right." It said. "I should probably introduce myself formally."

Suddenly it was next to James and taking him by the shoulder as if they were old friends out pub-crawling.

"I'm the god of Defiance." It said as it pressed James down into a red, incredibly comfortable, chair that hadn't been there a few moments before. "Let's discuss the way things work now that I exist."

James shrugged out of its guiding hands and stood back up.

"Oh." The samurai shaped god gasped. "Fantastic."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z29a0h/wait_is_this_just_gate_266/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (264/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look, unintended consequences. Ouch.

Also Moon fucked around. Now she gets to see the other part.

Godly interview next chapter. Yaaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~

Kai approached the king's studies on uneasy feet.

He still ached from his injuries. But he was also just tired. That and the fact that he, on principal, didn't bring his spiders with him into the castle had resulted in him quickly exhausting himself as he made his way through the halls. But he needed to speak with the king.

"Guardian of the deep dark Shil'Varyon'Kai. Also known as the Weaver." He said to the guards at the door. He saw them through the eyes of the single purple reaver spider that was perched on his shoulder. It was the ONLY way he would see things now. "Here to discuss a grave matter with his Majesty."

The guards nodded and one of them quietly slipped through the door and into the chamber beyond.

A few moments later the doors opened and Kai heard the King's familiar voice from within.

"Come in." It said simply.

Kai did as he was bid and gave a slight bow to King Farrick, who returned the gesture awkwardly. The king looked, to Kai at least, as though he was nearly as exhausted as he was.

"Your majesty." Kai said in greeting.

"It has been a long time since last we parleyed Guardian." The king replied. "I see that the reports of your injuries are true. Please, come sit. I'll send for a healer." He said as he quickly made his way around his desk to pull up a chair.

"Leave the healers for those who are worse off." Kai said with a pained smile as he gingerly sat down. "I will live. I will simply do so in discomfort. Though I do appreciate the offer."

King Farrick nodded. "I understand we have you to thank for a large part of our victory." He said. "Whatever that victory is worth now."

"Not as great as the princess's leadership. Or this Chief Vickers character, who helped me disable the weapons that both he AND James Choi determined as the greatest threats." Kai said humbly. "I actually missed most of the fight once I.... sustained my injuries. I mostly just helped secure prisoners."

"Still." The king countered. "An important task. And not one typically required of your duties. I thank you."

Kai nodded. "We do have a slight problem though." He said.

The King's eyebrow raised. "Only one?" He asked sarcastically. "What a nice change."

"The Agency intervened." Kai said flatly.

That caught King Farrick's attention. His eyes grew cold and hard.

"They.... removed... one of the prisoners from under our nose. Most likely the second in command of the enemy unit. And also one of their foremost warriors according to the Captain and Chief." Kai said.

"How did they do that?" The King asked.

"They opened one of their doors. A temporary one at that. And they fell through it while under the hold of my spiders. I only knew about it once the battle was winding down and I had reason to look at the area my spiders were going crazy about."

"And you are certain it was THEM?" The king asked. Not accusing. Simply asking for certainty.

"The evidence they left behind points toward them. And they are the only other people who can so easily move about the deep dark without being noticed by the Twelve Guardians."

The king sat in silence for several long moments as he considered this.

"Leave it to them to interfere in such an important event." He said at last. "Tell me what you know."

Kai nodded. Then he began to recount his experience leading up to the battle.

\----------

Jenkins stood up quickly as she felt the wolf beneath her finally go limp.

The ground rumbled as the massive wolf towering over her brought itself around the top of the half burned down building nearby. Its massive glowing eyes regarded her with that same intensity that she had seen in the corridor of the base. Back.... before.... she'd been turned into whatever she was now.

The massive beast began to emit a growl that made every bone in her body vibrate and made her ears ache.

Every instinct her newly reforged mind had in it told her to cower and submit to the massive creature.

An answer would be prudent. The new voice said inside her mind.

You and the other one that talked to me earlier have a real Greek Pantheon sense about you. She answered. Using us mortals as playthings and entertainment. How do I know you won't screw me over later?

She sensed that very amusement that she had in mind from the so called deity.

The beast stomped into a position that had it in line with the small street she was on. Its eyes remained locked on her even as a fighter jet of some kind hit it with a burst of cannon fire.

It didn't even flinch at the attack.

On the first mark you are quite correct. At least for most of my kind. The voice said.Though I gain no true amusement from any of this. I simply enjoy your tenacity. And "Screwing you" is anathema to my purpose.

What the fuck is Anathema? She asked.

Nevermind that. It replied. In a moment that beast will lunge. Do you desire the strength to counter it?

Course I do. She answered even as she back pedaled and bumped into a car. Something impacted a different car nearby and she saw another werewolf crouched on it and looking at her with hungry eyes. But I won't be your toy. Keep your damn power. If I die here, I do so as myself.

She sensed that same amusement from earlier in their "conversation."

The best kind of answer. So be it. It said. Something burned inside of her, but in a way that seemed almost..... soothing. Good luck.... Champion.

Jenkins' eyes widened as she felt herself shrink down several inches. Her senses of smell and hearing dulled and as she looked down she didn't see fur, or claws, and the window on the car next to her didn't show a wolf anymore.

Instead she saw herself, naked as the day she was born, and emitting a radiance like the glow of a campfire from her eyes and several parts of her skin. Most noticeably from a spot in her chest that pulsed and throbbed.

"What the fuck?" She asked herself as a simple wooden spear appeared in her right hand, and a metal shield in the other. She looked down in surprise as glowing versions of her combat uniform, plate carrier and all, appeared on her body.

The werewolf, and a new companion that had joined it as she'd changed, looked at her with confusion. She looked to the monstrous wolf nearby and saw the same confusion on its gargantuan face as well.

She reached over and gripped at the door frame of the car and flexed her hand.

The metal creaked and groaned as she made it buckle with little more effort than she would have needed to crack an egg.

"Ohhhh shit." She said softly.

Then she looked up at the wolves nearby. One of them snarled at her as it sensed her anger.

She made to run towards it and closed the distance faster than she could blink.

Before any of them, herself included, could react her spear was impaling the wolf through the chest.

NNNNOOO! That original, feminine, voice raged in her head.
DEFIANCE! It bellowed.

Fuck you. She thought back at it as she slammed the edge of her shield into the wolf's confused and scared face. It flew back from the impact like a missile, leaving gore on her spear that burned away as if the spear was red hot. And for all she knew it was.

She looked over at the other wolf and it cringed back, its ears pressed flat to its head.

There was a loud boom as one of the monster's paws landed next to her. She looked up into its slavering jaws as it made to bite at her.

She jumped to the side and then staggered as she slammed into a brick wall hard enough to send some of its bricks tumbling inside the building it was a part of. Her shield rang like a gong from the impact.

The wolf monster bit down on the car that she and the first wolf had been standing on when she'd impaled it. The car crunched as it crushed it. Then the creature's eye, the one on her side of its body, looked at her with confusion once more. It released the car and turned to face her.

"Ohohohoho!..." She said with a manic grin. "Not a fan of the lack of consent 'OTHER god'." She said with a hint of scorn. "But if this kind of power comes from being your champion then hot damn. I'mma fuck this oversized bitch up!"

She and the monster charged at each other at the same time. The monster moved with the speed of any normal sized wolf made large. But she moved with the speed of some kind of comic book hero.

And as the rest of the military in the area fought to hold back the pack of hungry wolves, or to save the victims of their rampage. Two titans, two godly champions, clashed.

\------------------------

James struggled feebly against the restraining hands of the two healers that were attending him, and his own mother.

"James stay down." His mother demanded.

"Captain Choi please rest. We still need to heal you." Said an elderly dwarf woman. "Your injuries are extensive."

"No!" James countered. "I need to see Joey! I need to make sure he's okay! Let go of me!"

"We can't do that." The Minotaur said. "I've already sent out several of my staff to see if he's among the injured. But you need to rest now Mr. Choi. I won't have you injure yourself further. Not under my watch!"

"He needs me." James insisted. "Mom he was having an episode. He got scared and he did something that's going to make it hard for him to come back down. We have to help him."

"JAMES MICHAEL CHOI!" His mother said in that tone that instantly made him flinch and draw back a bit. "YOU WILL SIT YOUR ASS BACK ON THIS BED AND LET THEM HEAL YOU OR ELSE I WILL MAKE THEIR JOBS HARDER! DO YOU UNDERSTAND?"

James fought the urge to listen and obey. But he couldn't, not right now.

"No mom." He said simply. "I have to see Joey. I can't stay here."

Then something unexpected happened. Even more unexpected than seeing his mom here in the first place.

His mother's eyes and hands began to glow. The light coming off of them was the familiar amber glow of healing. But James's magical senses screamed at him that he was in danger.

"I SAID SIT DOWN YOUNG MAN!" She bellowed in a voice that echoed louder than anyone in the room expected. She pressed a hand to his forehead, and before James could react, slapped him across the cheek. Then she pressed him back down onto the medical bed.

"Yes mom." He said eagerly, cowed by the unexpected power and violence his mother had displayed.

She sagged as the power faded from her eyes and hands and the minotaur caught her with a single hand as she slumped.

"Mrs. Choi." He said. "Are you okay?"

"Yeah." She replied as she gripped the edge of the bed and regained her footing. "Yeah. I'm good. Thank you."

She looked James in the eyes and he saw the worry and the lingering anger there. He also saw the hints of black veins around the edges of them.

"When did you figure out magic?" He asked uncertainly.

"Literally today mijo." She said as she took a deep breath. "Damn that took a lot out of me."

"Mom." He said softly. "Joey's in trouble. He's scared. And he's gonna be confused. I HAVE to go talk to him."

She placed a hand over his. He winced as he felt the broken bones there throb from the contact.

"Mijo. I don't know what happened. But your in no place to do anything. Stay and heal." She said. "I'll go find him. Tell me what happened."

James saw the resolve there, and suddenly felt guilty that he hadn't thought SHE could help his brother too.

He told her everything she knew. Even the part where Joey had inadvertently impaled him.

By the time he was done her eyes glistened with barely held back tears.

"Oh, Josephito." She said under her breath. Then she stood up.

She didn't say another word as she left the room.

James reluctantly laid back down as he instantly regretted having to tell his mother something that so obviously hurt her to hear.

He hoped that all of them would be okay, even though he knew they wouldn't.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/z1dxci/wait_is_this_just_gate_265/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (264/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look, unintended consequences. Ouch.

Also Moon fucked around. Now she gets to see the other part.

Godly interview next chapter. Yaaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~

Kai approached the king's studies on uneasy feet.

He still ached from his injuries. But he was also just tired. That and the fact that he, on principal, didn't bring his spiders with him into the castle had resulted in him quickly exhausting himself as he made his way through the halls. But he needed to speak with the king.

"Guardian of the deep dark Shil'Varyon'Kai. Also known as the Weaver." He said to the guards at the door. He saw them through the eyes of the single purple reaver spider that was perched on his shoulder. It was the ONLY way he would see things now. "Here to discuss a grave matter with his Majesty."

The guards nodded and one of them quietly slipped through the door and into the chamber beyond.

A few moments later the doors opened and Kai heard the King's familiar voice from within.

"Come in." It said simply.

Kai did as he was bid and gave a slight bow to King Farrick, who returned the gesture awkwardly. The king looked, to Kai at least, as though he was nearly as exhausted as he was.

"Your majesty." Kai said in greeting.

"It has been a long time since last we parleyed Guardian." The king replied. "I see that the reports of your injuries are true. Please, come sit. I'll send for a healer." He said as he quickly made his way around his desk to pull up a chair.

"Leave the healers for those who are worse off." Kai said with a pained smile as he gingerly sat down. "I will live. I will simply do so in discomfort. Though I do appreciate the offer."

King Farrick nodded. "I understand we have you to thank for a large part of our victory." He said. "Whatever that victory is worth now."

"Not as great as the princess's leadership. Or this Chief Vickers character, who helped me disable the weapons that both he AND James Choi determined as the greatest threats." Kai said humbly. "I actually missed most of the fight once I.... sustained my injuries. I mostly just helped secure prisoners."

"Still." The king countered. "An important task. And not one typically required of your duties. I thank you."

Kai nodded. "We do have a slight problem though." He said.

The King's eyebrow raised. "Only one?" He asked sarcastically. "What a nice change."

"The Agency intervened." Kai said flatly.

That caught King Farrick's attention. His eyes grew cold and hard.

"They.... removed... one of the prisoners from under our nose. Most likely the second in command of the enemy unit. And also one of their foremost warriors according to the Captain and Chief." Kai said.

"How did they do that?" The King asked.

"They opened one of their doors. A temporary one at that. And they fell through it while under the hold of my spiders. I only knew about it once the battle was winding down and I had reason to look at the area my spiders were going crazy about."

"And you are certain it was THEM?" The king asked. Not accusing. Simply asking for certainty.

"The evidence they left behind points toward them. And they are the only other people who can so easily move about the deep dark without being noticed by the Twelve Guardians."

The king sat in silence for several long moments as he considered this.

"Leave it to them to interfere in such an important event." He said at last. "Tell me what you know."

Kai nodded. Then he began to recount his experience leading up to the battle.

\------------------------

Jenkins stood up quickly as she felt the wolf beneath her finally go limp.

The ground rumbled as the massive wolf towering over her brought itself around the top of the half burned down building nearby. Its massive glowing eyes regarded her with that same intensity that she had seen in the corridor of the base. Back.... before.... she'd been turned into whatever she was now.

The massive beast began to emit a growl that made every bone in her body vibrate and made her ears ache.

Every instinct her newly reforged mind had in it told her to cower and submit to the massive creature.

An answer would be prudent. The new voice said inside her mind.

You and the other one that talked to me earlier have a real Greek Pantheon sense about you. She answered. Using us mortals as playthings and entertainment. How do I know you won't screw me over later?

She sensed that very amusement that she had in mind from the so called deity.

The beast stomped into a position that had it in line with the small street she was on. Its eyes remained locked on her even as a fighter jet of some kind hit it with a burst of cannon fire.

It didn't even flinch at the attack.

On the first mark you are quite correct. At least for most of my kind. The voice said.Though I gain no true amusement from any of this. I simply enjoy your tenacity. And "Screwing you" is anathema to my purpose.

What the fuck is Anathema? She asked.

Nevermind that. It replied. In a moment that beast will lunge. Do you desire the strength to counter it?

Course I do. She answered even as she back pedaled and bumped into a car. Something impacted a different car nearby and she saw another werewolf crouched on it and looking at her with hungry eyes. But I won't be your toy. Keep your damn power. If I die here, I do so as myself.

She sensed that same amusement from earlier in their "conversation."

The best kind of answer. So be it. It said. Something burned inside of her, but in a way that seemed almost..... soothing. Good luck.... Champion.

Jenkins' eyes widened as she felt herself shrink down several inches. Her senses of smell and hearing dulled and as she looked down she didn't see fur, or claws, and the window on the car next to her didn't show a wolf anymore.

Instead she saw herself, naked as the day she was born, and emitting a radiance like the glow of a campfire from her eyes and several parts of her skin. Most noticeably from a spot in her chest that pulsed and throbbed.

"What the fuck?" She asked herself as a simple wooden spear appeared in her right hand, and a metal shield in the other. She looked down in surprise as glowing versions of her combat uniform, plate carrier and all, appeared on her body.

The werewolf, and a new companion that had joined it as she'd changed, looked at her with confusion. She looked to the monstrous wolf nearby and saw the same confusion on its gargantuan face as well.

She reached over and gripped at the door frame of the car and flexed her hand.

The metal creaked and groaned as she made it buckle with little more effort than she would have needed to crack an egg.

"Ohhhh shit." She said softly.

Then she looked up at the wolves nearby. One of them snarled at her as it sensed her anger.

She made to run towards it and closed the distance faster than she could blink.

Before any of them, herself included, could react her spear was impaling the wolf through the chest.

NNNNOOO! That original, feminine, voice raged in her head.
DEFIANCE! It bellowed.

Fuck you. She thought back at it as she slammed the edge of her shield into the wolf's confused and scared face. It flew back from the impact like a missile, leaving gore on her spear that burned away as if the spear was red hot. And for all she knew it was.

She looked over at the other wolf and it cringed back, its ears pressed flat to its head.

There was a loud boom as one of the monster's paws landed next to her. She looked up into its slavering jaws as it made to bite at her.

She jumped to the side and then staggered as she slammed into a brick wall hard enough to send some of its bricks tumbling inside the building it was a part of. Her shield rang like a gong from the impact.

The wolf monster bit down on the car that she and the first wolf had been standing on when she'd impaled it. The car crunched as it crushed it. Then the creature's eye, the one on her side of its body, looked at her with confusion once more. It released the car and turned to face her.

"Ohohohoho!..." She said with a manic grin. "Not a fan of the lack of consent 'OTHER god'." She said with a hint of scorn. "But if this kind of power comes from being your champion then hot damn. I'mma fuck this oversized bitch up!"

She and the monster charged at each other at the same time. The monster moved with the speed of any normal sized wolf made large. But she moved with the speed of some kind of comic book hero.

And as the rest of the military in the area fought to hold back the pack of hungry wolves, or to save the victims of their rampage. Two titans, two godly champions, clashed.

\-------------------------

James struggled feebly against the restraining hands of the two healers that were attending him, and his own mother.

"James stay down." His mother demanded.

"Captain Choi please rest. We still need to heal you." Said an elderly dwarf woman. "Your injuries are extensive."

"No!" James countered. "I need to see Joey! I need to make sure he's okay! Let go of me!"

"We can't do that." The Minotaur said. "I've already sent out several of my staff to see if he's among the injured. But you need to rest now Mr. Choi. I won't have you injure yourself further. Not under my watch!"

"He needs me." James insisted. "Mom he was having an episode. He got scared and he did something that's going to make it hard for him to come back down. We have to help him."

"JAMES MICHAEL CHOI!" His mother said in that tone that instantly made him flinch and draw back a bit. "YOU WILL SIT YOUR ASS BACK ON THIS BED AND LET THEM HEAL YOU OR ELSE I WILL MAKE THEIR JOBS HARDER! DO YOU UNDERSTAND?"

James fought the urge to listen and obey. But he couldn't, not right now.

"No mom." He said simply. "I have to see Joey. I can't stay here."

Then something unexpected happened. Even more unexpected than seeing his mom here in the first place.

His mother's eyes and hands began to glow. The light coming off of them was the familiar amber glow of healing. But James's magical senses screamed at him that he was in danger.

"I SAID SIT DOWN YOUNG MAN!" She bellowed in a voice that echoed louder than anyone in the room expected. She pressed a hand to his forehead, and before James could react, slapped him across the cheek. Then she pressed him back down onto the medical bed.

"Yes mom." He said eagerly, cowed by the unexpected power and violence his mother had displayed.

She sagged as the power faded from her eyes and hands and the minotaur caught her with a single hand as she slumped.

"Mrs. Choi." He said. "Are you okay?"

"Yeah." She replied as she gripped the edge of the bed and regained her footing. "Yeah. I'm good. Thank you."

She looked James in the eyes and he saw the worry and the lingering anger there. He also saw the hints of black veins around the edges of them.

"When did you figure out magic?" He asked uncertainly.

"Literally today mijo." She said as she took a deep breath. "Damn that took a lot out of me."

"Mom." He said softly. "Joey's in trouble. He's scared. And he's gonna be confused. I HAVE to go talk to him."

She placed a hand over his. He winced as he felt the broken bones there throb from the contact.

"Mijo. I don't know what happened. But you're in no place to do anything. Stay and heal." She said. "I'll go find him. Tell me what happened."

James saw the resolve there, and suddenly felt guilty that he hadn't thought SHE could help his brother too.

He told her everything she knew. Even the part where Joey had inadvertently impaled him.

By the time he was done her eyes glistened with barely held back tears.

"Oh, Josephito." She said under her breath. Then she stood up.

She didn't say another word as she left the room.

James reluctantly laid back down as he instantly regretted having to tell his mother something that so obviously hurt her to hear.

He hoped that all of them would be okay, even though he knew they wouldn't.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/z1dvfp/wait_is_this_just_gate_265/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (263/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey hey, Big reveal. And no, it's not as dumb as some of my past reveals may have led you to believe. A NEW PLAYER ENTERS THE FIELD!

Enjoy.

\~

James couldn't remember waking up.

Had it happened hours ago? Minutes? Weeks or seconds?

Something was odd about the space around him. He had the impression of hiding behind a curtain. But not a good curtain. More like one of those lacy, see through curtains that was more about softening the light than stopping it.

There were people (?) on the other side. But something in his mind told him that that wasn't quite right. These weren't REALLY people. He didn't know how he knew that. But somehow he knew it was accurate.

He reached out to push back at the curtain like barrier and found it immovable.

Then he looked down at the hand that had done the pushing.

James recoiled at the left hand.

>!"Where the fuck is my fur and claws?"!< He asked as he looked down at his old human arm. Then he touched his mouth as he realized that he hadn't heard his own voice. >!"What the fuck?"!<

One of the Not-People turned their head(s) to look towards him curiously. He froze in shock as he realized that they must not have known he was there.

Something told him not to let them find him or he would be in trouble.

After a moment of looking his direction, the Not-Person with the indeterminate number of heads turned back to the conversation that he could only half hear.

Then he began to notice the odd nature of the room beyond.

It wasn't a room.

Sure, there was a ceiling. But it seemed to be made of twinkling stars and shifting colors and gases. He had the sense that it was only a few feet above him and that he could touch it despite the veil he was looking through.

He also knew that if he did he would never find his way back HOME.

The floor was some kind of silvery metal that looked like it could have been titanium. But when the figures beyond walked, or crawled, or however they moved, he saw the floor ripple like water.

There were no walls that he could see in any direction. He tried to turn around to see if the metaphorical behind-the-curtains space he was in would have a wall that he was pressed against.

But when he did he found himself looking back at the exact same view he had been looking at before turning around. As if he was some game character who had hit the focus button to look back at something important.

More of the Not-People appeared, seemingly from thin air, and James suddenly realized that he was sitting in a miasma of overflowing magical energy. He hadn't noticed it at first. But as the new arrivals appeared each of them brought with them a flood of energy so massive that he felt himself struggling not to be overwhelmed. He imagined that it was the magical sensation equivalent to how Joey might feel at an unexpected Heavy Metal concert.

One of the Not-People drew his attention. Not because of their unfathomable physiology, but rather because as he looked at what he thought was a woman he saw familiarity that couldn't exist given his current situation.

Her skin glowed in a slowly shifting myriad of colors but one color dominated all others. A sort of silvery white light that he KNEW. Not in a learned knowledge kind of way, but in the instinctive "I've known this my whole life" kind of way.

His arm throbbed and burned with the memory of what had happened to it in a completely different world.

"The Moon." He said in a stern yet still silent voice that he was surprised he COULD hear.

And as if he had called her on a bullhorn, her head snapped toward his location and her eyes locked on his.

Before, he had only ever heard the conversations in hushed murmurs and whispers. But as she realized he was there and spoke, he heard her as clearly as if they were standing right next to each other.

"You?" She asked in a voice that was equal parts feminine and boomingly, painfully, loud. "How?"

The other Not-People, who James now realized must have been other so-called GODS, turned to regard him. That feeling that he should have gone unnoticed and hidden made James's blood run cold at the realization as one of them, a large four legged creature with different weapons in each of its three arms, began approaching him.

As it approached he realized that he'd not been looking at people his size. Rather, he'd been looking at them from something akin to a table height, or maybe a shelf. The alien creature, the GOD, approached with blinding speed. And yet as it did it crossed MILES of space.

Before James realized what had happened he was looking up at a figure that was taller than any sky scraper, or mountain, or..... hell, anything he'd ever seen in his life.

He was an ant to this thing. Hell, less than an ant, he was a grain of sand that had somehow managed to get a balcony seat to a cocktail party of Deities.

"HOW ARE YOU HERE?" A male voice that, somehow, sounded like metal impacting metal demanded as the alien form approached.

"James?" A familiar voice said from somewhere far away. "Mijo!"

Something, some phantom force, slapped lightly at his cheek.

"Mijo!?!?" His mom's voice said. "Mijo wake up! Please!"

The curtain space and the view of the veiled gods was instantly replaced by a view of a familiar ceiling, and a world of pain.

James shuddered as he drew a deep, refreshingly cool, breath. He hadn't even realized that he hadn't been breathing in the.... other place.

"James?" His mother asked as she gripped his face.

"Mom?" He asked, confused, as he turned to look at her. His neck ached from the movement.

"Oh thank God!" She exclaimed as she showered him in kisses. James looked up in fear as she said the Deity's name. "We thought we'd lost you. Your breathing stopped." She continued before slapping his left shoulder lightly. It hurt, but the pain was muted compared to what it should have been. He looked and saw the familiar dark fur there. "What happened?"

He quickly used the wolf arm to grab his mom's shoulder and look her in the face. Her cheeks glistened with tears.

"Mom where's Joey?" He asked.

Margaret Choi looked at her son in confusion at the question.

And what the fuck did I just see? He wondered as he looked back at the ceiling.

\--------------------------

Dranek turned his massive form southward, ignoring the attacks of the pathetic humans below him, which were growing fewer and more inaccurate. As he did, his tail swiped one of the odd spinning contraptions out of the air with a painful sting as its blades dug into his flesh, before it spun out of the air and crashed in a fireball.

This felt good in the worst way possible.

For years, decades even, he had longed for a chance to lash out. To strike back at everyone and everything. Why should he have been the capped exile? He had only been defending himself. The only reason he had been tried for an unsanctioned turning and not a murder was because blood loss had made him pass out before he'd been able to rip the fool's head off.

But now as he stomped on one of the odd, metal, carriages with their alien projectile weapons he would have smiled if he could have. It felt good to finally be the one that all the other wolves, and there were many surrounding him now, looked up to. The fact that that was literal only made it better.

One of the massive metal arrows, the ones with the explosive rune stones in them, impacted him just to the side of his snout, sending his hot blood and flesh flying as it exploded. He felt several of his massive, silver, teeth pop and fall out of his mouth and he saw one crush several of the small humans below. Even when he faltered he was a deadly force of nature.

The two teeth grew back, silver and all, in a matter of moments as he reached up and used them to rip a massive green and white metal sign off of its posts and throw it at a group of soldiers below.

Beloved champion Dranek.

Goddess. He thought back. But thinking was getting difficult now. More and more he was finding his thoughts simplified. Attack, eat, move. Little more existed in his mind now. Even thinking her title felt like drawing air while drowning. It felt blissful for things to be so simple now.

We have a slight.... problem... my champion.

How.......help?

Smell for the blood of wolves. She instructed him. Smell for the scent of anger and fury, and look for clusters of your kin. They deal with non-believers and blasphemers.

They.... deny you? Goddess?

They try. She admitted.

Dranek owes Goddess life. Dranek will..... He struggled to find the word even though he'd had it only moments before. ......Serve.

I know you will my dear. And you shall be so handsomely rewarded for it.

Something, some kind of projectile that moved too fast for him to even sense, slammed into his side, punching through both of his shoulder blades, ribs, and organs, and continued onward without even slowing down, and sent him toppling over sideways. Dozens of fellow wolves scattered as fast as they could as he crushed buildings and trees and the odd metal carriages. More than a few of them didn't make it and were crushed badly enough that even THEY couldn't survive it.

Dranek will try.

He slowly lifted himself up on forelegs that shook as they regenerated from the startling amount of damage the round had done.

As he stood to full height another projectile of the same nature ripped his throat out, sending a wave of hot, faintly luminous, blood splashing over the remains of a building that his nose told him was some kind of restaurant.

He turned toward the direction the round had come from. Then jumped out of the way just as another round came at him. He almost dodged it, and felt a line of fire blast through his left flank in a long ragged slash.

He saw the hole the projectile had made in the woods near town, smelled the ozone of some kind of magic from where it had passed, though it was unlike anything he'd ever smelled before.

He began to charge toward it, occasionally dodging left or right.

First. This thing dies.

\---

"Ohhhhh. The humans have brought out one of their magnetic cannons." War said in a fit of joy that was atypical of him. "Oh, I do so love some of the weapons this world has come up with. We need to make more of these No-Magic worlds. Very innovative in their bloodshed."

Moon sighed as she looked around the vision space that had just manifested. It wasn't uncommon for the other gods to put one in place when Apotheosis was approaching. Especially now that Logic and Lust had both shown up. They always showed up at the same time, and they constantly bickered. But they loved having Visuals for everything.

"War!" She hissed, pulling the weapon laden god form's attention. "How was that MORTAL here?"

War rolled his eyes, which was impressive given his crustacean-like anatomy, at the question.

"It's apotheosis Moon." He said simply, as if that answered anything at all. "The rules always get a little..... loose.... when a god is born." He went back to the somewhat reclined position he'd been in and looked back upon the world.

"Still. A mortal was here. IN OUR REALM." She reiterated. "And it was HIM. HOW?"

War took in a deep breath.

"Your obsession with hims is adorable Moon. Really. You should make some demi-gods with him. That world hasn't had any of those in a while. Nice change of pace." He said as he smiled. Below them a squad of Soldiers had just opened up with an automatic grenade launcher and were absolutely wreaking havoc on the Moon's children. And most of the nearby buildings too. "But it's not like he's the first one to ever get here."

"Those were all vestiges during prayer rituals." She shot back. "People who requested, and were granted audience. HE wouldn't do that. And you know it."

War simply shrugged with his three shoulders. "Yeah, and he's probably in a coma now. Or will be. Not many mortals have gotten eyes on our true forms and kept their minds intact. Only issue this will cause is if it ruins his story line."

A sudden stillness came over the space as a NEW voice spoke.

"I... brought him here." Said the new voice. The tone, pitch, and even cadence of the new voice rapidly shifted as it spoke. It's form was humanoid in shape, but all of its features were soft and indistinguishable.

"This is earlier than expected." War said to her in a whisper. "Is it supposed to have happened already?"

"Apologies." It said, as though it had heard the question, and as a god it probably had. "It is simply my way."

Moon tensed even as she saw other gods around the space growing uneasy around the new member of their kind.

"Who..... or WHAT... are you?" Life asked. Life was always the one to ask. It was their role in these things.

The new god looked at life with a soft smile as its form took on one that was similar to a human. But uglier, and hairier, and a little hunched. It was wearing simple animal furs and clutched a rudimentary spear.

"I am the proto-human." It said as it began to pace around and examine each of them. "Half starved, sick with illnesses that no longer exist, surrounded by wolves as they circle him for their dinner. Determined to make them work for their meal."

It looked down at the world below with another of those soft smiles as its form shifted to one of ancient Greek features, wearing tattered, blood soaked bronze armor and wielding a broken spear and a shield covered in dents and embedded arrows.

"I am King Leonidas and the few thousand free Greeks who stood against an army that outnumbered them twenty to one and had them surrounded."

It shifted to the form of a sweaty, dirty, African man with no shirt on and scars across his back. A noose extended from its neck up out of sight.

"I am the slave. Who could no longer accept a master."

Another form shift and it was a skinny, bald, pale woman.

"I am the patient." It said as it neared Death, who smiled at it. Death never smiled at any of them except life. "Whose days can be counted on their fingers. But who will still go to their doctors appointments. To gatherings with friends and families even though it exhausts them. Who continues to attempt survival because what other option is there?"

It became a small child with ratty clothes and a tattered book in one hand.

"I am the child of a destitute family. Who will be lucky to see adulthood. And even though I will need to move heaven and earth to get anywhere, I study harder than any other child my age. Because I know that moving heaven and earth are the only way I will get anywhere or become anything.

It shifted again as it leaned against a pillar that hadn't been there until it had moved to lean. And it was wearing a bloody, soot stained, version of the uniform the soldiers below wore. But with a black and blue polo shirt. It leaned because its left leg now ended in a bloody stump.

"I am PFC Anthony Goodson. Who is, as we speak, about to die. He is still wearing the pizza delivery shirt that he'd been wearing when his Reserve Unit called him into action." It smiled, but the smile was sad this time. "He has five.... no.... four... rounds left in his rifle. His leg is pinned under some debris from the building his squad had been in and he cannot move. And your wolves are closing in on him." It said with an accusatory glance at Moon. "And he will die a bloody, senseless death. But he will do so with an empty magazine and a bloody combat knife."

It shifted again, and now it WAS one of those werewolves. It had the subtle curves that marked it as a woman, and Moon recognized the form.

"I am Corporal Samantha Leray Jenkins. Who thought she was dead. Only to reawaken as something from her nightmares, and begin receiving instructions from a goddess." This time it stared at Moon with that same sad smile. "And even though there is no solid evidence AGAINST this goddess's existence. I have denied her and I fight her forces with literal tooth and nail."

Moon spoke the word that she had had on the tip of her tongue as she had dealt with the handful of Earth humans who had resisted her.

"Defiance." She hissed.

The new god smiled at her and nodded. Its form shifted to that of the very Mortal who had intruded on their space.

"Don't wear it out." Defiance said in a deeper version of James Choi's voice.

Then, as the pantheon exploded into angry accusations and impromptu prophesying, Defiance walked over to a, previously non-existent, chair and sat down.

Moon glared at it as one of the other Gods harried her about how she had brought such a God into apotheosis.

\------------------------------

Jenkins was tired as she faced off against yet another of the werewolves.

Her body bore more wounds than she thought she had ever gotten in the rest of her life.

Still, she fought. The beast lunged at her.

"Serve." It said just as she dodged to the side and slashed her new claws down its side. It whimpered and skittered away as the last of its tattered lab coat fell away from it, coated in its own blood.

"Fuck you!" She yelled in her new, deeper, voice. It hurt to talk. A bullet from one of her own brothers in arms had hit her in the chest a few minutes earlier. She'd lived thanks to her new form. But it still hurt.

The wolf jumped up on a piece of wreckage near it and then leapt into the air with its claws extended toward her. She jumped towards it, clearing at least ten feet before she impacted the beast and the two of them began rolling over and over like the dogs they now resembled.

"I'm not gonna be a monster just because some jumped up wannabe deity made me look like one." She said as she managed to get the beast in a makeshift arm bar. She snapped its arm without hesitation, then as it began to cry got it into a choke hold and began strangling it into unconsciousness.

She'd only managed that tactic on a few of the other wolves she'd faced. The rest she'd had to put down in a messier fashion, and hope that they healed from it.

It took a few minutes. She knew from her own new physiology that the wolf's neck and throat were much larger, and assumed that their hearts were too. So choking them out was time exhaustive.

The ground beneath her shuddered as the massive wolf rampaging on the other side of the town did something.

Gotta stay away from that thing. She thought.

Samantha Jenkins. A voice said to her. But it wasn't the voice that had spoken to her earlier. You have a defiant soul.

Great. She thought. Which one are you? Jesus? Horus? Maybe some Aztec god or something?

I am none of the ones you know. It replied. And she got a sense that this speaker was sad somehow. Or maybe tired. But I come with an offer. I ask for no service nor devotion. I ask only that you continue to defy those who would control you.

She felt the werewolf wrapped in her arms and legs begin weakening.

Yeah? And what do I get out of this offer? Or... more importantly... what do YOU get out of it?

You will gain the power to end this battle. And, though you are already one in spirit, I.... will gain a champion.

The ground shuddered again, closer this time. And Jenkins heard some great movement of the wind as it seemed to pulse.

Then a massive, fur laden, slightly glowing, nose moved over the building near her and began to sniff.

Oh shit. She thought as she considered the offer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yyuukd/wait_is_this_just_gate_264/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (263/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey hey, Big reveal. And no, it's not as dumb as some of my past reveals may have led you to believe. A NEW PLAYER ENTERS THE FIELD!

Enjoy.

\~

James couldn't remember waking up.

Had it happened hours ago? Minutes? Weeks or seconds?

Something was odd about the space around him. He had the impression of hiding behind a curtain. But not a good curtain. More like one of those lacy, see through curtains that was more about softening the light than stopping it.

There were people (?) on the other side. But something in his mind told him that that wasn't quite right. These weren't REALLY people. He didn't know how he knew that. But somehow he knew it was accurate.

He reached out to push back at the curtain like barrier and found it immovable.

Then he looked down at the hand that had done the pushing.

James recoiled at the left hand.

>!"Where the fuck is my fur and claws?"!< He asked as he looked down at his old human arm. Then he touched his mouth as he realized that he hadn't heard his own voice. >!"What the fuck?"!<

One of the Not-People turned their head(s) to look towards him curiously. He froze in shock as he realized that they must not have known he was there.

Something told him not to let them find him or he would be in trouble.

After a moment of looking his direction, the Not-Person with the indeterminate number of heads turned back to the conversation that he could only half hear.

Then he began to notice the odd nature of the room beyond.

It wasn't a room.

Sure, there was a ceiling. But it seemed to be made of twinkling stars and shifting colors and gases. He had the sense that it was only a few feet above him and that he could touch it despite the veil he was looking through.

He also knew that if he did he would never find his way back HOME.

The floor was some kind of silvery metal that looked like it could have been titanium. But when the figures beyond walked, or crawled, or however they moved, he saw the floor ripple like water.

There were no walls that he could see in any direction. He tried to turn around to see if the metaphorical behind-the-curtains space he was in would have a wall that he was pressed against.

But when he did he found himself looking back at the exact same view he had been looking at before turning around. As if he was some game character who had hit the focus button to look back at something important.

More of the Not-People appeared, seemingly from thin air, and James suddenly realized that he was sitting in a miasma of overflowing magical energy. He hadn't noticed it at first. But as the new arrivals appeared each of them brought with them a flood of energy so massive that he felt himself struggling not to be overwhelmed. He imagined that it was the magical sensation equivalent to how Joey might feel at an unexpected Heavy Metal concert.

One of the Not-People drew his attention. Not because of their unfathomable physiology, but rather because as he looked at what he thought was a woman he saw familiarity that couldn't exist given his current situation.

Her skin glowed in a slowly shifting myriad of colors but one color dominated all others. A sort of silvery white light that he KNEW. Not in a learned knowledge kind of way, but in the instinctive "I've known this my whole life" kind of way.

His arm throbbed and burned with the memory of what had happened to it in a completely different world.

"The Moon." He said in a stern yet still silent voice that he was surprised he COULD hear.

And as if he had called her on a bullhorn, her head snapped toward his location and her eyes locked on his.

Before, he had only ever heard the conversations in hushed murmurs and whispers. But as she realized he was there and spoke, he heard her as clearly as if they were standing right next to each other.

"You?" She asked in a voice that was equal parts feminine and boomingly, painfully, loud. "How?"

The other Not-People, who James now realized must have been other so-called GODS, turned to regard him. That feeling that he should have gone unnoticed and hidden made James's blood run cold at the realization as one of them, a large four legged creature with different weapons in each of its three arms, began approaching him.

As it approached he realized that he'd not been looking at people his size. Rather, he'd been looking at them from something akin to a table height, or maybe a shelf. The alien creature, the GOD, approached with blinding speed. And yet as it did it crossed MILES of space.

Before James realized what had happened he was looking up at a figure that was taller than any sky scraper, or mountain, or..... hell, anything he'd ever seen in his life.

He was an ant to this thing. Hell, less than an ant, he was a grain of sand that had somehow managed to get a balcony seat to a cocktail party of Deities.

"HOW ARE YOU HERE?" A male voice that, somehow, sounded like metal impacting metal demanded as the alien form approached.

^("James?") A familiar voice said from somewhere far away. ^("Mijo!")

Something, some phantom force, slapped lightly at his cheek.

"Mijo!?!?" His mom's voice said. "Mijo wake up! Please!"

The curtain space and the view of the veiled gods was instantly replaced by a view of a familiar ceiling, and a world of pain.

James shuddered as he drew a deep, refreshingly cool, breath. He hadn't even realized that he hadn't been breathing in the.... other place.

"James?" His mother asked as she gripped his face.

"Mom?" He asked, confused, as he turned to look at her. His neck ached from the movement.

"Oh thank God!" She exclaimed as she showered him in kisses. James looked up in fear as she said the Deity's name. "We thought we'd lost you. Your breathing stopped." She continued before slapping his left shoulder lightly. It hurt, but the pain was muted compared to what it should have been. He looked and saw the familiar dark fur there. "What happened?"

He quickly used the wolf arm to grab his mom's shoulder and look her in the face. Her cheeks glistened with tears.

"Mom where's Joey?" He asked.

Margaret Choi looked at her son in confusion at the question.

And what the fuck did I just see? He wondered as he looked back at the ceiling.

\-------------------------

Dranek turned his massive form southward, ignoring the attacks of the pathetic humans below him, which were growing fewer and more inaccurate. As he did, his tail swiped one of the odd spinning contraptions out of the air with a painful sting as its blades dug into his flesh, before it spun out of the air and crashed in a fireball.

This felt good in the worst way possible.

For years, decades even, he had longed for a chance to lash out. To strike back at everyone and everything. Why should he have been the capped exile? He had only been defending himself. The only reason he had been tried for an unsanctioned turning and not a murder was because blood loss had made him pass out before he'd been able to rip the fool's head off.

But now as he stomped on one of the odd, metal, carriages with their alien projectile weapons he would have smiled if he could have. It felt good to finally be the one that all the other wolves, and there were many surrounding him now, looked up to. The fact that that was literal only made it better.

One of the massive metal arrows, the ones with the explosive rune stones in them, impacted him just to the side of his snout, sending his hot blood and flesh flying as it exploded. He felt several of his massive, silver, teeth pop and fall out of his mouth and he saw one crush several of the small humans below. Even when he faltered he was a deadly force of nature.

The two teeth grew back, silver and all, in a matter of moments as he reached up and used them to rip a massive green and white metal sign off of its posts and throw it at a group of soldiers below.

Beloved champion Dranek.

Goddess. He thought back. But thinking was getting difficult now. More and more he was finding his thoughts simplified. Attack, eat, move. Little more existed in his mind now. Even thinking her title felt like drawing air while drowning. It felt blissful for things to be so simple now.

We have a slight.... problem... my champion.

How.......help?

Smell for the blood of wolves. She instructed him. Smell for the scent of anger and fury, and look for clusters of your kin. They deal with non-believers and blasphemers.

They.... deny you? Goddess?

They try. She admitted.

Dranek owes Goddess life. Dranek will..... He struggled to find the word even though he'd had it only moments before. ......Serve.

I know you will my dear. And you shall be so handsomely rewarded for it.

Something, some kind of projectile that moved too fast for him to even sense, slammed into his side, punching through both of his shoulder blades, ribs, and organs, and continued onward without even slowing down, and sent him toppling over sideways. Dozens of fellow wolves scattered as fast as they could as he crushed buildings and trees and the odd metal carriages. More than a few of them didn't make it and were crushed badly enough that even THEY couldn't survive it.

Dranek will try.

He slowly lifted himself up on forelegs that shook as they regenerated from the startling amount of damage the round had done.

As he stood to full height another projectile of the same nature ripped his throat out, sending a wave of hot, faintly luminous, blood splashing over the remains of a building that his nose told him was some kind of restaurant.

He turned toward the direction the round had come from. Then jumped out of the way just as another round came at him. He almost dodged it, and felt a line of fire blast through his left flank in a long ragged slash.

He saw the hole the projectile had made in the woods near town, smelled the ozone of some kind of magic from where it had passed, though it was unlike anything he'd ever smelled before.

He began to charge toward it, occasionally dodging left or right.

First. This thing dies.

\---

"Ohhhhh. The humans have brought out one of their magnetic cannons." War said in a fit of joy that was atypical of him. "Oh, I do so love some of the weapons this world has come up with. We need to make more of these No-Magic worlds. Very innovative in their bloodshed."

Moon sighed as she looked around the vision space that had just manifested. It wasn't uncommon for the other gods to put one in place when Apotheosis was approaching. Especially now that Logic and Lust had both shown up. They always showed up at the same time, and they constantly bickered. But they loved having Visuals for everything.

"War!" She hissed, pulling the weapon laden god form's attention. "How was that MORTAL here?"

War rolled his eyes, which was impressive given his crustacean-like anatomy, at the question.

"It's apotheosis Moon." He said simply, as if that answered anything at all. "The rules always get a little..... loose.... when a god is born." He went back to the somewhat reclined position he'd been in and looked back upon the world.

"Still. A mortal was here. IN OUR REALM." She reiterated. "And it was HIM. HOW?"

War took in a deep breath.

"Your obsession with hims is adorable Moon. Really. You should make some demi-gods with him. That world hasn't had any of those in a while. Nice change of pace." He said as he smiled. Below them a squad of Soldiers had just opened up with an automatic grenade launcher and were absolutely wreaking havoc on the Moon's children. And most of the nearby buildings too. "But it's not like he's the first one to ever get here."

"Those were all vestiges during prayer rituals." She shot back. "People who requested, and were granted audience. HE wouldn't do that. And you know it."

War simply shrugged with his three shoulders. "Yeah, and he's probably in a coma now. Or will be. Not many mortals have gotten eyes on our true forms and kept their minds intact. Only issue this will cause is if it ruins his story line."

A sudden stillness came over the space as a NEW voice spoke.

"I... brought him here." Said the new voice. The tone, pitch, and even cadence of the new voice rapidly shifted as it spoke. It's form was humanoid in shape, but all of its features were soft and indistinguishable.

"This is earlier than expected." War said to her in a whisper. "Is it supposed to have happened already?"

"Apologies." It said, as though it had heard the question, and as a god it probably had. "It is simply my way."

Moon tensed even as she saw other gods around the space growing uneasy around the new member of their kind.

"Who..... or WHAT... are you?" Life asked. Life was always the one to ask. It was their role in these things.

The new god looked at life with a soft smile as its form took on one that was similar to a human. But uglier, and hairier, and a little hunched. It was wearing simple animal furs and clutched a rudimentary spear.

"I am the proto-human." It said as it began to pace around and examine each of them. "Half starved, sick with illnesses that no longer exist, surrounded by wolves as they circle him for their dinner. Determined to make them work for their meal."

It looked down at the world below with another of those soft smiles as its form shifted to one of ancient Greek features, wearing tattered, blood soaked bronze armor and wielding a broken spear and a shield covered in dents and embedded arrows.

"I am King Leonidas and the few thousand free Greeks who stood against an army that outnumbered them twenty to one and had them surrounded."

It shifted to the form of a sweaty, dirty, African man with no shirt on and scars across his back. A noose extended from its neck up out of sight.

"I am the slave. Who could no longer accept a master."

Another form shift and it was a skinny, bald, pale woman.

"I am the patient." It said as it neared Death, who smiled at it. Death never smiled at any of them except life. "Whose days can be counted on their fingers. But who will still go to their doctors appointments. To gatherings with friends and families even though it exhausts them. Who continues to attempt survival because what other option is there?"

It became a small child with ratty clothes and a tattered book in one hand.

"I am the child of a destitute family. Who will be lucky to see adulthood. And even though I will need to move heaven and earth to get anywhere, I study harder than any other child my age. Because I know that moving heaven and earth are the only way I will get anywhere or become anything.

It shifted again as it leaned against a pillar that hadn't been there until it had moved to lean. And it was wearing a bloody, soot stained, version of the uniform the soldiers below wore. But with a black and blue polo shirt. It leaned because its left leg now ended in a bloody stump.

"I am PFC Anthony Goodson. Who is, as we speak, about to die. He is still wearing the pizza delivery shirt that he'd been wearing when his Reserve Unit called him into action." It smiled, but the smile was sad this time. "He has five.... no.... four... rounds left in his rifle. His leg is pinned under some debris from the building his squad had been in and he cannot move. And your wolves are closing in on him." It said with an accusatory glance at Moon. "And he will die a bloody, senseless death. But he will do so with an empty magazine and a bloody combat knife."

It shifted again, and now it WAS one of those werewolves. It had the subtle curves that marked it as a woman, and Moon recognized the form.

"I am Corporal Samantha Leray Jenkins. Who thought she was dead. Only to reawaken as something from her nightmares, and begin receiving instructions from a goddess." This time it stared at Moon with that same sad smile. "And even though there is no solid evidence AGAINST this goddess's existence. I have denied her and I fight her forces with literal tooth and nail."

Moon spoke the word that she had had on the tip of her tongue as she had dealt with the handful of Earth humans who had resisted her.

"Defiance." She hissed.

The new god smiled at her and nodded. Its form shifted to that of the very Mortal who had intruded on their space.

"Don't wear it out." Defiance said in a deeper version of James Choi's voice.

Then, as the pantheon exploded into angry accusations and impromptu prophesying, Defiance walked over to a, previously non-existent, chair and sat down.

Moon glared at it as one of the other Gods harried her about how she had brought such a God into apotheosis.

\------------------------------

Jenkins was tired as she faced off against yet another of the werewolves.

Her body bore more wounds than she thought she had ever gotten in the rest of her life.

Still, she fought. The beast lunged at her.

"Serve." It said just as she dodged to the side and slashed her new claws down its side. It whimpered and skittered away as the last of its tattered lab coat fell away from it, coated in its own blood.

"Fuck you!" She yelled in her new, deeper, voice. It hurt to talk. A bullet from one of her own brothers in arms had hit her in the chest a few minutes earlier. She'd lived thanks to her new form. But it still hurt.

The wolf jumped up on a piece of wreckage near it and then leapt into the air with its claws extended toward her. She jumped towards it, clearing at least ten feet before she impacted the beast and the two of them began rolling over and over like the dogs they now resembled.

"I'm not gonna be a monster just because some jumped up wannabe deity made me look like one." She said as she managed to get the beast in a makeshift arm bar. She snapped its arm without hesitation, then as it began to cry got it into a choke hold and began strangling it into unconsciousness.

She'd only managed that tactic on a few of the other wolves she'd faced. The rest she'd had to put down in a messier fashion, and hope that they healed from it.

It took a few minutes. She knew from her own new physiology that the wolf's neck and throat were much larger, and assumed that their hearts were too. So choking them out was time exhaustive.

The ground beneath her shuddered as the massive wolf rampaging on the other side of the town did something.

Gotta stay away from that thing. She thought.

Samantha Jenkins. A voice said to her. But it wasn't the voice that had spoken to her earlier. You have a defiant soul.

Great. She thought. Which one are you? Jesus? Horus? Maybe some Aztec god or something?

I am none of the ones you know. It replied. And she got a sense that this speaker was sad somehow. Or maybe tired. But I come with an offer. I ask for no service nor devotion. I ask only that you continue to defy those who would control you.

She felt the werewolf wrapped in her arms and legs begin weakening.

Yeah? And what do I get out of this offer? Or... more importantly... what do YOU get out of it?

You will gain the power to end this battle. And, though you are already one in spirit, I.... will gain a champion.

The ground shuddered again, closer this time. And Jenkins heard some great movement of the wind as it seemed to pulse.

Then a massive, fur laden, slightly glowing, nose moved over the building near her and began to sniff.

Oh shit. She thought as she considered the offer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yyut6o/wait_is_this_just_gate_264/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (262/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look, the gods are talking again. Can't wait to get all Neil Gaiman on some pantheon conversations. ^(That is a joke, not a promise).*

Enjoy.

\~

"This is not going as you'd hoped." War said as the Moon goddess paced, for lack of a better term, around their shared space in the cosmos. "Your new, so called, Children..... are not obeying you as completely as you'd hoped."

"Shut up war. Even if a handful of these new pups resist, enough of them are obeying their goddess that it shall make no difference." She replied, anger flaring her presence through the primordial outer space of the dimension. "Besides, how can anyone deny me when my champion shows my glory to the world."

"The new sibling grows towards apotheosis." Magic said in its jilting, to and fro, way of speaking. "Other gods are taking notice."

THAT caused the moon to stop and consider.

It was one thing to help create a new member of their kind. That would have been more than enough for the others to forgive her intrusion on this test dimension. But she didn't want them to see her being resisted by her own subjects. A denier and blasphemer here or there was one thing, in fact it was practically a given. But as she looked down at the chaos occurring near her champion, she felt several dozen of the new werewolves in various levels of rebellion against her commands. She had well over a hundred new children now, but that was still an insanely high ratio of blasphemy.

And as if that wasn't enough her champion was being resisted much more effectively than she'd expected. It was still winning of course. These humans would have to use something MUCH bigger to even come close to stopping its slow progress toward the nearby town. But they were remarkably good at slowing it down, distracting it, and hitting it in ways that hindered, even if only for seconds.

The cost to life was already extraordinary.

But still, she had to wonder just what kind of GOD would be born of a world like this.

She'd hoped for technology, destruction, or maybe even something esoteric, like maybe the god of atomics, or industry or something. Those would have made sense given this world's colorful history.

They could definitely create a god of communication. She thought to herself. They've petty much perfected planetary communication. Only thing holding them back is the speed of light at this point. And LIGHT will never budge on that front.

But the battle below, even in the non military areas, was speaking to a human nature that she had no frame of reference for. People simply did not struggle like this. At least not in any of the OTHER universes. Why were these ones so different?

She thought back to her meeting with the Summoned Hero after he'd killed her favorite champion. He was different too.

Her thoughts were interrupted by the arrival of a god whose familiar energy made her recoil in mild annoyance.

"Hello moon." Said a slow, deep, echoing voice. "It's been a long time since we've shared a dimension."

"Darkness." She said coldly. "Glad you could join us."

"New god." Darkness said as it expanded its consciousness to view the world and its history, as well as the current situation. "Your doing? Bit young for that aren't you?"

"I am as old as any of you are, plus or minus a few aeons for celestial creation in the original existence." She shot back.

"And the need for the worshipers of said celestial body. Which makes you significantly YOUNGER than those of us who CREATED that original existence." Darkness said coyly. "What an amusing scenario. I can't wait to see what kind of deity YOU create."

Moon seethed as she felt darkness move away and begin examining things more closely.

She turned her own attention back to the werewolves in the battle below.

"That seemed awkward." Said war from where he basked in the violent energies below. "Want a hand with this part? It is kind of my field after all."

"No." She replied angrily.

They all felt the growing presence that was on the verge of being created amongst them.

Resting calmly and unnoticed, as they always were despite their power, Life and Death looked on in mild amusement.

\----------

Vickers emerged from the door into the castle with his arm in a sling and a lit cigarette in his mouth.

He limped past the Petravian soldiers and mages and pulled his two new prisoners along with him. He'd had their legs cut free of the webbing just so they could walk.

"Come on." He said. "You two more than anyone need to be brought in immediately.

First Sergeant Nguyen hung his head even as the Major glared at the back of the SEAL's head.

\["You oughta be ashamed of yourself Chief."\] The woman spat at his back. \["Your career is over. You're a dead man walking if you ever get back to Earth."\]

Vickers halted his limping, aching, trudge with a sigh as he glanced back at her.

"Shut up." He said simply. "You clearly don't get what's going on."

\["And what's that, Traitor?"\] She replied.

This time Vickers stopped entirely and turned to face them, oblivious of the soldiers milling past them toward the healers ward.

"You got played major." He said simply. "Think about it. First, they sent a maniac like you. Someone who's probably been screaming for blood and glory for the good ole U.S.A. since she was a kid watching propaganda about the war. They sent that kinda person on what was essentially a scientific research trip." He shrugged. "Granted, they sent you with reinforcements to save that trip, but still."

She began to speak but he cut her off.

"They already had a cover for people being in this world. Hell, I'm half the reason they had to make that cover up." He gestured at the castle around them. "They had peace with these people and they sent MUCK MARCHERS to clean up a small spill on the sand?" He looked at Nguyen. "That make sense to either of you? Cause that's going zero to a hundred real fuckin quick in my books."

He began walking again, pulling their restraints as he did.

"Then, instead of simply poppin' smoke and gettin' y'all the hell out of there and somewhere else where you could maaaaaybe make a new cover story. They double down! They bring in more troops, the muck marcher tech boys, goddam Miffy's. I mean, talk about goin' all in. Surprised they didn't have you setting up a landing strip for an air base."

Neither of the prisoners spoke up about the fact that a helicopter pad and a small surveillance chopper had been next on the plan for the FOB.

"Then a REAL fight comes to your door. Even gives you prep time cause your position and drones let you see em coming." He stopped and turned to face them again. "And command KNOWS what the Petravians are capable of physically and somewhat magically. They have reports from me and Choi. But what do they do to support you? Do they send more people? More vehicles? More bombs? Anything?"

After a moment of neither of them answering he continues.

"Nope." He says smugly as he turns back and begins walking once again. "They let you swing on the noose you tied for yourself. And they had footage of all of it that they could study and analyze to their hearts content."

Suddenly the Major's angry expression shifted to one of understanding.

"You were never sent here to conquer.... MAJOR." Vickers continued, putting as much venom into her rank as possible. "You were a goddam sacrificial guinea pig. They just wanted to see what the Petravians were really capable of against their favorite toys. And you gave em one hell of a show."

As he finished the statement they rounded a corner and were greeted by a pair of guards in front of a row of prison cells.

"VIP's for the King's detainment." He said as he handed the ropes tied around their spider silk cocoons. "The leaders of the invading camp."

The guards accepted the ropes eagerly, even as they eyed Vickers' extensive injuries.

"I'm not a traitor Major." He said as she moved past him. "I'll do what I can to get our people free. Or at least off the chopping block. But don't kid yourself. You two will probably be off the table when it comes to pardons or whatever." He turned to Nguyen, whose head was still hanging. "Cept maybe you Top." He said. "Giving the order to stand down might help. Sorry things went this way."

\["You're wrong chief."\] The Major said. \["They wouldn't do that to their own people."\]

Vickers stopped and laughed as he took the last few puffs of the smoke while he stood in the doorway. He wanted to say something profound or witty. But he was just too tired. Too sore.

"Just shut the fuck up you fuckin' idiot." He said as he walked away and toward the healing ward.

\--------------------------

\[Small writer's note: Not trying to mess with formatting or accidentally post something here with a fake URL. So I'm just gonna use brackets for this next section. You'll get the idea.\]

\--------------------------

H2OGoon: Yo, you guys seeing this shit outside of Sturgis?

EndlessWeebery: CGI on it is pretty epic. Looks like a cross between an old Del Toro movie and Princess Mononoke

BigCLITEnergy24-7: Don't understand why they're doing it found footage style though. Think it has anything to do with that weird foreign dessert video. \[Youtube URL\] The one that looks like WoW vs CoD23?

HowleySimp: The werewolves are sexy <3

H2OGoon: Oh great. The furries are here.

HowleySimp: ;P

StunningLinguist562: Did you guys understand anything in the dessert video? I mean, obviously the soldier lady was speaking english. But what was that other language? The one the super model looking paladin lady was speaking? Sounded like Romanian and Tagalog had hate sex with each other or something.

The-Bob: She was sexy tho. That weird glow filter on her face when she was talking was weird. But other than that, solid 5/7 would gladly disappoint.

EndlessWeebery: 100% TROOF

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Can't believe the army is getting so #RECKT Back when I was in they would've lit that big ole fuzzball with a couple JDAMs by now.

HowleySimp: No! He's a good boi. D-:

EndlessWeebery: It's not like it's real.

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Yeah, and the lack of big gun usage is part of what makes it unbelievable. MOAR DAKKA!

Natthecat: It's very real, and its terrifying. There were soldiers right outside my house until a few minutes ago.

BigCLITEnergy24-7: Bullshit. Pics or it didn't happen.

Natthecat: Can't do sound because it's too noisy. And there's wolves outside. Big wolves. \[Streaming embed\]

HowleySimp: Ooooh wolfies! Show us some toe beans! Pwetty pwease.

....

....

....

H2OGoon: Holy shit Natthecat. Is that real?

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Damn, ole gunner boi was rockin the .50 and they still got his ass. \[Salute GIF\] RIP brother.

Natthecat: I'm going to hide now. The soldiers outside are all gone and there's so many wolves. I think I heard one in my back yard. My parents were on a date tonight. They're out there somewhere.

-User: Natthecat has left the chat.-

The-Bob: Well that was fake af. She could've at least shown us something hot.

EndlessWeebery: That blood did look super fake. And there was way too much of it. I mean, sure the guy got his head ripped off. But still, Tarantino much?

H2OGoon: Anybody else suddenly craving chili? BRB.

-User: H2OGoon has left the chat.-

HowleySimp: I don't think I want to see THOSE werewolves anymore. So nasty XP

StuningLinguist562: Seriously? Anyone recognize that language?

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yy6dut/wait_is_this_just_gate_263/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (262/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look, the gods are talking again. Can't wait to get all Neil Gaiman on some pantheon conversations. ^(That is a joke, not a promise.)

Enjoy.

\~

"This is not going as you'd hoped." War said as the Moon goddess paced, for lack of a better term, around their shared space in the cosmos. "Your new, so called, Children..... are not obeying you as completely as you'd hoped."

"Shut up war. Even if a handful of these new pups resist, enough of them are obeying their goddess that it shall make no difference." She replied, anger flaring her presence through the primordial outer space of the dimension. "Besides, how can anyone deny me when my champion shows my glory to the world."

"The new sibling grows towards apotheosis." Magic said in its jilting, to and fro, way of speaking. "Other gods are taking notice."

THAT caused the moon to stop and consider.

It was one thing to help create a new member of their kind. That would have been more than enough for the others to forgive her intrusion on this test dimension. But she didn't want them to see her being resisted by her own subjects. A denier and blasphemer here or there was one thing, in fact it was practically a given. But as she looked down at the chaos occurring near her champion, she felt several dozen of the new werewolves in various levels of rebellion against her commands. She had well over a hundred new children now, but that was still an insanely high ratio of blasphemy.

And as if that wasn't enough her champion was being resisted much more effectively than she'd expected. It was still winning of course. These humans would have to use something MUCH bigger to even come close to stopping its slow progress toward the nearby town. But they were remarkably good at slowing it down, distracting it, and hitting it in ways that hindered, even if only for seconds.

The cost to life was already extraordinary.

But still, she had to wonder just what kind of GOD would be born of a world like this.

She'd hoped for technology, destruction, or maybe even something esoteric, like maybe the god of atomics, or industry or something. Those would have made sense given this world's colorful history.

They could definitely create a god of communication. She thought to herself. They've petty much perfected planetary communication. Only thing holding them back is the speed of light at this point. And LIGHT will never budge on that front.

But the battle below, even in the non military areas, was speaking to a human nature that she had no frame of reference for. People simply did not struggle like this. At least not in any of the OTHER universes. Why were these ones so different?

She thought back to her meeting with the Summoned Hero after he'd killed her favorite champion. He was different too.

Her thoughts were interrupted by the arrival of a god whose familiar energy made her recoil in mild annoyance.

"Hello moon." Said a slow, deep, echoing voice. "It's been a long time since we've shared a dimension."

"Darkness." She said coldly. "Glad you could join us."

"New god." Darkness said as it expanded its consciousness to view the world and its history, as well as the current situation. "Your doing? Bit young for that aren't you?"

"I am as old as any of you are, plus or minus a few aeons for celestial creation in the original existence." She shot back.

"And the need for the worshipers of said celestial body. Which makes you significantly YOUNGER than those of us who CREATED that original existence." Darkness said coyly. "What an amusing scenario. I can't wait to see what kind of deity YOU create."

Moon seethed as she felt darkness move away and begin examining things more closely.

She turned her own attention back to the werewolves in the battle below.

"That seemed awkward." Said war from where he basked in the violent energies below. "Want a hand with this part? It is kind of my field after all."

"No." She replied angrily.

They all felt the growing presence that was on the verge of being created amongst them.

Resting calmly and unnoticed, as they always were despite their power, Life and Death looked on in mild amusement.

\------------------------------

Vickers emerged from the door into the castle with his arm in a sling and a lit cigarette in his mouth.

He limped past the Petravian soldiers and mages and pulled his two new prisoners along with him. He'd had their legs cut free of the webbing just so they could walk.

"Come on." He said. "You two more than anyone need to be brought in immediately.

First Sergeant Nguyen hung his head even as the Major glared at the back of the SEAL's head.

\["You oughta be ashamed of yourself Chief."\] The woman spat at his back. \["Your career is over. You're a dead man walking if you ever get back to Earth."\]

Vickers halted his limping, aching, trudge with a sigh as he glanced back at her.

"Shut up." He said simply. "You clearly don't get what's going on."

\["And what's that, Traitor?"\] She replied.

This time Vickers stopped entirely and turned to face them, oblivious of the soldiers milling past them toward the healers ward.

"You got played major." He said simply. "Think about it. First, they sent a maniac like you. Someone who's probably been screaming for blood and glory for the good ole U.S.A. since she was a kid watching propaganda about the war. They sent that kinda person on what was essentially a scientific research trip." He shrugged. "Granted, they sent you with reinforcements to save that trip, but still."

She began to speak but he cut her off.

"They already had a cover for people being in this world. Hell, I'm half the reason they had to make that cover up." He gestured at the castle around them. "They had peace with these people and they sent MUCK MARCHERS to clean up a small spill on the sand?" He looked at Nguyen. "That make sense to either of you? Cause that's going zero to a hundred real fuckin quick in my books."

He began walking again, pulling their restraints as he did.

"Then, instead of simply poppin' smoke and gettin' y'all the hell out of there and somewhere else where you could maaaaaybe make a new cover story. They double down! They bring in more troops, the muck marcher tech boys, goddam Miffy's. I mean, talk about goin' all in. Surprised they didn't have you setting up a landing strip for an air base."

Neither of the prisoners spoke up about the fact that a helicopter pad and a small surveillance chopper had been next on the plan for the FOB.

"Then a REAL fight comes to your door. Even gives you prep time cause your position and drones let you see em coming." He stopped and turned to face them again. "And command KNOWS what the Petravians are capable of physically and somewhat magically. They have reports from me and Choi. But what do they do to support you? Do they send more people? More vehicles? More bombs? Anything?"

After a moment of neither of them answering he continues.

"Nope." He says smugly as he turns back and begins walking once again. "They let you swing on the noose you tied for yourself. And they had footage of all of it that they could study and analyze to their hearts content."

Suddenly the Major's angry expression shifted to one of understanding.

"You were never sent here to conquer.... MAJOR." Vickers continued, putting as much venom into her rank as possible. "You were a goddam sacrificial guinea pig. They just wanted to see what the Petravians were really capable of against their favorite toys. And you gave em one hell of a show."

As he finished the statement they rounded a corner and were greeted by a pair of guards in front of a row of prison cells.

"VIP's for the King's detainment." He said as he handed the ropes tied around their spider silk cocoons. "The leaders of the invading camp."

The guards accepted the ropes eagerly, even as they eyed Vickers' extensive injuries.

"I'm not a traitor Major." He said as she moved past him. "I'll do what I can to get our people free. Or at least off the chopping block. But don't kid yourself. You two will probably be off the table when it comes to pardons or whatever." He turned to Nguyen, whose head was still hanging. "Cept maybe you Top." He said. "Giving the order to stand down might help. Sorry things went this way."

\["You're wrong chief."\] The Major said. \["They wouldn't do that to their own people."\]

Vickers stopped and laughed as he took the last few puffs of the smoke while he stood in the doorway. He wanted to say something profound or witty. But he was just too tired. Too sore.

"Just shut the fuck up you fuckin' idiot." He said as he walked away and toward the healing ward.

\---

\[Small writer's note: Not trying to mess with formatting or accidentally post something here with a fake URL. So I'm just gonna use brackets for this next section. You'll get the idea.\]

\---

H2OGoon: Yo, you guys seeing this shit outside of Sturgis?

EndlessWeebery: CGI on it is pretty epic. Looks like a cross between an old Del Toro movie and Princess Mononoke

BigCLITEnergy24-7: Don't understand why they're doing it found footage style though. Think it has anything to do with that weird foreign dessert video. \[Youtube URL\] The one that looks like WoW vs CoD23?

HowleySimp: The werewolves are sexy <3

H2OGoon: Oh great. The furries are here.

HowleySimp: ;P

StunningLinguist562: Did you guys understand anything in the dessert video? I mean, obviously the soldier lady was speaking english. But what was that other language? The one the super model looking paladin lady was speaking? Sounded like Romanian and Tagalog had hate sex with each other or something.

The-Bob: She was sexy tho. That weird glow filter on her face when she was talking was weird. But other than that, solid 5/7 would gladly disappoint.

EndlessWeebery: 100% TROOF

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Can't believe the army is getting so #RECKT Back when I was in they would've lit that big ole fuzzball with a couple JDAMs by now.

HowleySimp: No! He's a good boi. D-:

EndlessWeebery: It's not like it's real.

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Yeah, and the lack of big gun usage is part of what makes it unbelievable. MOAR DAKKA!

Natthecat: It's very real, and its terrifying. There were soldiers right outside my house until a few minutes ago.

BigCLITEnergy24-7: Bullshit. Pics or it didn't happen.

Natthecat: Can't do sound because it's too noisy. And there's wolves outside. Big wolves. \[Streaming embed\]

HowleySimp: Ooooh wolfies! Show us some toe beans! Pwetty pwease.

....

....

....

H2OGoon: Holy shit Natthecat. Is that real?

Hippo-Nat20-Critical: Damn, ole gunner boi was rockin the .50 and they still got his ass. \[Salute GIF\] RIP brother.

Natthecat: I'm going to hide now. The soldiers outside are all gone and there's so many wolves. I think I heard one in my back yard. My parents were on a date tonight. They're out there somewhere.

-User: Natthecat has left the chat.-

The-Bob: Well that was fake af. She could've at least shown us something hot.

EndlessWeebery: That blood did look super fake. And there was way too much of it. I mean, sure the guy got his head ripped off. But still, Tarantino much?

H2OGoon: Anybody else suddenly craving chili? BRB.

-User: H2OGoon has left the chat.-

HowleySimp: I don't think I want to see THOSE werewolves anymore. So nasty XP

StuningLinguist562: Seriously? Anyone recognize that language?

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yy6bbz/wait_is_this_just_gate_263/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (261/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Uh oh. Did a god make an oopsie with their puppies?

Also, any resemblences to actual news organizations or personalities are 100% accidental. I don't even watch the news, and there are WAY too many different news company accronyms/initialisms out there. I prefer to get my news via memes like any sane person during these times of strife.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Victor Remerton shuffled the papers that sat in front of him on the KTMN logo'd desk as he read the teleprompter with a hint of agitation. He'd just been on the verge of reporting on a story about the emergence of so-called magic and how it impacted parents. Something he was heavily interested in due to his own daughter's new ability to shoot little dark blue lightning bolts from her finger tips. They couldn't go far, and weren't very big. But he'd learned first hand that they could hurt. His belly still had a singe mark on it from where she'd poked him while he was napping.

"This just in; we've got breaking news from just north of.... Sturgis, South Dakota. We go live to Samantha Flair."

"Thank you Victor." Replied a young blonde woman with heavy makeup that concealed the sleep that had been interrupted by the emergency going on. "I'm coming to you with reports of.... Well... If I'm a hundred percent honest I'm not entirely sure what it is. But as you can see behind," The camera man pans the camera so that it can look up over her left shoulder at the chaos unfolding in the distance. "me, there appears to be some sort of.... Monster... rampaging through the forest just north of Sturgis here."

There's a loud explosion heard in the distance as light flares above one of the hills, causing the camera to automatically darken to adjust. Gunfire peppers the night air as small cracks and rolling booms that mark rifles and machine guns sound through the distant air.

"The Military appears to be engaging the creature with a combination of small arms fire and air support." Several loud howls are heard in the background. "Additionally there seems to be heavy wolf activity coinciding with whatever is going on. As you can see the creature appears to be lupine in nature."

A small feed, seemingly from a helicopter, appears in the corner of the screen. Though, how a news helicopter could be flying amid all the military air power moving around is unknown. On the feed a massive wolf creature with eyes the emit white light, and massive silvery fangs, stomps its front paws down on a military vehicle of some kind, causing a small fire to erupt as its battery panel is compromised.

"As you know Victor there was some uproar in the Sturgis community a little over a decade ago about the opening of an Army laboratory nearby." Samantha said, mostly just trying to sound informed for the viewers. "And this creature appears to have co-" The young woman's face scrunches as the camera goes off angle for a moment. "What?" She asks as a hand points from next to the camera's lens.

The camera jerks toward a blur of movement at the far end of the road that the news crew are currently standing on. A pedestrian, busy gawking at the mayhem like everyone else, is impacted by something with a scream.

"What the hell was that?" A man's voice asks from off camera.

The people in the street begin screaming and scrambling away from whatever it is just as a military helicopter roars over the town low enough to kick dust up.

"Victor!" Samantha Flair's voice says in a panicked-but-attempting-professionalism tone. "There appears to be some kind of- Oh GOD!" She cuts herself off. "There's..... There's.... wolves?" She says in a sort of question. The camera shows something massive and furred and covered in something that will probably get censored on later replays. "Oh god. It's..... it killed them. It's eating- Oh Shit!"

The camera abruptly drops to the ground, showing the young reporters feet. Despite the blue suit and white blouse she was wearing, her shoes are a pair of worn out hiking boots. More furred blurs are impacting more civilians in their attempt to flee.

"There's more." She says as the feet back out of view. "Oh god! There's dozens!"

The feed abruptly cuts back to Victor Remerton in the studio, who is sitting wide eyed in a combination of shock at the footage, and surprise at being back on camera.

As he realizes he's back on camera Victor lets out a quick laugh. "It appears that Samantha is dealing with some slight uhhhh.... technical difficulties.... and may be caught in some kind of viral marketing stunt." He says, though his nervous swallow afterward reveals the lie. "We'll get back to her as soon as we can get things ironed out. Up next after this commercial break and Government update broadcast; So called 'Magic'..... and what it means for your family. I'm Victor Remerton and this is KTM News"

The little red light goes off on the main camera and the "ON-AIR" sign darkens.

"What the fuck was that?" He asks his cameraman, Sid.

Sid shrugged as he shook his head.

\------------------------

Margaret Choi was exhausted.

The wounded from whatever battle had occurred had been streaming in for hours now. Eight if her watch was still accurate in this world. And she'd exhausted her magical capabilities within the first hour. This had annoyed her, but Shrend had assured her that that was not only normal, but actually a bit more than he had expected of someone who had only learned magic THAT day.

He'd recommended that she head back to her quarters, assuring her that they had this handled.

But she was a nurse, and there were injured people. She'd insisted on staying.

She had quickly enlisted several of the uninjured soldiers who'd acted as litter bearers, as well as several of the newest of the healing trainees who were still too unskilled to be of aide magically. She'd even shanghaied the ambassador, who had insisted that she would be better of holding back. But Margaret had brokered no exceptions. People needed help, and they were obligated to offer theirs.

Since then it had been hours of redoing tourniquets, packing wounds, applying splints, attempting chest seals, when the person's anatomy allowed the. In one case she even had to perform an emergency cricothyrotomy. The soldier in question was a young elf who had been shot through the jaw and also chest. She'd been hesitant of the young woman's anatomy. But then she'd simply knuckled down and gotten to work. One of the lead healers had almost stopped her, but had quickly halted their questioning once they'd seen the soldier's chest begin rising and falling again as they regained their ability to breath.

The healer had quickly called Shrend back over, who had had more than a few questions that Margaret had answered while securing the bit of improvised tubing, which she was more than a bit uncomfortable with, and assessing the soldier's chest injury.

Then there had been a commotion near the door and two limp and heavily shrouded people had been brought in and rushed past everybody.

She'd initially brushed them off. They were emergency cases that would need to be dealt with by the head healers, Shrend himself was already moving to follow the two patients.

Then she saw a shock of black hair that was familiar to her, and a dangling wolf arm attached to the same person as the soldiers carried them into the room Shrend had guided them to.

Something inside of her knew who it was without having to be told, as every alarm in her brain began to go off like sirens.

Shrend popped his head out only a few moments later.

"Mrs. Choi." He'd said and his bovine-like minotaur features and booming baritone voice couldn't hide the tone and expression that she'd heard and seen on so many doctor's faces in her life.

She dropped the roll of gauze that was in her hand as she ran to the door that the doctor held open for her.

\------------------------------

Where am I? The person inside the monster wondered.

You are my child now. Said a voice that sounded as matronly as it did cold and uncaring.

What? She wondered. Who are you? What's going on?

Then the memory flooded back into her mind. The door. The eye. Her friends dying. Wolves chasing her through the dark, red lit, hallways. Pain.

Death.

And as if the thought had conjured them into being, she felt something inside of her that was.... other. Some primal, bestial, entity. She had the sensation that it was circling her inside her own mind.

I... am the moon. And I am your mother. The voice answered.

No. No you're not my mother. I know my mother. This. This isn't happening. I'm dead.

You came close. And do not spurn me child. I am the only reason you AREN'T dead.

Suddenly, as if a light switch had been turned on, she was able to see.

But her view was NOT where it was supposed to be.

Last she'd seen she had been lying on a concrete floor with a monster biting down on her shoulder and killing her.

But this new view was..... in a street somewhere.

Her eyes snapped toward something that she'd smelled. And OH GOD She could smell. She could smell so much. She smelled the asphalt below her feet. She smelled the garbage in the trashcan she sped past in a blur. She smelled the steak sandwiches that.... Hey wait, those are the sandwiches from Jerry's bar and grill. I'd recognize that garlic and horse radish spread anywhere. She thought.

Then the thing circling her mind seemed to lunge into control.

AND WE SMELL BLOOD! AND THE URINE AND SWEAT OF FEARFUL PREY!

Then her view was filled with the sight of a middle aged woman in a puffy jacket, who'd dropped her phone as Samantha Jenkins, now a werewolf, flew around a corner and out of an alleyway in front of the woman.

Slay her child. The voice said.

What?!? No! Jenkins tried to say.

She tried to resist. She really did.

But her muscles moved of their own accord, the animal instincts in her mind surged at the thought of a kill. Resisting them was like trying to push back a tidal wave.

Before she could think even a single thought more, she was on the poor woman.

Blood filled her view, her sense of smell..... and her mouth.

NO! No....nonononono!

A good kill my child.

I AM NOT... YOUR CHILD! She yelled back in her mind. NO MOTHER WOULD EVER ASK FOR THIS!

As if in answer, her animal instincts made her tear open the dead woman's stomach and latch her jaws onto the liver inside. Something jostled her and she send a clawed hand lashing at whatever it was.

DO NOT.... resist me child. The voice demanded. You are of MY pack now.

The thing that she'd lashed at tackled her, and she was suddenly looking up into the gaping maw of another werewolf. Some small part of her wondered whether it was the one that had killed her.

No.... it had turned her. Turned her into one of its kind.

"LISTEN...." The blood soaked creature yelled at her. And she gawked at the fact that it could speak. "TO... THE GODDESS!"

Goddess? She wondered.

That's right child. Now you know what you are "Attempting" to resist against.

That snapped the control that the animal inside her had.

Her clawed hand slammed into the wolf's chest, fingers (claws) first and sank in deeply. Despite its inhuman features, she could read the surprise there. Then she did the only thing she could think of and latched onto its throat with her newly dagger like teeth.

What are you doing child? The so-called "Goddess" asked her in a harried tone.

"I told you." She growled with her actual voice as she finished the bite, leaving the other werewolf clutching at its throat on the ground with a large piece of its neck missing. Her voice was much deeper and rumbled now. "You are NOT my mother. If you were you would know that you are not my GODDESS either."

She looked down at the corpse of the dead woman on the ground, wiping the blood from her mouth as best she could. She was surprised to find a lock of reddish brown hair stuck in her teeth. It didn't match the dead woman. She realized that she must have killed someone else before "Waking up".

She clutched at her heart for a moment.

"Because my mother raised me Buddhist." She said as she took a halting step backwards. She tripped and looked down to see long, fur coated, wolf feet beneath her. "She raised me to be non-violent." She looked back at the red hair in her hand. "Never took. But....." She shuddered. "Oh god."

Do not resist me child. The voice said in her head. Only fools resist gods.

Something crashed somewhere in front of her, and when she looked she saw two more werewolves, one of whom was wearing the tattered remains of what looked like a prisoners uniform. She'd seen uniforms like that back in the base.

The two wolves looked at her and bared their teeth, eyes gleaming in the darkness as the slowly began moving toward her.

My children WILL obey.

She lowered down, hands extending their claws out to the side in an instinctive gesture of hostility.

They're gonna obey someone alright. She thought.

Then she charged at the two wolves.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yx6zki/wait_is_this_just_gate_262/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (261/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Uh oh. Did a god make an oopsie with their puppies?

Also, any resemblences to actual news organizations or personalities are 100% accidental. I don't even watch the news, and there are WAY too many different news company accronyms/initialisms out there. I prefer to get my news via memes like any sane person during these times of strife.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Victor Remerton shuffled the papers that sat in front of him on the KTMN logo'd desk as he read the teleprompter with a hint of agitation. He'd just been on the verge of reporting on a story about the emergence of so-called magic and how it impacted parents. Something he was heavily interested in due to his own daughter's new ability to shoot little dark blue lightning bolts from her finger tips. They couldn't go far, and weren't very big. But he'd learned first hand that they could hurt. His belly still had a singe mark on it from where she'd poked him while he was napping.

"This just in; we've got breaking news from just north of.... Sturgis, South Dakota. We go live to Samantha Flair."

"Thank you Victor." Replied a young blonde woman with heavy makeup that concealed the sleep that had been interrupted by the emergency going on. "I'm coming to you with reports of.... Well... If I'm a hundred percent honest I'm not entirely sure what it is. But as you can see behind," The camera man pans the camera so that it can look up over her left shoulder at the chaos unfolding in the distance. "me, there appears to be some sort of.... Monster... rampaging through the forest just north of Sturgis here."

There's a loud explosion heard in the distance as light flares above one of the hills, causing the camera to automatically darken to adjust. Gunfire peppers the night air as small cracks and rolling booms that mark rifles and machine guns sound through the distant air.

"The Military appears to be engaging the creature with a combination of small arms fire and air support." Several loud howls are heard in the background. "Additionally there seems to be heavy wolf activity coinciding with whatever is going on. As you can see the creature appears to be lupine in nature."

A small feed, seemingly from a helicopter, appears in the corner of the screen. Though, how a news helicopter could be flying amid all the military air power moving around is unknown. On the feed a massive wolf creature with eyes the emit white light, and massive silvery fangs, stomps its front paws down on a military vehicle of some kind, causing a small fire to erupt as its battery panel is compromised.

"As you know Victor there was some uproar in the Sturgis community a little over a decade ago about the opening of an Army laboratory nearby." Samantha said, mostly just trying to sound informed for the viewers. "And this creature appears to have co-" The young woman's face scrunches as the camera goes off angle for a moment. "What?" She asks as a hand points from next to the camera's lens.

The camera jerks toward a blur of movement at the far end of the road that the news crew are currently standing on. A pedestrian, busy gawking at the mayhem like everyone else, is impacted by something with a scream.

"What the hell was that?" A man's voice asks from off camera.

The people in the street begin screaming and scrambling away from whatever it is just as a military helicopter roars over the town low enough to kick dust up.

"Victor!" Samantha Flair's voice says in a panicked-but-attempting-professionalism tone. "There appears to be some kind of- Oh GOD!" She cuts herself off. "There's..... There's.... wolves?" She says in a sort of question. The camera shows something massive and furred and covered in something that will probably get censored on later replays. "Oh god. It's..... it killed them. It's eating- Oh Shit!"

The camera abruptly drops to the ground, showing the young reporters feet. Despite the blue suit and white blouse she was wearing, her shoes are a pair of worn out hiking boots. More furred blurs are impacting more civilians in their attempt to flee.

"There's more." She says as the feet back out of view. "Oh god! There's dozens!"

The feed abruptly cuts back to Victor Remerton in the studio, who is sitting wide eyed in a combination of shock at the footage, and surprise at being back on camera.

As he realizes he's back on camera Victor lets out a quick laugh. "It appears that Samantha is dealing with some slight uhhhh.... technical difficulties.... and may be caught in some kind of viral marketing stunt." He says, though his nervous swallow afterward reveals the lie. "We'll get back to her as soon as we can get things ironed out. Up next after this commercial break and Government update broadcast; So called 'Magic'..... and what it means for your family. I'm Victor Remerton and this is KTM News"

The little red light goes off on the main camera and the "ON-AIR" sign darkens.

"What the fuck was that?" He asks his cameraman, Sid.

Sid shrugged as he shook his head.

\----------

Margaret Choi was exhausted.

The wounded from whatever battle had occurred had been streaming in for hours now. Eight if her watch was still accurate in this world. And she'd exhausted her magical capabilities within the first hour. This had annoyed her, but Shrend had assured her that that was not only normal, but actually a bit more than he had expected of someone who had only learned magic THAT day.

He'd recommended that she head back to her quarters, assuring her that they had this handled.

But she was a nurse, and there were injured people. She'd insisted on staying.

She had quickly enlisted several of the uninjured soldiers who'd acted as litter bearers, as well as several of the newest of the healing trainees who were still too unskilled to be of aide magically. She'd even shanghaied the ambassador, who had insisted that she would be better of holding back. But Margaret had brokered no exceptions. People needed help, and they were obligated to offer theirs.

Since then it had been hours of redoing tourniquets, packing wounds, applying splints, attempting chest seals, when the person's anatomy allowed them. In one case she even had to perform an emergency cricothyrotomy. The soldier in question was a young elf who had been shot through the jaw and also chest. She'd been hesitant of the young woman's anatomy. But then she'd simply knuckled down and gotten to work. One of the lead healers had almost stopped her, but had quickly halted their questioning once they'd seen the soldier's chest begin rising and falling again as they regained their ability to breath.

The healer had quickly called Shrend back over, who had had more than a few questions that Margaret had answered while securing the bit of improvised tubing, which she was more than a bit uncomfortable with, and assessing the soldier's chest injury.

Then there had been a commotion near the door and two limp and heavily shrouded people had been brought in and rushed past everybody.

She'd initially brushed them off. They were emergency cases that would need to be dealt with by the head healers, Shrend himself was already moving to follow the two patients.

Then she saw a shock of black hair that was familiar to her, and a dangling wolf arm attached to the same person as the soldiers carried them into the room Shrend had guided them to.

Something inside of her knew who it was without having to be told, as every alarm in her brain began to go off like sirens.

Shrend popped his head out only a few moments later.

"Mrs. Choi." He'd said and his bovine-like minotaur features and booming baritone voice couldn't hide the tone and expression that she'd heard and seen on so many doctor's faces in her life.

She dropped the roll of gauze that was in her hand as she ran to the door that the doctor held open for her.

\----------

Where am I? The person inside the monster wondered.

You are my child now. Said a voice that sounded as matronly as it did cold and uncaring.

What? She wondered. Who are you? What's going on?

Then the memory flooded back into her mind. The door. The eye. Her friends dying. Wolves chasing her through the dark, red lit, hallways. Pain.

Death.

And as if the thought had conjured them into being, she felt something inside of her that was.... other. Some primal, bestial, entity. She had the sensation that it was circling her inside her own mind.

I... am the moon. And I am your mother. The voice answered.

No. No you're not my mother. I know my mother. This. This isn't happening. I'm dead.

You came close. And do not spurn me child. I am the only reason you AREN'T dead.

Suddenly, as if a light switch had been turned on, she was able to see.

But her view was NOT where it was supposed to be.

Last she'd seen she had been lying on a concrete floor with a monster biting down on her shoulder and killing her.

But this new view was..... in a street somewhere.

Her eyes snapped toward something that she'd smelled. And OH GOD She could smell. She could smell so much. She smelled the asphalt below her feet. She smelled the garbage in the trashcan she sped past in a blur. She smelled the steak sandwiches that.... Hey wait, those are the sandwiches from Jerry's bar and grill. I'd recognize that garlic and horse radish spread anywhere. She thought.

Then the thing circling her mind seemed to lunge into control.

AND WE SMELL BLOOD! AND THE URINE AND SWEAT OF FEARFUL PREY!

Then her view was filled with the sight of a middle aged woman in a puffy jacket, who'd dropped her phone as Samantha Jenkins, now a werewolf, flew around a corner and out of an alleyway in front of the woman.

Slay her child. The voice said.

What?!? No! Jenkins tried to say.

She tried to resist. She really did.

But her muscles moved of their own accord, the animal instincts in her mind surged at the thought of a kill. Resisting them was like trying to push back a tidal wave.

Before she could think even a single thought more, she was on the poor woman.

Blood filled her view, her sense of smell..... and her mouth.

NO! No....nonononono!

A good kill my child.

I AM NOT... YOUR CHILD! She yelled back in her mind. NO MOTHER WOULD EVER ASK FOR THIS!

As if in answer, her animal instincts made her tear open the dead woman's stomach and latch her jaws onto the liver inside. Something jostled her and she send a clawed hand lashing at whatever it was.

DO NOT.... resist me child. The voice demanded. You are of MY pack now.

The thing that she'd lashed at tackled her, and she was suddenly looking up into the gaping maw of another werewolf. Some small part of her wondered whether it was the one that had killed her.

No.... it had turned her. Turned her into one of its kind.

"LISTEN...." The blood soaked creature yelled at her. And she gawked at the fact that it could speak. "TO... THE GODDESS!"

Goddess? She wondered.

That's right child. Now you know what you are "Attempting" to resist against.

That snapped the control that the animal inside her had.

Her clawed hand slammed into the wolf's chest, fingers (claws) first and sank in deeply. Despite its inhuman features, she could read the surprise there. Then she did the only thing she could think of and latched onto its throat with her newly dagger like teeth.

What are you doing child? The so-called "Goddess" asked her in a harried tone.

"I told you." She growled with her actual voice as she finished the bite, leaving the other werewolf clutching at its throat on the ground with a large piece of its neck missing. Her voice was much deeper and rumbled now. "You are NOT my mother. If you were you would know that you are not my GODDESS either."

She looked down at the corpse of the dead woman on the ground, wiping the blood from her mouth as best she could. She was surprised to find a lock of reddish brown hair stuck in her teeth. It didn't match the dead woman. She realized that she must have killed someone else before "Waking up".

She clutched at her heart for a moment.

"Because my mother raised me Buddhist." She said as she took a halting step backwards. She tripped and looked down to see long, fur coated, wolf feet beneath her. "She raised me to be non-violent." She looked back at the red hair in her hand. "Never took. But....." She shuddered. "Oh god."

Do not resist me child. The voice said in her head. Only fools resist gods.

Something crashed somewhere in front of her, and when she looked she saw two more werewolves, one of whom was wearing the tattered remains of what looked like a prisoners uniform. She'd seen uniforms like that back in the base.

The two wolves looked at her and bared their teeth, eyes gleaming in the darkness as they slowly began moving toward her.

My children WILL obey.

She lowered down, hands extending their claws out to the side in an instinctive gesture of hostility.

They're gonna obey someone alright. She thought.

Then she charged at the two wolves.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yx6xsu/wait_is_this_just_gate_262/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (260/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Aaaaaandwe'reback.

The Earth..... situation..... will only be viewed briefly and in flashes like this for the next couple dozen chapters. But we will keep an eye on it. Especially once it gets to the real ~~Divine~~ stuff.

In the mean time; everyone's alive-ish. Yaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~

It was just after two in the morning as Jenkins ran down the long hallway.

Red lights flashed over the emergency white lights as the siren sounded, broken by the occasional robotic voice of the P.A. system.

-ALERT! SECURITY BREACH! ALL PERSONNEL REPORT TO EMERGENCY STATIONS! ALERT! SECURITY BREACH! ALL PERSONNEL REPORT TO EMERGENCY STATIONS!-

Something rumbled through the ground beneath her feet as she ran.

What the hell was that? She wondered as the announcement sounded again.

She had been sleeping when the initial klaxons had sounded, raising her up from the land of dreams in her quarters. She'd quickly thrown her duty pants and socks on, then her combat boots and vest simultaneously, one hand working each as she went. She'd rushed out the door while still strapping on her helmet and holstering her pistol.

She rounded the corner and saw her post. Sergeant Tovar waved her over.

"The fuck is up T?" She asked as she ran behind the barricade and into the small security office with all the camera feeds. "This doesn't sound like another drill." She said.

Outside Reyes and Deggigi were standing at their posts, rifles at the ready.

But they weren't faced outward like usual. Instead they were faced at the massive set of doors. The ones with the red paint and black and yellow edging. And the security panels had been lowered and locked over the smaller door to the left of it that was the most commonly used entrance to the base's lower levels.

"Security breach." Tovar replied. "B-three and below. And from the sounds of it the attackers are moving up." He said with his heavily Jamaican accent. He pointed at one of the weapons cages on the wall. "Orders are shotguns with the white mags."

"The new ones?" She asked. He nodded and she set to equipping herself with the weapon and the new ammo. "You're sounding Islander today Sarge." She said.

Normally the Caribbean born man had a neutral accent with a hint of Old New York in it. Something he'd affected after the wars had brought some hostility towards his homeland. But today his native accent colored every word heavily. She knew that it meant he was stressed.

"Radio chatter sounds more insane than expected." He said sternly. "Get out their with Chuckle and Fuckle."

She nodded and moved out next to Reyes, who she knew was Fuckle because he had eight kids.

"Sup Jenk." He said as he looked at the massive red door.

"Sup Rey." She said in return. "This sounds like a shit show."

Something rumbled below them again. Everyone looked down, including Murray, who'd just come running around the corner.

"Ya." Reyes said. "Fuckin' aliens and shit." He added.

"There aint no fuckin' aliens." Deggigi said in his Texas drawl. "It's fuckin' vampires." He said with the chuckle that had earned him HIS nickname. Though he and Reyes were only Chuckle and Fuckle when they were on duty together, which the Sergeants made sure happened often as a result.

"Is it the fuckin' aliens?" Murray asked as he came running out of the office, still loading a shotgun.

"It AINT fuckin' aliens!" Deggigi repeated.

Then there was another shudder. This one long and drawn out and rumbling like a train was passing by. Some dust fell from the ceiling as a crack formed near the door. They all watched it, mouths shut, as the emergency lights flickered a few times.

There was a long, deeply baritone, noise that sounded familiar to Jenkins as they heard it. It reverberated through the entire building as effectively as if it had been broadcast on the P.A. speakers.

"Biggest fuckin' coyote I ever heard." Diggigi said.

It clicked in Jenkins' head that he was right, just in time for a chorus of significantly weaker howls reverberated behind it.

"The fuck?" Reyes asked beside her just as Sergeant Tovar sprinted out of the office and down the hall away from them. "What the fuck?" He repeated, echoing everyone else's thoughts as they watched the Sergeant run down the corridor and out of sight.

Something impacted the small pedestrian door next to the main one, drawing their attention to it as they all subconsciously shouldered their shotguns.

"The fuck?" Reyes said for a third time.

Something on the other side of the door snarled as something massive slammed into the large red door hard enough to send cracks spidering through the concrete that it was set in.

There was a deep growl and they all saw bright white lite shine through one of the small cracks.

Several loud impacts sounded from both doors as whatever was on the other side began hammering at it repeatedly. There was a vicious slavering noise as whatever they were fought and scrabbled at the reinforced steel and concrete.

Then there was another loud impact and Jenkins heard something screeching from the other side.

Then the red door began to bend inward near its bottom left corner.

"BACK UP!" She yelled. "BACK UP! WHATEVER IT IS IS GETTING THROUGH! SAFETIES OFF!" She ordered, now that she was the ranking soldier there, as she herself snapped the little switch on the side of her shotgun to semi-auto.

Then a massive black talon of some kind punched through the steel of the door like a nail through plywood.

"Aw man." She heard Diggigi say. "It WAS fuckin' aliens."

Before anyone could reply the door screamed open and away from them.

Behind it a massive, white-glowing, eye stared at them from in the darkness. Jenkins blinked in confusion. Nothing had an eye that big. It had to be at least seven feet in diameter. Its pupil alone was bigger than she was.

They heard skittering noises and low growls from in the darkness.

"Fire." She said. "F......Fire. FIRE!" She ordered as she pulled the trigger on her shotgun, sending a roaring blast into the darkness. The buckshot, mainly silver though she didn't know that, impacted the eye and made it retreat back into the darkness beyond with a loud, deep whimper.

The other three opened fire as well, sending countless silver buckshot shells screaming into the unexpectedly open door.

Something blurred past her and collided with Murray, who flew backwards with a yell. He hit the wall with a noise that was much too wet to be a human body.

The fire stopped as everyone remaining turned to look at what had just flown past them.

"Ah shit." Reyes said, as they all recognized the creature. "We was all wrong."

Standing over Murray's limp, boneless, bloody body and still holding his right arm in its mouth, was a thing out of cheesy Halloween costume shops and fairy tales.

Jenkins did not live up to all the jokes that had been made about her name throughout childhood and even through Army training.

As everyone else turned their weapons towards the.... werewolf.... cause that's what it was. She ran, unconsciously following Sergeant Tovar's path as she did.

Something flew past her in a furry blur as she passed Reyes, who had been turning to join her. Then she heard him yell "Jenk-" Before hearing a loud crunching noise.

"FUCKLE!" She heard Deggigi yell as his shotgun roared again, this time firing on full auto as the soldier sprayed at a mass of fur and claws and blood that Jenkins was too scared to look back at.

Then the world shook again as something behind her slammed into the wall. The impact shook her off of her feet, and as she looked back she saw the horde of werewolves behind her.

She froze for a moment as she realized what the impact had been. That massive talon from earlier was, it turned out, a nail on a hand. A long, black, slightly curved, nail. Or more accurately, a claw.

Degiggi's body hung limply as that claw and the ,oddly human shaped, hand had impaled him in an impact that could knock a running person from their feet.

As she watched, one of the wolves leaped up and sank its teeth into the dead man's leg and began mauling it like a rabid animal, snarling as it did.

Her shotgun clattered to the ground as she began slowly backpedaling.

"No." She said as first the ears, then the heads and reflective eyes turned to regard her. "Nonononononono."

She bolted, and behind her she heard the snarls and howls and growls of the werewolves.

Jenkins wasn't a fast person. She wasn't slow by any means. But she was only a few inches over five feet and had only really put on any muscle or gained any endurance once she'd joined the military. So, she wasn't exactly setting any running records.

Still, in those terrifying moments as he world stopped making sense, she ran like the wind down the tight, concrete and steel, hallways of the facility she'd been assigned to as an M.P.

She had the advantage of knowing the corridors. She had after all been here for nearly a year now. And as an M.P. patrolling the halls was her job.

She also had the advantage of having a badge on her chest that would open just about any door she needed, even in the current security lock-down.

None of it mattered in the end.

She'd slammed through one of the doors to another corridor, kicking it behind her as she sprung off of it for a slight burst of speed and to shut it as she did. She'd done that several times now.

Still, they had gained on her.

Her training. Her pistol, still in its holster, her dead friends. Even her dreams of becoming a ration security driver once she got out. None of it mattered as she felt the claw slash through the back of her leg in a swipe that sent her sliding across the concrete floor on her face, her blood trailing behind her on the way.

She struggled to get up, but the foot attached to the leg was limp and useless.

She had a moment to realize that her Achilles tendon, and likely some of the muscles nearby, had been severed as she struggled for a sidearm that she had no idea wouldn't work.

Then a set of massive, wickedly sharp, jaws clamped down on her shoulder. They didn't get through the Kevlar weave of her vest. But they also didn't really have to.

She screamed as she felt every bone inside the jaw shatter with a crunch and a flash of pain that made her blackout in a matter of seconds. The jaws were wide enough that they sank into the flesh AROUND her vest's shoulder strap anyways. A set of claws pierced into her opposite shoulder and another into the meat of her waist as the wolf held her in place.

At a little before three in the morning, Corporal Samantha Jenkins lingered on the brink of death.

.

.

Not yet little pup. A voice said from somewhere she was too far gone to hear.

.

.

And at just AFTER three in the morning, she woke back up. Her body burning as bones cracked and snapped into new forms and hair erupted across her mangled body.

She screamed in pain, long and bloody and raw, as her body rebuilt itself into a completely new species.

And as she screamed, the pitch of her voice deepened and grew bestial in nature, before transforming into a howl.

Then, with no control over he instincts, and no knowledge of who or WHAT she was, she joined into the growing mayhem.

And a great, luminous, shaggy wolf. Easily twenty stories high at its shoulders, began to savage the secret military facility. No rounds, large or small, silver or not, could harm the beast for more than a moment.

Somewhere beyond its senses, aircraft took the the sky to counter it.

And a set of mischievous gods watched with glee as the chaotic battle began in earnest.

\----------

James awoke still in the desert. He was bobbing up and down slightly and covered in something light and breathable. He could only barely see out of one eye, the other was sealed shut.

"Joey?" He asked weakly. "Where's Joey?"

"Silence James." A familiar, Elven, voice said. Though it sounded pained and tired. "Rest. You are badly injured."

"Where's Joseph?" He asked again. "Where's Amina?"

"I'm told your brother rushed through some kind of door and is already back at the Capital." Kai said from where he walked beside James. "And the Princess is only a few yards ahead of you."

"Are they okay?" He asked, his voice a little stronger. "She was hurt too."

"Okay?" He wondered. "Not really. But she'll live. As for your brother I don't know. All I know is that the Arch Mage flew him out of here quickly. He was alive and speaking though, from what I saw."

"Is it over?" James asked.

"The battle? Most assuredly." Kai said. "The camp is being secured now. The wounded- and that includes you- are being brought through this door. We'll be there in a few minutes. Myself and several of the mages had to stabilize you two."

"Does that mean there are spiders inside me again?" James wondered.

"Do you really want to know?" Kai countered.

James thought for a moment. "No." He said after a few seconds. "Think I'll pass out either way."

"I would actually recommend it." Kai said snidely. "Your body could use it."

The two of them moved along in silence for a few moment. Then Kai spoke again.

"James?" He asked.

"Yeah?" James said, his voice weak and sleepy again.

"I won't be able to do this for you again. Or at least it's highly unlikely." The elf said.

"Okay." James said simply.

"Quit trying to die." Kai said just as simply.

"Working.... on it." James said as he finally passed out the way he'd said he would.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yw7t0p/wait_is_this_just_gate_261/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (260/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Aaaaaandwe'reback.

The Earth..... situation..... will only be viewed briefly and in flashes like this for the next couple dozen chapters. But we will keep an eye on it. Especially once it gets to the real ~~Divine~~ stuff.

In the mean time; everyone's alive-ish. Yaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~

It was just after two in the morning as Jenkins ran down the long hallway.

Red lights flashed over the emergency white lights as the siren sounded, broken by the occasional robotic voice of the P.A. system.

-ALERT! SECURITY BREACH! ALL PERSONNEL REPORT TO EMERGENCY STATIONS! ALERT! SECURITY BREACH! ALL PERSONNEL REPORT TO EMERGENCY STATIONS!-

Something rumbled through the ground beneath her feet as she ran.

What the hell was that? She wondered as the announcement sounded again.

She had been sleeping when the initial klaxons had sounded, raising her up from the land of dreams in her quarters. She'd quickly thrown her duty pants and socks on, then her combat boots and vest simultaneously, one hand working each as she went. She'd rushed out the door while still strapping on her helmet and holstering her pistol.

She rounded the corner and saw her post. Sergeant Tovar waved her over.

"The fuck is up T?" She asked as she ran behind the barricade and into the small security office with all the camera feeds. "This doesn't sound like another drill." She said.

Outside Reyes and Deggigi were standing at their posts, weapons at the ready.

But they weren't faced outward like usual. Instead they were faced at the massive set of doors. The ones with the red paint and black and yellow edging. And the security panels had been lowered and locked over the smaller door to the left of it that was the most commonly used entrance to the base's lower levels.

"Security breach." Tovar replied. "B-three and below. And from the sounds of it the attackers are moving up." He said with his heavily Jamaican accent. He pointed at one of the weapons cages on the wall. "Orders are shotguns with the white mags."

"The new ones?" She asked. He nodded and she set to equipping herself with the weapon and the new ammo. "You're sounding Islander today Sarge." She said.

Normally the Caribbean born man had a neutral accent with a hint of Old New York in it. Something he'd affected after the wars had brought some hostility towards his homeland. But today his native accent colored every word heavily. She knew that it meant he was stressed.

"Radio chatter sounds more insane than expected." He said sternly. "Get out their with Chuckle and Fuckle."

She nodded and moved out next to Reyes, who she knew was Fuckle because he had eight kids.

"Sup Jenk." He said as he looked at the massive red door.

"Sup Rey." She said in return. "This sounds like a shit show."

Something rumbled below them again. Everyone looked down, including Murray, who'd just come running around the corner.

"Ya." Reyes said. "Fuckin' aliens and shit." He added.

"There aint no fuckin' aliens." Deggigi said in his Texas drawl. "It's fuckin' vampires." He said with the chuckle that had earned him HIS nickname. Though he and Reyes were only Chuckle and Fuckle when they were on duty together, which the Sergeants made sure happened often as a result.

"Is it the fuckin' aliens?" Murray asked as he came running out of the office, still loading a shotgun.

"It AINT fuckin' aliens!" Deggigi repeated.

Then there was another shudder. This one long and drawn out and rumbling like a train was passing by. Some dust fell from the ceiling as a crack formed near the door. They all watched it, mouths shut, as the emergency lights flickered a few times.

There was a long, deeply baritone, noise that sounded familiar to Jenkins as they heard it. It reverberated through the entire building as effectively as if it had been broadcast on the P.A. speakers.

"Biggest fuckin' coyote I ever heard." Diggigi said.

It clicked in Jenkins' head that he was right, just in time for a chorus of significantly weaker howls to begin reverberating behind it.

"The fuck?" Reyes asked beside her just as Sergeant Tovar sprinted out of the office and down the hall away from them. "What the fuck?" He repeated, echoing everyone else's thoughts as they watched the Sergeant run down the corridor and out of sight.

Something impacted the small pedestrian door next to the main one, drawing their attention to it as they all subconsciously shouldered their shotguns.

"The fuck?" Reyes said for a third time.

Something on the other side of the door snarled as something massive slammed into the large red door hard enough to send cracks spidering through the concrete that it was set in.

There was a deep growl and they all saw bright white lite shine through one of the small cracks.

Several loud impacts sounded from both doors as whatever was on the other side began hammering at it repeatedly. There was a vicious slavering noise as whatever they were fought and scrabbled at the reinforced steel and concrete.

Then there was another loud impact and Jenkins heard something screeching from the other side.

Then the red door began to bend inward near its bottom left corner.

"BACK UP!" She yelled. "BACK UP! WHATEVER IT IS IS GETTING THROUGH! SAFETIES OFF!" She ordered, now that she was the ranking soldier there, as she herself snapped the little switch on the side of her shotgun to semi-auto.

Then a massive black talon of some kind punched through the steel of the door like a nail through plywood.

"Aw man." She heard Diggigi say. "It WAS fuckin' aliens."

Before anyone could reply the door screamed open and away from them.

Behind it a massive, white-glowing, eye stared at them from in the darkness. Jenkins blinked in confusion. Nothing had an eye that big. It had to be at least seven feet in diameter. Its pupil alone was bigger than she was.

They heard skittering noises and low growls from in the darkness.

"Fire." She said. "F......Fire. FIRE!" She ordered as she pulled the trigger on her shotgun, sending a roaring blast into the darkness. The buckshot, mainly silver though she didn't know that, impacted the eye and made it retreat back into the darkness beyond with a loud, deep whimper.

The other three opened fire as well, sending countless silver buckshot shells screaming into the unexpectedly open door.

Something blurred past her and collided with Murray, who flew backwards with a yell. He hit the wall with a noise that was much too wet to be a human body.

The fire stopped as everyone remaining turned to look at what had just flown past them.

"Ah shit." Reyes said, as they all recognized the creature. "We was all wrong."

Standing over Murray's limp, boneless, bloody body and still holding his right arm in its mouth, was a thing out of cheesy Halloween costume shops and fairy tales.

Jenkins did not live up to all the jokes that had been made about her name throughout childhood and even through Army training.

As everyone else turned their weapons towards the.... werewolf.... cause that's what it was. She ran, unconsciously following Sergeant Tovar's path as she did.

Something flew past her in a furry blur as she passed Reyes, who had been turning to join her. Then she heard him yell "Jenk-" Before hearing a loud crunching noise.

"FUCKLE!" She heard Deggigi yell as his shotgun roared again, this time firing on full auto as the soldier sprayed at a mass of fur and claws and blood that Jenkins was too scared to look back at.

Then the world shook again as something behind her slammed into the wall. The impact shook her off of her feet, and as she looked back she saw the horde of werewolves behind her.

She froze for a moment as she realized what the impact had been. That massive talon from earlier was, it turned out, a nail on a hand. A long, black, slightly curved, nail. Or more accurately, a claw.

Degiggi's body hung limply as that claw and the ,oddly human shaped, hand had impaled him in an impact that could knock a running person from their feet.

As she watched, one of the wolves leaped up and sank its teeth into the dead man's leg and began mauling it like a rabid animal, snarling as it did.

Her shotgun clattered to the ground as she began slowly backpedaling.

"No." She said as first the ears, then the heads and reflective eyes turned to regard her. "Nonononononono."

She bolted, and behind her she heard the snarls and howls and growls of the werewolves.

Jenkins wasn't a fast person. She wasn't slow by any means. But she was only a few inches over five feet and had only really put on any muscle or gained any endurance once she'd joined the military. So, she wasn't exactly setting any running records.

Still, in those terrifying moments as the world stopped making sense, she ran like the wind down the tight, concrete and steel, hallways of the facility she'd been assigned to as an M.P.

She had the advantage of knowing the corridors. She had after all been here for nearly a year now. And as an M.P. patrolling the halls was her job.

She also had the advantage of having a badge on her chest that would open just about any door she needed, even in the current security lock-down.

None of it mattered in the end.

She'd slammed through one of the doors to another corridor, kicking it behind her as she sprung off of it for a slight burst of speed and to shut it as she did. She'd done that several times now.

Still, they had gained on her.

Her training. Her pistol, still in its holster, her dead friends. Even her dreams of becoming a ration security driver once she got out. None of it mattered as she felt the claw slash through the back of her leg in a swipe that sent her sliding across the concrete floor on her face, her blood trailing behind her on the way.

She struggled to get up, but the foot attached to the leg was limp and useless.

She had a moment to realize that her Achilles tendon, and likely some of the muscles nearby, had been severed as she struggled for a sidearm that she had no idea wouldn't work.

Then a set of massive, wickedly sharp, jaws clamped down on her shoulder. They didn't get through the Kevlar weave of her vest. But they also didn't really have to.

She screamed as she felt every bone inside the jaw shatter with a crunch and a flash of pain that made her blackout in a matter of seconds. The jaws were wide enough that they sank into the flesh AROUND her vest's shoulder strap anyways. A set of claws pierced into her opposite shoulder and another into the meat of her waist as the wolf held her in place.

At a little before three in the morning, Corporal Samantha Jenkins lingered on the brink of death.

.

.

Not yet little pup. A voice said from somewhere she was too far gone to hear.

.

.

And at just AFTER three in the morning, she woke back up. Her body burning as bones cracked and snapped into new forms and hair erupted across her mangled body.

She screamed in pain, long and bloody and raw, as her body rebuilt itself into a completely new species.

And as she screamed, the pitch of her voice deepened and grew bestial in nature, before transforming into a howl.

Then, with no control over her instincts, and no knowledge of who or WHAT she was, she joined into the growing mayhem.

And a great, luminous, shaggy wolf. Easily twenty stories high at its shoulders, began to savage the secret military facility. No rounds, large or small, silver or otherwise, could harm the beast for more than a moment.

Somewhere beyond its senses, aircraft took the the sky to counter it.

And a set of mischievous gods watched with glee as the chaotic battle began in earnest.

\----------

James awoke still in the desert. He was bobbing up and down slightly and covered in something light and breathable. He could only barely see out of one eye, the other was sealed shut.

^("Joey?") He asked weakly. ^("Where's Joey?")

"Silence James." A familiar, Elven, voice said. Though it sounded pained and tired. "Rest. You are badly injured."

^("Where's Joseph?") He asked again. ^("Where's Amina?")

"I'm told your brother rushed through some kind of door and is already back at the Capital." Kai said from where he walked beside James. "And the Princess is only a few yards ahead of you."

"Are they okay?" He asked, his voice a little stronger. "She was hurt too."

"Okay?" He wondered. "Not really. But she'll live. As for your brother I don't know. All I know is that the Arch Mage flew him out of here quickly. He was alive and speaking though, from what I saw."

"Is it over?" James asked.

"The battle? Most assuredly." Kai said. "The camp is being secured now. The wounded- and that includes you- are being brought through this door. We'll be there in a few minutes. Myself and several of the mages had to stabilize you two."

"Does that mean there are spiders inside me again?" James wondered.

"Do you really want to know?" Kai countered.

James thought for a moment. "No." He said after a few seconds. "Think I'll pass out either way."

"I would actually recommend it." Kai said snidely. "Your body could use it."

The two of them moved along in silence for a few moment. Then Kai spoke again.

"James?" He asked.

"Yeah?" James said, his voice weak and sleepy again.

"I won't be able to do this for you again. Or at least it's highly unlikely." The elf said.

"Okay." James said simply.

"Quit trying to die." Kai said just as simply.

"Working.... on it." James said as he finally passed out the way he'd said he would.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yw7r29/wait_is_this_just_gate_261/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (259/?)

Previous

Writer's note: And that basically ends this arc. I'm off tomorrow, so no chapter. But I'll be back Monday. Then we start dealing with the fallout of what's happened.

Until then, enjoy.

\~

^("JOEY!") James yelled, though the sound was drowned out by the wind whipping past him and his little brother as they hovered some fifty feet off the desert ground. ^("JOSEPH!!! LET ME IN!!!! LET ME TALK TO YOU!!!!")

He felt, distantly and in some other body that didn't matter right now, the wind and sand ripping at him. He felt the leg of his pants shred to tatters and felt warm wetness spreading there. He felt his left ear burn as someone held a power grinder to it. He felt that opening in his chest from where he'd been impaled... twice now, actually.

None of it mattered.

He slapped his hands, lightly, over Joey's. But Joey didn't move, still rocking back and forth as he repeated something that James couldn't hear.

He slapped again and felt one of Joey's hands, the left one, lift ever so slightly.

He quickly pressed his mouth to that side and yelled to be heard.

It took every ounce of strength he had to keep himself on Joey's back. Only one foot was emitting a jet now, and only weakly.

^("YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE AFRAID JOJO! I'M HERE! IT'S OKAY!") He yelled before the hand slammed back down.

He felt something, some invisible blade, slash across his back. Felt pain bloom there. But he'd had his back slashed before. He'd.... probably.... be okay there. But he definitely needed to figure something out. His words just weren't working.

James drew in a deep breath. His entire chest ached from the effort. With one of his thumbs he pried just a tiny bit of space open on Joey's right ear and leaned in.

He hadn't had to use this trick in over a decade.

It took every ounce of effort he could muster to SING the lyrics without faltering in the tempest of desert air surrounding them.

"Man it's a hot one." He began.

He couldn't see it, but he felt the wind around them pulse.

"Like seven inches from the midday sun."

The hand over his thumb loosened ever so slightly as Joey heard the opening lines to the song that their parents had always loved dancing to.

"Well I hear you whisper and the words.... melt every....one."

He didn't even notice his own hips wiggle, though the lack of a floor beneath them made it pointless.

"But you stay so.... cool."

"My muñequita..... My Spanish Harlem Mona Lisa." Joey continued for him. "James?" He asked as the wind around them seemed to intensify even as they became more uniform. He said it so softly that James only heard it because of how close he was.

"Yeah buddy." James said as his brother's rocking motion slowed. "I'm here. You're okay."

"I broke rule number one James." Joey said as James felt his hand clamping back down on the ear. The sand and wind began whipping again. "I- I hurt peo-"

"It's okay Jojo." James said. "You were protecting yourself. What was the exception to that rule."

Joey sniffed a string of sand coated snot as he rocked.

"Unless someone's trying to hurt you." He said after a moment.

"That's right." James continued. "That robot was trying to hurt you. So it's okay."

"It hurt Ms. Veliry." Joey said "And then she disappeared. It hurt Ms. Veliry." Again the wind began to pick up.

"Then that's even more reason it's okay." James countered. "Because you're supposed to protect people. That's what dad always taught us. It's what HIS favorite characters did. Protect the people you care about. Right?"

"When you can." Joey said.

"Right. When you can. And now I have to protect YOU Jojo." James said. He felt Joeys hand tighten again. "Because you're doing an Akita or Akido or whatever that movie was. You're losing control of the power.

And now that you've studied under Ms. Veliry, what happens in this world when you lose control of your power?"

It was a lot to drop on Joey, especially while he was already overwhelmed. But he knew that the best way to get to his brother was to show him a path of logic that would let him draw his own conclusions.

"It's A-KIR-A James. You know that." Joey said with a hint of anger. But James also noticed that the wind stilled a touch more. And Joey was louder and firmer as he said it. Less snotty crying. "And If I lose control I.... I potentially cause a magical overuse cascade."

"That's right." James said. "What happens then?"

Joey looked at him with his classic "How do you not know this?" expression that James had seen more than his fair share of.

"Either I burn myself out and completely exhaust the magical reserves of my body AND soul." Joey answered. "In which case I become a husk. Probably Petravus's term for a vegetable." He wiped the snot from his nose with one of his sleeves, a good sign. "Or I expend it all in a burst and basically nuke this area with magical energy."

"Either of those sound good to you?" James asked as he looked down and saw that the ground was minutely closer.

"Of course not." Joey spat, as if James was stupid. "Why would I want that?"

"Don't know bud. But it's what you're on the verge of doing." James answered, and saw the wind pick up ever so slightly. "But that's okay." He amended. "You're back. I'm back. We can get through this. We ALWAYS... get through this."

Joey's eyes sealed shut and James felt his hand tighten ever so slightly again.

"I hurt someone else didn't I?" He asked. "I hurt you too."

James knew that Joey wouldn't like either answer. The truth would upset him. But a lie would just upset him worse later. He had to gamble.

"Yeah bud." He said. "Someone tripped and got too close to you. You uh... you hurt em pretty bad."

Joey's breathing quickened as he curled into himself a bit more.

"And you?" He asked in a half whimper.

"Don't worry about me Jojo. You've hit me before. You can get me some food later if you want to make up for it."

"Rule one." Joey said as he drew back into himself. "Rule one, rule one, rule one."

"Joey, don't." James said into his brothers ear. "I cant do much anymore. I'm just about at my limit." He tightened his hugging grip around his brother. "But I'm not letting go either. So you have to either calm down or risk breaking rule one again." He pressed his face into his brothers back. "But I'm not going anywhere."

James shut his eyes and did what he could to tighten even further. He could feel the wind picking back up, felt the sand beginning to grind at his skin again.

"Cause I'm with you to the end of the line bud." He said. "Just like cap."

Then something surprised him. Surprised both of them really, as James felt the wind die down almost immediately.

A set of thin arms snaked their way between the two brothers.

James felt his brother straighten out almost immediately.

"See?" Said a familiar voice. "I told you it would take more than that to kill an arch-mage."

Joey's arms shot out, away from his ears, and wrapped around the small form of Veliry in a vice like hug.

"You're okay?" He asked as James peered over his brother's shoulder, eyes wide.

"I told you I would be." She answered. "Now come on. This is no place for you. We need to get you back to the castle. We don't want you to hurt yourself."

Joey nodded emphatically, even as tears flowed down his face. "Okay."

James simply smiled as he thought. Course a woman does the trick. He gets that from me and dad.

Veliry pulled Joey with her as she flew, and the jolt of the two of them suddenly accelerating away was enough to make James lose his grip.

He continued smiling as he fell the thirty feet or so to the sand, his vision quickly fading as he did.

Young padawan. He wondered as he fell. When did you get so strong with the force?

.....Angels and devils kid. That little tiny memory voice said as he blacked out. He was so tired.

\---------------------------

Dranek was sleeping when SHE came to him for the last time.

It's time dear Dranek.

He awoke with a start. He sniffed the air for a moment and was reassured to smell the other of his newfound kin in the rooms around him. None had been taken in weeks now, and it seemed that the "Scientists" were all but done with their tests and examinations, save the occasional checkup.

"Now goddess?" He asked aloud so the others would hear him.

The people "running" this place are distracted. A great misfortune has befallen them in your world and they are... distracted. And that is to say nothing of the magic that has been born in this world. You have felt that yes?"

Indeed, he had felt the magical energy around him growing ever so slightly with each day. It was still weaker than anything he'd ever felt in his world. A mage would be all but useless in this land. But he'd felt it. He couldn't imagine the kind of havoc that was already beginning to blossom elsewhere. Dranek may have never been destined for politics or business. But even a fool could guess at the kind of mayhem it must have been causing.

A question goddess? A mere curiosity if you would allow.

What is it.... Champion?

What happens....after?

There was a long pause, and Dranek got the sense that he was being studied.

After, you will lounge in eternity with the other champions. And this world will witness the truth strength and Majesty of our pantheon.

Dranek smiled at that.

He thought he could die for something like that. After all. This place and its people had kidnapped him and put him through countless tests that were all but indistinguishable from torture. And that was nothing to say of the Werewolves he had created at their direction.

He worried at that thought.

And the others goddess? He wondered.

Worry not. They shall look to you as their champion. They already know your fate.

He nodded.

"Then let us begin." He said.

The goddess did not give him time to think of anything else. Pain and bliss, in equal measures, coursed through his body as blindingly bright light began to emanate from all over his body.

Then he began to grow.

From the rooms next to him, the others began to howl.

\----------

As Earth soldiers were marched past in single file, hands bound and heads covered, Kai studied the depression in the sand curiously.

Someone had opened a hole into the Deep Dark and retrieved one of the two leaders of the Earth warriors. The armored one who he had thought was the second in command, or maybe the combat leader. He didn't know for sure how the Earth Military worked.

His spiders had sensed the opening even as they had died of whatever curse or poison had emerged from it and killed them.

Now he was standing over the top of where the opening was, studying the remains of some kind of formerly wooden device that was all that was left of the intruders. He saw and smelled the area through his spiders, his mask granting him the sight of the arachnid horde as it moved to his will.

It was the only way he was ever going to see anything again thanks to the armored enemies.

He glowered at the intrusion and theft of the enemy.

Only one group had the power to move so freely in the Deep Dark besides he and the other guardians.

The Agency. He thought. He commanded his spiders to examine the mushy, decayed wood of what he was sure was one of their doors. They would commit it to his memory and he would know if any more like it appeared in his domain. Not that it would come to much.

^("HEEEEELP!!") He heard through some of the spiders on the surface of the desert. It was the princess's voice.

He turned his attention to that part of his power.

He sighed as he saw why she was crying for help. Saw who she was doggedly dragging through the sand as Petravian soldiers moved to react to her cries for help.

"Again?" He asked nobody in particular.

Then he began moving towards them.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yva0ie/wait_is_this_just_gate_260/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (259/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: And that basically ends this arc. I'm off tomorrow, so no chapter. But I'll be back Monday. Then we start dealing with the fallout of what's happened.

Until then, enjoy.

\~

^("JOEY!") James yelled, though the sound was drowned out by the wind whipping past him and his little brother as they hovered some fifty feet off the desert ground. ^("JOSEPH!!! LET ME IN!!!! LET ME TALK TO YOU!!!!")

He felt, distantly and in some other body that didn't matter right now, the wind and sand ripping at him. He felt the leg of his pants shred to tatters and felt warm wetness spreading there. He felt his left ear burn as someone held a power grinder to it. He felt that opening in his chest from where he'd been impaled... twice now, actually.

None of it mattered.

He slapped his hands, lightly, over Joey's. But Joey didn't move, still rocking back and forth as he repeated something that James couldn't hear.

He slapped again and felt one of Joey's hands, the left one, lift ever so slightly.

He quickly pressed his mouth to that side and yelled to be heard.

It took every ounce of strength he had to keep himself on Joey's back. Only one foot was emitting a jet now, and only weakly.

^("YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE AFRAID JOJO! I'M HERE! IT'S OKAY!") He yelled before the hand slammed back down.

He felt something, some invisible blade, slash across his back. Felt pain bloom there. But he'd had his back slashed before. He'd.... probably.... be okay there. But he definitely needed to figure something out. His words just weren't working.

James drew in a deep breath. His entire chest ached from the effort. With one of his thumbs he pried just a tiny bit of space open on Joey's right ear and leaned in.

He hadn't had to use this trick in over a decade.

It took every ounce of effort he could muster to SING the lyrics without faltering in the tempest of desert air surrounding them.

"Man it's a hot one." He began.

He couldn't see it, but he felt the wind around them pulse.

"Like seven inches from the midday sun."

The hand over his thumb loosened ever so slightly as Joey heard the opening lines to the song that their parents had always loved dancing to.

"Well I hear you whisper and the words.... melt every....one."

He didn't even notice his own hips wiggle, though the lack of a floor beneath them made it pointless.

"But you stay so.... cool."

"My muñequita..... My Spanish Harlem Mona Lisa." Joey continued for him. "James?" He asked as the wind around them seemed to intensify even as they became more uniform. He said it so softly that James only heard it because of how close he was.

"Yeah buddy." James said as his brother's rocking motion slowed. "I'm here. You're okay."

"I broke rule number one James." Joey said as James felt his hand clamping back down on the ear. The sand and wind began whipping again. "I- I hurt peo-"

"It's okay Jojo." James said. "You were protecting yourself. What was the exception to that rule."

Joey sniffed a string of sand coated snot as he rocked.

"Unless someone's trying to hurt you." He said after a moment.

"That's right." James continued. "That robot was trying to hurt you. So it's okay."

"It hurt Ms. Veliry." Joey said "And then she disappeared. It hurt Ms. Veliry." Again the wind began to pick up.

"Then that's even more reason it's okay." James countered. "Because you're supposed to protect people. That's what dad always taught us. It's what HIS favorite characters did. Protect the people you care about. Right?"

"When you can." Joey said.

"Right. When you can. And now I have to protect YOU Jojo." James said. He felt Joeys hand tighten again. "Because you're doing an Akita or Akido or whatever that movie was. You're losing control of the power. And now that you've studied under Ms. Veliry, what happens in this world when you lose control of your power?"

It was a lot to drop on Joey, especially while he was already overwhelmed. But he knew that the best way to get to his brother was to show him a path of logic that would let him draw his own conclusions.

"It's A-KIR-A James. You know that." Joey said with a hint of anger. But James also noticed that the wind stilled a touch more. And Joey was louder and firmer as he said it. Less snotty crying. "And If I lose control I.... I potentially cause a magical overuse cascade."

"That's right." James said. "What happens then?"

Joey looked at him with his classic "How do you not know this?" expression that James had seen more than his fair share of.

"Either I burn myself out and completely exhaust the magical reserves of my body AND soul." Joey answered. "In which case I become a husk. Probably Petravus's term for a vegetable." He wiped the snot from his nose with one of his sleeves, a good sign. "Or I expend it all in a burst and basically nuke this area with magical energy."

"Either of those sound good to you?" James asked as he looked down and saw that the ground was minutely closer.

"Of course not." Joey spat, as if James was stupid. "Why would I want that?"

"Don't know bud. But it's what you're on the verge of doing." James answered, and saw the wind pick up ever so slightly. "But that's okay." He amended. "You're back. I'm back. We can get through this. We ALWAYS... get through this."

Joey's eyes sealed shut and James felt his hand tighten ever so slightly again.

"I hurt someone else didn't I?" He asked. "I hurt you too."

James knew that Joey wouldn't like either answer. The truth would upset him. But a lie would just upset him worse later. He had to gamble.

"Yeah bud." He said. "Someone tripped and got too close to you. You uh... you hurt em pretty bad."

Joey's breathing quickened as he curled into himself a bit more.

"And you?" He asked in a half whimper.

"Don't worry about me Jojo. You've hit me before. You can get me some food later if you want to make up for it."

"Rule one." Joey said as he drew back into himself. "Rule one, rule one, rule one."

"Joey, don't." James said into his brothers ear. "I cant do much anymore. I'm just about at my limit." He tightened his hugging grip around his brother. "But I'm not letting go either. So you have to either calm down or risk breaking rule one again." He pressed his face into his brothers back. "But I'm not going anywhere."

James shut his eyes and did what he could to tighten even further. He could feel the wind picking back up, felt the sand beginning to grind at his skin again.

"Cause I'm with you to the end of the line bud." He said. "Just like cap."

Then something surprised him. Surprised both of them really, as James felt the wind die down almost immediately.

A set of thin arms snaked their way between the two brothers.

James felt his brother straighten out almost immediately.

"See?" Said a familiar voice. "I told you it would take more than that to kill an arch-mage."

Joey's arms shot out, away from his ears, and wrapped around the small form of Veliry in a vice like hug.

"You're okay?" He asked as James peered over his brother's shoulder, eyes wide.

"I told you I would be." She answered. "Now come on. This is no place for you. We need to get you back to the castle. We don't want you to hurt yourself."

Joey nodded emphatically, even as tears flowed down his face. "Okay."

James simply smiled as he thought. Course a woman does the trick. He gets that from me and dad.

Veliry pulled Joey with her as she flew, and the jolt of the two of them suddenly accelerating away was enough to make James lose his grip.

He continued smiling as he fell the thirty feet or so to the sand, his vision quickly fading as he did.

Young padawan. He wondered as he fell. When did you get so strong with the force?

.....Angels and devils kid. That little tiny memory voice said as he blacked out. He was so tired.

\---------------------------

Dranek was sleeping when SHE came to him for the last time.

It's time dear Dranek.

He awoke with a start. He sniffed the air for a moment and was reassured to smell the other of his newfound kin in the rooms around him. None had been taken in weeks now, and it seemed that the "Scientists" were all but done with their tests and examinations, save the occasional checkup.

"Now goddess?" He asked aloud so the others would hear him.

The people "running" this place are distracted. A great misfortune has befallen them in your world and they are... distracted. And that is to say nothing of the magic that has been born in this world. You have felt that yes?"

Indeed, he had felt the magical energy around him growing ever so slightly with each day. It was still weaker than anything he'd ever felt in his world. A mage would be all but useless in this land. But he'd felt it. He couldn't imagine the kind of havoc that was already beginning to blossom elsewhere. Dranek may have never been destined for politics or business. But even a fool could guess at the kind of mayhem it must have been causing.

A question goddess? A mere curiosity if you would allow.

What is it.... Champion?

What happens....after?

There was a long pause, and Dranek got the sense that he was being studied.

After, you will lounge in eternity with the other champions. And this world will witness the truth strength and Majesty of our pantheon.

Dranek smiled at that.

He thought he could die for something like that. After all. This place and its people had kidnapped him and put him through countless tests that were all but indistinguishable from torture. And that was nothing to say of the Werewolves he had created at their direction.

He worried at that thought.

And the others goddess? He wondered.

Worry not. They shall look to you as their champion. They already know your fate.

He nodded.

"Then let us begin." He said.

The goddess did not give him time to think of anything else. Pain and bliss, in equal measures, coursed through his body as blindingly bright light began to emanate from all over his body.

Then he began to grow.

From the rooms next to him, the others began to howl.

\----------

As Earth soldiers were marched past in single file, hands bound and heads covered, Kai studied the depression in the sand curiously.

Someone had opened a hole into the Deep Dark and retrieved one of the two leaders of the Earth warriors. The armored one who he had thought was the second in command, or maybe the combat leader. He didn't know for sure how the Earth Military worked.

His spiders had sensed the opening even as they had died of whatever curse or poison had emerged from it and killed them.

Now he was standing over the top of where the opening was, studying the remains of some kind of formerly wooden device that was all that was left of the intruders. He saw and smelled the area through his spiders, his mask granting him the sight of the arachnid horde as it moved to his will.

It was the only way he was ever going to see anything again thanks to the armored enemies.

He glowered at the intrusion and theft of the enemy.

Only one group had the power to move so freely in the Deep Dark besides he and the other guardians.

The Agency. He thought. He commanded his spiders to examine the mushy, decayed wood of what he was sure was one of their doors. They would commit it to his memory and he would know if any more like it appeared in his domain. Not that it would come to much.

^("HEEEEELP!!") He heard through some of the spiders on the surface of the desert. It was the princess's voice.

He turned his attention to that part of his power.

He sighed as he saw why she was crying for help. Saw who she was doggedly dragging through the sand as Petravian soldiers moved to react to her cries for help.

"Again?" He asked nobody in particular.

Then he began moving towards them.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yv9y76/wait_is_this_just_gate_260/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (258/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look. That person is still around. And things happen. Important things.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Neither of them had much strength to them.

Amina looked like she'd been executed by a firing squad and survived.

James had so many broken bones that he wondered how he was even conscious, and also had a barely sealed hole in his chest, that he imagined had only missed his lung by a few millimeters, if it even had. On top of that he was using what little strength he had to send out his own wind magic. Some of it to fend off his brother's unconscious attacks, and some of it to animate his chain whip so that his sword could intercept and absorb whatever it could. And the poor weapon was working overtime.

And she was the only reason he was even moving.

"JOOOOOEEEEEYYY!!!" He yelled into the wind, trying to get his brother's attention as they trudged through the biting sand.

"He's too strong!" Amina yelled into his ear as she continued carrying him along. "We're not making up ground because the sand keeps shifting our way!"

He ignored her.

He had to.

"JOJO IT'S ME!" He yelled instead. "IT'S JAMES! YOU GOTTA STOP BUD! I'M HERE FOR YOU!"

Choose life. The nonchalant, seemingly pristine, version of him had said.

"James I can't get any closer." Amina said. "I can't. The sand is resisting." She continued, struggling to breath as her opposite hand held part of her tattered, bloody, cloak to her face so she could breath. "I'm too weak. I need to rest." Even as she said this he felt her sag a little as the sand and his weight took her footing from her a bit.

Kill! The twisted, barely recognizable, hateful version of himself had demanded.

James looked at her, the woman he loved so much, and saw the weariness there. He didn't know what had happened to her, or how she'd gotten in the state she was in. But he had a feeling that she was worse off than he was, somehow.

Then he looked at his brother.

Angels and devils kid. The middle road James had said.

They were so close. If he could just reach Joey he could get him to calm down. Could get him back.

The other HIMs... had implied that he would have to make some kind of choice here.

But this wasn't a choice.

This was his brother.

It was Jojo.

The wiggly little baby that James had happily held in his arms and carried all over their house after he'd been born.

The little autistic child that he had helped learn numbers and letters and words, even when he himself only barely understood them either.

The brother who, when their father had walked out their front door, destined to never return again, he had promised to look after and provide for.

So the choice wasn't for Joey's life. It never would be.

It was a choice about James's life.

And it wasn't even about whether or not he would survive. That had NEVER been a factor in any of the equations involving his little brother.

No. This choice was about what he might be able to live with it afterwords should he survive the next few minutes.

But first he had to save Joey.

"Throw me." He said.

Amina looked up at him in surprise. His sword lashed out at an unseen attack behind her and drank in the wind magic as it did.

"What?" She asked.

James leaned into her and pressed the handle of his chain into her battered hand.

"It uses wind magic to move. The sword does the rest. It'll watch after you." He said as they bumped foreheads. "But you have to throw me. Otherwise I can't get to him."

"James no. He's out of control. The wind will tear you to shreds." She countered.

He looked at her and smiled.

"Yeah. But he's my brother." He looked up at Joey, who had gone even higher. He wondered if his brother was somehow aware of them being there, and realized that he must have been. Maybe the added height was meant to keep them away. "And I made a promise."

He looked back over at her, at the eyes that pleaded for him not to go.

Had his mother had the same look when his father had walked away toward that fateful bus, all those years ago?

"If we survive this.... why don't we get married?"

Amina, despite everything else, smiled.

"I think I'd like that." She said.

Then her hands shot into the sand beneath him and under his feet.

And with what little strength her body had left in its aching, torn, bruised, muscles, she heaved him up into the air. James launched up and just a bit towards Joey, nearly ten feet off of the ground before he felt gravity begin to pull again.

Small jets of magical energy sputtered into life from the bottom of his feet. They weren't strong. They ebbed and flowed as he struggled to gather enough energy to maintain them. This was made more difficult by the defensive blasts of air he was having to send out with his hands, while also using them to stabilize himself in the tornado like vortex of wind and sand.

But slowly and surely, he began to rise up and toward his brother.

\------------------------------

Colonel Muhammed stood tall in the secret, teleconference, hearing with the Pentagon.

"This entire operation has gone completely FUBAR Colonel." Said Lieutenant General Dibiallo. "We have two Servicemen who have gone completely native and acted against their own nations interests. We have an entire forward operating base that's been overrun by stuff out of a Led Zeppelin song. Billions of dollars of resources that are either destroyed, or else in the hands of another nation. AND THAT'S BEFORE YOU MENTION THE LOSS OF AN ENTIRE SQUAD OF MUCK MARCHERS." He said in a half yell.

She listened to all of it with grim surety.

"Yes sir." She said simply.

"And it was all YOUR plan." He said. "YOU wanted the base reinforced once it was discovered. YOU advocated the use of the M.F.F.V.'s. YOU suggested sending a Muck Marcher squad. YOU recommended the Major to be the O.I.C. of the whole op."

"Yes sir I did." She answered.

"We thought you were trying to make up for that fuck up with the Chois and Sergeant Batista. Or that you were trying to prove that you weren't Krick's little lap dog." The General ranted. "And now we've got to explain to the president how we've completely FUCKED. THIS. UP."

"We've also likely ruined our diplomatic options with the Petravians." She said as she fought back a smirk.

She could see the General's ire rising at the comment.

"To say.... the least." He said, vein pulsing on his forehead.

"Sir." She began softly. "Are you aware of the concept of a poison pill? As it relates to hostile business practices?"

He deflated at the unexpected question. "What does that have to-" Then the realization hit him. "You..... you set this up? To make us look bad?" He said in a hiss. "Do you have any idea how many lives you just cost us?"

"Well the fight is still in its winding down phase, so I expect there will be a few more before its over. And I...." She shook her head. "I'll have to learn to live with that." Then she straightened back up. "How many Petravian lives did this cost SIR?" She asked. "Do you even know?"

"THEY STARTED THIS!" He yelled into his webcam.

"No." She said, a single finger held up. "No. They responded to unexpected intruders to their country, and they did it in an almost entirely pacifist way. None of our people were harmed during the attempted arrest by the Petravian patrol." She leaned forward. "It was OUR people who started the fight."

"AT YOUR SUGGESTION!" He snapped back at her.

"Partly." She admitted. "I did suggest that the Deep Strike Force might be a better option for our troops there due to their skills and equipment, but my primary reason was because they might resist the effects of a return trip more capably. I NEVER suggested using them as a show of force. Much less to walk through the door guns blazing."

She left out the part where she'd expected it though.

"Regardless. This fight is over. We now have one of the things you Pentagon Pilots love most." She said, not holding back with the jab. "Intel." She said. "You now know exactly what the Petravian military is capable of in a stand up fight. How they handle the different weapons systems and ground forces we use. Minus tanks, and fighter jets and things, but still. More importantly, you know that they are not to be handled lightly."

"We already knew that." The General said. "We weren't going to underestimate an opponent who has MAGIC."

"Weren't you though? Sir?" She asked. "Or have you forgotten that facility full of werewolves? Or at least I assume that its full of them by now."

He turned even redder at that. "That's classified Colonel."

"Oh I'm sure." She said. "And I sure as hell won't be the one to let the.... CAT... out of the bag on it. But it's still a colossally stupid idea. Grant was playing with things he had NO comprehension of. AND NOW we also have ACTUAL magic popping up all over the world. You can't tell me that was something any of us expected. The last thing the President needs is to have attention drawn to THIS operation."

She paused and smirked again at the General's growing agitation.

"But that's neither here nor there." She said. "You have.... a completely new set of problems in Petravus." She tilted her head a bit. "But these problems also present wonderful opportunities.."

"What are you talking about?" He asked with scorn.

"The kingdom of Petravus just won a battle against an unexpected and, according to what we will tell them, UNSANCTIONED enemy." She said. "It'll be a hard sell. But we now have the opportunity to... humble... ourselves to them. To make concessions. AND.... to let Choi look more and more like a hero, and also lead the people WE have over there now."

As she'd spoken she'd watched the general's face move from rage to confusion, to considering thought.

Good. She thought. Things will be rough for a while. But at least this should loosen Choi's leash even more. And give the King some cards to play if he needs them.

But neither of them were aware of the short, sweet, and violence inducing, conversation that a certain goddess was having with her favorite soon to be champion.

\---

James winced as a sand laden blade of wind dug into the meat of his shoulder as he made to close the last few yards of distance between him and his brother. Hot blood poured down the fur of his left arm as he narrowly deflected the attack.

"JOEY!" He yelled. "JOEY LET ME IN!"

He felt something, some unseen phantom of magical wind energy, grab at him like a massive hand and try pulling at him. He pulsed wind energy from his arms and struggled free from it.

He's in complete nuclear mode. He thought. But holes in walls, smashed toys, and broken nails are nothing compared to this.

"JOEY PLEASE!" He begged as he struggled against what felt like a rubber shield of whipping wind.

His skin burned where the sand blasted at it. His muscles ached as he struggled to maintain balance in his flight. He could feel the ache in his legs and knew that he was exhausting himself magically.

Suddenly, and unexpectedly, a dark and multi-colored shortsword flew up in front of him. The chain was no longer attached to it, and as James instinctively grabbed it with his right hand, he looked down and saw Amina quickly shuffling away in a crouch.

She'd given him the one thing that could defend her from the magical sandstorm.

Even as he wanted to thank her for the the unexpected aid, James cursed it.

No. He thought. I can't use this on him.

The sword yearned to pull James toward his brother.

But it can get me TO him. Just gotta move fast. Can't let it hurt him.

James flew up a few yards higher than Joey, letting the sword slice at the incoming defensive attacks, and used his wolf arm to continue fighting wind with wind.

Then when he was in a position that he thought would work, and right as he felt his left leg begin to burn in pain, James burst forward, letting the sword cut the magic in front of him as he did.

Something pierced him in the abdomen, a blade.... no... a spear of sand laced wind punched through him just before he slammed into his brother with his chest. The sword tumbled down to the sand below, intentionally discarded.

His hands shot up and clamped onto his brothers hands. An old signal that their mother had figured out with Joey years ago to let him know that they needed to talk to him, for just a few words.

Joey instinctively lifted his hands ever so slightly off of his ears and James pressed his mouth to the space. James worried at the blood around Joey's ears, and caked on his hands.

"I'm here Joey." He said. "I'm not going anywhere."

And Joey's hands slammed back onto his ears.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yrvbae/wait_is_this_just_gate_259/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (257/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Believe it or not, Veliry has done this once before in the story. I have said before that I don't really "PLAN" this story, and just let it kind of flow organically. And that's 100% true. But every now and then I do keep something pinned for later.

Wonder if anyone can figure out where/when she did it.

Enjoy.

\~

Margaret Choi jumped in surprise as her hands began to glow the amber color of healing magic as she worked on the wounded soldier in front of her.

"See, there it is." Shrend Farstorm, the large minotaur and primary healer of this shift said as he studied her hands with his eyes glowing a faint green.. "Now simply direct those thoughts to the injury. Focus on undoing the damage there and putting everything back the way its supposed to be."

"Oh god." She said in response. "This feels weird. Okay. Undo. Like on a computer document. But for this laceration."

"Healer, is she going to be okay with this?" The middle aged man on the cot asked. His torso had a long tearing slash on it from where a bullet had grazed him. He also had a bullet wound to his calf, but one of the more experienced healers was treating that.

Shrend cocked an eyebrow at what he saw with a slight smirk.

"Why don't you look for yourself soldier." He said. "I'd say she has it in hand."

"This is insane." Margaret said as she watched the muscle and skin covering the soldiers ribs knit back together at a speed that would have made RegTek representatives back home pull their hair out. "Even the blood is retracting back into him."

Then the light around her hands faltered as she realized what she'd just said.

She was on the verge of saying "Oh shit." But then she remembered one of the primary rules of healthcare. To never do things like that in front of the patient.

"Dr. Farstorm. Is blood recovery part of healing magic?" She asked instead.

"Not at such an early stage in your learning." He admitted as he leaned forward to study her progress. "But you are doing work that would make even my more advanced healers look like novices. I would be surprised if the Sergeant at Arms here even had a noticeable scar once you're done." He touched a metal tool from the nearby table to the wound, eliciting a wince from the soldier, and inspected some of the blood she had been affecting, his left eye glowing a dull orange color. "But you seem to be doing quite well very quickly Mrs. Choi. Please. Continue."

"Fast would be nice." The soldier said. "No more poking please."

She nodded enthusiastically as her hands began to glow again.

To think that only a few hours ago she had thought Magic was beyond her, and something for young people to learn.

\----------

As the second to last thermobaric blast went off, destroying the last few of the defensive interception Miffy's that were loosely clustered behind the FOB, Vickers rummaged around in the cabin of the truck. He listened as the main gun of the vehicle's weapon began its somewhat slow rotation to the last target he'd input into its controls.

"Come on." He said as he checked all the compartments of the truck. A handful of Earth soldiers, probably the last of the ones that were alive and unrestrained if he was honest, were running towards him with weapons. "Never been in a truck that didn't have a snack somewhere."

The display on the screen flashed the warning for "Target acquired" Then began it's charge sequence just as he found what he was looking for.

It crinkled noisily as he pulled it from out of one of the gauges on the driver's side dash. It's red and multicolored wrapper a sight for sore eyes as he listened to the whine of the charging magnetic coils.

Vickers placed the corner of the wrapper in his mouth and tore eagerly just as the soldiers got to the cabin of the truck.

"Hands up!" The young Sergeant demanded as Vickers looked over at the barrel of a rifle aimed at him.

He held his hands up while also dumping a few of the skittles into his mouth. They were a little stale, and definitely chalky on the outside. They'd sat in the cabin of the vehicle just a touch too long. But they were still a godsend in his book.

The soldier wrenched the door open, rifle never leaving Vickers as he did.

"Evening officer." Vickers said as he used his tongue to tuck most of the skittles into his cheek. "I wasn't speeding was I?"

"Get the fuck out!" The soldier demanded. "Get out NOW!"

"Alright alright." Vickers said. "Just gimme a minute man. I'm beat to shit."

"You're gonna be worse than that if you don't move!" The soldier replied.

Vickers scooted out just a bit, careful to keep his hands up and visible. He looked over at the screen and smiled as he saw the "Ready" indicator.

"We should probably hurry." He said as he made to grab the top of the cab with his good hand.

"Yeah? Why?" The soldier asked.

Vickers spat the Skittle out as hard as he could at the fire button on the screen. It hit exactly where he'd wanted it to, and the warmth and saliva on it was apparently enough for the button to read it as a finger.

The Miffy sounded off with one last, massive, blast that made all the soldiers outside the vehicle flinch and duck. To his credit the Sergeant didn't lose his target.

"Because in about thirty seconds this is gonna be a crater." Vickers said as he gingerly slid down to the sand on his butt.

The Sergeant looked at him with wide eyes. Then he looked quickly up at the mortar barrel on the Miffy.

"Looks like about ninety degrees, don't it?" Vickers asked. "Plus or minus a few to adjust for wind and shit."

"You motherf-" The Sergeant began, then thought better of it and turned to his comrades. "RUN!"

The other soldiers didn't need to be told twice. They all immediately scattered and began sprinting.

Vickers groaned as he lifted himself back to his feet.

"Thanks for the lift guys. Definitely not injured or anything." He said. He took a deep breath and braced himself. "Fuuuuuck."

Then, despite all his pains and weariness, he began running faster than any of them. Faster by a large margin.

\------------------------

Veliry had expected to impact the sand below, maybe even one of the soldiers or a body or something. She was more than a little surprised when she was caught by a pair of arms and a body instead.

"Veliry?" A familiar voice asked with concern. A voice that was NOT supposed to be here. "Ms. Veliry?"

She opened her eyes and confirmed the impossible.

"Joseph?" She asked weakly. "No. What are you doing here?"

Joey gasped as he saw her eyes open and heard her speak.

Then she groaned in pain as she was reminded of what had happened. Her hands shot to the hole in her stomach and came away bloody.

"Oh god." Joey said. "Ohhhh you're hurt. No."

His left hand went up and attempted to cover his ear, smearing her blood on his hair and face around it in the process, but then went back down to try to press at her stomach. He'd seen in movies and things that you were supposed to apply pressure to things like this. Then his right hand tried to cover his right ear, before he realized that doing so would mean dropping her.

"Stop." She said weakly. "Hurts."

"No. No no no no." He said, tears flowing down his cheeks. "No. They hurt you."

"Joey." She said as she gripped the front of his robes weakly, leaving a bloody hand print there. "You have to go back." She shivered, as if cold. "Not safe here."

"But you're hurt." He said. "Gotta help. James would help. Mom would help. I'm here. I have to help."

She began bouncing just a bit, as the leg he had underneath her began bouncing up and down rapidly.

A small, blood soaked, hand rested on his cheek.

"Joseph Choi." She said sternly as her other hand fished into one of the pouches on her robe. "I am... an Arch-Mage." She winced a bit. "If you think a... gunshot to the stomach is enough... to kill me. Than you haven't been paying attention in class." Then she slapped him, and his leg stopped twitching in surprise at the sharp pain. "GO. HOME." She demanded. "And don't freak out."

Before Joey could say anything Veliry disappeared, her entire body seeming to phase right through his hands and leg, and down through the sand as she dropped out of sight.

Joey's eyes widened in confusion and fear as he quickly got on his hands and knees and began feeling around the sand.

"No!" He exclaimed, not understanding what had just happened. "No, Ms. Veliry! No no no no."

The wind began to whip around him wildly, kicking up sand, as he dug through the sand in a feeble attempt to find her.

"No. Come back." He said frantically as the wind around him began to pick up. "Don't leave. Not you too. Come back." He practically begged the uncaring sand.

Joeys breathing began to grow fast and ragged as his hands shot up to his ears and clamped down hard enough to dig his fingernails into his skin.

Over a nearby dune, a robotic body with a sword shaped hole in the front of its head lurched into view, a rifle held awkwardly as it approached in spastic steps.

Joeys eyes fixed on the piece of military machinery and blazed with fury.

"You." He said softly to himself. "You did this. One of you did this. YOU HURT HER!!!!"

"Huh." Driscoll's voice said from the speaker of his dead teammate. "Little Choi's here too. Well, guess it's time to get the second bird too. Different stone though." The dead Muck Marcher's remote controlled suit raised the rifle. "This is for Rod and Doc."

Like his brother, Joey didn't think.

His hand reached out toward the armored hostile and wind, in gales that shamed hurricanes, lashed out and wrapped around the metal zombie and brought it toward him so fast that it didn't have time to react.

Joey's hand latched onto the things throat in a vice that he wouldn't have been capable of back on Earth.

"The fuck?" The speaker said as Joey saw the lifeless eyes behind the crack in its mask, a large diamond shaped hole where the bridge of the nose had been.

"YOU HURT HER!" Joey raged at the dead thing.

Driscoll tried to get the suit to raise the rifle up and attack the young man. But before he could a blast of high pressure air burst from Joey's palm and out through the neck of the suit, sending metal, circuitry, and bits of dead flesh flying back like shrapnel.

The suit never got a chance to do anything else as Driscoll attempted to reestablish control of the now even more disrupted mechanism.

Joey landed on it in a pounce, not even realizing that he had been hovering some ten feet off the ground when he'd decapitated the machine. His hands slammed into the metal of the suit, palm first, in a rage. Each strike blasting holes into the machinery and the flesh it concealed.

"YOU DID THIS! YOU TOOK THEM AWAY! YOU HURT THEM!" He yelled into the rapidly diminishing body.

From where he sat bundled in spider silk, Driscoll watched the destruction of his teammate's dead body and suit on his display with mounting surprise and horror. The remaining cameras and sensors showed him the magically enhanced tantrum the young man was unleashing upon it. Until the feed cut out and a warning of "Total Suit Loss" flashed in its place.

Joey kept beating at the metal and bits of flesh until he was sitting in a sandy, bloody, slurry of dead Muck Marcher.

His hands hurt from where the bits of metal had cut into them, and from where he'd hit too hard for his own good.

Then he looked down and realized what he was sitting in.

Joey quickly scampered out of the disgusting mess he'd made before curling into a ball and clamping his hands over his ears again.

"Nonononononono." He mumbled to himself as he began rocking side to side. "No. Can't hurt people. Rule one. Don't hurt people."

He didn't notice the small group of Petravian soldiers that climbed up the dune nearby to see what was happening.

He didn't notice that James was among them, carried by Amina and one of those soldiers in a daze, both of whom were casting healing magic on him.

\----------

"Jojo?" James asked in mounting horror and distress at what he was seeing. "No. Oh, Jojo no." James said.

But Joey didn't hear that either, and didn't notice that the wind around him was intensifying.

The first sign of how wrong things had become, was when one of the Petravian soldiers slipped in the collapsing sand, falling just a few feet closer to the sobbing young man in the clearing.

Suddenly the young, armored, elf archer was pulled forward and into the air where he was quickly pulled apart, as if by invisible blades made of sand and wind.

"Get back!" Amina yelled, just as something lanced out and pierced one of the soldiers near her in the shoulder. "Fall back."

"Amina." James said softly. She looked at him and saw that his eyes were locked on his brother. "Go."

"No James. We have to go." She said. "You're too hurt. I'm too hurt."

"No." He said.

He looked over at her as the sand around them began to move in the air.

She saw the mixture of emotions there and swallowed. There wasn't going to be any convincing here.

"Fine." She said. "But this isn't going to be like the elemental."

"What?" He asked.

"If you're going to plunge into certain death again. Then I'm coming with." She said firmly as she looked at the young man in the center of the maelstrom. "Besides. He's going to be my little brother too."

James didn't have the energy to argue. He just nodded.

"Thank you." He said as he focused what little energy he could on his own wind magic. "I love you."

Then the two of them began walking forward. With Amina holding James up and trying to heal his wounds, while James fended off his brother's magical storm.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yqw37g/wait_is_this_just_gate_258/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (257/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Believe it or not, Veliry has done this once before in the story. I have said before that I don't really "PLAN" this story, and just let it kind of flow organically. And that's 100% true. But every now and then I do keep something pinned for later.

Wonder if anyone can figure out where/when she did it.

Enjoy.

\~

Margaret Choi jumped in surprise as her hands began to glow the amber color of healing magic as she worked on the wounded soldier in front of her.

"See, there it is." Shrend Farstorm, the large minotaur and primary healer of this shift said as he studied her hands with his eyes glowing a faint green.. "Now simply direct those thoughts to the injury. Focus on undoing the damage there and putting everything back the way its supposed to be."

"Oh god." She said in response. "This feels weird. Okay. Undo. Like on a computer document. But for this laceration."

"Healer, is she going to be okay with this?" The middle aged man on the cot asked. His torso had a long tearing slash on it from where a bullet had grazed him. He also had a bullet wound to his calf, but one of the more experienced healers was treating that.

Shrend cocked an eyebrow at what he saw with a slight smirk.

"Why don't you look for yourself soldier." He said. "I'd say she has it in hand."

"This is insane." Margaret said as she watched the muscle and skin covering the soldiers ribs knit back together at a speed that would have made RegTek representatives back home pull their hair out. "Even the blood is retracting back into him."

Then the light around her hands faltered as she realized what she'd just said.

She was on the verge of saying "Oh shit." But then she remembered one of the primary rules of healthcare. To never do things like that in front of the patient.

"Dr. Farstorm. Is blood recovery part of healing magic?" She asked instead.

"Not at such an early stage in your learning." He admitted as he leaned forward to study her progress. "But you are doing work that would make even my more advanced healers look like novices. I would be surprised if the Sergeant at Arms here even had a noticeable scar once you're done." He touched a metal tool from the nearby table to the wound, eliciting a wince from the soldier, and inspected some of the blood she had been affecting, his left eye glowing a dull orange color. "But you seem to be doing quite well very quickly Mrs. Choi. Please. Continue."

"Fast would be nice." The soldier said. "No more poking please."

She nodded enthusiastically as her hands began to glow again.

To think that only a few hours ago she had thought Magic was beyond her, and something for young people to learn.

\----------

As the second to last thermobaric blast went off, destroying the last few of the defensive interception Miffy's that were loosely clustered behind the FOB, Vickers rummaged around in the cabin of the truck. He listened as the main gun of the vehicle's weapon began its somewhat slow rotation to the last target he'd input into its controls.

"Come on." He said as he checked all the compartments of the truck. A handful of Earth soldiers, probably the last of the ones that were alive and unrestrained if he was honest, were running towards him with weapons. "Never been in a truck that didn't have a snack somewhere."

The display on the screen flashed the warning for "Target acquired" Then began it's charge sequence just as he found what he was looking for.

It crinkled noisily as he pulled it from out of one of the gauges on the driver's side dash. It's red and multicolored wrapper a sight for sore eyes as he listened to the whine of the charging magnetic coils.

Vickers placed the corner of the wrapper in his mouth and tore eagerly just as the soldiers got to the cabin of the truck.

"Hands up!" The young Sergeant demanded as Vickers looked over at the barrel of a rifle aimed at him.

He held his hands up while also dumping a few of the skittles into his mouth. They were a little stale, and definitely chalky on the outside. They'd sat in the cabin of the vehicle just a touch too long. But they were still a godsend in his book.

The soldier wrenched the door open, rifle never leaving Vickers as he did.

"Evening officer." Vickers said as he used his tongue to tuck most of the skittles into his cheek. "I wasn't speeding was I?"

"Get the fuck out!" The soldier demanded. "Get out NOW!"

"Alright alright." Vickers said. "Just gimme a minute man. I'm beat to shit."

"You're gonna be worse than that if you don't move!" The soldier replied.

Vickers scooted out just a bit, careful to keep his hands up and visible. He looked over at the screen and smiled as he saw the "Ready" indicator.

"We should probably hurry." He said as he made to grab the top of the cab with his good hand.

"Yeah? Why?" The soldier asked.

Vickers spat the Skittle out as hard as he could at the fire button on the screen. It hit exactly where he'd wanted it to, and the warmth and saliva on it was apparently enough for the button to read it as a finger.

The Miffy sounded off with one last, massive, blast that made all the soldiers outside the vehicle flinch and duck. To his credit the Sergeant didn't lose his target.

"Because in about thirty seconds this is gonna be a crater." Vickers said as he gingerly slid down to the sand on his butt.

The Sergeant looked at him with wide eyes. Then he looked quickly up at the mortar barrel on the Miffy.

"Looks like about ninety degrees, don't it?" Vickers asked. "Plus or minus a few to adjust for wind and shit."

"You motherf-" The Sergeant began, then thought better of it and turned to his comrades. "RUN!"

The other soldiers didn't need to be told twice. They all immediately scattered and began sprinting.

Vickers groaned as he lifted himself back to his feet.

"Thanks for the lift guys. Definitely not injured or anything." He said. He took a deep breath and braced himself. "Fuuuuuck."

Then, despite all his pains and weariness, he began running faster than any of them. Faster by a large margin.

\------------------------

Veliry had expected to impact the sand below, maybe even one of the soldiers or a body or something. She was more than a little surprised when she was caught by a pair of arms and a body instead.

"Veliry?" A familiar voice asked with concern. A voice that was NOT supposed to be here. "Ms. Veliry?"

She opened her eyes and confirmed the impossible.

"Joseph?" She asked weakly. "No. What are you doing here?"

Joey gasped as he saw her eyes open and heard her speak.

Then she groaned in pain as she was reminded of what had happened. Her hands shot to the hole in her stomach and came away bloody.

"Oh god." Joey said. "Ohhhh you're hurt. No."

His left hand went up and attempted to cover his ear, smearing her blood on his hair and face around it in the process, but then went back down to try to press at her stomach. He'd seen in movies and things that you were supposed to apply pressure to things like this. Then his right hand tried to cover his right ear, before he realized that doing so would mean dropping her.

"Stop." She said weakly. "Hurts."

"No. No no no no." He said, tears flowing down his cheeks. "No. They hurt you."

"Joey." She said as she gripped the front of his robes weakly, leaving a bloody hand print there. "You have to go back." She shivered, as if cold. "Not safe here."

"But you're hurt." He said. "Gotta help. James would help. Mom would help. I'm here. I have to help."

She began bouncing just a bit, as the leg he had underneath her began bouncing up and down rapidly.

A small, blood soaked, hand rested on his cheek.

"Joseph Choi." She said sternly as her other hand fished into one of the pouches on her robe. "I am... an Arch-Mage." She winced a bit. "If you think a... gunshot to the stomach is enough... to kill me. Than you haven't been paying attention in class." Then she slapped him, and his leg stopped twitching in surprise at the sharp pain. "GO. HOME." She demanded. "And don't freak out."

Before Joey could say anything Veliry disappeared, her entire body seeming to phase right through his hands and leg, and down through the sand as she dropped out of sight.

Joey's eyes widened in confusion and fear as he quickly got on his hands and knees and began feeling around the sand.

"No!" He exclaimed, not understanding what had just happened. "No, Ms. Veliry! No no no no."

The wind began to whip around him wildly, kicking up sand, as he dug through the sand in a feeble attempt to find her.

"No. Come back." He said frantically as the wind around him began to pick up. "Don't leave. Not you too. Come back." He practically begged the uncaring sand.

Joeys breathing began to grow fast and ragged as his hands shot up to his ears and clamped down hard enough to dig his fingernails into his skin.

Over a nearby dune, a robotic body with a sword shaped hole in the front of its head lurched into view, a rifle held awkwardly as it approached in spastic steps.

Joeys eyes fixed on the piece of military machinery and blazed with fury.

"You." He said softly to himself. "You did this. One of you did this. YOU HURT HER!!!!"

"Huh." Driscoll's voice said from the speaker of his dead teammate. "Little Choi's here too. Well, guess it's time to get the second bird too. Different stone though." The dead Muck Marcher's remote controlled suit raised the rifle. "This is for Rod and Doc."

Like his brother, Joey didn't think.

His hand reached out toward the armored hostile and wind, in gales that shamed hurricanes, lashed out and wrapped around the metal zombie and brought it toward him so fast that it didn't have time to react.

Joey's hand latched onto the things throat in a vice that he wouldn't have been capable of back on Earth.

"The fuck?" The speaker said as Joey saw the lifeless eyes behind the crack in its mask, a large diamond shaped hole where the bridge of the nose had been.

"YOU HURT HER!" Joey raged at the dead thing.

Driscoll tried to get the suit to raise the rifle up and attack the young man. But before he could a blast of high pressure air burst from Joey's palm and out through the neck of the suit, sending metal, circuitry, and bits of dead flesh flying back like shrapnel.

The suit never got a chance to do anything else as Driscoll attempted to reestablish control of the now even more disrupted mechanism.

Joey landed on it in a pounce, not even realizing that he had been hovering some ten feet off the ground when he'd decapitated the machine. His hands slammed into the metal of the suit, palm first, in a rage. Each strike blasting holes into the machinery and the flesh it concealed.

"YOU DID THIS! YOU TOOK THEM AWAY! YOU HURT THEM!" He yelled into the rapidly diminishing body.

From where he sat bundled in spider silk, Driscoll watched the destruction of his teammate's dead body and suit on his display with mounting surprise and horror. The remaining cameras and sensors showed him the magically enhanced tantrum the young man was unleashing upon it. Until the feed cut out and a warning of "Total Suit Loss" flashed in its place.

Joey kept beating at the metal and bits of flesh until he was sitting in a sandy, bloody, slurry of dead Muck Marcher.

His hands hurt from where the bits of metal had cut into them, and from where he'd hit too hard for his own good.

Then he looked down and realized what he was sitting in.

Joey quickly scampered out of the disgusting mess he'd made before curling into a ball and clamping his hands over his ears again.

"Nonononononono." He mumbled to himself as he began rocking side to side. "No. Can't hurt people. Rule one. Don't hurt people."

He didn't notice the small group of Petravian soldiers that climbed up the dune nearby to see what was happening.

He didn't notice that James was among them, carried by Amina and one of those soldiers in a daze, both of whom were casting healing magic on him.

\----------

"Jojo?" James asked in mounting horror and distress at what he was seeing. "No. Oh, Jojo no." James said.

But Joey didn't hear that either, and didn't notice that the wind around him was intensifying.

The first sign of how wrong things had become, was when one of the Petravian soldiers slipped in the collapsing sand, falling just a few feet closer to the sobbing young man in the clearing.

Suddenly the young, armored, elf archer was pulled forward and into the air where he was quickly pulled apart, as if by invisible blades made of sand and wind.

"Get back!" Amina yelled, just as something lanced out and pierced one of the soldiers near her in the shoulder. "Fall back."

"Amina." James said softly. She looked at him and saw that his eyes were locked on his brother. "Go."

"No James. We have to go." She said. "You're too hurt. I'm too hurt."

"No." He said.

He looked over at her as the sand around them began to move in the air.

She saw the mixture of emotions there and swallowed. There wasn't going to be any convincing here.

"Fine." She said. "But this isn't going to be like the elemental."

"What?" He asked.

"If you're going to plunge into certain death again. Then I'm coming with." She said firmly as she looked at the young man in the center of the maelstrom. "Besides. He's going to be my little brother too."

James didn't have the energy to argue. He just nodded.

"Thank you." He said as he focused what little energy he could on his own wind magic. "I love you."

Then the two of them began walking forward. With Amina holding James up and trying to heal his wounds, while James fended off his brother's magical storm.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yqvznw/wait_is_this_just_gate_258/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (256/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Nothing to see here beloved readers!

Enjoy!!!!\~\~\~

with a shaggy grayish black mane that matched Steve too, if the lizard had been showing signs of aging. The eye on that side was human, but yellow in color. His face had lines that James wouldn't have for at least another ten years, or at least he hoped not.

James stood up as he studied the Other Him.

"Where am I?" He asked as he looked around. He also looked at the versions of him that stood behind the central one. "What the fuck is going on?"

"Long story there." The central HIM said. "No time. It's coming."

"What?" James asked. "What's coming."

"The catalyst." HE said as if that was an explanation. "The one that determines which path you go down."

The James that was to the right of, and behind, the speaker muttered something that James couldn't hear.

"Path? What? What catalyst?" James asked. "What are you talking about? What the fuck is that?" He asked, pointing at the hunched over, deformed, version of them both.

"You're at the camp. The FOB right?" Central him asked. "That's when this happened. You're doing the right thing. But it's a distraction. It's the BIIIIG players keeping you away from your job. YOUR ACTUAL JOB!" He used his hands to emphasize the word 'Big' as he said it. "Right now we're taking advantage of a little loophole to warn you."

James tried to reach out and grab the older, twisted, version of himself by the shoulders. To get the alien reflection to elaborate.

But his hands went through the image like it was made of fog.

"Don't bother." It chided him. "Can't DIRECTLY contact past selves. Movie style rules. You know that."

"THEN TELL ME WHAT YOU MEAN!" He demanded. "What's happening?"

All three of the images of him looked around as the strange lights around them flared brighter and swirled faster.

"Too late." HE said. "You have to make a choice. It's about to happen."

"What's about to happen?" James asked for the millionth time.

"Choose life." The one to the left, who hadn't spoken and seemed the most like James, said with a soft smile. "It'll be okay."

"Kill." Said the one to the right, though it didn't turn to look at any of them.

"Angels and devils kid." Central HIM said. "No REAL right answer. But you have to save him."

"Save who?"

"And then you have to go back to your real job. The reason you were brought here in the first place." They answered, but the voice got quieter with each word, as if it's volume knob was being gradually turned down.

"SAVE WHO?" He demanded. "WHAT IS HAPPENING!?!?"

He couldn't hear them as all three of them spoke, even the right one turning so he could see its scarred, one eyed, hateful face.

But he saw the word, the name, they said.

"Jojo."

James felt his heart seize up at the idea that this "Warning" somehow involved his little brother.

Then the lights around him flared so bright that they made his eyes(?) hurt.

\----------

Pain erupted across James's mind as his ACTUAL eyes fluttered open. One of them didn't want to open the whole way, and that side of his vision was half-veiled in darkness.

Someone was slapping his cheek. The slaps sent cascades of pain across his face.

"JAMES!" Amina's voice said, though it was horse and broken by ragged breaths. "JAMES WAKE UP!"

"Amina?" He said weakly. "Wha-.... where?"

Then he saw her and he attempted to sit upright. But every muscle in his body screamed at him for even attempting it.

Amina was matted in drying blood and sand. Her armor was riddled with holes from bullets, and even a few jagged lines where ricochets or blades had rent it open.

"Amina? What happened?" He turned his head a bit and saw the Muck Marcher next to him as they lay among the mangled ruins of one of the camp tents. The Muck Marcher was laying with its limbs at odd angles, and its face plate was cracked. "Are you okay?"

Amina took a deep ragged breath and practically coughed out her answer. "No." She grunted. "Not really. But I'll live... I think." She grabbed the front of his vest and braced herself. "Take a deep breath." She instructed him.

"What? Why?" He asked.

"Just do it. Trust me dear." She said as blood dripped from her nose.

James took a deep, exaggerated, inhale as if he was at the doctor's office.

At the apex of his breath Amina jerked him upright and James felt something moved in his chest, just under the ribs. He felt things shift around it as it was removed from his body.

"AAAAAAAGH!!!" He screamed as he clamped his hands, which had pain induced strength, on her shoulder and waist.

"I'm sorry." She said into his ear as she moved something from underneath him with a loud clanking noise, and lowered him back down.

"Was I impaled?" James asked in disbelief. Amina nodded against him. James took quick, short breaths. "Fuck." He said softly. "Shoulda left it in." He said as she lowered his head. "Medical classes later. If I live that long. Fuck."

"We can't stay here." She said. "We need to get back to the castle and to the healers. Before I can't move."

"What happened to you?" He asked. "Are you shot? You look shot. A lot.... Rhymes." He said in between breaths.

"They fired one of those thermo-berry rounds at us." She said as she pressed her forhead against his. James's eyes widened, at the realization that that was what the Miffy had fired. "I went a bit crazy because of it. Lead the survivors on a charge. Don't know how much I have left in me." She said as she lifted herself to a knee and grabbed the top and bottom of his vest.

James reeled at the idea of CHARGING the base.

"Amina. You said "get back to the castle'. What do you mean? That's weeks away." He asked.

"Veliry is here." She answered as she grunted and lifted him up into a fireman's carry. He'd have told her it was a bad idea, medically speaking, but he had more pressing concerns. "Said she had a shortcut. Brought more mages."

"Veliry?" He wondered. "She didn't bring my brother did she?" He asked.

"Joey?" She wondered in return. "No. At least I can't imagine she did. He must be back at the castle. Why?"

"Just wondering. Weird dream while I was unconscious." He admitted.

Then, as Amina turned and began trudging slowly towards where the Petravian troops were still streaming over the walls, they saw Veliry.

She was glowing like a star above the dunes, her hands held up above her.

Then the sky above her erupted in an explosion that James recognized from outside the walls of Jadesport, though it was smaller than those.

"Holy fuck." He said as he saw the display around Amina's side.

"Veliry." Amina said.

The flame and devastation of the thermobaric mortar round slammed into an invisible wall above Veliry like a sci-fi, space movie, force field. Veliry dropped a few feet lower from the impact, but then began glowing brighter as the fire above the shield intensified.

From where they were, none of them knew what had actually just happened. But everyone, even the Earth soldiers who weren't well acquainted with magic, felt the power being wielded there. Everyone in the base stopped fighting for a moment to watch in awe at the small mage.

And the catalyst that James had been warned about, began.

\------------------------

Here it comes. Veliry thought. If it's like the others, it'll detonate roughly one hundred feet above the ground. Create the feedback loop with its own heat and pressure energy. Use it's own power to fuel the shield against it.

She felt the energy from the mages below flowing into her, actively now that some of the older mages had joined the group, and she put that into the shield too.

Unbreakable. She thought. Like a mountain against a wildfire. Unmoved. Unbroken. Eternal in its silent power.

Then the projectile, only a few feet long and maybe six inches wide, got to where she'd estimated it would go off.

She watched, in the same slow motion that she'd taught James to imbue upon himself, as it separated into four pieces with a pop.

Then a light so bright that she had to close those eyes shone out.

Fire, like nothing she would ever wield, like a fire elemental's core, burst out in a ring as the air inside expanded so rapidly she couldn't have seen it if her eyes had been open.

It hit the shield and she felt the raw strength of it and knew that it would break her.

She began to siphon off of that very strength, feeling the sudden wild intensification of the heat energy before her and using it.

UNBREAKABLE!

Her shield strengthened.

STRONGER.....THAN.....ITS OWN..... ATTACKER!!!!

Something below her made a pop noise that she couldn't hear so close to the explosion.

Something impacted her at the side of her stomach and punched through her and out the other side, just to the left of her belly button.

She felt a cold pain in her that temporarily distracted her.

She dropped several feet and felt the shield almost drop.

NO! She thought. No, demanded, of her mind. NOPE! NOT ALLOWED. SHIELD NOW! THIS SHIELD WILL HOLD!

She gritted her teeth as she made a point of ignoring the cold spreading through her legs. She forced some of the energy flowing through her to her legs, keeping her aloft through the glowing tattoos there, even as she felt those same legs growing cold and numb.

UN.....BREAKABLE!

Then she felt the heat and pressure of the explosion soften, dissipating ever so slightly, and knew that the explosion was over. It had only been about five seconds. But the other explosions hadn't been very long either. And they hadn't been used against themselves like this one had.

"Fancy Earth weapons are nothing...." She said as she slowly reduced the energy going to the shield. "Compared.... to an Arch-Mage." She said as she felt herself shudder. "THE ARCH-MAGE!" She exclaimed in triumphant victory.

Then she began to fall.

\-------------------------

From where he was bundled up, Driscoll watched with a smile as the little redhead began to falter, then fall.

He was surprised she'd held on as long as she had after taking the shot from Doc's pistol. He'd commend her if she weren't his enemy, and about to die.

He was a little annoyed as he saw several Petravian soldiers rush over to the downed suit and begin hacking and smashing at it with their stupid medieval weapons. But he also couldn't blame them.

Instead he began looking for other suits to use the new weapon on.

His smile turned to a scowl as he noticed that Rodriguez's suit was reading total destruction.

"How the fuck?" He asked as he began looking at the recording of what had happened.

"FUCKING CHOI!" He yelled into the silence of his helmet.

\--------------------

Joey didn't see Veliry's herculean effort. He was still curled into a ball with his hands over his ears.

But he felt the crescendo of energy she had built around herself as she'd readied the shield. After months of learning and training under her that energy was as familiar to him as the sound of his brother's voice, or the smell of his mother's cooking. He recognized who it was just by the way it felt as it pulled from everything around the battlefield.

He wondered, even as he was having his melt down, what she could possible need all that energy for. But he was also smart, and realized that she must have been trying to stop the next attack. Probably a shield.

Reroute all powers to shields. He thought, and the thought actually helped calm him a bit.

Then the explosion had occurred and even as it had overwhelmed the small bit of relief Joey had found in his own joke, he felt Veliry's power reach an insane crescendo.

Then... he felt that power jolt.

In his mind it was like a car hitting a pothole at highway speed. The sudden interruption not stopping what was happening, but definitely causing everything to stutter for just a moment.

Then he felt the power build up again, even higher now, as the roar of the thermobaric weapon reached its apex.

Then he felt all of the energy diminish. The roar began to quiet, and Joey felt Veliry's energy weaken, slowly lowering to match the reducing destructive power of the bomb.

As Joey reached out with his magical senses, training them even as he used them to try to distract himself from his own sensory overload. Focusing on the magic to aim his mind away from its own self destructive tendency to freak out.

He felt the energy disappear almost entirely.

One second he felt his teacher, high in the sky and triumphantly empowered.

The next second it was as though she'd fallen off a cliff, and he voice was trailing away like a cartoon.

Joey scrambled the few feet up to the top of the, almost blasted away now, dune.

He got there just in time to see her drop below his eye level.

His eyes widened and his hands dropped from his ears and down to the sand as they scrambled to get him to his feet, his own fears and confusion completely obliterated by the newfound fear he felt.

No. He thought. NOOOOOO!!!!

A loud thunderclap sounded as the sand where he'd been exploded in a plume.

And, without really thinking, Joseph Choi began to move like one of his favorite, crimson colored, comic book heroes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ypyn1x/wait_is_this_just_gate_257/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (256/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Nothing to see here beloved readers!

Enjoy!!!!\~

"Wake up idiot." A familiar, yet not quite right voice said.

James stirred, surprised at how little pain he was in.

His eyes opened, and to his surprise he.... wasn't..... looking up at the desert sky, or a tent, or into the sand. But, he wasn't blind either.

Instead, as he looked up he saw what looked like the most intense northern lights in the history of anywhere. Swirls of green, and blue, and red, and purple made vortexes and eddies of etheric light above him.

"There he is." Said the voice. "Good." Then James heard an odd kind of snapping noise. Like a snapping finger, only that wasn't quite right either.

He sat up and looked over at the source of the noise.

And immediately shuffled back in surprise.

"Yeah. Welcome to the shit show." HE said from several yards away.

James was looking at himself. Or rather, some older, alternate reality version of himself.

No.... that wasn't quite right. He was looking at.... three(?) versions of himself.

Front and center was the one that had been talking, and as he studied him he saw why the snapping finger sounded different.

He looked down at his own left hand and snapped the fingers there and sure enough it made same sound.

That was right about where the similarities ended.

"Yeah." The other him said. "Take it all in. Take your time. Definitely not in a rush."

The left side of this.... other James's face looked nothing like his. Where James had burns and scars on his face, this Other James had a section of flesh that looked to be made of the same kind of scales, albeit smaller, as Steve had. The lost hair on that side was replaced with a shaggy grayish black mane that matched Steve too, if the lizard had been showing signs of aging. The eye on that side was human, but yellow in color. His face had lines that James wouldn't have for at least another ten years, or at least he hoped not.

James stood up as he studied the Other Him.

"Where am I?" He asked as he looked around. He also looked at the versions of him that stood behind the central one. "What the fuck is going on?"

"Long story there." The central HIM said. "No time. It's coming."

"What?" James asked. "What's coming."

"The catalyst." HE said as if that was an explanation. "The one that determines which path you go down."

The James that was to the right of, and behind, the speaker muttered something that James couldn't hear.

"Path? What? What catalyst?" James asked. "What are you talking about? What the fuck is that?" He asked, pointing at the hunched over, deformed, version of them both.

"You're at the camp. The FOB right?" Central him asked. "That's when this happened. You're doing the right thing. But it's a distraction. It's the BIIIIG players keeping you away from your job. YOUR ACTUAL JOB!"

He used his hands to emphasize the word 'Big' as he said it. "Right now we're taking advantage of a little loophole to warn you."

James tried to reach out and grab the older, twisted, version of himself by the shoulders. To get the alien reflection to elaborate.

But his hands went through the image like it was made of fog.

"Don't bother." It chided him. "Can't DIRECTLY contact past selves. Movie style rules. You know that."

"THEN TELL ME WHAT YOU MEAN!" He demanded. "What's happening?"

All three of the images of him looked around as the strange lights around them flared brighter and swirled faster.

"Too late." HE said. "You have to make a choice. It's about to happen."

"What's about to happen?" James asked for the millionth time.

"Choose life." The one to the left, who hadn't spoken and seemed the most like James, said with a soft smile. "It'll be okay."

"Kill." Said the one to the right, though it didn't turn to look at any of them.

"Angels and devils kid." Central HIM said. "No REAL right answer. But you have to save him."

"Save who?"

"And then you have to go back to your real job. The reason you were brought here in the first place." They answered, but the voice got quieter with each word, as if it's volume knob was being gradually turned down.

"SAVE WHO?" He demanded. "WHAT IS HAPPENING!?!?"

He couldn't hear them as all three of them spoke, even the right one turning so he could see its scarred, one eyed, hateful face.

But he saw the word, the name, they said.

>!"Jojo."!<

James felt his heart seize up at the idea that this "Warning" somehow involved his little brother.

Then the lights around him flared so bright that they made his eyes(?) hurt.

\----------

Pain erupted across James's mind as his ACTUAL eyes fluttered open. One of them didn't want to open the whole way, and that side of his vision was half-veiled in darkness.

Someone was slapping his cheek. The slaps sent cascades of pain across his face.

"JAMES!" Amina's voice said, though it was horse and broken by ragged breaths. "JAMES WAKE UP!"

"Amina?" He said weakly. "Wha-.... where?"

Then he saw her and he attempted to sit upright. But every muscle in his body screamed at him for even attempting it.

Amina was matted in drying blood and sand. Her armor was riddled with holes from bullets, and even a few jagged lines where ricochets or blades had rent it open.

"Amina? What happened?" He turned his head a bit and saw the Muck Marcher next to him as they lay among the mangled ruins of one of the camp tents. The Muck Marcher was laying with its limbs at odd angles, and its face plate was cracked. "Are you okay?"

Amina took a deep ragged breath and practically coughed out her answer. "No." She grunted. "Not really. But I'll live... I think." She grabbed the front of his vest and braced herself. "Take a deep breath." She instructed him.

"What? Why?" He asked.

"Just do it. Trust me dear." She said as blood dripped from her nose.

James took a deep, exaggerated, inhale as if he was at the doctor's office.

At the apex of his breath Amina jerked him upright and James felt something moved in his chest, just under the ribs. He felt things shift around it as it was removed from his body.

"AAAAAAAGH!!!" He screamed as he clamped his hands, which had pain induced strength, on her shoulder and waist.

"I'm sorry." She said into his ear as she moved something from underneath him with a loud clanking noise, and lowered him back down.

"Was I impaled?" James asked in disbelief. Amina nodded against him. James took quick, short breaths. "Fuck." He said softly. "Shoulda left it in." He said as she lowered his head. "Medical classes later. If I live that long. Fuck."

"We can't stay here." She said. "We need to get back to the castle and to the healers. Before I can't move."

"What happened to you?" He asked. "Are you shot? You look shot. A lot.... Rhymes." He said in between breaths.

"They fired one of those thermo-berry rounds at us." She said as she pressed her forhead against his. James's eyes widened, at the realization that that was what the Miffy had fired. "I went a bit crazy because of it. Lead the survivors on a charge. Don't know how much I have left in me." She said as she lifted herself to a knee and grabbed the top and bottom of his vest.

James reeled at the idea of CHARGING the base.

"Amina. You said "get back to the castle'. What do you mean? That's weeks away." He asked.

"Veliry is here." She answered as she grunted and lifted him up into a fireman's carry. He'd have told her it was a bad idea, medically speaking, but he had more pressing concerns. "Said she had a shortcut. Brought more mages."

"Veliry?" He wondered. "She didn't bring my brother did she?" He asked.

"Joey?" She wondered in return. "No. At least I can't imagine she did. He must be back at the castle. Why?"

"Just wondering. Weird dream while I was unconscious."

Then, as Amina turned and began trudging slowly towards where the Petravian troops were still streaming over the walls, they saw Veliry.

She was glowing like a star above the dunes, her hands held up above her.

Then the sky above her erupted in an explosion that James recognized from outside the walls of Jadesport, though it was smaller than those.

"Holy fuck." He said as he saw the display around Amina's side.

"Veliry." Amina said.

The flame and devastation of the thermobaric mortar round slammed into an invisible wall above Veliry like a sci-fi, space movie, force field. Veliry dropped a few feet lower from the impact, but then began glowing brighter as the fire above the shield intensified.

From where they were, none of them knew what had actually just happened. But everyone, even the Earth soldiers who weren't well acquainted with magic, felt the power being wielded there. Everyone in the base stopped fighting for a moment to watch in awe at the small mage.

And the catalyst that James had been warned about, began.

\----------

Here it comes. Veliry thought. If it's like the others, it'll detonate roughly one hundred feet above the ground. Create the feedback loop with its own heat and pressure energy. Use it's own power to fuel the shield against it.

She felt the energy from the mages below flowing into her, actively now that some of the older mages had joined the group, and she put that into the shield too.

Unbreakable. She thought. Like a mountain against a wildfire. Unmoved. Unbroken. Eternal in its silent power.

Then the projectile, only a few feet long and maybe six inches wide, got to where she'd estimated it would go off.

She watched, in the same slow motion that she'd taught James to imbue upon himself, as it separated into four pieces with a pop.

Then a light so bright that she had to close those eyes shone out.

Fire, like nothing she would ever wield, like a fire elemental's core, burst out in a ring as the air inside expanded so rapidly she couldn't have seen it if her eyes had been open.

It hit the shield and she felt the raw strength of it and knew that it would break her.

She began to siphon off of that very strength, feeling the sudden wild intensification of the heat energy before her and using it.

UNBREAKABLE!

Her shield strengthened.

STRONGER.....THAN.....ITS OWN..... ATTACKER!!!!

Something below her made a pop noise that she couldn't hear so close to the explosion.

Something impacted her at the side of her stomach and punched through her and out the other side, just to the left of her belly button.

She felt a cold pain in her that temporarily distracted her.

She dropped several feet and felt the shield almost drop.

NO! She thought. No, demanded, of her mind. NOPE! NOT ALLOWED. SHIELD NOW! THIS SHIELD WILL HOLD!

She gritted her teeth as she made a point of ignoring the cold spreading through her legs. She forced some of the energy flowing through her to her legs, keeping her aloft through the glowing tattoos there, even as she felt those same legs growing cold and numb.

UN.....BREAKABLE!

Then she felt the heat and pressure of the explosion soften, dissipating ever so slightly, and knew that the explosion was over. It had only been about five seconds. But the other explosions hadn't been very long either. And they hadn't been used against themselves like this one had.

"Fancy Earth weapons are nothing...." She said as she slowly reduced the energy going to the shield. "Compared.... to an Arch-Mage." She said as she felt herself shudder. "THE ARCH-MAGE!" She exclaimed in triumphant victory.

Then she began to fall.

\-------------------------

From where he was bundled up, Driscoll watched with a smile as the little redhead began to falter, then fall.

He was surprised she'd held on as long as she had after taking the shot from Doc's pistol. He'd commend her if she weren't his enemy, and about to die.

He was a little annoyed as he saw several Petravian soldiers rush over to the downed suit and begin hacking and smashing at it with their stupid medieval weapons. But he also couldn't blame them.

Instead he began looking for other suits to use the new weapon on.

His smile turned to a scowl as he noticed that Rodriguez's suit was reading total destruction.

"How the fuck?" He asked as he began looking at the recording of what had happened.

"FUCKING CHOI!" He yelled into the silence of his helmet.

\--------------------

Joey didn't see Veliry's herculean effort. He was still curled into a ball with his hands over his ears.

But he felt the crescendo of energy she had built around herself as she'd readied the shield. After months of learning and training under her that energy was as familiar to him as the sound of his brother's voice, or the smell of his mother's cooking. He recognized who it was just by the way it felt as it pulled from everything around the battlefield.

He wondered, even as he was having his melt down, what she could possible need all that energy for. But he was also smart, and realized that she must have been trying to stop the next attack. Probably a shield.

Reroute all powers to shields. He thought, and the thought actually helped calm him a bit.

Then the explosion had occurred and even as it had overwhelmed the small bit of relief Joey had found in his own joke, he felt Veliry's power reach an insane peak.

Then... he felt that power jolt.

In his mind it was like a car hitting a pothole at highway speed. The sudden interruption not stopping what was happening, but definitely causing everything to stutter for just a moment.

Then he felt the power build up again, even higher now, as the roar of the thermobaric weapon reached its apex.

Then he felt all of the energy diminish. The roar began to quiet, and Joey felt Veliry's energy weaken, slowly lowering to match the reducing destructive power of the bomb.

As Joey reached out with his magical senses, training them even as he used them to try to distract himself from his own sensory overload. Focusing on the magic to aim his mind away from its own self destructive tendency to freak out.

He felt the energy disappear almost entirely.

One second he felt his teacher, high in the sky and triumphantly empowered.

The next second it was as though she'd fallen off a cliff, and her voice was trailing away like a cartoon.

Joey scrambled the few feet up to the top of the, almost blasted away now, dune.

He got there just in time to see her drop below his eye level.

His eyes widened and his hands dropped from his ears and down to the sand as they scrambled to get him to his feet, his own fears and confusion completely obliterated by the newfound fear he felt.

No. He thought. NOOOOOO!!!!

A loud thunderclap sounded as the sand where he'd been exploded in a plume.

And, without really thinking, Joseph Choi began to move like one of his favorite, crimson colored, comic book heroes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ypyknh/wait_is_this_just_gate_257/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (255/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Mr. Torgue would love this chapter.

Enjoy.

\~

Veliry picked herself up from the desert floor with a groan of pain.

Around her, other Petravian soldiers were shaking dust off of themselves and helping each other up. Others were looking around for their weapons or shields, or staggering toward the still noisy base that they had previously been besieging.

The gunfire they heard from inside the camp was no longer aimed at them, only occasionally striking them, seemingly at random. Instead they heard screams of rage, and desperate bursts of fire from Earth soldiers who were now fighting in close quarters with their own people.

But they all cringed and began scrambling when they heard the sound of whatever weapon had just struck their army for a second time now. None of them wanted to be in the open when it impacted this time. Some soldiers scrambled into the crater of the previous attack, burning their hands and feet on the hot sand and ash of their incinerated and pulverized comrades in a hope that the enemy wouldn't target the same area a second time.

Veliry shook the sand from her hair.

Her skin felt raw and burned, as though she'd spent too long in the sun, or had one of her experiments go wrong and explode in her face. Her ears rang, and her left one burned where the armored warrior had ripped nearly two thirds of it off while they'd been fighting.

Still, she knew what the sound of the projectile meant, and as she looked around she realized that she was the only one in the now scattered formation that could do anything about it.

"You there!" She yelled at one of the army mages nearby. The man was searching the ground around him and didn't pay her any heed at first. "Royal mage! Third circle!" She demanded. He looked over at her. "I need your help!"

The mage shook his head. "We need to run ma'am." He said as he continued to feel around the sand. Veliry grabbed one of the soldiers and got his attention. "Another one is coming." The mage added.

"Round up mages." She told the soldier. "Now!" The young Sergeant nodded, though she could see the fear in his eyes. Then she turned back to the mage. "No. If we run more people die." She said. She saw him turning to run away, ignoring her. She blurred over to his position and grabbed him by the hood of his robes. She spun him around and he beheld her rage. Her eyes glowed, red on the left and blue on the right, her hand emitted sparks of building deathbolts. "We fight." She said in a tone that would have made Amina listen if she'd heard it.

The mage cowed and raised his hands while nodding emphatically.

"You don't have to do anything." She said. "Just draw in energy. I'll do the rest. Tell the other mages to do the same." The mage kept nodding, but she saw the doubt there. "If I find you've run, you'll end up answering to me MAGE!" She spat with vicious venom.

Then Veliry began floating upwards, energy building into her as she began summoning a shield above the portion of army that was still left around her.

She reached into a pouch on her belt and withdrew a pouch that she'd made years earlier while still a student. It was an act of desperation, and she'd pay the price after, but it was also a necessity.

She placed the pouch into her cheek and began sucking on the mixture of alchemical components inside, channeling energy through the pouch as she did.

The glow surrounding her body intensified until she became difficult to look at for the people below.

Use the trick James told you about. Even the prince confirmed that it would work. You just have to do it fast.

With her enhanced vision she saw the small, almost arrow-shaped, projectile descending from on high. It was headed almost directly for her and she adjusted to get beneath it.

She felt the building energy of the mages below her, she thought maybe three or four of them now, and she began to draw from it.

More!

And only a little over a little over a quarter of a mile away, trembling in fear and confusion for his teacher, Joey watched the small arch-mage rise to the challenge.

But so did someone else. And they were not worried for the mage, but rather worried about the threat she clearly was to their side of things.

Down on the sand below, a metallic hand reached out to grab at something.

\---

James watched Amina rage against the two Muck Marchers as he staggered forward.

He'd tried to draw a bead on them with the stolen rifle once he'd seen what was happening. But his vision blurred in and out of focus, and he saw it darkening around its edges.

Whatever had happened to him had concussed him about as badly as he'd ever been before. And he was pretty sure that the wet spot on his back was him losing blood too.

So he'd closed the distance.

James was all but oblivious to the carnage roiling around him as he moved.

Several times soldiers from Earth had attempted to fire on him, only for his sword to lash out and stop the bullets in their tracks. James only had to keep the chain in the air for it to do its job.

At one point a Petravian mage had mistaken him for one of the base soldiers, understandable given his clothes and the rifle, and had shot a blast of ethereal green mist at him, only for the blade to intercept that too. It drank the magical energy like it had before its reforging, only afterwords it had glowed with the same green light as the spell, and it had shaken erratically for a moment before moving on to its next target. Not that James saw. But the mage had, and they had realized that he must have been from this world and moved on.

"Amina." He said weakly, though he couldn't even hear himself talk over the ringing in his ears.

He was only twenty yards away when the third of the Muck Marchers finally seemed to come alive, moving from its statue position and raising its rifle to aim at his fiance.

Like so many times before, James didn't think. He couldn't have if he wanted to. He was in too much pain, and things were moving too fast, now that he couldn't slow them down.

The explosion he released was like none he'd ever summoned before.

Before, they had always come from his feet, and occasionally his hands. He figured he could probably do it from his mouth too, like he could with the deathbolts. He'd also considered releasing one from his butt as a gag a few times, but he'd never been willing to risk it.

But when James saw the third Muck Marcher aim at Amina, who was already hard pressed against the other two, he reacted on split second reflex.

The resulting explosion emanated from his entire backside. From the top of his head to the soles of his already tattered boots.

His wolf arm instinctively put itself in front of his face and shoulders, and the sword and chain pressed themselves into a coil over it, though he didn't CONSCIOUSLY tell them to.

His upper body, wolf arm first, collided with the armored sentinel like a professional linebacker who could move near MACH1.

Pain exploded across his entire existence as he and the Muck Marcher crashed into the tent that they'd been guarding in another mess of canvas and steel, and in this case the control systems for all the Miffy's around the base, destroying them in a flash of violence that resulted in five deaths, as James and the Muck Marcher's armored body crushed everything before them.

And as Amina finally managed to score a crippling blow against one of her opponents, a stab of her sword through the weak point at the back of their knee, James slipped from consciousness.

\----------

Johansson looked at the carnage that had just entered his tent, and destroyed the only thing he was responsible for in the process, with fear and confusion.

He'd been spooling up another mortar shot when the computer panel in front of him had exploded from the impact of some massive, chain wrapped, bloody, tangle of bodies. It happened so quickly and so violently that the knob he'd been holding onto to adjust his targeting solution was still in his hand, despite no longer being attached to the computer it belonged to.

There was blood, and bits of....hair, splattered across the right leg of his uniform. He dropped the control knob if surprised disgust as he recognized the hair as belonging to Airmen Ridena, who's seat was only a row behind and to the right of him. Or had been, anyways.

He'd heard the gunfire outside. Heard the screams and the strange noises.

But they'd had three Muck Marchers just outside of their tent. There was no way the locals could have gotten in. And they were in the middle of the FOB, surrounded by armed soldiers.

How had this just happened.

He jolted back out of his seat as he realized the implications.

The tent was breached. The controls were destroyed.

They had no air defenses, and the mortar was down. They'd only be able to use them if they sent people to man them at the vehicles. And he was one of only five people trained to do so.

Ridena had been one of the others.

He looked around the room at the devastation that had just occurred. He couldn't even see past the section of tent that had been crushed.

But there was blood oozing out from under it.

Something buzzed and crackled from one of the terminals nearby.

"Come i-Bzzzt- Repe-SSSSS- ll Earth tr-* come in." The familiar voice of the First Sergeant said, though it cut in and out and was almost drown out by the sound of the battle outside, which now made its way into the tent easily. "Repeat Sta-ZZZT- STAND DOWN!"

What? He wondered. What did he say?

"All Earth troops. -ZZZZZZT- down. Stand down now!"

Did we lose? He wondered. But I just fired the mortar again.

Then the side of the tent flew open as a sword slashed its way through it.

A tall, blood soaked and crazed looking woman in armor stepped through like some kind of nightmarish super model. Her armor was riddled with bullet holes, so many that he wondered how she was even alive. Her face was glowing several different colors that didn't make sense to Johansson, who'd never seen magic before.

When she spoke his ears ached from the volume.

"JAAAAMES!"

She yelled as she stalked toward him, sword aimed at him like a pointing finger. Johansson stumbled back and fell back into his chair.

"WHERE'S JAMES!?!"

Johansson felt his pants grow warm and wet as he stammered. "I don't know!" With his hands raised.

\----------

Vickers pulled himself into the passenger side of the central Miffy's cabin with an audible groan of pain. He stopped with his left knee resting on the floor for a moment as he gingerly pulled his right leg up into the cabin with him. His knee had been thoroughly dislocated when he'd woken up, and it was swollen to almost twice its normal size now.

He'd been surprised to wake up. After all, he hadn't really had an exit strategy for hitting the Muck Marcher with the C4. He'd mostly done what Choi would have, and reacted without thinking. It happened like that in combat sometimes.

Then Choi had pulled his ass out of the fire at literally the last second.

He'd have to buy the kid a beer or something.

Then he'd woken up underneath a tent, and underneath a chow hall table covered in what he thought was spaghetti sauce. At least he hoped it was, it smelled like it anyways.

When he'd finally extricated himself from the mess, aching the whole way after realizing how badly he'd been twisted and folded to get there, he'd found himself oddly alone.

He'd also seen a clear path to the Miffy that had been his target in the first place.

It had taken him a long time of limping slowly to get here. Well, probably not really. But it had felt like ages. His body had ached the whole way, his knee most of all.

The Miffy had been on the verge of firing as he'd gotten close to it. He'd seen the barrel change its position, albeit minutely. Then he'd heard the telltale charging of its magnetic coils as it prepared to fire.

He'd braced himself for the inevitable noise, planting his hands over his ears to help the plugs that were already in them.

Then, after waiting for what felt like at least a minute, nothing happened.

He'd wondered at that. But he wasn't one to look gift horses in the mouth. Especially not when the horse already had a tendency to bite in the first place.

He grunted and swore as he pulled himself up into the field gunner's seat and sighed as he was able to straighten his much abused leg.

Then he pulled down the screen that hung from the top of the cabin and flipped on the display.

"Time to even things out a bit." He said as he pulled up the targeting map. He slid the map over to where he saw the cluster of defensive Miffy's. "Spiders? No spiders? C4 or no C4." He said as he initiated the mortar's chargin phase.

It took about five seconds for it to turn to aim at the new target. Another fifteen or so for the coils to charge.

"Fuck." He said as he flipped the red cover of the firing panel.

"Your." He continued as he waited for the panel to read READY.

"Self." He said as he pressed his good hand on the big green button.

And the Miffy roared again.

Then Vickers went back to the map and looked at the "NO TARGET" zones that it had listed.

"They really need to lock these things if they're not in them." He said as he scrolled through the options. "Grade-A.... Tactical.... Fuck up."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yoyq6q/wait_is_this_just_gate_256/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (255/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Mr. Torgue would love this chapter.

Enjoy.

\~

Veliry picked herself up from the desert floor with a groan of pain.

Around her, other Petravian soldiers were shaking dust off of themselves and helping each other up. Others were looking around for their weapons or shields, or staggering toward the still noisy base that they had previously been besieging.

The gunfire they heard from inside the camp was no longer aimed at them, only occasionally striking them, seemingly at random. Instead they heard screams of rage, and desperate bursts of fire from Earth soldiers who were now fighting in close quarters with their own people.

But they all cringed and began scrambling when they heard the sound of whatever weapon had just struck their army for a second time now. None of them wanted to be in the open when it impacted this time. Some soldiers scrambled into the crater of the previous attack, burning their hands and feet on the hot sand and ash of their incinerated and pulverized comrades in a hope that the enemy wouldn't target the same area a second time.

Veliry shook the sand from her hair.

Her skin felt raw and burned, as though she'd spent too long in the sun, or had one of her experiments go wrong and explode in her face. Her ears rang, and her left one burned where the armored warrior had ripped nearly two thirds of it off while they'd been fighting.

Still, she knew what the sound of the projectile meant, and as she looked around she realized that she was the only one in the now scattered formation that could do anything about it.

"You there!" She yelled at one of the army mages nearby. The man was searching the ground around him and didn't pay her any heed at first. "Royal mage! Third circle!" She demanded. He looked over at her. "I need your help!"

The mage shook his head. "We need to run ma'am." He said as he continued to feel around the sand. Veliry grabbed one of the soldiers and got his attention. "Another one is coming." The mage added.

"Round up mages." She told the soldier. "Now!" The young Sergeant nodded, though she could see the fear in his eyes. Then she turned back to the mage. "No. If we run more people die." She said. She saw him turning to run away, ignoring her. She blurred over to his position and grabbed him by the hood of his robes. She spun him around and he beheld her rage. Her eyes glowed, red on the left and blue on the right, her hand emitted sparks of building deathbolts. "We fight." She said in a tone that would have made Amina listen if she'd heard it.

The mage cowed and raised his hands while nodding emphatically.

"You don't have to do anything." She said. "Just draw in energy. I'll do the rest. Tell the other mages to do the same." The mage kept nodding, but she saw the doubt there. "If I find you've run, you'll end up answering to me MAGE!" She spat with vicious venom.

Then Veliry began floating upwards, energy building into her as she began summoning a shield above the portion of army that was still left around her.

She reached into a pouch on her belt and withdrew a pouch that she'd made years earlier while still a student. It was an act of desperation, and she'd pay the price after, but it was also a necessity.

She placed the pouch into her cheek and began sucking on the mixture of alchemical components inside, channeling energy through the pouch as she did.

The glow surrounding her body intensified until she became difficult to look at for the people below.

Use the trick James told you about. Even the prince confirmed that it would work. You just have to do it fast.

With her enhanced vision she saw the small, almost arrow-shaped, projectile descending from on high. It was headed almost directly for her and she adjusted to get beneath it.

She felt the building energy of the mages below her, she thought maybe three or four of them now, and she began to draw from it.

More!

And only a little over a little over a quarter of a mile away, trembling in fear and confusion for his teacher, Joey watched the small arch-mage rise to the challenge.

But so did someone else. And they were not worried for the mage, but rather worried about the threat she clearly was to their side of things.

Down on the sand below, a metallic hand reached out to grab at something.

\---------------------------

James watched Amina rage against the two Muck Marchers as he staggered forward.

He'd tried to draw a bead on them with the stolen rifle once he'd seen what was happening. But his vision blurred in and out of focus, and he saw it darkening around its edges.

Whatever had happened to him had concussed him about as badly as he'd ever been before. And he was pretty sure that the wet spot on his back was him losing blood too.

So he'd closed the distance.

James was all but oblivious to the carnage roiling around him as he moved.

Several times soldiers from Earth had attempted to fire on him, only for his sword to lash out and stop the bullets in their tracks. James only had to keep the chain in the air for it to do its job.

At one point a Petravian mage had mistaken him for one of the base soldiers, understandable given his clothes and the rifle, and had shot a blast of ethereal green mist at him, only for the blade to intercept that too. It drank the magical energy like it had before its reforging, only afterwords it had glowed with the same green light as the spell, and it had shaken erratically for a moment before moving on to its next target. Not that James saw. But the mage had, and they had realized that he must have been from this world and moved on.

"Amina." He said weakly, though he couldn't even hear himself talk over the ringing in his ears.

He was only twenty yards away when the third of the Muck Marchers finally seemed to come alive, moving from its statue position and raising its rifle to aim at his fiance.

Like so many times before, James didn't think. He couldn't have if he wanted to. He was in too much pain, and things were moving too fast, now that he couldn't slow them down.

The explosion he released was like none he'd ever summoned before.

Before, they had always come from his feet, and occasionally his hands. He figured he could probably do it from his mouth too, like he could with the deathbolts. He'd also considered releasing one from his butt as a gag a few times, but he'd never been willing to risk it.

But when James saw the third Muck Marcher aim at Amina, who was already hard pressed against the other two, he reacted on split second reflex.

The resulting explosion emanated from his entire backside. From the top of his head to the soles of his already tattered boots.

His wolf arm instinctively put itself in front of his face and shoulders, and the sword and chain pressed themselves into a coil over it, though he didn't CONSCIOUSLY tell them to.

His upper body, wolf arm first, collided with the armored sentinel like a professional linebacker who could move near MACH1.

Pain exploded across his entire existence as he and the Muck Marcher crashed into the tent that they'd been guarding in another mess of canvas and steel, and in this case the control systems for all the Miffy's around the base, destroying them in a flash of violence that resulted in five deaths, as James and the Muck Marcher's armored body crushed everything before them.

And as Amina finally managed to score a crippling blow against one of her opponents, a stab of her sword through the weak point at the back of their knee, James slipped from consciousness.

\----------

Johansson looked at the carnage that had just entered his tent, and destroyed the only thing he was responsible for in the process, with fear and confusion.

He'd been spooling up another mortar shot when the computer panel in front of him had exploded from the impact of some massive, chain wrapped, bloody, tangle of bodies. It happened so quickly and so violently that the knob he'd been holding onto to adjust his targeting solution was still in his hand, despite no longer being attached to the computer it belonged to.

There was blood, and bits of....hair, splattered across the right leg of his uniform. He dropped the control knob in surprised disgust as he recognized the hair as belonging to Airmen Ridena, whose seat was only a row behind and to the right of him. Or had been, anyways.

He'd heard the gunfire outside. Heard the screams and the strange noises.

But they'd had three Muck Marchers just outside of their tent. There was no way the locals could have gotten in. And they were in the middle of the FOB, surrounded by armed soldiers.

How had this just happened.

He jolted back out of his seat as he realized the implications.

The tent was breached. The controls were destroyed.

They had no air defenses, and the mortar was down. They'd only be able to use them if they sent people to man them at the vehicles. And he was one of only five people trained to do so.

Ridena had been one of the others.

He looked around the room at the devastation that had just occurred. He couldn't even see past the section of tent that had been crushed.

But there was blood oozing out from under it.

Something buzzed and crackled from one of the terminals nearby.

"Come i-Bzzzt- Repe-SSSSS- ll Earth tr-* come in." The familiar voice of the First Sergeant said, though it cut in and out and was almost drown out by the sound of the battle outside, which now made its way into the tent easily. "Repeat Sta-ZZZT- STAND DOWN!"

What? He wondered. What did he say?

"All Earth troops. -ZZZZZZT- down. Stand down now!"

Did we lose? He wondered. But I just fired the mortar again.

Then the side of the tent flew open as a sword slashed its way through it.

A tall, blood soaked and crazed looking woman in armor stepped through like some kind of nightmarish super model. Her armor was riddled with bullet holes, so many that he wondered how she was even alive. Her face was glowing several different colors that didn't make sense to Johansson, who'd never seen magic before.

When she spoke his ears ached from the volume.

"JAAAAMES!"

She yelled as she stalked toward him, sword aimed at him like a pointing finger. Johansson stumbled back and fell back into his chair.

"WHERE'S JAMES!?!"

Johansson felt his pants grow warm and wet as he stammered. "I don't know!" With his hands raised.

\----------

Vickers pulled himself into the passenger side of the central Miffy's cabin with an audible groan of pain. He stopped with his left knee resting on the floor for a moment as he gingerly pulled his right leg up into the cabin with him. His knee had been thoroughly dislocated when he'd woken up, and it was swollen to almost twice its normal size now.

He'd been surprised to wake up. After all, he hadn't really had an exit strategy for hitting the Muck Marcher with the C4. He'd mostly done what Choi would have, and reacted without thinking. It happened like that in combat sometimes.

Then Choi had pulled his ass out of the fire at literally the last second.

He'd have to buy the kid a beer or something.

Then he'd woken up underneath a tent, and underneath a chow hall table covered in what he thought was spaghetti sauce. At least he hoped it was, it smelled like it anyways.

When he'd finally extricated himself from the mess, aching the whole way after realizing how badly he'd been twisted and folded to get there, he'd found himself oddly alone.

He'd also seen a clear path to the Miffy that had been his target in the first place.

It had taken him a long time of limping slowly to get here. Well, probably not really. But it had felt like ages. His body had ached the whole way, his knee most of all.

The Miffy had been on the verge of firing as he'd gotten close to it. He'd seen the barrel change its position, albeit minutely. Then he'd heard the telltale charging of its magnetic coils as it prepared to fire.

He'd braced himself for the inevitable noise, planting his hands over his ears to help the plugs that were already in them.

Then, after waiting for what felt like at least a minute, nothing happened.

He'd wondered at that. But he wasn't one to look gift horses in the mouth. Especially not when the horse already had a tendency to bite in the first place.

He grunted and swore as he pulled himself up into the field gunner's seat and sighed as he was able to straighten his much abused leg.

Then he pulled down the screen that hung from the top of the cabin and flipped on the display.

"Time to even things out a bit." He said as he pulled up the targeting map. He slid the map over to where he saw the cluster of defensive Miffy's. "Spiders? No spiders? C4 or no C4." He said as he initiated the mortar's charging phase.

It took about five seconds for it to turn to aim at the new target. Another fifteen or so for the coils to charge.

"Fuck." He said as he flipped the red cover of the firing panel.

"Your." He continued as he waited for the panel to read READY.

"Self." He said as he pressed his good hand on the big green button.

And the Miffy roared again.

Then Vickers went back to the map and looked at the "NO TARGET" zones that it had listed.

"They really need to lock these things if they're not in them." He said as he scrolled through the options. "Grade-A.... Tactical.... Fuck up."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yoyklc/wait_is_this_just_gate_256/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (254/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Anger can be a really good motivator for some people.

\~\~\~

When Gixelle entered the state of mind she needed for battle, she envisioned herself as an unstoppable killing machine. A warrior, and a living weapon, incapable of being stopped by anything short of utter destruction.

This focus, this self image that she'd crafted as her warrior persona, unbeknownst to her, had utilized her magical energy in a way wholly unlike anything a mage like Veliry or Marcos could have ever imagines. And that was why they never had.

But in the moments after witnessing well over one hundred of her soldiers being annihilated by one of the Earth weapons in mere seconds, General, and Princess, Amina Petravius, of mindless rage and aggression that made all physical weakness cease to exist in her mind. And because magic is, at its basest level, a case of mind over matter; those weaknesses ceased to exist in the real world.

As the soldiers in the enemy camp opened fire upon her dazed, traumatized army, Amina charged at them. Shield raised in front of her and moving in a blur, sword at her side. She bellowed a scream of primal fury that made ears bleed as she unconsciously used her voice of command. It was a scream of anger, vengeance, and fear inducing mania.

Bullets punctured the steel and leather of her armor as easily as they ever had, but stopped as they embedded themselves in flesh that had magically hardened itself, causing the already slowed bullets to only barely penetrate her skin.

Despite her previously injured leg she moved toward the base at a sprint that would have shamed any Olympian athlete on Earth. Her strides carried her yards at a time and when she reached the enemy battlement she cleared it in a single leap, her sword flashing out to remove the heads of the two soldiers nearest to her as she did and her shield sending another flying.

Her landing was no thing of grace as she crashed into the sand on the other side and slammed into a soldier who had been carrying a box of ammo to the front line for his comrades. She toppled the young man and sprawled across him in the confusion. She never gave him time to recover, as her helmeted head slammed into his hard enough to crush his skull and splatter his blood and brains across the sand.

Bullets clanged and rang off of her shield and dug into the meat of her arm and ribs and legs as she scrambled to her feet and charged at the confused, frightened, men and women around her. Those men and women wearing uniforms nearly identical to the one her fiance had arrived in this world wearing.

She felt a note of pride as she saw some of her own warriors, their soot stained, sand and blood caked armor showing hints of crimson and gold trim as they charged recklessly and with fury through and over the enemy battlements. She saw, with the same enhanced vision that James used so well, dozens of them cut down by rounds of the Earth weapons.

But she also saw them, the wolves, the orcs, the humans, the occasional dwarf or other kinds of people that comprised HER people, tearing into the ranks of the Earth soldiers with a rage that almost matched her own.

As she spun, blade trailing blood as it left the waist of a now bifurcated riflemen, she felt a hammer blow to the back of her head and her helmet was ripped off of her by force. Hot, magically rich, blood streamed down the back of her neck as she staggered forward. But her consciousness never so much as wavered from the blow that would have killed a normal human. That would have killed any Earth born human.

Her left arm, her shield arm, twisted in a contortion that would have sent pain screaming through her under normal circumstances. Two more hammer blows were intercepted by it as it prevented any further shots from finding her. She reengaged the spin to get eyes on the assailant, only to see a massive, armored were-folk with the head of a lion lift the person up and rip their arm from its socket, sending their rifle spinning to the ground.

Then she saw a trio of the armored Muck Marchers standing near a tent and firing into her ranks of berserk soldiers. They stood near the entrance to a tent that looked to be full of machinery and computers that looked a lot like the Communication Array back at the castle.

She heard the sound of the Miffy firing its cannon again, though she still didn't know what that meant. But she did know that the sound had preceded the death of an portion of her army.

She didn't know what that tent held. But if it had three of the armored combatants defending it, then she was willing to bet that it was important.

She charged them, ignoring the rounds that all three of them began to fire at her as she raised her shield in front of her. She was too enraged to notice that one of the bullets punched a small, startlingly neat, hole in the edge of her shield as she did. It made no difference to her right now anyways.

She screamed again, voice of command still active, as she charged the alien defenders.

\---

James emerged from the mangled, tangled, wreck of the tent in a daze as he crawled over the twisted and bent metal and torn green canvas. A hand landing in something that looked like poor quality chili made him think it might have been the mess hall for the base. He licked some of the chili off his hand, oblivious to the grit of the sand in it, before moving on.

He didn't know where Vickers was. Or if he was even alive. Hell, he didn't know how HE was alive. They'd only been a few paces away when a brick of C4 had detonated. The fact that they weren't red jelly on the sand was nothing short of a miracle.

Everything hurt.

His head felt like someone had used it as a drum at a heavy metal concert.

His ears rang.

Every joint felt like it had been forced to do a full 360 degree spin, then told to go back the opposite direction to undo it.

Something burned in his back, and the area around it felt warm and wet. But when he tried to inspect it his vest made something there sing with fiery pain.

Even his eyes hurt, and when he tried to focus he found that he couldn't get things to slow down. He wondered, albeit slowly and as if through a haze, if a mirror would show black veins formed around them. Maybe even ON them.

But as he found the handle for his chain, he remembered that that was a problem for later.

He stood up, staggering for a minute as he did, and looked around.

Something nearby made a whining noise that his newly enhanced tinnitus matched almost perfectly. Then there was a loud bang that might have deafened him under normal circumstances. But as it was he was already pretty deaf, so it mostly just made his head throb.

Someone in an Army uniform, and full battle rattle, ran up to him and grabbed his shoulder.

>!"ARE YOU ALRIGHT!"!< He saw them mouth, though the ringing made it inaudible.

"WHAT?" He asked, yelling without even realizing it.

>!"I SAID; ARE YOU ALRIGHT?"!< They repeated.

James looked down at himself. His clothes were blackened and covered in a mixture of blood and sand. He realized, once again through a haze, that other than his boots, which were mostly destroyed anyways, and his chain, he was basically wearing the same thing the soldier was.

He wobbled as he looked back up at them. He shook his head.

"NOPE!" He said.

The soldier turned and tried to pull him along with them. "COME ON!" They said as they did, unaware of who he was. >!"IT'S NOT SAFE HERE! LET'S GET YOU TO THE MED BOX!"!<

James resisted, albeit weakly, and when the soldier turned to look at him he made his move.

"SORRY!" He yelled as he slammed his fist into their jaw. He felt the jaw break beneath his knuckles as the soldier fell limply to the sand.

James fell to his knees and threw up into the sand near the soldier's boots. Then clambered over it and grabbed the rifle out of their hand. He struggled back to his feet in a daze and looked around.

"Amina?" He wondered as he saw her moving in a blur of blood and steel near one of the tents some fifty yards away.

Two Muck Marchers were dancing around her with pistols and knives as she moved between them, her sword and shield moving so fast he doubted he'd be able to keep track of them even with his magical vision.

Curiously, a third Muck Marcher stood nearby, immobile and seemingly unconcerned with the brawl occurring only feet away from them.

James began running, in a stumbling, limping, gait towards them. His chain coiled and writhed around him like a rattlesnake readying to strike.

He had to help Amina.

\----------

Kai emerged from the sands with a scream as he clawed at the desert floor, and the spiders and webbing coating it with a hand that was still raw and scorched.

Even as he moved his spiders were working furiously. Glob-spitters sprayed him down with their gelatinous masses of numbing venom that would typically be used to keep their pray docile as they fed.

His weavers moved rapidly across him, following shortly behind the carrion carriers that were cleaning his flesh of its burned and weeping excess. The weavers replaced the lost tissue with thread so fine and so durable that it might as well have been armor in its own right.

But it wasn't the right color, and he watched in agony as his once deep purple, bordering on midnight black, skin was replaced with a sheen of shimmering silver thread.

His eyes. His TRUE, natural born, eyes were gone, burned away by the flames of the armored attacker that savaged him with its flames.

All that was left were the gemstone eyes of his princely mantle. The ones that allowed him to peer through the eyes of his horde. And he knew that they would be the only eyes he would know for the rest of his life, however long it may be.

What they showed him made little sense as his horde once more scattered and spread across the desert battlefield.

The position he'd been in when he'd been burned was little more than a crater now, some devastation having destroyed everything that had been there. Even now his spiders had to move around it as the heat of the sand there, some of which was glass now, was too much for their small arachnid bodies to survive.

Still his right arm, now thoroughly coated in spider silk that had covered even his control harp, twitched and spasmed as he commanded his spider army forward. Forward past the bodies of the fallen Petravians, and over the two armored opponents, whose bodies were lying like they were entombed upon the sand. Past the walls of the enemy encampment, surprised to see the Petravian soldiers already inside it, and tearing into its occupants in a bloody rage.

Something detonated overhead, and even though his body's eyes could see nothing his head craned up to see what it was.

Then he bore witness, through the eyes of his spider horde, to what had so devastated the Petravians and created the crater.

His mind exploded with the pain of tens of thousands, no hundreds of thousands, of spiders being incinerated and crushed in the space of a single heartbeat. And his heart ached with the knowledge that yet more Petravians had been among them in the moment of their destruction.

And as his mind recovered from the sudden, unfathomable, violence he suddenly understood the rage that had driven the ranks of them on their near suicidal charge of the enemy base, the princess at their lead.

He felt that rage too.

His right arm began to flex and spasm and rise up in a clenched fist.

He felt, and saw through, the teeming masses that came from miles below him as they answered his call to battle.

He screamed from the pain of the newly recrafted flesh of his body straining against his enraged muscles as they fought to control the things he brought up from the depths of the Deep Dark.

He would show these invaders what REAL monsters looked like.

\----------

First Sergeant Nguyen listened to the battle unfold as he sat on the sand, most of his body wrapped in spider silk, and surrounded by Petravian guards.

He heard the whine and boom of the M.A.M. Miffy fire and knew what would follow. He'd been in the room when the Major, who was lying next to him only a few yards away and seething with anger, had given the order for what it would be loaded with.

He'd winced and sealed his eyes shut as he'd heard the thermobaric detonation some quarter of a mile away. He'd heard the Petravians wonder what the hell had just happened. And he had watched as one of them had climbed to the top of the dune, only to return a few moments later, with a haunted, shell-shocked look upon their face.

He'd heard the princess's scream of rage, and been surprised at its volume.

Then he'd heard the Miffy fire again.

This was never supposed to be the mission. He thought as his head hung. He numbly ignored the yelled insults and questions from the Petravian soldiers before another thermo round went off. We were just supposed to explore and gather intel. This base was supposed to be the fantasy world version of a watching post.

His mouth moved before he could think.

"Help me get my radio." He said, though it was hard to hear over the distant battle.

"What!?!?" One of the soldiers asked incredulously. "What did you say?"

Nguyen looked up at them, they had long pointed ears and a long pointed beard. They were also furious and had a spear leveled at his head.

He hung his head again.

"Help me get my radio." He said again.

"No Nguyen." The Major said from next to him.

"Shut the fuck up." He spat at her. Then he looked up at the soldiers. "Help me get my radio. I'll order my people to stand down."

"No you fuckin won't!" The Major exclaimed.

The soldiers looked back and forth between the two of them.

"Look at her." He said. "She was the one who ordered all of this. Because of someone on the other side. On Earth." He wanted to kick at her, but he knew that trying to do so would just make him fall over too. "This was NEVER supposed to be the way this went. This has all gone off the rails. Let me try to fix it."

The elf soldier pressed his spear against Nguyen's throat, and he felt a trickle of blood there.

"Why should I trust anything you say?" They asked.

"Because you can kill me either way." Nguyen said firmly. "And you probably will. Even if this ends up with me in some kind of trial. But at least let me try to stop this."

He heard something from the radio on his chest. But it was under numerous layers of spiderweb and so muffled that he couldn't make it out.

^(\["Fat chance Sergeant."\]) Driscoll's voice said in English. ^(\["Now it's my turn to work a bit of magic."\])

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ymba42/wait_is_this_just_gate_255/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (254/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Anger can be a really good motivator for some people.

\~\~\~

living weapon, incapable of being stopped by anything short of utter destruction.

This focus, this self image that she'd crafted as her warrior persona, unbeknownst to her, had utilized her magical energy in a way wholly unlike anything a mage like Veliry or Marcos could have ever imagines. And that was why they never had.

But in the moments after witnessing well over one hundred of her soldiers being annihilated by one of the Earth weapons in mere seconds, General, and Princess, Amina Petravius, entered a state of mindless rage and aggression that made all physical weakness cease to exist in her mind. And because magic is, at its basest level, a case of mind over matter; those weaknesses ceased to exist in the real world.

As the soldiers in the enemy camp opened fire upon her dazed, traumatized army, Amina charged at them. Shield raised in front of her and moving in a blur, sword at her side. She bellowed a scream of primal fury that made ears bleed as she unconsciously used her voice of command. It was a scream of anger, vengeance, and fear inducing mania.

Bullets punctured the steel and leather of her armor as easily as they ever had, but stopped as they embedded themselves in flesh that had magically hardened itself, causing the already slowed bullets to only barely penetrate her skin.

Despite her previously injured leg she moved toward the base at a sprint that would have shamed any Olympian athlete on Earth. Her strides carried her yards at a time and when she reached the enemy battlement she cleared it in a single leap, her sword flashing out to remove the heads of the two soldiers nearest to her as she did and her shield sending another flying.

Her landing was no thing of grace as she crashed into the sand on the other side and slammed into a soldier who had been carrying a box of ammo to the front line for his comrades. She toppled the young man and sprawled across him in the confusion. She never gave him time to recover, as her helmeted head slammed into his hard enough to crush his skull and splatter his blood and brains across the sand.

Bullets clanged and rang off of her shield and dug into the meat of her arm and ribs and legs as she scrambled to her feet and charged at the confused, frightened, men and women around her. Those men and women wearing uniforms nearly identical to the one her fiance had arrived in this world wearing.

She felt a note of pride as she saw some of her own warriors, their soot stained, sand and blood caked armor showing hints of crimson and gold trim as they charged recklessly and with fury through and over the enemy battlements. She saw, with the same enhanced vision that James used so well, dozens of them cut down by rounds of the Earth weapons.

But she also saw them, the wolves, the orcs, the humans, the occasional dwarf or other kinds of people that comprised HER people, tearing into the ranks of the Earth soldiers with a rage that almost matched her own.

As she spun, blade trailing blood as it left the waist of a now bifurcated riflemen, she felt a hammer blow to the back of her head and her helmet was ripped off of her by force. Hot, magically rich, blood streamed down the back of her neck as she staggered forward. But her consciousness never so much as wavered from the blow that would have killed a normal human. That would have killed any Earth born human.

Her left arm, her shield arm, twisted in a contortion that would have sent pain screaming through her under normal circumstances. Two more hammer blows were intercepted by it as it prevented any further shots from finding her. She reengaged the spin to get eyes on the assailant, only to see a massive, armored were-folk with the head of a lion lift the person up and rip their arm from its socket, sending their rifle spinning to the ground.

Then she saw a trio of the armored Muck Marchers standing near a tent and firing into her ranks of berserk soldiers. They stood near the entrance to a tent that looked to be full of machinery and computers that looked a lot like the Communication Array back at the castle.

She heard the sound of the Miffy firing its cannon again, though she still didn't know what that meant. But she did know that the sound had preceded the death of an portion of her army.

She didn't know what that tent held. But if it had three of the armored combatants defending it, then she was willing to bet that it was important.

She charged them, ignoring the rounds that all three of them began to fire at her as she raised her shield in front of her. She was too enraged to notice that one of the bullets punched a small, startlingly neat, hole in the edge of her shield as she did. It made no difference to her right now anyways.

She screamed again, voice of command still active, as she charged the alien defenders.

\---

James emerged from the mangled, tangled, wreck of the tent in a daze as he crawled over the twisted and bent metal and torn green canvas. A hand landing in something that looked like poor quality chili made him think it might have been the mess hall for the base. He licked some of the chili off his hand, oblivious to the grit of the sand in it, before moving on.

He didn't know where Vickers was. Or if he was even alive. Hell, he didn't know how HE was alive. They'd only been a few paces away when a brick of C4 had detonated. The fact that they weren't red jelly on the sand was nothing short of a miracle.

Everything hurt.

His head felt like someone had used it as a drum at a heavy metal concert.

His ears rang.

Every joint felt like it had been forced to do a full 360 degree spin, then told to go back the opposite direction to undo it.

Something burned in his back, and the area around it felt warm and wet. But when he tried to inspect it his vest made something there sing with fiery pain.

Even his eyes hurt, and when he tried to focus he found that he couldn't get things to slow down. He wondered, albeit slowly and as if through a haze, if a mirror would show black veins formed around them. Maybe even ON them.

But as he found the handle for his chain, he remembered that that was a problem for later.

He stood up, staggering for a minute as he did, and looked around.

Something nearby made a whining noise that his newly enhanced tinnitus matched almost perfectly. Then there was a loud bang that might have deafened him under normal circumstances. But as it was he was already pretty deaf, so it mostly just made his head throb.

Someone in an Army uniform, and full battle rattle, ran up to him and grabbed his shoulder.

>!"ARE YOU ALRIGHT!"!< He saw them mouth, though the ringing made it inaudible.

"WHAT?" He asked, yelling without even realizing it.

>!"I SAID; ARE YOU ALRIGHT?"!< They repeated.

James looked down at himself. His clothes were blackened and covered in a mixture of blood and sand. He realized, once again through a haze, that other than his boots, which were mostly destroyed anyways, and his chain, he was basically wearing the same thing the soldier was.

He wobbled as he looked back up at them. He shook his head.

"NOPE!" He said.

The soldier turned and tried to pull him along with them. >!"COME ON!"!< They said as they did, unaware of who he was. >!"IT'S NOT SAFE HERE! LET'S GET YOU TO THE MED BOX!"!<

James resisted, albeit weakly, and when the soldier turned to look at him he made his move.

"SORRY!" He yelled as he slammed his fist into their jaw. He felt the jaw break beneath his knuckles as the soldier fell limply to the sand.

James fell to his knees and threw up into the sand near the soldier's boots. Then clambered over it and grabbed the rifle out of their hand. He struggled back to his feet in a daze and looked around.

"Amina?" He wondered as he saw her moving in a blur of blood and steel near one of the tents some fifty yards away.

Two Muck Marchers were dancing around her with pistols and knives as she moved between them, her sword and shield moving so fast he doubted he'd be able to keep track of them even with his magical vision.

Curiously, a third Muck Marcher stood nearby, immobile and seemingly unconcerned with the brawl occurring only feet away from them.

James began running, in a stumbling, limping, gait towards them. His chain coiled and writhed around him like a rattlesnake readying to strike.

He had to help Amina.

\----------

Kai emerged from the sands with a scream as he clawed at the desert floor, and the spiders and webbing coating it with a hand that was still raw and scorched.

Even as he moved his spiders were working furiously. Glob-spitters sprayed him down with their gelatinous masses of numbing venom that would typically be used to keep their prey docile as they fed.

His weavers moved rapidly across him, following shortly behind the carrion carriers that were cleaning his flesh of its burned and weeping excess. The weavers replaced the lost tissue with thread so fine and so durable that it might as well have been armor in its own right.

But it wasn't the right color, and he watched in agony as his once deep purple, bordering on midnight black, skin was replaced with a sheen of shimmering silver thread.

His eyes. His TRUE, natural born, eyes were gone, burned away by the flames of the armored attacker that savaged him with its flames.

All that was left were the gemstone eyes of his princely mantle. The ones that allowed him to peer through the eyes of his horde. And he knew that they would be the only eyes he would know for the rest of his life, however long it may be.

What they showed him made little sense as his horde once more scattered and spread across the desert battlefield.

The position he'd been in when he'd been burned was little more than a crater now, some devastation having destroyed everything that had been there. Even now his spiders had to move around it as the heat of the sand there, some of which was glass now, was too much for their small arachnid bodies to survive.

Still his right arm, now thoroughly coated in spider silk that had covered even his control harp, twitched and spasmed as he commanded his spider army forward. Forward past the bodies of the fallen Petravians, and over the two armored opponents, whose bodies were lying like they were entombed upon the sand. Past the walls of the enemy encampment, surprised to see the Petravian soldiers already inside it, and tearing into its occupants in a bloody rage.

Something detonated overhead, and even though his body's eyes could see nothing his head craned up to see what it was.

Then he bore witness, through the eyes of his spider horde, to what had so devastated the Petravians and created the crater.

His mind exploded with the pain of tens of thousands, no hundreds of thousands, of spiders being incinerated and crushed in the space of a single heartbeat. And his heart ached with the knowledge that yet more Petravians had been among them in the moment of their destruction.

And as his mind recovered from the sudden, unfathomable, violence he suddenly understood the rage that had driven the ranks of them on their near suicidal charge of the enemy base, the princess at their lead.

He felt that rage too.

His right arm began to flex and spasm and rise up in a clenched fist.

He felt, and saw through, the teeming masses that came from miles below him as they answered his call to battle.

He screamed from the pain of the newly recrafted flesh of his body straining against his enraged muscles as they fought to control the things he brought up from the depths of the Deep Dark.

He would show these invaders what REAL monsters looked like.

\----------

First Sergeant Nguyen listened to the battle unfold as he sat on the sand, most of his body wrapped in spider silk, and surrounded by Petravian guards.

He heard the whine and boom of the M.A.M. Miffy fire and knew what would follow. He'd been in the room when the Major, who was lying next to him only a few yards away and seething with anger, had given the order for what it would be loaded with.

He'd winced and sealed his eyes shut as he'd heard the thermobaric detonation some quarter of a mile away. He'd heard the Petravians wonder what the hell had just happened. And he had watched as one of them had climbed to the top of the dune, only to return a few moments later, with a haunted, shell-shocked look upon their face.

He'd heard the princess's scream of rage, and been surprised at its volume.

Then he'd heard the Miffy fire again.

This was never supposed to be the mission. He thought as his head hung. He numbly ignored the yelled insults and questions from the Petravian soldiers before another thermo round went off. We were just supposed to explore and gather intel. This base was supposed to be the fantasy world version of a watching post.

His mouth moved before he could think.

"Help me get my radio." He said, though it was hard to hear over the distant battle.

"What!?!?" One of the soldiers asked incredulously. "What did you say?"

Nguyen looked up at them, they had long pointed ears and a long pointed beard. They were also furious and had a spear leveled at his head.

He hung his head again.

"Help me get my radio." He said again.

"No Nguyen." The Major said from next to him.

"Shut the fuck up." He spat at her. Then he looked up at the soldiers. "Help me get my radio. I'll order my people to stand down."

"No you fuckin won't!" The Major exclaimed.

The soldiers looked back and forth between the two of them.

"Look at her." He said. "She was the one who ordered all of this. Because of someone on the other side. On Earth." He wanted to kick at her, but he knew that trying to do so would just make him fall over too. "This was NEVER supposed to be the way this went. This has all gone off the rails. Let me try to fix it."

The elf soldier pressed his spear against Nguyen's throat, and he felt a trickle of blood there.

"Why should I trust anything you say?" They asked.

"Because you can kill me either way." Nguyen said firmly. "And you probably will. Even if this ends up with me in some kind of trial. But at least let me try to stop this."

He heard something from the radio on his chest. But it was under numerous layers of spiderweb and so muffled that he couldn't make it out.

^(\["Fat chance Sergeant."\]) Driscoll's voice said in English. ^(\["Now it's my turn to work a bit of magic."\])

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ymayvn/wait_is_this_just_gate_255/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (253/?)

Previous

Writer's note: This is where things begin to go.... poorly.

Enjoy (?)

\~

Margaret Choi was there when the first of the wounded began to come to the castle through the passage her son had helped create.

"Alright." Ambassador Werner said as she helped her begin the process of learning the new method of healing people. "Imagine that feeling you get when you can feel a static charge building up but can't get it to leave. Then imagine you can focus that static on your hands."

Head Healer Shrend watched the two women, eyes glowing green as he studied the energy flowing through them as they attempted healing magic. He could see the steady, even flow through the Ambassador, weak though it was. And he could see faint sparks of magical energy flowing through Mrs. Choi, though they were sporadic at best.

Still, he was impressed by the depth of the energy in the healer from Earth.

Then one of the other healers, a young woman who was new to the castle staff, tapped his arm for attention. He leaned down to listen to her when she beckoned for his ear. A moment later he spoke.

"Ambassador, Nurse Choi, I'm afraid duty calls." He said with a slight bow of his head. "Please feel free to continue your lessons for as long as you like."

"Is everything okay?" Mrs. Choi asked. "That looked like bad news."

He nodded. "It was. Though it was also, sadly, expected."

"What's going on?" The Ambassador asked. "It isn't related to the Captain again, is it?" Mrs. Choi looked at her with a hint of scorn and concern at the question.

"I.... Am not allowed to say." Shrend said. "Now if you'll pardon me, I must go."

He wasn't surprised when both women followed him out.

They didn't get five steps before they saw the first of the wounded.

Ambassador Werner stepped out of the way as two of the ward aides carried a soldier past on a stretcher. The soldier breathed in a raspy gurgle as a faint hissing sound was heard from their chest.

"Wait, was that man was shot in the chest?" Nurse Choi said as she beat him to the injured man and began inspecting the small hole in their chest plate.

She pressed the man's head up and studied his throat for a moment. Shrend watched curiously for a few moments as she worked. He'd yet to see much of Earth's medical practices in action, save a few small things that the Captain had showed them.

She quickly reached a hand under the man's back and felt for a moment. She winced and pulled her hand back, inspecting it for a moment. It was covered in blood which she wiped off for a moment. She lifted the soldier up just an inch and looked at whatever had caused her to wince.

"That's an exit wound." She said with a look of confusion. Then she muttered to herself. "He's got tension pneumothorax." She pointed at one of the aides that had carried the man to the bed he was on. "Find me something pliable but non-breathable. Plus adhesive. Does this world have tape?" The young half elf nodded in confusion. "Go get it." She said in a commanding voice that allowed no questioning.

Then she turned to Shrend and he was shocked at the fury that burned in her eyes. Startled by the sudden shift in who was running the room he faltered back a half step.

"This man was shot by a firearm. What the hell is going on?" She asked. "Where's my son?"

\----------

BOOOOOOM!!!!!

James flew like a bullet, his explosive propulsion sending the startled soldiers behind him flying in multiple directions from the blast he'd released from his feet.

He saw the glob of C4 in Vicker's hand as it pressed onto the face of the of the Muck Marcher's helmet and stuck into it.

Where Vickers had just come from, James had no idea. He also had no idea what had happened to the charred, bloody, ragged looking Navy SEAL. But considering he'd just saved him from having his head blown off, he could question it later.

He got his hand on the back of Vickers' vest, and his chain wrapped around the man's torso, just as the C4 had begun deforming on the Muck Marcher's helmet. With his enhanced vision he saw the armored combatant's hands already reaching up to try to do something about it.

He saw Vickers' eyes widen in surprise as he realized what James was doing. His rage and bloodlust traded in for confusion and what James thought might have been concern. He'd give him shit about it later if the two of them survived this.

Instead of blasting off again, since he didn't know what that would do to the explosive putty, James turned on his jets, and the two of them began rocketing away from the still airborne Muck Marcher.

Even as fast as James had managed to get them moving, they were only about ten yards away when James saw the faint pop of the detonator. The Muck Marcher was still scrambling at their face plate, weapon forgotten, when it happened.

Then the entire world seemed to explode behind them.

James and Vickers flew away in a screaming mass of chains and agony, taking out one of the tents in a heap of army green canvas and steel supports.

\------------------------------

Driscoll watched the progress of the battle through his suit's HUD.

He couldn't move, he'd been bundled up too tightly and too well by the mass of spiders that had engulfed him. Plus, he was missing an arm now.

But he could still see what was going on through the camera feeds of the camp, and of his comrades.

Every second his anger grew hotter within him, like a smoldering pit of coal in whatever was left of his gut.

Five was down. Suit destroyed and Shit-Can compromised. Chief Vickers had savaged her like some kind of barbarian version of one of the old Marvel movies' Captain America and Sub-Zero combined.

Carroll had died at the hands of the princess and whoever that little lightning girl was. Sword to the face. Quick, and likely painless.

Doc had had his head slagged by that same little redhead. He'd managed to get his licks in. But she'd basically fired his skull inside his own helmet with those weird bolts of whatever it was she was shooting. Then he'd watched her use the same attack on Carroll. It had allowed the princess to get her finishing blow.

Another klaxon sounded and he pulled up Johnson's feed. He'd had Choi in his sights, literally. Then something... no... someone, Vickers specifically, had slammed into him like a comet. And then he'd...

Shit. Driscoll thought. He was gonna martyr drop C4 on him to save Choi.

But then he'd seen Vickers' face change as Choi somehow miraculously managed to pull him away out of nowhere.

Then Johnson's feed, and all his suit sensors, had disappeared entirely. Suit destroyed.

Four of his crew down in less than half an hour. Five counting him. Which, they might as well have at that point.

That couldn't be right.

They were the deadliest warriors/weapon systems on their entire world save for actual nuclear weapons. And they had just experienced the greatest combat loss in their force since it's inception nearly three decades earlier.

And it happened at the hands of people with swords, and shields, and fucking hocus pocus magic and spiders. He fumed in his helmet.

He was tempted to initiate the self destruct sequences on the downed suits, save maybe Five's since she was still technically alive. He did send a recovery signal to the Toolies in their tent for her. He had to try to save her at least.

He stared at the small little red button on his HUD, the one that would trigger every bit of ordnance the downed suits had to detonate at once, and he pondered activating it.

Then he had a better idea. Though, he wasn't entirely certain how feasible it was.

He shot a message to Rodriguez, who was stationed near the Miffy control tent to protect it. Rodriguez had been a high level programmer on the civilian side before his time in the armor had started. If anyone could do what Driscoll needed, it would be him.

\----------

James and Vickers had both known what was going to happen when they'd heard the camp's mortar go off. Vickers had seen them in action several times, and James had seen them fire training rounds on an artillery range once. They both knew what they could do. The only question was what kind of ordinance it had been set to fire.

James would have tried to stop it, if he'd been able to.

Vickers would have done what he could to get to the Petravian army to warn them, maybe get their mages to aim their shields up into the sky. He'd already been on the move to disable the vehicle when he'd seen James on the verge of being executed.

But neither of them was conscious or mobile enough to do anything when the mortar round detonated.

But Joey saw it.

He'd scrambled to the top of a massive dune and looked down in awe at the sight below, his hands still firmly placed over his ears to block the cacophonous din of the battle.

He was too far away to spot Veliry, or James, or Amina, or anyone else that he maybe knew in passing. He could still see Guardian Ira'Nyl, who he found fascinatingly intimidating, and the other newly mustered riflemen of the Petravian guard. Their squad was moving up to the battle at a jog, rifles in hand.

His first thought, upon seeing the battle, was that it was like something out of a movie. Maybe one of the old Peter Jackson Lord of the Ring series. Back when they still used massive amounts of ACTUAL people for the major battles.

Part of him had wanted to stare in open mouthed wonder like a child watching their favorite toys come to life. He was, after all, a massive fan of all things fantasy, sci-fi, and anime. And what else was this besides all of those things at once.

Then he had seen the line of people being carried out and away from the battle.

People being carried on stretchers, holding their injuries and crying in pain.

People limping or hopping as their comrades helped them walk to safety.

People being carried, and then tossed into a pile.

And the reality set in.

I never should have come here. He thought as his left foot began jerking, attempting to stomp like it sometimes did when he was stressed. It made the side of the dune collapse a bit as he did. None of us should have come here. Why are they here?

Something in the air above one of the formations of Petravian soldiers made a loud pop noise and Joey looked up.

Then a massive ring of something that looked like fire formed, though it couldn't have been because fire didn't form rings like that, and it was too even to be fire, too uniform.

Then there was an explosion.

Joey couldn't even comprehend the size, or violence of the blast as he immediately cowered behind his dune, curled into a ball and hands over ears as he let himself roll down the sandy side of it. He'd never seen explosions in person before. His parents had tried to take him to a firework show when he'd been a child and he'd quickly been overwhelmed by it, forcing them to take him home.

He wanted to scream. To Cry. To run and hide. His ears rang and there was just... TOO MUCH of everything, even with his eyes closed.

And then there wasn't.

Without any warning of any kind, the entire world seemed to go silent.

Joey opened his eyes a bit as he coughed out a mouthful of sand.

"Hello?" He asked, and to his surprise he could hear his voice. Though his ears rang now.

He snapped his fingers, and he could hear that too.

But the gunfire had stopped.

The odd, sometimes almost alien, sounds of spells had stopped.

Nobody was yelling or barking orders at anyone else.

He scrambled to the top of the dune again and looked down.

"No." He said simply. Then he couldn't help but begin repeating it. "No. No. Nonononono. No!"

One of the formations of Petravians.... no longer existed. Instead there was a massive, blackened crater, and a sky full of sand and ash. The other formations milled about in a daze, looking like terracotta soldiers from all the sand they were coated in.

"No." He said in a whimper as he curled back up and let himself slide back down again. He couldn't watch this anymore. It was too much, it was all too much. For everyone.

He heard a familiar, feminine, voice yell. Louder and longer than human lungs should have been capable of. Even from as far back as he was it sounded ear splittingly loud.

"YOU MOOOOONNNNNSSSTTTEEEEERRRRSSSSS!!!!" Amina yelled from somewhere down below in the battle. "RAAAAAAAAAGGGGGGHHHHHHH!!!!!"

And then the gunfire started again.

"Why?" Joey asked.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yldnom/wait_is_this_just_gate_254/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (253/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: This is where things begin to go.... poorly.

Enjoy (?)

\~

Margaret Choi was there when the first of the wounded began to come to the castle through the passage her son had helped create.

"Alright." Ambassador Werner said as she helped her begin the process of learning the new method of healing people. "Imagine that feeling you get when you can feel a static charge building up but can't get it to leave. Then imagine you can focus that static on your hands."

Head Healer Shrend watched the two women, eyes glowing green as he studied the energy flowing through them as they attempted healing magic. He could see the steady, even flow through the Ambassador, weak though it was. And he could see faint sparks of magical energy flowing through Mrs. Choi, though they were sporadic at best.

Still, he was impressed by the depth of the energy in the healer from Earth.

Then one of the other healers, a young woman who was new to the castle staff, tapped his arm for attention. He leaned down to listen to her when she beckoned for his ear. A moment later he spoke.

"Ambassador, Nurse Choi, I'm afraid duty calls." He said with a slight bow of his head. "Please feel free to continue your lessons for as long as you like."

"Is everything okay?" Mrs. Choi asked. "That looked like bad news."

He nodded. "It was. Though it was also, sadly, expected."

"What's going on?" The Ambassador asked. "It isn't related to the Captain again, is it?" Mrs. Choi looked at her with a hint of scorn and concern at the question.

"I.... Am not allowed to say." Shrend said. "Now if you'll pardon me, I must go."

He wasn't surprised when both women followed him out.

They didn't get five steps before they saw the first of the wounded.

Ambassador Werner stepped out of the way as two of the ward aides carried a soldier past on a stretcher. The soldier breathed in a raspy gurgle as a faint hissing sound was heard from their chest.

"Wait, was that man was shot in the chest?" Nurse Choi said as she beat him to the injured man and began inspecting the small hole in their chest plate.

She pressed the man's head up and studied his throat for a moment. Shrend watched curiously for a few moments as she worked. He'd yet to see much of Earth's medical practices in action, save a few small things that the Captain had showed them.

She quickly reached a hand under the man's back and felt for a moment. She winced and pulled her hand back, inspecting it for a moment. It was covered in blood which she wiped off for a moment. She lifted the soldier up just an inch and looked at whatever had caused her to wince.

"That's an exit wound." She said with a look of confusion. Then she muttered to herself. "He's got tension pneumothorax." She pointed at one of the aides that had carried the man to the bed he was on. "Find me something pliable but non-breathable. Plus adhesive. Does this world have tape?" The young half elf nodded in confusion. "Go get it." She said in a commanding voice that allowed no questioning.

Then she turned to Shrend and he was shocked at the fury that burned in her eyes. Startled by the sudden shift in who was running the room he faltered back a half step.

"This man was shot by a firearm. What the hell is going on?" She asked. "Where's my son?"

\----------

BOOOOOOM!!!!!

James flew like a bullet, his explosive propulsion sending the startled soldiers behind him flying in multiple directions from the blast he'd released from his feet.

He saw the glob of C4 in Vicker's hand as it pressed onto the face of the of the Muck Marcher's helmet and stuck into it.

Where Vickers had just come from, James had no idea. He also had no idea what had happened to the charred, bloody, ragged looking Navy SEAL. But considering he'd just saved him from having his head blown off, he could question it later.

He got his hand on the back of Vickers' vest, and his chain wrapped around the man's torso, just as the C4 had begun deforming on the Muck Marcher's helmet. With his enhanced vision he saw the armored combatant's hands already reaching up to try to do something about it.

He saw Vickers' eyes widen in surprise as he realized what James was doing. His rage and bloodlust traded in for confusion and what James thought might have been concern. He'd give him shit about it later if the two of them survived this.

Instead of blasting off again, since he didn't know what that would do to the explosive putty, James turned on his jets, and the two of them began rocketing away from the still airborne Muck Marcher.

Even as fast as James had managed to get them moving, they were only about ten yards away when James saw the faint pop of the detonator. The Muck Marcher was still scrambling at their face plate, weapon forgotten, when it happened.

Then the entire world seemed to explode behind them.

James and Vickers flew away in a screaming mass of chains and agony, taking out one of the tents in a heap of army green canvas and steel supports.

\------------------------------

Driscoll watched the progress of the battle through his suit's HUD.

He couldn't move, he'd been bundled up too tightly and too well by the mass of spiders that had engulfed him. Plus, he was missing an arm now.

But he could still see what was going on through the camera feeds of the camp, and of his comrades.

Every second his anger grew hotter within him, like a smoldering pit of coal in whatever was left of his gut.

Five was down. Suit destroyed and Shit-Can compromised. Chief Vickers had savaged her like some kind of barbarian version of one of the old Marvel movies' Captain America and Sub-Zero combined.

Carroll had died at the hands of the princess and whoever that little lightning girl was. Sword to the face. Quick, and likely painless.

Doc had had his head slagged by that same little redhead. He'd managed to get his licks in. But she'd basically fired his skull inside his own helmet with those weird bolts of whatever it was she was shooting. Then he'd watched her use the same attack on Carroll. It had allowed the princess to get her finishing blow.

Another klaxon sounded and he pulled up Johnson's feed. He'd had Choi in his sights, literally. Then something... no... someone, Vickers specifically, had slammed into him like a comet. And then he'd...

Shit. Driscoll thought. He was gonna martyr drop C4 on him to save Choi.

But then he'd seen Vickers' face change as Choi somehow miraculously managed to pull him away out of nowhere.

Then Johnson's feed, and all his suit sensors, had disappeared entirely. Suit destroyed.

Four of his crew down in less than half an hour. Five counting him. Which, they might as well have at that point.

That couldn't be right.

They were the deadliest warriors/weapon systems on their entire world save for actual nuclear weapons. And they had just experienced the greatest combat loss in their force since it's inception nearly three decades earlier.

And it happened at the hands of people with swords, and shields, and fucking hocus pocus magic and spiders. He fumed in his helmet.

He was tempted to initiate the self destruct sequences on the downed suits, save maybe Five's since she was still technically alive. He did send a recovery signal to the Toolies in their tent for her. He had to try to save her at least.

He stared at the small little red button on his HUD, the one that would trigger every bit of ordnance the downed suits had to detonate at once, and he pondered activating it.

Then he had a better idea. Though, he wasn't entirely certain how feasible it was.

He shot a message to Rodriguez, who was stationed near the Miffy control tent to protect it. Rodriguez had been a high level programmer on the civilian side before his time in the armor had started. If anyone could do what Driscoll needed, it would be him.

\----------

James and Vickers had both known what was going to happen when they'd heard the camp's mortar go off. Vickers had seen them in action several times, and James had seen them fire training rounds on an artillery range once. They both knew what they could do. The only question was what kind of ordinance it had been set to fire.

James would have tried to stop it, if he'd been able to.

Vickers would have done what he could to get to the Petravian army to warn them, maybe get their mages to aim their shields up into the sky. He'd already been on the move to disable the vehicle when he'd seen James on the verge of being executed.

But neither of them was conscious or mobile enough to do anything when the mortar round detonated.

But Joey saw it.

He'd scrambled to the top of a massive dune and looked down in awe at the sight below, his hands still firmly placed over his ears to block the cacophonous din of the battle.

He was too far away to spot Veliry, or James, or Amina, or anyone else that he maybe knew in passing. He could still see Guardian Ira'Nyl, who he found fascinatingly intimidating, and the other newly mustered riflemen of the Petravian guard. Their squad was moving up to the battle at a jog, rifles in hand.

His first thought, upon seeing the battle, was that it was like something out of a movie. Maybe one of the old Peter Jackson Lord of the Ring series. Back when they still used massive amounts of ACTUAL people for the major battles.

Part of him had wanted to stare in open mouthed wonder like a child watching their favorite toys come to life. He was, after all, a massive fan of all things fantasy, sci-fi, and anime. And what else was this besides all of those things at once.

Then he had seen the line of people being carried out and away from the battle.

People being carried on stretchers, holding their injuries and crying in pain.

People limping or hopping as their comrades helped them walk to safety.

People being carried, and then tossed into a pile.

And the reality set in.

I never should have come here. He thought as his left foot began jerking, attempting to stomp like it sometimes did when he was stressed. It made the side of the dune collapse a bit as he did. None of us should have come here. Why are they here?

Something in the air above one of the formations of Petravian soldiers made a loud pop noise and Joey looked up.

Then a massive ring of something that looked like fire formed, though it couldn't have been because fire didn't form rings like that, and it was too even to be fire, too uniform.

Then there was an explosion.

Joey couldn't even comprehend the size, or violence of the blast as he immediately cowered behind his dune, curled into a ball and hands over ears as he let himself roll down the sandy side of it. He'd never seen explosions in person before. His parents had tried to take him to a firework show when he'd been a child and he'd quickly been overwhelmed by it, forcing them to take him home.

He wanted to scream. To Cry. To run and hide. His ears rang and there was just... TOO MUCH of everything, even with his eyes closed.

And then there wasn't.

Without any warning of any kind, the entire world seemed to go silent.

Joey opened his eyes a bit as he coughed out a mouthful of sand.

"Hello?" He asked, and to his surprise he could hear his voice. Though his ears rang now.

He snapped his fingers, and he could hear that too.

But the gunfire had stopped.

The odd, sometimes almost alien, sounds of spells had stopped.

Nobody was yelling or barking orders at anyone else.

He scrambled to the top of the dune again and looked down.

"No." He said simply. Then he couldn't help but begin repeating it. "No. No. Nonononono. No!"

One of the formations of Petravians.... no longer existed. Instead there was a massive, blackened crater, and a sky full of sand and ash. The other formations milled about in a daze, looking like terracotta soldiers from all the sand they were coated in.

"No." He said in a whimper as he curled back up and let himself slide back down again. He couldn't watch this anymore. It was too much, it was all too much. For everyone.

He heard a familiar, feminine, voice yell. Louder and longer than human lungs should have been capable of. Even from as far back as he was it sounded ear splittingly loud.

"YOU MOOOOONNNNNSSSTTTEEEEERRRRSSSSS!!!!" Amina yelled from somewhere down below in the battle. "RAAAAAAAAAGGGGGGHHHHHHH!!!!!"

And then the gunfire started again.

"Why?" Joey asked.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ylcc50/wait_is_this_just_gate_254/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (252/?)

Previous

Writer's note:

MORE WRITTEN SAKUGA!!!!!

Also, for those interested u/Mycroft4114 wrote a pretty cool bit of side story check it out.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

^("What?") A familiar dwarvish voice asked. But Joey couldn't hear them through his hands and the noise of what was going on. ^("The hells are you doin here? Go back boy!")

This was a mistake. Joey thought as he winced against the noise. It's too much.

Someone grabbed him by the shoulder and began pulling. It was the worst thing they could do at a time like this.

Joey shook them off and ran a few paces away, where he kneeled behind a rock. It was too loud.'

^("Mr. Choi! You got to go!") Marius tried to say to him. ^("It's not safe here. Plus I was ordered to keep you on the castle side. Get back through!")

There was an explosion followed by a series of rapid firecracker pops somewhere in the distance.

Joey looked that way, trying to quantify the overwhelming amounts of info flowing into his brain just from the sound.

Why did I do this? I knew what was happening here.

Then he saw familiar dark blackish blue bolts of lightning fly into the sky beyond one of the dunes. It was only a few small bolts, and only for a fraction of a second.

But it caught his focus.

Veliry? He wondered.

His curiosity clawed its way above his fear and confusion.

He shook Marius off without even realizing it as he jogged over to the dune to see what was happening. His hands still firmly clamped to his ears.

\------------------------------

Amina, her eyes glowing and her arm already sore from the pull of her shield, saw Veliry slam into the Muck Marcher like a magic wielding wild cat. She had just a moment of impressed awe as she saw the two combatants begin rolling through the sand, spraying gouts of flame and sprays of deathbolts out at random as the scrambled at each other.

Then her arm pulled itself into the way of another hail of bullets and punches from her current opponent and she was back into her own fight.

The first of the armored opponents had been an easy fight. She'd had the Prince of Eyes at her side at the time. His spider horde and her martial abilities had been more than a match for the singular Muck Marcher and they had practically disassembled him before the spiders had carried him back into her army's midst, bundled like an insect.

But now she was on her own. Her own soldiers were making gradual, but frequently halting, progress around their melee. But she was surrounded by guttering flames, writhing masses of the Prince's spiders, and a seemingly endless cascade of incoming bullets.

She'd learned very quickly to keep the Army base, the FOB as James had called it, on her left. Her shield was to predisposed to protecting her from their fire, and having the base on her right had caused her to frequently spin unexpectedly. This had made openings that she'd only managed to close because of her own speed and skill.

The Muck Marcher wielded two knives long enough to be considered short swords, and would frequently sheath one in favor of a pistol very similar to James's.

They were faster on the draw than James was too. She'd learned that quickly as well.

On top of that they wielded their daggers as well as any combatant she'd ever faced. She doubted either of her brothers would have been a match for either of them in a one on one duel. Her older brother the crown prince would have only stood a chance because of his size and his spear's deadly enchantment.

As it was, she was finding herself hard-pressed as her own sword frequently bounced or slid off of the angular, remarkably hard armor of the odd opponent. Additionally this one had seen how she had dismembered its comrade and was doing everything it could to keep its paltry few weak points on the move.

Even with magic on her side, its reflexes were every bit as quick as hers were.

Their blades and her shield clashed in a violent fever of clangs and rasps as the two of them danced around each other in a match that was making her question Vickers' frequent claims of being one of his world's deadliest warriors.

But she had one distinct disadvantage over the Muck Marcher.

And just like they always seemed to in battle, it made itself evident at the worst possible time.

She brought her shield up, aiding its own enchanted desire to protect her against a combination of a stab from the Muck Marcher's blade, and a shot from its pistol in what James called hip-fire position.

She felt it's subtle tug backwards and knew that something was going to hit her somewhere else too. But the shield's semi-sentience considered the Muck Marcher's attack the greatest threat.

She felt the blade clang off of her sword's backhanded parry even as she felt the hammer blow of the pistol round on the shield.

Then she screamed through gritted teeth as something punched through the armor around her leg and lanced through her calf. She immediately felt blood pour down her leg in a steady torrent as she fell to a knee.

The Muck Marcher showed no mercy, and no more hesitation than she would have had the roles been reversed.

It's pistol raised up and aimed at her head even as it rushed at her with its blade held forward in a stabbing lunge.

Amina snarled as her shield raised itself to attempt blocking both.

She readied to roll out of the way.

Then a spray of black and blue bolts slammed into the side of the thing, scoring black lines into its strange armor and driving it back.

Amina saw Veliry several yards away, blood flowing from her nose and missing one of her ears as one hand blasted deathbolts into the Muck Marcher. The other hand was raised in the direction of the base, and she saw bullets sparking as they slammed into the faint blue shimmer of a magical shield.

The Muck Marcher's pistol exploded in its hand as one of the bolts dug into it, mangling the mechanical appendage in the process as they held their knife hand up in a feeble attempt to shield themself from the mage's onslaught.

Amina staggered up as and lunged at them with her sword.

The Muck Marcher turned just in time to see the tip of her sword find one of the blackened weak spots on its helmet.

She put every ounce of magically enhanced strength she had into the stab and was rewarded with a satisfying crunching noise before her blade slid into the opponent's face. It stopped before could go all the way through. She wrenched it out as she fell back to her knee.

Curiously, the Muck Marcher's arms shot to its sides, dropping its knife in the process, and locked there as its legs straightened and locked together. It fell to the ground looking like a corpse in a casket. She looked over at the one that Veliry had been fighting, which was now surrounded by soldiers attempting to carry it away, and it was in much the same state. Though, it's head was a mess of melted, smoking, metal.

"Took you long enough." She said to the small arch mage.

"Say that to my good ear princess." Veliry shot back with a grimace.

Amina nodded, then pulled one of the tourniquets that James had taught their healers to make from her gear and wrapped it around her leg, snaking it under her armor in the process. Then she tightened it until it hurt, and felt the bleeding in her leg stop. She looked at the wound and saw a small, pinky thick hole in one side, and a thumb sized hole bursting out of the other. But it was what James had called a "through and through", and the bone wasn't broken.

In other words. It would hold.

"You alright?" Veliry asked.

Amina nodded. "The big guns. The ones James and Vickers were so worried about. They've stopped firing. I think that's a good thing."

"Is that what's making all those popping sounds?" Veliry asked.

Amina nodded, then used her voice of command to address the soldiers near the downed Muck Marcher.

"YOU MEN! Stay back from that for now. We don't know enough about them. It could still be dangerous. Give it a wide berth until the battle is over!" She ordered them. They looked over at her and one of them, an Orc Sergeant, nodded and began ushering the other soldiers away from it and back behind the mage near them so they could continue their advance.

Amina leaned on her sword and shield as she brought herself back up to her feet.

"Gods damn!" She exclaimed as she bent for a second, favoring the injured leg. "Agh! Newfound respect for Artair!" She said as she began moving again, limping as she did.

She stepped over next to the small mage and the two began advancing among the formations of soldiers.

"ONWARD!" She yelled at them. "FOR THE KINGDOM!"

Something made a loud whining noise before there was an equally loud -BANG- from inside the base. They both looked at eachother, curious as to what their enemies had in store for them now.

\----------

James had been, a touch, overconfident as he'd made a slow advance on the Muck Marcher.

He'd gotten excited about the fact that his reforged sword, at the end of his newly enchanted chain weapon, had apparently gotten some new habits from his enchantment. As such, he'd felt a desire to test its effectiveness.

It turned out, as he'd marched toward the Muck Marcher, that it was very effective.

The newly enchanted handle of his chain whip made controlling the chain with his wind magic significantly easier, and as such much less of an energy drain. So he was capable of multitasking a bit more easily.

The sword was apparently NOT a fan of letting anything shoot James and moved, with difficult to control aggression, between James and any bullets that might hurt him. It used the writhing, coiling, whipping chain as a vector for these interceptions, at times seeming to move around James in a blur as it protected him.

The downside was that the Muck Marcher, and whatever sensors and programs it had access to, had picked up on the habit very quickly. Any time James made to strike at the armored opponent they would fire off rapid bursts of fire at him that prevented the blade from striking, by forcing it to defend him.

It was a new quirk that he would need to work on controlling.

But at least he wasn't getting shot.

That had been.... what... several minutes ago?.... Several seconds ago?

Between his enhanced reflexes and the fact that battle was, just on principal, chaotic. It was hard to tell how long he'd been trying to bring the Muck Marcher down.

That had, unfortunately, allowed some of the other soldiers to join in on the fight.

James's chain and sword were a blurring tempest around him as he lanced out at the enemy combatants with as many magical attacks as he could manage. Though most of them were interrupted or even blocked, accidentally, by his own weapon.

Things had been getting a touch more out of his control than he'd wanted them to.

Then the FOB's central Miffy had fired its cannon.

He'd heard a moment of faint buzzing, and he thought he'd tasted ozone, though it was hard to tell with all the spent gunpowder in the air.

Then it fired, and the sonic boom of its projectile was deafening even by gunfire standards.

It felt like it had shaken his very bones.

Everyone in the current melee EXCEPT the Muck Marcher was stunned by the sudden violence against their ears and bodies. James had a moment, as he looked around at the soldiers shaking their heads, to regret not having put his earpro in. There was a loud ringing overlapping everything her heard.

No VA in Petravus. He thought sarcastically, just in time for an armor encased robotic hand to lift him up by his IOTBS's collar.

James wouldn't admit it later, but he squeaked in surprise as the Muck Marcher lifted him up and choke slammed him violently back into the sand.

As James, stunned from the impact, looked up at the barrel now aimed at his face he was surprised to see his sword sticking out of the Muck Marcher's left shoulder, it's blade sunken into the metal a good three inches.

"Smile and wait for the f-" The Muck Marcher began in a deep, gravelly voice before suddenly snapping the gun up into an aiming position.

A mass of scorched clothe and flesh slammed into the Muck Marcher in a flare of orange light that sent the armored opponent flying and made James and the other soldiers present cringe back from the light and heat.

James's enhanced vision showed him Vickers, in a rage that would have matched Gixelle, flying after the Muck Marcher even as they themselves flew back, their armor smoking.

The Muck Marcher that still had James's sword in its shoulder.

The sword that was attached to the chain in James's hand.

James grabbed the handle in both hands and focused his magic into it, willing it to return to him even as he saw the other soldiers around him getting their weapons aimed at him again.

The Muck marcher's flight halted in mid-air as the chain went taught. James used their weight and momentum to his advantage as it pulled him up off his back and onto his feet.

He saw Vickers reaching toward the Muck Marcher, his shield no longer on his arm and wondered what he was doing.

Then he saw the white lump in his extended hand.

Oh shit. He thought.

As he saw his blade finally pull free from the Muck Marcher's armor James knew what he had to do.

All his magical energy focused on his feet.

He beat Vickers to the punch, already doing what the SEAL said even before he'd had the chance.

"CHOI!" Vickers yelled as everything seemed to slow to an even slower crawl. "FLYYYYYY!!!!!"

BOOOOOOM!!!!

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ykp1br/wait_is_this_just_gate_253/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (252/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note:

MORE WRITTEN SAKUGA!!!!!

Also, for those interested u/Mycroft4114 wrote a pretty cool bit of side story over on r/GATEhouse Check it out.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

He quickly clamped his hands over his ears as he heard the cacophony of noise that was on the other side.

^("What?") A familiar dwarvish voice asked. But Joey couldn't hear them through his hands and the noise of what was going on. "^(The hells are you doin here? Go back boy!")

This was a mistake. Joey thought as he winced against the noise. It's too much.

Someone grabbed him by the shoulder and began pulling. It was the worst thing they could do at a time like this.

Joey shook them off and ran a few paces away, where he kneeled behind a rock. It was too loud.'

^("Mr. Choi! You got to go!") Marius tried to say to him. ^("It's not safe here. Plus I was ordered to keep you on the castle side. Get back through!")

There was an explosion followed by a series of rapid firecracker pops somewhere in the distance.

Joey looked that way, trying to quantify the overwhelming amounts of info flowing into his brain just from the sound.

Why did I do this? I knew what was happening here.

Then he saw familiar dark blackish blue bolts of lightning fly into the sky beyond one of the dunes. It was only a few small bolts, and only for a fraction of a second.

But it caught his focus.

Veliry? He wondered.

His curiosity clawed its way above his fear and confusion.

He shook Marius off without even realizing it as he jogged over to the dune to see what was happening. His hands still firmly clamped to his ears.

\------------------------------

Amina, her eyes glowing and her arm already sore from the pull of her shield, saw Veliry slam into the Muck Marcher like a magic wielding wild cat. She had just a moment of impressed awe as she saw the two combatants begin rolling through the sand, spraying gouts of flame and sprays of deathbolts out at random as the scrambled at each other.

Then her arm pulled itself into the way of another hail of bullets and punches from her current opponent and she was back into her own fight.

The first of the armored opponents had been an easy fight. She'd had the Prince of Eyes at her side at the time. His spider horde and her martial abilities had been more than a match for the singular Muck Marcher and they had practically disassembled him before the spiders had carried him back into her army's midst, bundled like an insect.

But now she was on her own. Her own soldiers were making gradual, but frequently halting, progress around their melee. But she was surrounded by guttering flames, writhing masses of the Prince's spiders, and a seemingly endless cascade of incoming bullets.

She'd learned very quickly to keep the Army base, the FOB as James had called it, on her left. Her shield was too predisposed to protecting her from their fire, and having the base on her right had caused her to frequently spin unexpectedly. This had made openings that she'd only managed to close because of her own speed and skill.

The Muck Marcher wielded two knives long enough to be considered short swords, and would frequently sheath one in favor of a pistol very similar to James's.

They were faster on the draw than James was too. She'd learned that quickly as well.

On top of that they wielded their daggers as well as any combatant she'd ever faced. She doubted either of her brothers would have been a match for either of them in a one on one duel. Her older brother the crown prince would have only stood a chance because of his size and his spear's deadly enchantment.

As it was, she was finding herself hard-pressed as her own sword frequently bounced or slid off of the angular, remarkably hard armor of the odd opponent. Additionally this one had seen how she had dismembered its comrade and was doing everything it could to keep its paltry few weak points on the move.

Even with magic on her side, its reflexes were every bit as quick as hers were.

Their blades and her shield clashed in a violent fever of clangs and rasps as the two of them danced around each other in a match that was making her question Vickers' frequent claims of being one of his world's deadliest warriors.

But she had one distinct disadvantage over the Muck Marcher.

And just like they always seemed to in battle, it made itself evident at the worst possible time.

She brought her shield up, aiding its own enchanted desire to protect her against a combination of a stab from the Muck Marcher's blade, and a shot from its pistol in what James called hip-fire position.

She felt it's subtle tug backwards and knew that something was going to hit her somewhere else too. But the shield's semi-sentience considered the Muck Marcher's attack the greatest threat.

She felt the blade clang off of her sword's backhanded parry even as she felt the hammer blow of the pistol round on the shield.

Then she screamed through gritted teeth as something punched through the armor around her leg and lanced through her calf. She immediately felt blood pour down her leg in a steady torrent as she fell to a knee.

The Muck Marcher showed no mercy, and no more hesitation than she would have had the roles been reversed.

It's pistol raised up and aimed at her head even as it rushed at her with its blade held forward in a stabbing lunge.

Amina snarled as her shield raised itself to attempt blocking both.

She readied to roll out of the way.

Then a spray of black and blue bolts slammed into the side of the thing, scoring black lines into its strange armor and driving it back.

Amina saw Veliry several yards away, blood flowing from her nose and missing one of her ears as one hand blasted deathbolts into the Muck Marcher. The other hand was raised in the direction of the base, and she saw bullets sparking as they slammed into the faint blue shimmer of a magical shield.

The Muck Marcher's pistol exploded in its hand as one of the bolts dug into it, mangling the mechanical appendage in the process as they held their knife hand up in a feeble attempt to shield themself from the mage's onslaught.

Amina staggered up and lunged at them with her sword.

The Muck Marcher turned just in time to see the tip of her sword find one of the blackened weak spots on its helmet.

She put every ounce of magically enhanced strength she had into the stab and was rewarded with a satisfying crunching noise before her blade slid into the opponent's face. It stopped before could go all the way through. She wrenched it out as she fell back to her knee.

Curiously, the Muck Marcher's arms shot to its sides, dropping its knife in the process, and locked there as its legs straightened and locked together. It fell to the ground looking like a corpse in a casket. She looked over at the one that Veliry had been fighting, which was now surrounded by soldiers attempting to carry it away, and it was in much the same state. Though, it's head was a mess of melted, smoking, metal.

"Took you long enough." She said to the small arch mage.

"Say that to my good ear princess." Veliry shot back with a grimace.

Amina nodded, then pulled one of the tourniquets that James had taught their healers to make from her gear and wrapped it around her leg, snaking it under her armor in the process. Then she tightened it until it hurt, and felt the bleeding in her leg stop. She looked at the wound and saw a small, pinky thick hole in one side, and a thumb sized hole bursting out of the other. But it was what James had called a "through and through", and the bone wasn't broken.

In other words. It would hold.

"You alright?" Veliry asked.

Amina nodded. "The big guns. The ones James and Vickers were so worried about. They've stopped firing. I think that's a good thing."

"Is that what's making all those popping sounds?" Veliry asked.

Amina nodded, then used her voice of command to address the soldiers near the downed Muck Marcher.

"YOU MEN! Stay back from that for now. We don't know enough about them. It could still be dangerous. Give it a wide berth until the battle is over!" She ordered them. They looked over at her and one of them, an Orc Sergeant, nodded and began ushering the other soldiers away from it and back behind the mage near them so they could continue their advance.

Amina leaned on her sword and shield as she brought herself back up to her feet.

"Gods damn!" She exclaimed as she bent for a second, favoring the injured leg. "Agh! Newfound respect for Artair!" She said as she began moving again, limping as she did.

She stepped over next to the small mage and the two began advancing among the formations of soldiers.

"ONWARD!" She yelled at them. "FOR THE KINGDOM!"

Something made a loud whining noise before there was an equally loud -BANG- from inside the base. They both looked at eachother, curious as to what their enemies had in store for them now.

\----------

James had been, a touch, overconfident as he'd made a slow advance on the Muck Marcher.

He'd gotten excited about the fact that his reforged sword, at the end of his newly enchanted chain weapon, had apparently gotten some new habits from his enchantment. As such, he'd felt a desire to test its effectiveness.

It turned out, as he'd marched toward the Muck Marcher, that it was very effective.

The newly enchanted handle of his chain whip made controlling the chain with his wind magic significantly easier, and as such much less of an energy drain. So he was capable of multitasking a bit more easily.

The sword was apparently NOT a fan of letting anything shoot James and moved, with difficult to control aggression, between James and any bullets that might hurt him. It used the writhing, coiling, whipping chain as a vector for these interceptions, at times seeming to move around James in a blur as it protected him.

The downside was that the Muck Marcher, and whatever sensors and programs it had access to, had picked up on the habit very quickly. Any time James made to strike at the armored opponent they would fire off rapid bursts of fire at him that prevented the blade from striking, by forcing it to defend him.

It was a new quirk that he would need to work on controlling.

But at least he wasn't getting shot.

That had been.... what... several minutes ago?.... Several seconds ago?

Between his enhanced reflexes and the fact that battle was, just on principal, chaotic. It was hard to tell how long he'd been trying to bring the Muck Marcher down.

That had, unfortunately, allowed some of the other soldiers to join in on the fight.

James's chain and sword were a blurring tempest around him as he lanced out at the enemy combatants with as many magical attacks as he could manage. Though most of them were interrupted or even blocked, accidentally, by his own weapon.

Things had been getting a touch more out of his control than he'd wanted them to.

Then the FOB's central Miffy had fired its cannon.

He'd heard a moment of faint buzzing, and he thought he'd tasted ozone, though it was hard to tell with all the spent gunpowder in the air.

Then it fired, and the sonic boom of its projectile was deafening even by gunfire standards.

It felt like it had shaken his very bones.

Everyone in the current melee EXCEPT the Muck Marcher was stunned by the sudden violence against their ears and bodies. James had a moment, as he looked around at the soldiers shaking their heads, to regret not having put his earpro in. There was a loud ringing overlapping everything her heard.

No VA in Petravus. He thought sarcastically, just in time for an armor encased robotic hand to lift him up by his IOTBS's collar.

James wouldn't admit it later, but he squeaked in surprise as the Muck Marcher lifted him up and choke slammed him violently back into the sand.

As James, stunned from the impact, looked up at the barrel now aimed at his face he was surprised to see his sword sticking out of the Muck Marcher's left shoulder, it's blade sunken into the metal a good three inches.

"Smile and wait for the f-" The Muck Marcher began in a deep, gravelly voice before suddenly snapping the gun up into an aiming position.

A mass of scorched clothe and flesh slammed into the Muck Marcher in a flare of orange light that sent the armored opponent flying and made James and the other soldiers present cringe back from the light and heat.

James's enhanced vision showed him Vickers, in a rage that would have matched Gixelle, flying after the Muck Marcher even as they themselves flew back, their armor smoking.

The Muck Marcher that still had James's sword in its shoulder.

The sword that was attached to the chain in James's hand.

James grabbed the handle in both hands and focused his magic into it, willing it to return to him even as he saw the other soldiers around him getting their weapons aimed at him again.

The Muck marcher's flight halted in mid-air as the chain went taught. James used their weight and momentum to his advantage as it pulled him up off his back and onto his feet.

He saw Vickers reaching toward the Muck Marcher, his shield no longer on his arm and wondered what he was doing.

Then he saw the white lump in his extended hand.

Oh shit. He thought.

As he saw his blade finally pull free from the Muck Marcher's armor James knew what he had to do.

All his magical energy focused on his feet.

He beat Vickers to the punch, already doing what the SEAL said even before he'd had the chance.

"CHOI!" Vickers yelled as everything seemed to slow to an even slower crawl. "FLYYYYYY!!!!!"

BOOOOOOM!!!!

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ykn8so/wait_is_this_just_gate_253/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (251/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yall waited an entire weekend for this. THEN THERE WAS A FIREFIGHT!!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

She looked back down and saw the mages below still attempting to protect the advancing soldiers around them. The first of the archers, hiding behind a dune, had begun firing. A cloud of arrows arced up over the small skirmish of soldiers below and toward the battlements of the Earth camp.

Several odd looking, strangely angular, armored warrior rapidly closed the distance between the camp and where Amina and the guardian were. They ignored the hail of arrows and even the stray rounds from their own camp, each of which bounced off of their armor with as much effect as hail stones. One of them impacted Amina's shield, charging at her like a bull, and sent the princess flying backwards several yards where she skidded to a halt.

The other, did something much more devastating.

They stopped just short of the defensive sphere that the guardian had crafted around himself, then touched something on each of their arms. Then they held their hands up with their middle fingers extended, in a gesture that James had taught her was an insult.

Sprays of thick brown fluid erupted from a set of tubes under their wrists. Something sparked, and the guardian and his spiders were engulfed in flames.

She heard him scream in rage and pain even as he disappeared behind the inferno. But she noticed that the spider swarm around the area didn't cease its movements, or lose cohesion.

There was another explosion, like the one before, followed by the same rapid popping. She looked up and saw James still flying around, using his explosions for rapid evasion as clouds of massive bullets attempted to intercept him.

More Petravian soldiers fell, though in smaller numbers now, as they figured out where the weak points in their magical defenses were and adjusted to get behind them.

Then she saw the armored warrior with the flames turn to look toward Amina, who was desperately fending off the other armored warrior while also having to avoid incoming fire.

Veliry flew from her position so fast that she left a trail of sand clouds behind her, her robes fluttering as she did.

The armored warrior sensed her approach somehow and turned to aim its flame weapons at her as she flew. Two gouts of flame sprayed out at her in a torrent, their fuel already ignited by the current inferno. These flames were met by a blast of compressed air that parted them before her like fog before Veliry's hand slammed into the warriors helmet, black and blue lightning bolts spraying into it from point blank range as she used her momentum to flip over and cling to its back.

The two of them began to roll and fight like cats on top of the sand, ashed webbing and scorched spiders.

\------------------------------

Faster. Must go faster. James thought as he dodged another cloud of the angry hornets that were the Miffy's projectiles. Vickers. You dick.

He knew the plan now. He'd flown close enough to the second one when it had destroyed itself.

Vickers, in his Navy SEAL stealthiness, had somehow rigged the Miffy's with rounds from his fire suppression launcher. He'd gotten the rounds into the cannons on top of the Miffy's and secured them well enough that they'd stay there even as the weapons spun up. Then they would either get damaged enough, or heated up enough by the barrels, to detonate. The resulting cloud of condensed, super cool, gases would cause an immediate failure in the extremely hot barrels.

But it wasn't an instant thing. The first truck had fired three, "Die! Motherfucker! Die!" long bursts at him before it had destroyed itself.

And he'd counted twelve of the things. They'd been re-positioned since his last flight. They weren't in the loose ring they'd been in before. Instead they'd been arrayed in two large arcs on the side of the camp AWAY from the opening to the desert. Where an approaching army wouldn't be able to get at them without dealing with the camp itself.

The only upside to their new formation, was that it meant James had one direction he didn't have to worry about them firing from.

The down side was that that side had an Army base, and the Petravian army launching arrows in high arcs.

He dodged again, just in time for another Miffy to detonate, though this time it did it without cooking off its ammo stores.

Then as he hovered, waiting for the next intercepting volley, something slammed into his back. The plate in his IOTBS stopped it. But it still knocked the wind out of him and made him falter in his flight.

He wanted to look to see what had happened when he heard a Miffy fire and had to dodge.

He decided to meet the two decisions in the middle.

James released his flight spell, and instead reached a hand up above him and emitted an explosion that shot him at the ground like a bullet. His other hand went to the chain wrapped around his torso and found the hook clip at the end.

He didn't know if any of the Earth soldiers had figured out magic yet. But he had a feeling that not many had. And even if they had, he had a feeling he was significantly better at it than they were. As such, he reckoned that his sword wouldn't be doing too much intercepting in this fight. So he decided to use it in a new way.

He fastened the hook clip at the end of the chain into the loop at the end of his sword's pommel.

Then just as he impacted the ground, kicking up a cloud of sand as he did, he grabbed the handle of the chain and began unwinding it with his wind magic.

A figure, obscured by the sand, raised their weapon and fired at him, creating three gunshot flashes as the expanding gas cleared the sand somewhat. James moved to dodge when something blurred into his view and intercepted the three rounds with lightning speed that he couldn't match even with his enhanced reflexes.

Changes to the original pattern. He remembered as the newly reforged Mage's blade, now the Dark Mage's blade in honor of the nature of its reforging, flashed forward at the end of his wind chain.

The figure in the rapidly clearing sand flinched as it realized what had happened. James saw a glint of dark blue and black power armor and knew that his opponent was one of the Muck Marchers.

Neither of them hesitated.

The Muck Marcher's weapon began barking rapidly even as James's chain and sword began to move around him in a rapid whirlwind of dark, multi-colored, steel and wind magic.

James began to advance on the armored opponent in the middle of its own camp.

\----------

"Motherfucker!" Vickers' armored opponent cursed as they reeled from the surprise counter to their burst of shots.

Vickers ripped the now half scorched ghillie cloak from his shoulders in a flourish as he turned around, grabbing his shield off his back with his other hand as he did.

Opposite him, now with only half their right arm, was the Muck Marcher that had shot at him. Their rifle lay in pieces on the ground, its barrel shattered and melted in some places from where its round had been sent back at it, faster and hotter than they'd left it.

The impacts had felt like hammer blows to his back, the caliber of the rifle being much larger than his pistol had been during his tests of the shield.

But he'd played baseball as a kid. He knew that when you got beaned you didn't show any pain. That was how you told the pitcher they threw like a little bitch.

"YOU MOTHERFUCKER!" The Muck Marcher repeated as they began running at him.

Wrong choice. He thought as he charged them right back. I already know what it does in THIS situation.

Vickers pressed his broken hand into the back of the shield, wincing at the ache there just as the Muck Marcher's fist impacted the shield.

There was another flare of orange light and heat.

Vickers smiled as he heard the Muck Marcher scream in surprise.

Then, with the fight now firmly in his favor, he was on them.

Before the armored behemoth could even land, Vickers was on top of them. His magically enhanced speed, coupled with his adrenaline enhanced battle focus allowing him to almost beat them to their own impact site.

The Muck Marcher didn't even have a chance to interpret the confusing array of information on their HUD before an icy, already broken, fist impacted their smoking armor like a gunshot.

\------------------------

Five reached up in desperation, both good hand and amputated arm reaching up in a feeble attempt to halt the assault.

Then the shield slammed into her chest and flared to life again, heating her armor even as it drove her deeper into the sand.

The fist followed it even before the sand had had a chance to settle and slammed her chest as well, chilling it to freezing temperature in a heartbeat.

Her suit began to flash warnings of impact damage and temperature fluctuations. And that was on top of the warnings for her damaged arm and the internal bleeding that her can was trying to compete with from her two separate flights.

Another shield bash. Followed by another punch.

Then again.

And again in a rapid staccato that seemed to grow faster and more violent with every second.

The sand around her began to melt from the heat before cooling and exploding from the cold. Then a few impacts later it would do it again.

Something cracked with a horrible crunching noise as she felt wind on her face. Her HUD darkened on the left side as she felt some of its LED's fall on her cheek like bits of dirt.

And he still wasn't stopping. Impact after impact rained down upon her like an artillery barrage of fire and ice.

For the first time in years. Since her first year in the armor, while she was still getting used to her newfound abilities.

For the first time in almost two decades, Five felt fear.

It was quickly replaced by pain as some part of her torso armor finally failed and allowed the angry SEAL into her domain. Magical Fire erupted within the suit, melting electrical components, medical tubing, and what little flesh she still had left.

Then cold, deeper than any arctic shelf she'd ever walked beneath, followed as she felt something crunch into the housing that held all her vital organs. She felt something in there crush as she suddenly struggled to breath.

She screamed in a horse croaking voice, and the only reason Vickers heard it was because there was daylight coming through a crack in her visor.

Then, miracle of miracles, just as she thought she was about to die. The impacts stopped.

Her HUD stuttered with static and occasionally went dark. But in the brief moments where it showed her display she saw the Chief stand up over her, shield on his left arm, right hand hanging in a mangled mess of ice and blood.

And he began to walk away.

\----------

Vickers looked down at the crushed, smoking, glassed over wreck of a Muck Marcher with anger, and more than a little bit of disgust.

Their chest armor was rent open and caved in from where he'd struck it. Their Helmet was half crushed and had a massive hole where his fist had managed to punch through the heat strained material.

They were dug several feet into the sand, which had fused and cracked several times over from his assault on them. This led him to notice that his pants were burned off from the knees down and his legs were red and burned where they hadn't sunk into the sand beside the armored opponent's body.

Something smelled like shit and meat that was on the verge of spoiling.

"All that armor and you can't even handle body shots." He said as he stepped on the things leg to get out of the crater and begin walking away.

He looked at the Miffy that was nearby. The one that the now smoldering Muck Marcher had been on the verge of inspecting. It hadn't fired the entire time he'd been fighting. Yet as he looked around and the rest of the battle came back into view, he saw that Choi had to have flown at least a bit. A little less than a quarter mile away another one of the Miffy's was on fire, its ammo cooking off from what had to have been its barrels exploding.

He looked back at the one next to them. He wasn't one to leave a job half finished.

Setting the shield on his back for a moment, he used his good hand to fish around in his bag again.

He made a point of ignoring the pain in his right hand. He could see the black and blue flesh under the layer of ice. Could see the bits of metal, and whatever else the Muck Marcher had been made of, sticking in between a pair of knuckles. It had blood frozen onto it.

He'd deal with that later. Just bad luck that it was his right hand.

After a few moments he found what he wanted.

He tucked the small white brick under his right arm as he grabbed his shield again.

Then the one Miffy that he hadn't been able to get to, the one in the center of the camp with a magnetically accelerated mortar, fired.

ZZZZZZZZPHUMPF! BANG!

Vickers saw the small vapor cone as the round immediately broke the sound barrier upon exiting the barrier.

"Shit." He said.

He looked back at the Miffy he'd been on the verge of destroying, and decided that maybe that could remain half finished for now.

Now he had a slightly more important target to deal with.

He began to run.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yjmw3b/wait_is_this_just_gate_252/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (251/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yall waited an entire weekend for this. THEN THERE WAS A FIREFIGHT!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

Veliry was there when the Earth soldiers struck out with their first gunshots.

She saw, for the first time since the Grabber camp, just what a firearm could do to flesh during combat.

She knew from the handful of soldiers and the two mages that had helped her set up their side of the passage door that James and Amina had warned the soldiers and mages present of what to do to protect the troops from the incoming barrage. Still, she saw just how deadly the projectiles were in spite of their attempts.

When the soldiers in the camp opened fire on the Petravian formations, she watched as dozens of soldiers fell, their positions putting them outside of the nearby mage's protective abilities, or as those abilities proved not strong enough to stop the incoming bullets.

She saw James fly up over the battle, and out of the way of the incoming volley, even as she saw Amina's left arm move in a blur of speed as her shield moved itself between her and the incoming attack. She saw what had to have been one of the twelve guardians of the Deep Dark as they staggered back, a wall of webs and spiders forming a half shell around them as they did.

Then something much larger than any of the firearms below began to make a long, drawn out tearing sound that made the air vibrate. She saw James, eyes glowing, emit an explosion and blast his way out of the path of something she couldn't see until her own eyes began glowing as well. Then there was a stutter in the tearing sound, followed by a massive explosion somewhere in the distance, followed by a rapid series of what sounded like gunshots, occurring rapidly and without rhythm.

Then two other things began to make similar ripping noises, and James was moving again.

She looked back down and saw the mages below still attempting to protect the advancing soldiers around them. The first of the archers, hiding behind a dune, had begun firing. A cloud of arrows arced up over the small skirmish of soldiers below and toward the battlements of the Earth camp.

Several odd looking, strangely angular, armored warrior rapidly closed the distance between the camp and where Amina and the guardian were. They ignored the hail of arrows and even the stray rounds from their own camp, each of which bounced off of their armor with as much effect as hail stones. One of them impacted Amina's shield, charging at her like a bull, and sent the princess flying backwards several yards where she skidded to a halt.

The other, did something much more devastating.

They stopped just short of the defensive sphere that the guardian had crafted around himself, then touched something on each of their arms. Then they held their hands up with their middle fingers extended, in a gesture that James had taught her was an insult.

Sprays of thick brown fluid erupted from a set of tubes under their wrists. Something sparked, and the guardian and his spiders were engulfed in flames.

She heard him scream in rage and pain even as he disappeared behind the inferno. But she noticed that the spider swarm around the area didn't cease its movements, or lose cohesion.

There was another explosion, like the one before, followed by the same rapid popping. She looked up and saw James still flying around, using his explosions for rapid evasion as clouds of massive bullets attempted to intercept him.

More Petravian soldiers fell, though in smaller numbers now, as they figured out where the weak points in their magical defenses were and adjusted to get behind them.

Then she saw the armored warrior with the flames turn to look toward Amina, who was desperately fending off the other armored warrior while also having to avoid incoming fire.

Veliry flew from her position so fast that she left a trail of sand clouds behind her, her robes fluttering as she did.

The armored warrior sensed her approach somehow and turned to aim its flame weapons at her as she flew. Two gouts of flame sprayed out at her in a torrent, their fuel already ignited by the current inferno. These flames were met by a blast of compressed air that parted them before her like fog before Veliry's hand slammed into the warriors helmet, black and blue lightning bolts spraying into it from point blank range as she used her momentum to flip over and cling to its back.

The two of them began to roll and fight like cats on top of the sand, ashed webbing and scorched spiders.

\------------------------------

Faster. Must go faster. James thought as he dodged another cloud of the angry hornets that were the Miffy's projectiles. Vickers. You dick.

He knew the plan now. He'd flown close enough to the second one when it had destroyed itself.

Vickers, in his Navy SEAL stealthiness, had somehow rigged the Miffy's with rounds from his fire suppression launcher. He'd gotten the rounds into the cannons on top of the Miffy's and secured them well enough that they'd stay there even as the weapons spun up. Then they would either get damaged enough, or heated up enough by the barrels, to detonate. The resulting cloud of condensed, super cool, gases would cause an immediate failure in the extremely hot barrels.

But it wasn't an instant thing. The first truck had fired three, "Die! Motherfucker! Die!" long bursts at him before it had destroyed itself.

And he'd counted twelve of the things. They'd been re-positioned since his last flight. They weren't in the loose ring they'd been in before. Instead they'd been arrayed in two large arcs on the side of the camp AWAY from the opening to the desert. Where an approaching army wouldn't be able to get at them without dealing with the camp itself.

The only upside to their new formation, was that it meant James had one direction he didn't have to worry about them firing from.

The down side was that that side had an Army base, and the Petravian army launching arrows in high arcs.

He dodged again, just in time for another Miffy to detonate, though this time it did it without cooking off its ammo stores.

Then as he hovered, waiting for the next intercepting volley, something slammed into his back. The plate in his IOTBS stopped it. But it still knocked the wind out of him and made him falter in his flight.

He wanted to look to see what had happened when he heard a Miffy fire and had to dodge.

He decided to meet the two decisions in the middle.

James released his flight spell, and instead reached a hand up above him and emitted an explosion that shot him at the ground like a bullet. His other hand went to the chain wrapped around his torso and found the hook clip at the end.

He didn't know if any of the Earth soldiers had figured out magic yet. But he had a feeling that not many had. And even if they had, he had a feeling he was significantly better at it than they were. As such, he reckoned that his sword wouldn't be doing too much intercepting in this fight. So he decided to use it in a new way.

He fastened the hook clip at the end of the chain into the loop at the end of his sword's pommel.

Then just as he impacted the ground, kicking up a cloud of sand as he did, he grabbed the handle of the chain and began unwinding it with his wind magic.

A figure, obscured by the sand, raised their weapon and fired at him, creating three gunshot flashes as the expanding gas cleared the sand somewhat. James moved to dodge when something blurred into his view and intercepted the three rounds with lightning speed that he couldn't match even with his enhanced reflexes.

Changes to the original pattern. He remembered as the newly reforged Mage's blade, now the Dark Mage's blade in honor of the nature of its reforging, flashed forward at the end of his wind chain.

The figure in the rapidly clearing sand flinched as it realized what had happened. James saw a glint of dark blue and black power armor and knew that his opponent was one of the Muck Marchers.

Neither of them hesitated.

The Muck Marcher's weapon began barking rapidly even as James's chain and sword began to move around him in a rapid whirlwind of dark, multi-colored, steel and wind magic.

James began to advance on the armored opponent in the middle of its own camp.

\----------

"Motherfucker!" Vickers' armored opponent cursed as they reeled from the surprise counter to their burst of shots.

Vickers ripped the now half scorched ghillie cloak from his shoulders in a flourish as he turned around, grabbing his shield off his back with his other hand as he did.

Opposite him, now with only half their right arm, was the Muck Marcher that had shot at him. Their rifle lay in pieces on the ground, its barrel shattered and melted in some places from where its round had been sent back at it, faster and hotter than they'd left it.

The impacts had felt like hammer blows to his back, the caliber of the rifle being much larger than his pistol had been during his tests of the shield.

But he'd played baseball as a kid. He knew that when you got beaned you didn't show any pain. That was how you told the pitcher they threw like a little bitch.

"YOU MOTHERFUCKER!" The Muck Marcher repeated as they began running at him.

Wrong choice. He thought as he charged them right back. I already know what it does in THIS situation.

Vickers pressed his broken hand into the back of the shield, wincing at the ache there just as the Muck Marcher's fist impacted the shield.

There was another flare of orange light and heat.

Vickers smiled as he heard the Muck Marcher scream in surprise.

Then, with the fight now firmly in his favor, he was on them.

Before the armored behemoth could even land, Vickers was on top of them. His magically enhanced speed, coupled with his adrenaline enhanced battle focus allowing him to almost beat them to their own impact site.

The Muck Marcher didn't even have a chance to interpret the confusing array of information on their HUD before an icy, already broken, fist impacted their smoking armor like a gunshot.

\-------------------------

Five reached up in desperation, both good hand and amputated arm reaching up in a feeble attempt to halt the assault.

Then the shield slammed into her chest and flared to life again, heating her armor even as it drove her deeper into the sand.

The fist followed it even before the sand had had a chance to settle and slammed her chest as well, chilling it to freezing temperature in a heartbeat.

Her suit began to flash warnings of impact damage and temperature fluctuations. And that was on top of the warnings for her damaged arm and the internal bleeding that her can was trying to compete with from her two separate flights.

Another shield bash. Followed by another punch.

Then again.

And again in a rapid staccato that seemed to grow faster and more violent with every second.

The sand around her began to melt from the heat before cooling and exploding from the cold. Then a few impacts later it would do it again.

Something cracked with a horrible crunching noise as she felt wind on her face. Her HUD darkened on the left side as she felt some of its LED's fall on her cheek like bits of dirt.

And he still wasn't stopping. Impact after impact rained down upon her like an artillery barrage of fire and ice.

For the first time in years. Since her first year in the armor, while she was still getting used to her newfound abilities.

For the first time in almost two decades, Five felt fear.

It was quickly replaced by pain as some part of her torso armor finally failed and allowed the angry SEAL into her domain. Magical Fire erupted within the suit, melting electrical components, medical tubing, and burned what little flesh she still had left.

Then cold, deeper than any arctic shelf she'd ever walked beneath, followed as she felt something crunch into the housing that held all her vital organs. She felt something in there crush as she suddenly struggled to breath.

She screamed in a horse croaking voice, and the only reason Vickers heard it was because there was daylight coming through a crack in her visor.

Then, miracle of miracles, just as she thought she was about to die. The impacts stopped.

Her HUD stuttered with static and occasionally went dark. But in the brief moments where it showed her display she saw the Chief stand up over her, shield on his left arm, right hand hanging in a mangled mess of ice and blood.

And he began to walk away.

\----------

Vickers looked down at the crushed, smoking, glassed over wreck of a Muck Marcher with anger, and more than a little bit of disgust.

Their chest armor was rent open and caved in from where he'd struck it. Their Helmet was half crushed and had a massive hole where his fist had managed to punch through the heat strained material.

They were dug several feet into the sand, which had fused and cracked several times over from his assault on them. This led him to notice that his pants were burned off from the knees down and his legs were red and burned where they hadn't sunk into the sand beside the armored opponent's body.

Something smelled like shit and meat that was on the verge of spoiling.

"All that armor and you can't even handle body shots." He said as he stepped on the things leg to get out of the crater and begin walking away.

He looked at the Miffy that was nearby. The one that the now smoldering Muck Marcher had been on the verge of inspecting. It hadn't fired the entire time he'd been fighting. Yet as he looked around and the rest of the battle came back into view, he saw that Choi had to have flown at least a bit. A little less than a quarter mile away another one of the Miffy's was on fire, its ammo cooking off from what had to have been its barrels exploding.

He looked back at the one next to them. He wasn't one to leave a job half finished.

Setting the shield on his back for a moment, he used his good hand to fish around in his bag again.

He made a point of ignoring the pain in his right hand. He could see the black and blue flesh under the layer of ice. Could see the bits of metal, and whatever else the Muck Marcher had been made of, sticking in between a pair of knuckles. It had blood frozen onto it.

He'd deal with that later. Just bad luck that it was his right hand.

After a few moments he found what he wanted.

He tucked the small white brick under his right arm as he grabbed his shield again.

Then the one Miffy that he hadn't been able to get to, the one in the center of the camp with a magnetically accelerated mortar, fired.

ZZZZZZZZPHUMPF! BANG!

Vickers saw the small vapor cone as the round immediately broke the sound barrier upon exiting the barrier.

"Shit." He said.

He looked back at the Miffy he'd been on the verge of destroying, and decided that maybe that could remain half finished for now.

Now he had a slightly more important target to deal with.

He began to run.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yjmt3x/wait_is_this_just_gate_252/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (250/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah. This is all ya get until Monday. Also, if yall expected fair fights just because, "So and so has blah-blah power" -or- "I don't see how \[insert ability here\] can possibly defeat the power of \[vaguely realistic future tech here\]"

WELL GUESS WHAT?!?!? Sometimes you're right and sometimes you aint. And sometimes a guy pulls the pin on a grenade and instead of an explosion it says "There's a snake in mah boot" While some kid somewhere pulls the string on their doll and
EXPLODES!!!

Predictability goes out the window in wars where magic is a thing that clashes with science fiction.

NOW LET'S GET READY TO-

-enjoy an interesting few chapters.

Edit: I might have had way to much caffeine this morning. lol

\~

Joey was busy reading a fascinating book about how enchanting items actually created a tether to the person who created the item when the doorway in Veliry's lab "turned on". He didn't notice at first because of his distraction. But there was no mistaking her signal as she tossed it through. The stone clattered against one of her shelves before letting out a quick, and loud, horn noise.

Joey's head shot up and saw the door now lit around its edges with a soft pink light from the runes in its frame.

"Shit!" He yelled as he leapt up and ran out of the room. "SERGEANT MARIUS!!!" He yelled down the hall as he ran.

He almost ran over a pair of servants as he exited past the magical door and froze.

"Hello." He said as he blushed. "Sorry. Please send for Sergeant Marius if you can. I'm going to see if I can find him."

One of the two people nodded in confusion.

"Thank you." Joey said before running again.

\-------------------------

Vickers sprung from the ground as the Muck Marcher got next to the last Miffy he'd rigged. They'd clearly been studying it as they'd gotten nearer, and as they looked up at the multi-barrelled canon he'd known the game was up.

He was however, pleasantly surprised that they hadn't been able to detect him. He'd only gotten about ten yards from the machine when the armored cyborg had come over the nearby dune. He'd almost expected them to charge him, or to begin firing. But instead he'd watched as they walked within only five feet of him, his breath held and his body as relaxed and still as he could get. Luckily he'd dug himself deep into the sand as he moved.

Then he'd seen the Muck Marcher on the verge of climbing up the side of the vehicle to inspect whatever it had noticed.

He couldn't let that happen.

As slowly as he'd been able, he'd pulled his knife out of the sheathe on his shoulder and slowly cut the ghillie cloak off of his shoulders and neck.

Then he burst into motion.

He should have known better.

The Muck Marcher was already facing him as he took his first step toward them. Their right hand was already bringing a rifle up to aim at him. Their left hand was bringing out a knife that was practically identical to his.

But for probably the first time in the Muck Marchers entire career, someone was faster than they were. He saw them take a half step back in surprise at the speed of his approach.

Vickers' right hand shot out in a frost coated fist as he stepped into fighting range.

The rifle shot sideways, and for just a split second the SEAL thought that he'd successfully disarmed the cyborg.

Then he saw the hand of the suit bent almost backwards on itself, at an angle that would have shattered a human wrist. But it still held the rifle with a vice-like grip.

He didn't have time to follow up as he had to immediately dodge back, narrowly avoiding a knife to the ribs as he did.

He also didn't give them any time to try to bring the rifle back forward and up. He stepped in again, left hand wielding the knife as his icy right blocked and redirected the rapid swings of the enemy blade.

He and his fellow SEALS had trained knife fighting almost as a hobby back on Earth, frequently sparring with kali sticks, markers, and rubber training blades. He'd also gotten quite a bit better with a sword and shield specifically for his mission to this world.

But the Muck Marcher was faster than anyone he'd ever gone toe to toe with before.

They were keeping up with him even as he saw the right hand snap itself back into position.

He was evenly matching an armored opponent who was only using one arm to fight him.

Shit. He thought. That's not good.

"Nice to meet you Vickers." The Muck Marcher said through its speaker as it took a step forward, pressing him a step back. "I've read your file. Cool magic punch."

Vickers flew back, his breath knocked out of him, as a knee that was faster than he could see slammed into his torso. He slammed into the sand and rolled in a spray of fine grit. But he'd been hit harder than that before. Or at least he thought he had. It would depend on how many ribs ended up broken after this.

He used the roll and his momentum to land on his feet as he came to terms with what had just happened.

The Muck Marcher was already on him.

"Sadly." The cyborg said as it began harassing him with its knife again. He noticed that it was simply holding its rifle at its side, not involving it or its arm in the fight still. "You've brought a fist and a knife to an armored gun fight."

Then Vickers saw a window. His fist flashed through the opening in his opponents defenses and flew towards their helmeted face.

PING!!!

The report of the impact was like a gong being rung as Vickers recoiled from the unexpected pain in his hand.

There wasn't a scratch on the helmet, and the ice he'd left behind flaked off like nothing. Their head wasn't even cocked back.

"Also, cold won't work on me." The Muck Marcher said as it tilted its head. "My suit can walk on the bottom of the ocean." They held the knife hand up and waved it in a so-so gesture. "Maybe not down at the Trench or anything. But we still go lower than enemy subs. Cold? Pressure?" Their hand turned and raised a finger, which it shook from side to side. "Not gonna work chief. You're gonna have to hit a lot harder than that."

"Deal." He said as he flexed the aggravated hand. He began gathering as much energy into the hand as he could.

"Hmm?" The cyborg wondered.

"Harder it is." Vickers added as he focused the energy onto his central knuckle.

Vickers closed the five foot distance so fast that the Muck Marcher's finger was still pointed upward.

Visualization. He thought as his fist flew forward in an uppercut aimed right at the enemy's sternum. Choi. The princess. The little redhead. They all say the same thing; that it's all about visualization.

His mind went to one of his favorite video games. He had the 25th anniversary edition downloaded on his phone back on Earth.

Fus Ro Dah motherfucker.

The Muck Marcher flinched back ever so slightly at the unexpectedly fast intruder to their personal space. The small bit of space it made in doing so actually let Vickers get just the right amount of extension on his arm to make the punch connect just the way he wanted.

His fist impacted the Muck Marcher's chest like a cannon shot. There was the briefest moment, not even a tenth of a second, where the cyborg was still on the ground in front of him.

He heard, and felt, the bones in his hand crack and break from the impact. He had to have broken at least three of his knuckles, and who knew how many of his metacarpal bones. He felt the pain of it scream up his arm and into his brain. But he'd broken his hands before. He'd live.

He heard something that sounded like a person being slugged in the gut. A slight "Oof!" sound. But it came from the suit's speaker.

Then the Muck Marcher was flying.

It didn't go far. Maybe ten yards. Fifteen tops. As it turned out, all that metal, machinery, and circuitry made the Muck Marchers damned heavy. But it had the desired effect as he saw the cyborg slam into the sand on its back, kicking up a massive cloud of sand.

He had a moment of triumphant pride.

Then his hand started hurting. He brought it in close and began shaking it as he took deep breaths.

"Ooooow!" He said to nobody.

Then he heard something.

"You have committed acts of war and crimes of malice against the nation of Petravus and its citizens!" He heard the princess say somewhere in the distance. She must have been doing the glowy mouth thing that her and her father could do when they needed.

That meant that shit was going down.

He sheathed the knife in his left hand and began fishing through his bottomless bag, looking for the message stone that would let him talk to them. His right hand made the job difficult. But he had to tell them that the Miffy's were rigged. Or at least they should be, assuming the spiders had done the job.

"Hehehehe!" He heard from within the now settling dust cloud. He froze as he realized what it meant. "That was a lot better chief." He heard a grunt of discomfort just as his left hand found the smooth white stone with the green and red symbols on it. "Still not hard enough though."

He quickly lifted the stone to his mouth, using his broken hand to swipe the symbols on it, just as he saw the rifle aimed at his chest.

"CHOI!" He yelled into it as he spun around. "FLY!"

BA-BA-BANG!

Vickers felt heat as a bright orange light flared out.

\----------

James was faster on the draw than the Major. He knew he would be.

BANG!

His pistol cracked once and he watched, with a sense of joy that he felt just a bit bad about despite everything else, as the Major's pistol was launched from her hand before she gripped at her gunshot forearm.

She glared at him with a look that promised vengeance.

CLANG!

James peeked over and saw Amina's sword pressed against Driscoll's forearm even as the Muck Marcher fought to loosen its pistol arm from a thick coating of webbing and some other goo that James didn't want to think of. Kai was moving and flexing his control arm rapidly, his face now covered in the many eyed mask that James had seen before.

"Drop it!" The First Sergeant commanded, drawing James's attention back quickly. He turned to see the man aiming his rifle at James. "Drop the pistol."

"You drop yours first." James said as his pistol continued aiming at the Major. "I was trying to do this the peaceful way. Y'all are the ones who got rude."

"Fuck you, you spidery bitch!" Driscoll yelled off to the side as his helmet was quickly wrapped in webs, spiders skittering all over him. Amina drove her sword into the weak point under his shoulder with a metallic grinding noise as she used her shield to keep the Muck Marcher's grasping hand away from her. After a moment there was a loud crunching noise as the arm popped off and was carried away by the horde of arachnids.

James looked back at the two soldiers and tilted his head as he cocked an eyebrow.

The First Sergeant made the mistake of looking over at the skirmish between the three combatants. And that was all James needed.

His left hand flashed forward, leather wrapped handle in its grip. There was a metallic rasping noise that bordered on mechanical. Then a length of chain ripped the rifle from the soldier's hands violently faster than he could react.

First Sergeant Nguyen looked at his unexpectedly empty hand in shock.

"Thank god. Finally dialing that in." James said as the chain snaked back around. "First Sergeant. Do I know you from somewhere?" He asked, hand on his hip. "You know what? Not important. Vickers needs me." He looked over to where Kai was standing over the now unrecognizable Driscoll, who more closely resembled the end of a Q-tip than a person. "Kai. Mind wrapping these two up?"

Kai nodded, then flexed his arm. James watched with satisfaction as the horde of spiders swarmed over the two soldiers.

Then, despite his incredibly traumatizing memories of what had happened the last time, James began to fly upwards just as the first of the Petravian soldiers made it to their location.

He regretted it almost immediately as he heard the Major, in her last few seconds before becoming a coccoon, yell.

"FIRE AT WILL!" She yelled. James heard it reverberate through the camp from unseen speakers.

Suddenly, the world became thunder.

Amina. He thought as he heard the rippling cracks, and buzzing chatter of the assault rifles and LMG's below him. Survive this. Please.

And then the nearest Miffy began to fire at him.

Not this time motherfuckers. He thought.

His eyes began to glow.

\------------------

Joey watched as Sergeant Marius, a brawny half dwarf with a spirally mustache, hopped back through the door. He landed on his feet and then put his hands on his knees.

"That'll take some learnin'." He said as he fought to keep his breakfast down. "Bit spinny."

"That's the bottomless bag sub-dimension." Joey said. "You go weightless for just a second."

"Sure lad." The Sergeant said as he stood up and took a deep breath. Then he looked around and nodded at what he saw. "Guardian." He said. "You and your special squad ready?"

"We are." The massive elf said as she slung the simple rifle on her shoulder. "All of us are armed and loaded with the new weapons."

Marius stepped out of the way. "On your way then." He instructed. "One at a time, give the person in front of ya a second to move out of the way before you go. Exit's about a mile from the action. You'll hear it."

"It's already begun?" Ira'Nyl asked.

"Aye." The dwarf answered.

She nodded and looked back at the other Petravian riflemen. "On the double then." She said and immediately jumped into the open door.

Marius stood to the side and held a hand up in a stop gesture for a few moments to prevent a pile-up on the other side. Then he waved the next soldier through.

"The other troops ready?" Marius asked as he waved a third soldier through.

Joey nodded.

"Good. Go get the next one and have em line up outside, single file. I want archers." The Sergeant instructed.

"O-Okay." Joey stammered as he moved to do so.

The door actually works long distance. He thought with a smile. Then he thought of what Sergeant Marius had said and looked back, the smile fading. But they ARE fighting over there. Hope Jamesy's alright.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yikr2z/wait_is_this_just_gate_251/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (250/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah. This is all ya get until Monday. Also, if yall expected fair fights just because, "So and so has blah-blah power" -or- "I don't see how \[insert ability here\] can possibly defeat the power of \[vaguely realistic future tech here\]"

WELL GUESS WHAT?!?!? Sometimes you're right and sometimes you aint. And sometimes a guy pulls the pin on a grenade and instead of an explosion it says "There's a snake in mah boot" While some kid somewhere pulls the string on their doll and
EXPLODES!!!

Predictability goes out the window in wars where magic is a thing that clashes with science fiction.

NOW LET'S GET READY TO-

-enjoy an interesting few chapters.

Edit: I might have had way to much caffeine this morning. lol

\~

Joey was busy reading a fascinating book about how enchanting items actually created a tether to the person who created the item when the doorway in Veliry's lab "turned on". He didn't notice at first because of his distraction. But there was no mistaking her signal as she tossed it through. The stone clattered against one of her shelves before letting out a quick, and loud, horn noise.

Joey's head shot up and saw the door now lit around its edges with a soft pink light from the runes in its frame.

"Shit!" He yelled as he leapt up and ran out of the room. "SERGEANT MARIUS!!!" He yelled down the hall as he ran.

He almost ran over a pair of servants as he exited past the magical door and froze.

"Hello." He said as he blushed. "Sorry. Please send for Sergeant Marius if you can. I'm going to see if I can find him."

One of the two people nodded in confusion.

"Thank you." Joey said before running again.

\-------------------------

Vickers sprung from the ground as the Muck Marcher got next to the last Miffy he'd rigged. They'd clearly been studying it as they'd gotten nearer, and as they looked up at the multi-barrelled canon he'd known the game was up.

He was however, pleasantly surprised that they hadn't been able to detect him. He'd only gotten about ten yards from the machine when the armored cyborg had come over the nearby dune. He'd almost expected them to charge him, or to begin firing. But instead he'd watched as they walked within only five feet of him, his breath held and his body as relaxed and still as he could get. Luckily he'd dug himself deep into the sand as he moved.

Then he'd seen the Muck Marcher on the verge of climbing up the side of the vehicle to inspect whatever it had noticed.

He couldn't let that happen.

As slowly as he'd been able, he'd pulled his knife out of the sheathe on his shoulder and slowly cut the ghillie cloak off of his shoulders and neck.

Then he burst into motion.

He should have known better.

The Muck Marcher was already facing him as he took his first step toward them. Their right hand was already bringing a rifle up to aim at him. Their left hand was bringing out a knife that was practically identical to his.

But for probably the first time in the Muck Marchers entire career, someone was faster than they were. He saw them take a half step back in surprise at the speed of his approach.

Vickers' right hand shot out in a frost coated fist as he stepped into fighting range.

The rifle shot sideways, and for just a split second the SEAL thought that he'd successfully disarmed the cyborg.

Then he saw the hand of the suit bent almost backwards on itself, at an angle that would have shattered a human wrist. But it still held the rifle with a vice-like grip.

He didn't have time to follow up as he had to immediately dodge back, narrowly avoiding a knife to the ribs as he did.

He also didn't give them any time to try to bring the rifle back forward and up. He stepped in again, left hand wielding the knife as his icy right blocked and redirected the rapid swings of the enemy blade.

He and his fellow SEALS had trained knife fighting almost as a hobby back on Earth, frequently sparring with kali sticks, markers, and rubber training blades. He'd also gotten quite a bit better with a sword and shield specifically for his mission to this world.

But the Muck Marcher was faster than anyone he'd ever gone toe to toe with before.

They were keeping up with him even as he saw the right hand snap itself back into position.

He was evenly matching an armored opponent who was only using one arm to fight him.

Shit. He thought. That's not good.

"Nice to meet you Vickers." The Muck Marcher said through its speaker as it took a step forward, pressing him a step back. "I've read your file. Cool magic punch."

Vickers flew back, his breath knocked out of him, as a knee that was faster than he could see slammed into his torso. He slammed into the sand and rolled in a spray of fine grit. But he'd been hit harder than that before. Or at least he thought he had. It would depend on how many ribs ended up broken after this.

He used the roll and his momentum to land on his feet as he came to terms with what had just happened.

The Muck Marcher was already on him.

"Sadly." The cyborg said as it began harassing him with its knife again. He noticed that it was simply holding its rifle at its side, not involving it or its arm in the fight still. "You've brought a fist and a knife to an armored gun fight."

Then Vickers saw a window. His fist flashed through the opening in his opponents defenses and flew towards their helmeted face.

PING!!!

The report of the impact was like a gong being rung as Vickers recoiled from the unexpected pain in his hand.

There wasn't a scratch on the helmet, and the ice he'd left behind flaked off like nothing. Their head wasn't even cocked back.

"Also, cold won't work on me." The Muck Marcher said as it tilted its head. "My suit can walk on the bottom of the ocean." They held the knife hand up and waved it in a so-so gesture. "Maybe not down at the Trench or anything. But we still go lower than enemy subs. Cold? Pressure?" Their hand turned and raised a finger, which it shook from side to side. "Not gonna work chief. You're gonna have to hit a lot harder than that."

"Deal." He said as he flexed the aggravated hand. He began gathering as much energy into the hand as he could.

"Hmm?" The cyborg wondered.

"Harder it is." Vickers added as he focused the energy onto his central knuckle.

Vickers closed the five foot distance so fast that the Muck Marcher's finger was still pointed upward.

Visualization. He thought as his fist flew forward in an uppercut aimed right at the enemy's sternum. Choi. The princess. The little redhead. They all say the same thing; that it's all about visualization.

His mind went to one of his favorite video games. He had the 25th anniversary edition downloaded on his phone back on Earth.

Fus Ro Dah motherfucker.

The Muck Marcher flinched back ever so slightly at the unexpectedly fast intruder to their personal space. The small bit of space it made in doing so actually let Vickers get just the right amount of extension on his arm to make the punch connect just the way he wanted.

His fist impacted the Muck Marcher's chest like a cannon shot. There was the briefest moment, not even a tenth of a second, where the cyborg was still on the ground in front of him.

He heard, and felt, the bones in his hand crack and break from the impact. He had to have broken at least three of his knuckles, and who knew how many of his metacarpal bones. He felt the pain of it scream up his arm and into his brain. But he'd broken his hands before. He'd live.

He heard something that sounded like a person being slugged in the gut. A slight "Oof!" sound. But it came from the suit's speaker.

Then the Muck Marcher was flying.

It didn't go far. Maybe ten yards. Fifteen tops. As it turned out, all that metal, machinery, and circuitry made the Muck Marchers damned heavy. But it had the desired effect as he saw the cyborg slam into the sand on its back, kicking up a massive cloud of sand.

He had a moment of triumphant pride.

Then his hand started hurting. He brought it in close and began shaking it as he took deep breaths.

"Ooooow!" He said to nobody.

Then he heard something.

^("You have committed acts of war and crimes of malice against the nation of Petravus and its citizens!") He heard the princess say somewhere in the distance. She must have been doing the glowy mouth thing that her and her father could do when they needed.

That meant that shit was going down.

He sheathed the knife in his left hand and began fishing through his bottomless bag, looking for the message stone that would let him talk to them. His right hand made the job difficult. But he had to tell them that the Miffy's were rigged. Or at least they should be, assuming the spiders had done the job.

"Hehehehe!" He heard from within the now settling dust cloud. He froze as he realized what it meant. "That was a lot better chief." He heard a grunt of discomfort just as his left hand found the smooth white stone with the green and red symbols on it. "Still not hard enough though."

He quickly lifted the stone to his mouth, using his broken hand to swipe the symbols on it, just as he saw the rifle aimed at his chest.

"CHOI!" He yelled into it as he spun around. "FLY!"

BA-BA-BANG!

Vickers felt heat as a bright orange light flared out.

\----------

James was faster on the draw than the Major. He knew he would be.

BANG!

His pistol cracked once and he watched, with a sense of joy that he felt just a bit bad about despite everything else, as the Major's pistol was launched from her hand before she gripped at her gunshot forearm.

She glared at him with a look that promised vengeance.

CLANG!

James peeked over and saw Amina's sword pressed against Driscoll's forearm even as the Muck Marcher fought to loosen its pistol arm from a thick coating of webbing and some other goo that James didn't want to think of. Kai was moving and flexing his control arm rapidly, his face now covered in the many eyed mask that James had seen before.

"Drop it!" The First Sergeant commanded, drawing James's attention back quickly. He turned to see the man aiming his rifle at James. "Drop the pistol."

"You drop yours first." James said as his pistol continued aiming at the Major. "I was trying to do this the peaceful way. Y'all are the ones who got rude."

"Fuck you, you spidery bitch!" Driscoll yelled off to the side as his helmet was quickly wrapped in webs, spiders skittering all over him. Amina drove her sword into the weak point under his shoulder with a metallic grinding noise as she used her shield to keep the Muck Marcher's grasping hand away from her. After a moment there was a loud crunching noise as the arm popped off and was carried away by the horde of arachnids.

James looked back at the two soldiers and tilted his head as he cocked an eyebrow.

The First Sergeant made the mistake of looking over at the skirmish between the three combatants. And that was all James needed.

His left hand flashed forward, leather wrapped handle in its grip. There was a metallic rasping noise that bordered on mechanical. Then a length of chain ripped the rifle from the soldier's hands violently faster than he could react.

First Sergeant Nguyen looked at his unexpectedly empty hand in shock.

"Thank god. Finally dialing that in." James said as the chain snaked back around. "First Sergeant. Do I know you from somewhere?" He asked, hand on his hip. "You know what? Not important. Vickers needs me." He looked over to where Kai was standing over the now unrecognizable Driscoll, who more closely resembled the end of a Q-tip than a person. "Kai. Mind wrapping these two up?"

Kai nodded, then flexed his arm. James watched with satisfaction as the horde of spiders swarmed over the two soldiers.

Then, despite his incredibly traumatizing memories of what had happened the last time, James began to fly upwards just as the first of the Petravian soldiers made it to their location.

He regretted it almost immediately as he heard the Major, in her last few seconds before becoming a coccoon, yell.

"FIRE AT WILL!" She yelled. James heard it reverberate through the camp from unseen speakers.

Suddenly, the world became thunder.

Amina. He thought as he heard the rippling cracks, and buzzing chatter of the assault rifles and LMG's below him. Survive this. Please.

And then the nearest Miffy began to fire at him.

Not this time motherfuckers. He thought.

His eyes began to glow.

\------------------

Joey watched as Sergeant Marius, a brawny half dwarf with a spirally mustache, hopped back through the door. He landed on his feet and then put his hands on his knees.

"That'll take some learnin'." He said as he fought to keep his breakfast down. "Bit spinny."

"That's the bottomless bag sub-dimension." Joey said. "You go weightless for just a second."

"Sure lad." The Sergeant said as he stood up and took a deep breath. Then he looked around and nodded at what he saw. "Guardian." He said. "You and your special squad ready?"

"We are." The massive elf said as she slung the simple rifle on her shoulder. "All of us are armed and loaded with the new weapons."

Marius stepped out of the way. "On your way then." He instructed. "One at a time, give the person in front of ya a second to move out of the way before you go. Exit's about a mile from the action. You'll hear it."

"It's already begun?" Ira'Nyl asked.

"Aye." The dwarf answered.

She nodded and looked back at the other Petravian riflemen. "On the double then." She said and immediately jumped into the open door.

Marius stood to the side and held a hand up in a stop gesture for a few moments to prevent a pile-up on the other side. Then he waved the next soldier through.

"The other troops ready?" Marius asked as he waved a third soldier through.

Joey nodded.

"Good. Go get the next one and have em line up outside, single file. I want archers." The Sergeant instructed.

"O-Okay." Joey stammered as he moved to do so.

The door actually works long distance. He thought with a smile. Then he thought of what Sergeant Marius had said and looked back, the smile fading. But they ARE fighting over there. Hope Jamesy's alright.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yiknbd/wait_is_this_just_gate_251/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (249/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Well would you look at that. Things are about to kick off just in time for chapter 250. Neat.

Also: Jimbo aint no himbo.

Enjoy.

\~

It was impossible NOT to notice all the firearms being held by the FOB soldiers as James, Amina, and Kai walked towards the three individuals in front of them.

Major Patinson, First Sergeant Nguyen, and Chief Driscoll stood a hundred yards in front of the camp. Large wire wrapped bags of sand had been spray-creted together, and razor wire lined the top of the make shift wall. Soldiers were positioned in position every few dozen yards, including several machine gun nests. James could see the barrel of the central Miffy sticking up from just off center of the camp. Its single, magnetically accelerated mortar already angled upward and in their direction.

If the walls had been a bit more uniform it would have looked like the FOB his unit had been in at NTC, just smaller.

He gulped as they finally got close enough to "talk".

"Captain Choi." The Major said with a fake smile. "Nice to finally meet the man of the hour."

"Coulda done that almost a week ago." James shot back. "If you hadn't shot me down."

Her eyebrows raised. "So that was you?" She gestured at Driscoll. "Chief Driscoll here suspected as much after trying to figure out what happened to you."

"I think you mean, 'what happened to THE BODY' don't you?" Kai interjected, his eyes never leaving the shiny face plate of the Muck Marcher across from him. To his credit, Driscoll hadn't so much as acknowledged that anything was happening.

James saw the glance Nguyen shot at the back of the Major's head. He thought maybe he recognized the First Sergeant but he couldn't think of how, or from where.

"Admittedly, the fact that you survived is somewhat shocking Captain." The Major admitted. "Allow me to apologize."

Then she did something that none of them had expected. Based on their reactions, neither had the two men next to her.

She stepped aside and gestured for him to move to her side.

"Fall in Captain." She said sternly.

Despite everything else.

His anger and at times hatred of the military complex that he was, admittedly a part of.

The love he had come to have for this world and its people, especially the woman next to him.

All the aches in his bones and muscles that he still had from his near death experience at the hands of the woman across from him.

Despite even the fact that he knew that... really... Earth had no more anchor points for him anymore. He would never go back.

Despite all of this; a small part of him that had been forced into his brain by all the indoctrination, all the smokings, and counseling statements, and Drill Sergeants yelling at him. Plus the two years of service he'd had since leaving AIT.

It was the part of him that was always, even years from now, going to be a soldier. It was what drove some former soldiers to occasionally get high and tights. It was what drove them to reenlist years after they'd sworn to never go in again. What drove them to walk taller and more rigidly even in civilian clothes. The thing that dug into them despite how much they hated it, even if they acknowledged that they hated it.

That part of his brain screamed at him to yell "MOVING!" and jog over next to the Major. Like a good little soldier.

Amina must have sensed the conflict inside him. How could she not? She knew him better than anyone except his own mother, and was a soldier in her own right.

"James?" She asked with just a hint of concern.

James raised his head back up and stared the Major in the eyes.

That part of his brain shut up as he firmly pressed it back into its box.

"No." He said, just as firmly as the Major had.

James watched as the Muck Marcher's armor made a slight whine as his hand moved down to the pistol sticking off his hip by some unseen means. Even the First Sergeant seemed to tense at the denial.

"What was that CAPTAIN?" The Major asked venomously.

James lifted his head higher.

"I said no." He replied.

"That's an order Choi." She said. "Fall... In."

James felt Amina watching him. He felt Kai watching him, in that odd way that the elf had of doing so without ACTUALLY looking at someone. He saw all the soldiers on the wall in front of him looking at him, likely unable to hear him unless they had open comms or were in the command tent or something. And he KNEW the Petravian soldiers were watching from just behind the dune they'd come over for the meeting.

He didn't want to disappoint. Besides; every soldier wanted to say this at some point.

He smirked just a tiny bit.

\["Fuck you..... Ma'am."\] He said in English.

Kai turned his head in James's direction just a bit. Amina simply looked back at the three across from her as she put on her own smirk.

To her credit, the Major didn't so much as bat an eye at the remark.

"Chief." She said. Driscoll turned to look at her, his hand now openly resting on the pistol. "Detain this man for insubordination."

The Muck Marcher moved even faster than James had anticipated. He had barely even heard Amina's sword begin to move in its sheathe when the armored submarine killer was almost halfway through the distance between the two groups.

James held up his hand.

"I wouldn't if I were you." He said calmly.

Even as he said the words he saw that the Muck Marcher wasn't going to stop. He also heard the muted twanging of Kai's controls being used. The ground in front of the Muck Marcher's advance began to bubble and roil as he neared it. He stopped, his suit and his trained reflexes warning him of the danger in time to dodge the emerging spider horde.

Driscoll stopped in his tracks and looked at Kai. The three of them could sense the scowl hidden behind his helmet even as his external speaker turned on.

"You." He hissed.

"Major!" James yelled. "Pump the brakes for a second. I got my reasons."

"Hold!" She yelled. Driscoll froze in place with a glance back at the officer.

"Kai." James said softly. "Not just yet."

Next to him the dark elf's jaw clenched as he slowly withdrew his spiders back into the ground. In only a matter of moments it was as if the hundreds, or maybe thousands, of them had never even been there.

"Interesting company you keep these days Captain Choi." The Major said coolly, as if she hadn't just seen a horde of most people's nightmares just pop up like spring water. "Explain your reasoning for not following a lawful order."

James was actually startled by her willingness to listen. Vickers had him thinking that she'd dismiss him out of hand. But, this was still in line with what he wanted to happen.

"For starters." He began. "I don't recognize your authority." He said. The statement had the, somewhat, desired effect as he saw the muscles in the Major's jaw and neck strain as she clenched her jaw. "I was never informed of your intrusion into this country. Or, you know," He shook his head a bit. "This world." He shrugged a bit. "And I have no ACTUAL proof that you are ACTUAL Earth military other than a pretty good resemblance."

"Really?" She asked. "That's your approach?"

"It's a fair one." He replied. "Even if its a bit weak. Additionally; even if you ARE actual Earth military. Coming here uninvited by the King or any of his family is not only a violation of the accords between the United States government and the Petravian Monarchy. But also a blatant act of war." He tilted his head at Amina. "Killing a Royal Army patrol, even if they were making moves to arrest you, is another act of war."

The Major licked her lips a bit before biting on the lower one a bit.

"Yeah." He continued. "We know about that." He nodded to Kai this time. "Additionally. Killing civilians, which is what those dwarves were, is another act of war. AND A WAR CRIME!" He exclaimed loudly. "Plus one of them was a member of Clan Drakrid, and resulted in the death of not only a rider, but their mount as well."

He took a step forward and pointed his finger at her. "I'm the one that's gonna collect for that one." He said with anger in his eyes. Then he nodded at Kai again. "Then you invaded the Deep Dark. Not a huge deal in and of itself. But you killed more innocent civilians while you were down there. And THAT." He pointed at the spot on the ground where the spiders had been. "Is why they're here."

He turned his back to the Major and was about to rejoin Amina and Kai when the Major answered.

"Is that all?" She asked. She said it as if she was simply upset at how small a beer selection a bar had.

He turned back, angry now.

"What?" He asked.

She looked at him with no hint of emotion. "I said; is that all?" She repeated.

"Isn't that enough?" He asked as he turned around. "Besides. I don't answer to you... MAJOR." He said angrily. "I'm following orders from someone significantly higher up the chain than you."

"General Krick?" She asked. He was about to nod when she amended her statement. "Or should I say, the LATE... General Krick."

James didn't give her the satisfaction of a response. Instead he turned to Amina.

"Hon." He said. She nodded.

"You have committed acts of war and crimes of malice against the nation of Petravus and its citizens!" She announced, her throat and mouth glowing.

As she did, the first rank of Petravian soldiers stepped up to the top of the dune behind them, shields at the ready and spears out.

"You have broken treaties and pacts between our two nations with no visible authority to do so, and for reasons that are, as of yet, undetermined."

The rank stepped forward, as did several formations on each side of the dune. Now archers and mages were visible. The Mages were all glowing with different colors of readied magics.

"For this, you are hereby under arrest! I, General and Princess Amina Petravius, and the forces accompanying me, shall take you into custody!"

Another set of ranks, and more visible formations.

"Lay down your arms and surrender peacefully!" Amina said. Then with a note of deadly finality added. "OR ELSE!"

James saw the glow in Amina's face dim as she settled back next to him.

The Major nodded, her eyebrows raised a bit. Then she stepped up. She was about to say something, James was sure that it was going to be pithy and maybe even use his own words against him. But he beat her to it.

"What was it you s-" She began.

"I'd hold off Major!" He interrupted. Her mask slipped as she showed a split second of anger. James fished into his shirt for a moment as if looking for something. His finger poked through as hole and waggled for a moment. Then he pulled out his phone and held it up.

He lifted it up into the air and turned around. Then he gave it the peace sign while sticking his tongue out.

\["Smile Major."\] He said. \["We've been live streaming this whole time."\] He held the phone out and switched the cameras so he could use it like a normal camera.

Her jaw clenched and James saw a vein bulge on her forehead.

"Nice try Choi." She said. "But you don't have any signal."

James exaggeratedly winced and sucked air through his teeth.

"You sure about that?" He asked. "Might wanna have someone on Earth check for you. It's up on the tube. Along with instructions on how to translate spoken Petravian."

As the Major pulled up a tablet and began looking at things, Choi looked and saw the soldiers on the wall doing what they could to get small. The way soldiers always did when they saw trouble coming their way.

He also saw First Sergeant Nguyen staring at the Major with his rifle almost readied. He hoped he was reading THAT situation right.

Then he also, finally, saw doubt on the Major's face.

Then she surprised him again.

"Chief. Arrest this man, and destroy that phone." She said harshly as she began reaching for her pistol.

Then, just like the always seemed to wherever he went, things began to move very quickly.

Driscoll began rushing toward Kai. Kai returned the hostility by bringing his right arm up as if performing an uppercut, causing the sand to bubble and roil again before spiders burst from it once more. Amina charged forward, shield in front of her and sword already moving to strike the Muck Marcher.

Then, even as his own pistol beat the Major's out of their respective holsters and drew a bead on her, he heard a familiar, and entirely unexpected, voice emit from somewhere on Amina's person.

"CHOI!" Vickers yelled, even though James couldn't see him. "FLY!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yg1uls/wait_is_this_just_gate_250/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (249/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Well would you look at that. Things are about to kick off just in time for chapter 250. Neat.

Also: Jimbo aint no himbo.

Enjoy.

\~

It was impossible NOT to notice all the firearms being held by the FOB soldiers as James, Amina, and Kai walked towards the three individuals in front of them.

Major Patinson, First Sergeant Nguyen, and Chief Driscoll stood a hundred yards in front of the camp. Large wire wrapped bags of sand had been spray-creted together, and razor wire lined the top of the make shift wall. Soldiers were positioned in position every few dozen yards, including several machine gun nests. James could see the barrel of the central Miffy sticking up from just off center of the camp. Its single, magnetically accelerated mortar already angled upward and in their direction.

If the walls had been a bit more uniform it would have looked like the FOB his unit had been in at NTC, just smaller.

He gulped as they finally got close enough to "talk".

"Captain Choi." The Major said with a fake smile. "Nice to finally meet the man of the hour."

"Coulda done that almost a week ago." James shot back. "If you hadn't shot me down."

Her eyebrows raised. "So that was you?" She gestured at Driscoll. "Chief Driscoll here suspected as much after trying to figure out what happened to you."

"I think you mean, 'what happened to THE BODY' don't you?" Kai interjected, his eyes never leaving the shiny face plate of the Muck Marcher across from him. To his credit, Driscoll hadn't so much as acknowledged that anything was happening.

James saw the glance Nguyen shot at the back of the Major's head. He thought maybe he recognized the First Sergeant but he couldn't think of how, or from where.

"Admittedly, the fact that you survived is somewhat shocking Captain." The Major admitted. "Allow me to apologize."

Then she did something that none of them had expected. Based on their reactions, neither had the two men next to her.

She stepped aside and gestured for him to move to her side.

"Fall in Captain." She said sternly.

Despite everything else.

His anger and at times hatred of the military complex that he was, admittedly a part of.

The love he had come to have for this world and its people, especially the woman next to him.

All the aches in his bones and muscles that he still had from his near death experience at the hands of the woman across from him.

Despite even the fact that he knew that... really... Earth had no more anchor points for him anymore. He would never go back.

Despite all of this; a small part of him that had been forced into his brain by all the indoctrination, all the smokings, and counseling statements, and Drill Sergeants yelling at him. Plus the two years of service he'd had since leaving AIT.

It was the part of him that was always, even years from now, going to be a soldier. It was what drove some former soldiers to occasionally get high and tights. It was what drove them to reenlist years after they'd sworn to never go in again. What drove them to walk taller and more rigidly even in civilian clothes. The thing that dug into them despite how much they hated it, even if they acknowledged that they hated it.

That part of his brain screamed at him to yell "MOVING!" and jog over next to the Major. Like a good little soldier.

Amina must have sensed the conflict inside him. How could she not? She knew him better than anyone except his own mother, and was a soldier in her own right.

"James?" She asked with just a hint of concern.

James raised his head back up and stared the Major in the eyes.

That part of his brain shut up as he firmly pressed it back into its box.

"No." He said, just as firmly as the Major had.

James watched as the Muck Marcher's armor made a slight whine as his hand moved down to the pistol sticking off his hip by some unseen means. Even the First Sergeant seemed to tense at the denial.

"What was that CAPTAIN?" The Major asked venomously.

James lifted his head higher.

"I said no." He replied.

"That's an order Choi." She said. "Fall... In."

James felt Amina watching him. He felt Kai watching him, in that odd way that the elf had of doing so without ACTUALLY looking at someone. He saw all the soldiers on the wall in front of him looking at him, likely unable to hear him unless they had open comms or were in the command tent or something. And he KNEW the Petravian soldiers were watching from just behind the dune they'd come over for the meeting.

He didn't want to disappoint. Besides; every soldier wanted to say this at some point.

He smirked just a tiny bit.

\["Fuck you..... Ma'am."\] He said in English.

Kai turned his head in James's direction just a bit. Amina simply looked back at the three across from her as she put on her own smirk.

To her credit, the Major didn't so much as bat an eye at the remark.

"Chief." She said. Driscoll turned to look at her, his hand now openly resting on the pistol. "Detain this man for insubordination."

The Muck Marcher moved even faster than James had anticipated. He had barely even heard Amina's sword begin to move in its sheathe when the armored submarine killer was almost halfway through the distance between the two groups.

James held up his hand.

"I wouldn't if I were you." He said calmly.

Even as he said the words he saw that the Muck Marcher wasn't going to stop. He also heard the muted twanging of Kai's controls being used. The ground in front of the Muck Marcher's advance began to bubble and roil as he neared it. He stopped, his suit and his trained reflexes warning him of the danger in time to dodge the emerging spider horde.

Driscoll stopped in his tracks and looked at Kai. The three of them could sense the scowl hidden behind his helmet even as his external speaker turned on.

"You." He hissed.

"Major!" James yelled. "Pump the brakes for a second. I got my reasons."

"Hold!" She yelled. Driscoll froze in place with a glance back at the officer.

"Kai." James said softly. "Not just yet."

Next to him the dark elf's jaw clenched as he slowly withdrew his spiders back into the ground. In only a matter of moments it was as if the hundreds, or maybe thousands, of them had never even been there.

"Interesting company you keep these days Captain Choi." The Major said coolly, as if she hadn't just seen a horde of most people's nightmares just pop up like spring water. "Explain your reasoning for not following a lawful order."

James was actually startled by her willingness to listen. Vickers had him thinking that she'd dismiss him out of hand. But, this was still in line with what he wanted to happen.

"For starters." He began. "I don't recognize your authority." He said. The statement had the, somewhat, desired effect as he saw the muscles in the Major's jaw and neck strain as she clenched her jaw. "I was never informed of your intrusion into this country. Or, you know," He shook his head a bit. "This world." He shrugged a bit. "And I have no ACTUAL proof that you are ACTUAL Earth military other than a pretty good resemblance."

"Really?" She asked. "That's your approach?"

"It's a fair one." He replied. "Even if its a bit weak. Additionally; even if you ARE actual Earth military. Coming here uninvited by the King or any of his family is not only a violation of the accords between the United States government and the Petravian Monarchy. But also a blatant act of war." He tilted his head at Amina. "Killing a Royal Army patrol, even if they were making moves to arrest you, is another act of war."

The Major licked her lips a bit before biting on the lower one a bit.

"Yeah." He continued. "We know about that." He nodded to Kai this time. "Additionally. Killing civilians, which is what those dwarves were, is another act of war. AND A WAR CRIME!" He exclaimed loudly. "Plus one of them was a member of Clan Drakrid, and resulted in the death of not only a rider, but their mount as well."

He took a step forward and pointed his finger at her. "I'm the one that's gonna collect for that one." He said with anger in his eyes. Then he nodded at Kai again. "Then you invaded the Deep Dark. Not a huge deal in and of itself. But you killed more innocent civilians while you were down there. And THAT." He pointed at the spot on the ground where the spiders had been. "Is why they're here."

He turned his back to the Major and was about to rejoin Amina and Kai when the Major answered.

"Is that all?" She asked. She said it as if she was simply upset at how small a beer selection a bar had.

He turned back, angry now.

"What?" He asked.

She looked at him with no hint of emotion. "I said; is that all?" She repeated.

"Isn't that enough?" He asked as he turned around. "Besides. I don't answer to you... MAJOR." He said angrily. "I'm following orders from someone significantly higher up the chain than you."

"General Krick?" She asked. He was about to nod when she amended her statement. "Or should I say, the LATE... General Krick."

James didn't give her the satisfaction of a response. Instead he turned to Amina.

"Hon." He said. She nodded.

"You have committed acts of war and crimes of malice against the nation of Petravus and its citizens!" She announced, her throat and mouth glowing.

As she did, the first rank of Petravian soldiers stepped up to the top of the dune behind them, shields at the ready and spears out.

"You have broken treaties and pacts between our two nations with no visible authority to do so, and for reasons that are, as of yet, undetermined."

The rank stepped forward, as did several formations on each side of the dune. Now archers and mages were visible. The Mages were all glowing with different colors of readied magics.

"For this, you are hereby under arrest! I, General and Princess Amina Petravius, and the forces accompanying me, shall take you into custody!"

Another set of ranks, and more visible formations.

"Lay down your arms and surrender peacefully!" Amina said. Then with a note of deadly finality added. "OR ELSE!"

James saw the glow in Amina's face dim as she settled back next to him.

The Major nodded, her eyebrows raised a bit. Then she stepped up. She was about to say something, James was sure that it was going to be pithy and maybe even use his own words against him. But he beat her to it.

"What was it you s-" She began.

"I'd hold off Major!" He interrupted. Her mask slipped as she showed a split second of anger. James fished into his shirt for a moment as if looking for something. His finger poked through as hole and waggled for a moment. Then he pulled out his phone and held it up.

He lifted it up into the air and turned around. Then he gave it the peace sign while sticking his tongue out.

\["Smile Major."\] He said. \["We've been live streaming this whole time."\] He held the phone out and switched the cameras so he could use it like a normal camera.

Her jaw clenched and James saw a vein bulge on her forehead.

"Nice try Choi." She said. "But you don't have any signal."

James exaggeratedly winced and sucked air through his teeth.

"You sure about that?" He asked. "Might wanna have someone on Earth check for you. It's up on the tube. Along with instructions on how to translate spoken Petravian."

As the Major pulled up a tablet and began looking at things, Choi looked and saw the soldiers on the wall doing what they could to get small. The way soldiers always did when they saw trouble coming their way.

He also saw First Sergeant Nguyen staring at the Major with his rifle almost readied. He hoped he was reading THAT situation right.

Then he also, finally, saw doubt on the Major's face.

Then she surprised him again.

"Chief. Arrest this man, and destroy that phone." She said harshly as she began reaching for her pistol.

Then, just like they always seemed to wherever he went, things began to move very quickly.

Driscoll began rushing toward Kai. Kai returned the hostility by bringing his right arm up as if performing an uppercut, causing the sand to bubble and roil again before spiders burst from it once more. Amina charged forward, shield in front of her and sword already moving to strike the Muck Marcher.

Then, even as his own pistol beat the Major's out of their respective holsters and drew a bead on her, he heard a familiar, and entirely unexpected, voice emit from somewhere on Amina's person.

"CHOI!" Vickers yelled, even though James couldn't see him. "FLY!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yg1rf2/wait_is_this_just_gate_250/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (248/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Spent yesterday living in my bathroom. Super fun. Wait staff wasn't as attentive as I would've hoped. But still, 5/7 would poo again.

Enjoy.

\~

When Amina reunited with James it had been after hours of anticipation.

She had seen him, and his unexpected companion, once the army had made its way roughly halfway up the winding path up the mountain. One of the sergeants helping guide the formation up had pointed out the figures standing at the head of the path, and her looking glass had shown her who it was.

She'd wanted to ride Steve up to him as fast as she could. But she had a professional duty to stay by the troops and not let her love life make her look like some lovesick teen. Plus the path was already packed with the troops in formation, and to rush past on a massive drake would have put her or them in danger of sliding down the loose scree on the sides, potentially to their deaths.

She did wonder why he didn't fly down though. She knew he could. He would have been there in a matter of moments, and his new flying style wouldn't have endangered anyone the way his previous method would have.

And who was the tall elf beside him? Just what had happened in the weeks since last they'd seen each other?

When the formation finally reached the crest of the trail and began fanning out she saw James greet several of the commanders and Sergeants as they passed. She noticed that he was wearing his green medallion openly on his chest, something he had done away with a long time ago when he'd become fluent in their language.

She also noticed that, after greeting them, many of the elves among the troops, especially those few dark elves, would bow to the man standing beside him. The elf would always bow slightly in return, even after what had to have been the thirtieth or fortieth such greeting. Who was this stranger?

Steve stole her thunder once the two of them had reached the top. She'd wanted to slide off of him and rush over to her fiance and embrace him. But the massive reptile had different plans. One they'd gotten clear of the formation he'd charged over and practically headbutted James onto the gravel and began licking him.

"Rrrrhph!" James spat as the drakes tongue coated his face in thick saliva. James fought to keep the long forked enemy away even as Steve's head pushed him flat and pressed against him. "Off Boy!" He yelled. "AAGH!" Then Steve completely covered him with his jaw. James kicked feebly at the thick mane of hair on the drake's neck. ^("AMINA!") He cried out, though it was muffled by his oppressor.

"You deserve it!" She yelled as she jumped off the saddle and slid down. She yanked at Steve's fur and began slamming her hand into his side. He lifted his head to look at her and she quickly bent down and forcibly pulled James up onto his feet and into an embrace, ignoring the layer of slime on his face as he wrapped his arms around her to return the gesture. "Steve was the only reason I didn't think you were dead." She said softly into his ear.

James pulled back a bit and used the sleeve of his shirt to wipe his face somewhat clean. Then he pulled her back in and pressed his forehead against hers.

"I know." He said. "I'm so sorry. I'd thought the worst had happened to you two as well."

"What happened?" She asked.

"He almost died." Said a flat somewhat jilting voice.

Amina's head snapped off to the side. In her excitement to see James again she'd almost forgotten that he wasn't alone.

Standing only a few steps away was a tall, muscular yet slim, dark elf. He wore simple, almost skin tight, clothes of red and dark blue. She looked at him curiously for a moment before she saw a small spider resting on his shoulder, and a series of multicolored strings and a gold and white band wrapped around his right arm.

"Sorry." James said. "Amina, this is Kai. Full name unpronounceable. One of the twelve guardians." He was about to introduce her to the elf when Amina quickly pushed away and took a knee with her head bowed.

"An honor." She said now that she knew just who, and what, the elf was. "I wasn't aware that one of the Guardians was present."

James gawked at her in surprise. "Kai. This is-"

"Princess, and General, Amina of Petravus." Kai interrupted.

Now James gawked at Kai. "You two.... know each other?" He wondered.

Kai nodded. "As a guardian I have entreated with the royal family numerous times." He said simply. "After all, my domain of protection covers nearly half of the country." He held his hand out and Amina looked at it curiously. "Please princess. This is hardly a formal setting. Please stand."

"My apologies." She said as she let him aide her to her feet.

"For what?" He asked, beating James to the words by only a split second. "You have done me no wrongs. And I am not surprised to be unrecognized. The last time I was in your father's castle you were still a bundle in your mother's arms."

"Am I.... missing something here?" James asked. "What's happening?"

"James." Amina hissed. "This is a guardian prince."

James was about to agree and ask what the deal was when Kai beat him to talking again.

"Not on this day princess." He said in a low voice, his face barely containing anger.

Both she and James looked at Kai in surprise. Without realizing it, both of their hands went to their weapons of choice. Him to his pistol, and her to her sword.

"Today." He continued. "I am an avenging prince."

Then, as if a switch had been thrown, his face lightened.

"But James can be the one to tell you why." He said as his right hand began to twitch and spasm. "I am..... dealing with something."

She turned back to look at James who bore a pained half smile.

"Been a rough week." He said softly. "Come on. I'll tell you while the rest of your people come up."

He led her over to the makeshift camp and showed her to its lone chair. Then he kicked open one of the tents, revealing two squirming, web wrapped, people.

"Plus we have guests."

\----------

Vickers was more than a little mad at what happened when he finally made his way to the first of the Miffy's.

Once he'd gotten within twenty five yards of it he'd been able to move a bit more freely. After all they were PRIMARILY defensive weapons systems. They weren't designed to engage targets at close range. As a result they were unmanned and the machine gun turrets on top of their cabs were empty.

Sure they still had cameras, but their primary sensor suites wouldn't be able to detect him that close, and even if they did the primary weapons wouldn't be able to engage him unless the entire rig relocated.

It had taken him hours to get this close. Almost a whole day once he'd gotten over the dune nearest to the vehicle.

But he'd "neutralized" these kinds of defensive positions in training before, including one Chinese knock off that was SUPPOSED to have an even better sensor suite. Not that he ever trusted that kind of intel. But still, for training purposes they'd respected the listed specs and proceeded as necessary.

Now he had even more tricks, what with being able to mask his body's temperature.

Plus he had an ace in the hole for HOW he was going to disable them.

So he was more than a little annoyed when, as he got within a few yards of the truck, the sand near its base began to move and writhe, as if something was moving under it.

After a few moments several large spiders emerged and seemed to stare at him as if curious.

He'd done training when he was becoming a SEAL to avoid freaking out about creepy crawlies. Had even eaten a few spiders during survival training. Hell, you couldn't become a sniper if creepy crawlies could make you give up your position.

Still, the sight of what these things had done to the two soldiers the day before was fresh in his mind as the large tan arachnids seemed to stare at him curiously. He had to fight to suppress the urge to shudder. He may have been under the radar with the Miffy. But he still didn't want to move too much and draw the attention of its remote operators.

One of the spiders crawled up until it was almost touching him and stared into his eyes even as they hid behind the shroud of his ghillie.

"What do you want?" He hissed at it in a whisper.

The spider perked up and raised its two front legs. He thought he'd seen a video somewhere that that was how spiders did greetings or mating rituals or something. He stared at it curiously.

"You with the elf?" He asked.

The arms moved up and down.

"That a yes?" He asked. Then he thought about the situation. "Ugh. I'm talking to a fucking spider. What the fuck happened to my life?"

The spider tilted a bit, almost like a dog tilting its head.

Vickers let out a deep, incredibly exhausted, sigh.

"Okay." He said, surrendering to the surreal nature of the situation. "If you're with the elf raise and lower your legs twice."

There was a delay as, he assumed, the spider relayed the message back. How? He didn't know, and kind of didn't want to.

Then the spider raised ALL of its legs up and down twice.

Vickers blinked rapidly at what he was assuming was some form of sarcasm. Though, from the elf or the spider he wasn't entirely certain.

"Okay spider-elf." He said. "You here to help? Or are you just showing off?"

The spider raised its legs, only the front pair this time, and lowered them again.

Vickers stared at it. He sighed again.

"Fair enough." He said. "Can you actually hear me? Or are you reading my lips or something?"

This time the spider didn't raise its legs, but instead rushed across the sand, skittering its legs rapidly as it did. Vickers watched it curiously as it did... whatever it was doing.

After a moment it stood to the side and made like it was headbutting in the direction of the mess it had made.

Vickers peered up at the Miffy for a second. Then, gambling that no one was ACTIVELY watching the camera feeds, lifted up a bit to get a better look at the spiders work.

"Huh." He said in surprise as he saw a crude drawing of a human ear. He looked down at the spider in surprise. "Nice. Alright little... spider... bro." He said as he slowly spread his ghillie out into a sort of low tent with his body as his arms spread the sand underneath him. "I'll show you the game plan."

The spider watched him create the makeshift space curiously, then after a moment of hesitation, rushed into one of the openings of the ghillie cloak.

Vickers pulled slowly pulled one of the cryo rounds from his bottomless bag and held it up where the spider to see.

"See this?" He said. "I got about thirty of these things. And they are going to cause these things." He gestured in the direction of the Miffy. "To have a real bad day if they decide to use em."

The spider, and by extension Kai, watched and listened curiously as Vickers laid out his plan.

\---

"Um. Ma'am?" One of the techs in the Control room said.

"What is it?" The Major asked from where she was reading the info that she'd gotten from Earth.

"Um. Vehicle three has eyes on something you're gonna want to see." The young woman said in surprise. "I'm already setting off a drone to get a better view."

"Main screen." The Major replied. The tech nodded and the main screen was suddenly taken up by a feed overlooking the dunes towards the entrance to the desert. "Ah. Just as expected."

On the screen an entire army was marching toward them in formation.

At the front of it were a horse, being ridden by the princess she'd seen in their intelligence reports, a massive furred lizard being ridden by Captain Choi, and a dark skinned man who seemed to float along the ground as if he was hovering. She didn't recognize that one.

Behind them was at least three thousand Royal Army soldiers of different types. Some on horseback. Some flying in the air and wearing ornate robes. Many simply marching in the familiar style that any soldier would recognize.

"Call Driscoll and Nguyen." She said as she stood up. "Let em know what's going on."

She was about to leave when she noticed that the lone Muck Marcher, the one she only knew as "Five" was staring at one of the feeds. She'd expected the armored woman to respond, since she'd have an easier time reaching Driscoll than anyone else.

"Something wrong?" She asked as she turned to face the armored operative.

Five turned her helmeted head ever so slightly, as if noticing the Major for the first time.

"No ma'am." Said the tinny sounding speakers in a raspy voice. She began walking out of the room ahead of the Major. "Driscoll's already on his way. I just saw something funny. Gonna go check it out."

The Major watched Five stomp out of the room, then turned to the tech whose station she'd been looming over. She raised an eyebrow in question.

The tech shook his head and shrugged. "I don't know ma'am." He said. "I couldn't see what she was looking at. She didn't say anything to me."

She thought about it for a second. The deep sea warriors were eccentric almost to a person, even Driscoll, though they tried to act stoic and mysterious. She wondered if maybe "Five" had been having some kind of episode. Or... maybe she'd just been communicating with the other members of their team. She knew they could do that without anyone else knowing. Their suits were made for stealth after all.

She set it aside as a matter for later as she looked back up at the main screen.

"Zoom in on the lizard." She said as she sat back down and waited for Driscoll and Nguyen to show up. "Let's see what Choi's looking like."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/yf5euo/wait_is_this_just_gate_249/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (248/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Spent yesterday living in my bathroom. Super fun. Wait staff wasn't as attentive as I would've hoped. But still, 5/7 would poo again.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

standing at the head of the path, and her looking glass had shown her who it was.

She'd wanted to ride Steve up to him as fast as she could. But she had a professional duty to stay by the troops and not let her love life make her look like some lovesick teen. Plus the path was already packed with the troops in formation, and to rush past on a massive drake would have put her or them in danger of sliding down the loose scree on the sides, potentially to their deaths.

She did wonder why he didn't fly down though. She knew he could. He would have been there in a matter of moments, and his new flying style wouldn't have endangered anyone the way his previous method would have.

And who was the tall elf beside him? Just what had happened in the weeks since last they'd seen each other?

When the formation finally reached the crest of the trail and began fanning out she saw James greet several of the commanders and Sergeants as they passed. She noticed that he was wearing his green medallion openly on his chest, something he had done away with a long time ago when he'd become fluent in their language.

She also noticed that, after greeting them, many of the elves among the troops, especially those few dark elves, would bow to the man standing beside him. The elf would always bow slightly in return, even after what had to have been the thirtieth or fortieth such greeting. Who was this stranger?

Steve stole her thunder once the two of them had reached the top. She'd wanted to slide off of him and rush over to her fiance and embrace him. But the massive reptile had different plans. One they'd gotten clear of the formation he'd charged over and practically headbutted James onto the gravel and began licking him.

"Rrrrhph!" James spat as the drakes tongue coated his face in thick saliva. James fought to keep the long forked enemy away even as Steve's head pushed him flat and pressed against him. "Off Boy!" He yelled. "AAGH!" Then Steve completely covered him with his jaw. James kicked feebly at the thick mane of hair on the drake's neck. ^("AMINA!") He cried out, though it was muffled by his oppressor.

"You deserve it!" She yelled as she jumped off the saddle and slid down. She yanked at Steve's fur and began slamming her hand into his side. He lifted his head to look at her and she quickly bent down and forcibly pulled James up onto his feet and into an embrace, ignoring the layer of slime on his face as he wrapped his arms around her to return the gesture. "Steve was the only reason I didn't think you were dead." She said softly into his ear.

James pulled back a bit and used the sleeve of his shirt to wipe his face somewhat clean. Then he pulled her back in and pressed his forehead against hers.

"I know." He said. "I'm so sorry. I'd thought the worst had happened to you two as well."

"What happened?" She asked.

"He almost died." Said a flat somewhat jilting voice.

Amina's head snapped off to the side. In her excitement to see James again she'd almost forgotten that he wasn't alone.

Standing only a few steps away was a tall, muscular yet slim, dark elf. He wore simple, almost skin tight, clothes of red and dark blue. She looked at him curiously for a moment before she saw a small spider resting on his shoulder, and a series of multicolored strings and a gold and white band wrapped around his right arm.

"Sorry." James said. "Amina, this is Kai. Full name unpronounceable. One of the twelve guardians." He was about to introduce her to the elf when Amina quickly pushed away and took a knee with her head bowed.

"An honor." She said now that she knew just who, and what, the elf was. "I wasn't aware that one of the Guardians was present."

James gawked at her in surprise. "Kai. This is-"

"Princess, and General, Amina of Petravus." Kai interrupted.

Now James gawked at Kai. "You two.... know each other?" He wondered.

Kai nodded. "As a guardian I have entreated with the royal family numerous times." He said simply. "After all, my domain of protection covers nearly half of the country." He held his hand out and Amina looked at it curiously. "Please princess. This is hardly a formal setting. Please stand."

"My apologies." She said as she let him aide her to her feet.

"For what?" He asked, beating James to the words by only a split second. "You have done me no wrongs. And I am not surprised to be unrecognized. The last time I was in your father's castle you were still a bundle in your mother's arms."

"Am I.... missing something here?" James asked. "What's happening?"

"James." Amina hissed. "This is a guardian prince."

James was about to agree and ask what the deal was when Kai beat him to talking again.

"Not on this day princess." He said in a low voice, his face barely containing anger.

Both she and James looked at Kai in surprise. Without realizing it, both of their hands went to their weapons of choice. Him to his pistol, and her to her sword.

"Today." He continued. "I am an avenging prince."

Then, as if a switch had been thrown, his face lightened.

"But James can be the one to tell you why." He said as his right hand began to twitch and spasm. "I am..... dealing with something."

She turned back to look at James who bore a pained half smile.

"Been a rough week." He said softly. "Come on. I'll tell you while the rest of your people come up."

He led her over to the makeshift camp and showed her to its lone chair. Then he kicked open one of the tents, revealing two squirming, web wrapped, people.

"Plus we have guests."

\----------

Vickers was more than a little mad at what happened when he finally made his way to the first of the Miffy's.

Once he'd gotten within twenty five yards of it he'd been able to move a bit more freely. After all they were PRIMARILY defensive weapons systems. They weren't designed to engage targets at close range. As a result they were unmanned and the machine gun turrets on top of their cabs were empty.

Sure they still had cameras, but their primary sensor suites wouldn't be able to detect him that close, and even if they did the primary weapons wouldn't be able to engage him unless the entire rig relocated.

It had taken him hours to get this close. Almost a whole day once he'd gotten over the dune nearest to the vehicle.

But he'd "neutralized" these kinds of defensive positions in training before, including one Chinese knock off that was SUPPOSED to have an even better sensor suite. Not that he ever trusted that kind of intel. But still, for training purposes they'd respected the listed specs and proceeded as necessary.

Now he had even more tricks, what with being able to mask his body's temperature.

Plus he had an ace in the hole for HOW he was going to disable them.

So he was more than a little annoyed when, as he got within a few yards of the truck, the sand near its base began to move and writhe, as if something was moving under it.

After a few moments several large spiders emerged and seemed to stare at him as if curious.

He'd done training when he was becoming a SEAL to avoid freaking out about creepy crawlies. Had even eaten a few spiders during survival training. Hell, you couldn't become a sniper if creepy crawlies could make you give up your position.

Still, the sight of what these things had done to the two soldiers the day before was fresh in his mind as the large tan arachnids seemed to stare at him curiously. He had to fight to suppress the urge to shudder. He may have been under the radar with the Miffy. But he still didn't want to move too much and draw the attention of its remote operators.

One of the spiders crawled up until it was almost touching him and stared into his eyes even as they hid behind the shroud of his ghillie.

"What do you want?" He hissed at it in a whisper.

The spider perked up and raised its two front legs. He thought he'd seen a video somewhere that that was how spiders did greetings or mating rituals or something. He stared at it curiously.

"You with the elf?" He asked.

The arms moved up and down.

"That a yes?" He asked. Then he thought about the situation. "Ugh. I'm talking to a fucking spider. What the fuck happened to my life?"

The spider tilted a bit, almost like a dog tilting its head.

Vickers let out a deep, incredibly exhausted, sigh.

"Okay." He said, surrendering to the surreal nature of the situation. "If you're with the elf raise and lower your legs twice."

There was a delay as, he assumed, the spider relayed the message back. How? He didn't know, and kind of didn't want to.

Then the spider raised ALL of its legs up and down twice.

Vickers blinked rapidly at what he was assuming was some form of sarcasm. Though, from the elf or the spider he wasn't entirely certain.

"Okay spider-elf." He said. "You here to help? Or are you just showing off?"

The spider raised its legs, only the front pair this time, and lowered them again.

Vickers stared at it. He sighed again.

"Fair enough." He said. "Can you actually hear me? Or are you reading my lips or something?"

This time the spider didn't raise its legs, but instead rushed across the sand, skittering its legs rapidly as it did. Vickers watched it curiously as it did... whatever it was doing.

After a moment it stood to the side and made like it was headbutting in the direction of the mess it had made.

Vickers peered up at the Miffy for a second. Then, gambling that no one was ACTIVELY watching the camera feeds, lifted up a bit to get a better look at the spiders work.

"Huh." He said in surprise as he saw a crude drawing of a human ear. He looked down at the spider in surprise. "Nice. Alright little... spider... bro." He said as he slowly spread his ghillie out into a sort of low tent with his body as his arms spread the sand underneath him. "I'll show you the game plan."

The spider watched him create the makeshift space curiously, then after a moment of hesitation, rushed into one of the openings of the ghillie cloak.

Vickers slowly pulled one of the cryo rounds from his bottomless bag and held it up where the spider to see.

"See this?" He said. "I got about thirty of these things. And they are going to cause these things." He gestured in the direction of the Miffy. "To have a real bad day if they decide to use em."

The spider, and by extension Kai, watched and listened curiously as Vickers laid out his plan.

\--------------------------------

"Um. Ma'am?" One of the techs in the Control room said.

"What is it?" The Major asked from where she was reading the info that she'd gotten from Earth.

"Um. Vehicle three has eyes on something you're gonna want to see." The young woman said in surprise. "I'm already setting off a drone to get a better view."

"Main screen." The Major replied. The tech nodded and the main screen was suddenly taken up by a feed overlooking the dunes towards the entrance to the desert. "Ah. Just as expected."

On the screen an entire army was marching toward them in formation.

At the front of it were a horse, being ridden by the princess she'd seen in their intelligence reports, a massive furred lizard being ridden by Captain Choi, and a dark skinned man who seemed to float along the ground as if he was hovering. She didn't recognize that one.

Behind them was at least three thousand Royal Army soldiers of different types. Some on horseback. Some flying in the air and wearing ornate robes. Many simply marching in the familiar style that any soldier would recognize.

"Call Driscoll and Nguyen." She said as she stood up. "Let em know what's going on."

She was about to leave when she noticed that the lone Muck Marcher, the one she only knew as "Five" was staring at one of the feeds. She'd expected the armored woman to respond, since she'd have an easier time reaching Driscoll than anyone else.

"Something wrong?" She asked as she turned to face the armored operative.

Five turned her helmeted head ever so slightly, as if noticing the Major for the first time.

"No ma'am." Said the tinny sounding speakers in a raspy voice. She began walking out of the room ahead of the Major. "Driscoll's already on his way. I just saw something funny. Gonna go check it out."

The Major watched Five stomp out of the room, then turned to the tech whose station she'd been looming over. She raised an eyebrow in question.

The tech shook his head and shrugged. "I don't know ma'am." He said. "I couldn't see what she was looking at. She didn't say anything to me."

She thought about it for a second. The deep sea warriors were eccentric almost to a person, even Driscoll, though they tried to act stoic and mysterious. She wondered if maybe "Five" had been having some kind of episode. Or... maybe she'd just been communicating with the other members of their team. She knew they could do that without anyone else knowing. Their suits were made for stealth after all.

She set it aside as a matter for later as she looked back up at the main screen.

"Zoom in on the lizard." She said as she sat back down and waited for Driscoll and Nguyen to show up. "Let's see what Choi's looking like."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/yf5dcs/wait_is_this_just_gate_249/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (247/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey. That dude we haven't seen in a minute. Wonder what HE'S up to?

Enjoy.

\~

Master Sergeant Nguyen marched brusquely towards the command tent from the Miffy, and now drone control, tent.

Over the past few weeks here he'd been relegated from being the de facto second in command to basically being the Major's gofer. At first he'd been somewhat annoyed at the sudden lack of involvement in anything, usually being snubbed in favor of Chief Driscoll and his crew instead. But, then he'd seen the way things seemed to be going, and realized that his position actually had some advantages.

"Orders from the Major." He said as he stepped into the tent and sat next to Isaacs.

"What's she want this time?" He asked as he sipped his cool coffee. "Tanks? A few of those new F-40R's? Maybe a personal massage therapist?"

Nguyen glanced around at the other techs, some of whom he knew were more in the Major's camp than his. Most of them were still busily working at their stations. But one or two had looked over at the outburst.

Nguyen leaned in as he slid some papers over.

"Chill." He said. He looked around again, then lowered his voice to a barely audible whisper. "What's the word on the other side?"

Isaacs peered around for a moment. Nguyen couldn't help but notice that the Special Forces member was better at being sly than he was. When he was comfortable with the lack of attention he slipped a paper over to Nguyen, who quickly pocketed it.

"No M.S." He said quickly and quietly. "But they're doing what they can to put that damper on both sides of the equation."

Nguyen considered the news, knowing the note would say more. He slowly rose to his feet with a small nod.

"Get those ammo requests in. Let me know when they get here." He said. Then he turned to one of the other techs. "Airman Eirnet." He called. "Chief's got some comm requests on the list for you." The tech nodded and made to set their work aside and come over.

Nguyen gave Isaacs a pat on the shoulder as he stepped back out of the tent.

"Keep up the good work guys." He said as he stepped back out into the sand.

\---

James and Vickers reached the mountain pass just before sundown, and one day early for Amina and the army to arrive. Vickers helped Choi set up camp for the night, pulling from his bottomless bag to set up tents for the two of them and one small one for their two captives.

They both watched in silent curiosity as Kai sneered at the setting sun. Then he played a series of chords on his harp and Vickers watched as the sand nearby seemed to sink in. The mass of spiders that had been hording around him moving out to interact with whatever was happening there.

"I'll be back at first light." He said as he removed the darkened goggles he'd put on shortly after getting to the surface and later removing the crystal from his forehead.

"Can't stay?" James asked. "Cause of the moon thing?"

"Moon thing?" Vickers wondered as Kai nodded. A few moments later he was slowly descending back into the ground and out of sight.

"Long story." James replied. "Lot's of long stories."

"Well, you're gonna have to tell some of em." Vickers shot back as he dragged one of the two soldiers, still bound and gagged by spider silk, over to the small tent and threw him in. "We got all night and I gotta get back out in the morning."

"You're not staying either?" James asked.

"Can't." Vickers said simply. "Was on an op when you and spider guy made me shit myself. Still need to get eyes on that FOB and see what I can see. Otherwise we're liable to get turned into mincemeat."

"Yeah. I didn't really think about why you were out there in a ghillie suit." James realized.

"No." Vickers agreed. "And we probably set off half the sensors in their command room. Odds are that little hole in the ground is swarming with their people."

He drew out a small folding chair from his bag and set it down. He gestured for James to sit.

"Now tell me what the hell happened to you." He demanded.

James looked over the edge of the nearby ledge, down into the valley below. He could see them, down at the bottom of the mountain pass. The soldiers that Amina had amassed. Their camp stretched for at least a mile or so, and he could see campfires, moving torches, and the occasional colored light that meant someone was using magic. He longed to rush down on his jets and join her.

He turned back and accepted the offered chair. He and Vickers both had jobs to do now. Sappy romantic gestures could come later when they might not cost lives.

"I was flying." James said as his hands wrapped around himself. "I'd finally gotten to where I could see the camp and I put on the glasses. I was zooming in on the Miffy's because I wasn't sure what they were." He shook his head and pressed his eyes shut. "And then I saw one fire. Just these little flashes at the end of their barrels." He looked up at Vickers, who was doing what he could to hide his concern and awe. "Instincts took over." He continued. "And I tried to dodge."

Then he told him the rest. Vickers' eyes widened as he heard about James's fall. James saw the anger rising as the SEAL's jaw clenched when he heard about the dwarven clan. About the royal army patrol.

About everything.

When it was done Vickers put his pack back on. James was about to question the move. Then thought better of it.

"Choi." He said as he filled his CamelBak with a canteen from his bag. "These Muck Marchers. If they're here than it means these guys have support from on high."

"I know." James replied. "It's not good."

"No." Vickers agreed. "Cause if they're here than it means that we can't count on this FOB to have only what we can see. It also means that Earth can, and probably will, send help if shit gets nasty for em. Hell, the dwarves even said that they only showed up AFTER they and the soldiers had just about pacified the initial Earth party."

"Yeah." James agreed.

Vickers looked off into the darkness, in the direction of the desert base.

"Not gonna pretend I haven't done dirt for the Gov." He said with a look of regret. "Been a lotta ops where we had to do stuff that wasn't exactly kosher. But the objective was always to be in and out with as little mess as possible." He nodded. "Best jobs were always the ones where nobody even knew anything was wrong until we were already long gone."

James looked at him, shocked by how upset the usually stoic man seemed.

"And WE..." He jabbed himself in the chest with his thumb. "Were never the ones to do it to allies. That's what shit-bag contractors and the CIA are for."

And just like that, Vickers was stalking out into the darkness, a cold chill emanating from his entire body.

"What are you gonna do?" James asked into the darkness beyond the light of their fire.

"Sneaky shit." Vickers said simply. Then he was gone.

James couldn't even hear the sand or gravel shifting.

\--------------------

"So let me get this straight." Margaret asked as she, Shrend, and Ambassador Werner spoke. "Healing magic is less about the...." She grasped at the idea. "Chemical? Mechanical?.... Function of the person you're working on healing. And more about.... resetting their injuries to their previous status?"

"That's.... MY... understanding of it." Werner admitted sheepishly. "It's about being able to visualize how a person's body is SUPPOSED to be and using magic to make it that way."

Margaret looked at Shrend and he shrugged. "That's.... a simplification of it." He said. "And also why beginning healers such as Ambassador Werner are limited to practicing on INJURIES. Not sicknesses."

Werner shrank a little. Margaret thought she saw a bit of anger there. Though the Ambassador was good at hiding it.

"And what about healing sicknesses?" She asked curiously? She noticed Werner perk up a bit. She also knew what James had told her about his Sergeant's death when he'd first gotten here.

Shrend gave a curt nod. "Sickness is.... more.... difficult." He said. He gestured to the room. "Would you like to try a hand at basic healing? Or would you like to learn more about the many ailments of our world?"

She looked at Werner and saw just a hint of jealousy there, though Werner quickly looked back at her notes when she saw Margaret's gaze land on her.

"I can come back to this." She said. "One of the biggest problems any healthcare environment can tackle is infection response and prevention." She said, quoting one of her first college professors.

"I whole heartedly agree." Shrend said with a smile as he gestured for her to follow. "I will warn you." He said as they began walking. "Our Sick-soothers are um.... interesting... individuals. And startlingly rigid."

"Ours tend to be much the same." She said. She looked back at Werner, who was watching her and the massive minotaur leave.

She thought about it for a second. Something there wasn't quite right. But something, her nurse's intuition she thought, made her think that it wasn't malicious.

She gestured for the Ambassador to follow. Werner looked at her in surprise.

Margaret nodded as she waved the woman over. Shrend was too busy talking to notice.

Werner looked around for a moment, then rushed to catch up quietly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ye9qrf/wait_is_this_just_gate_248/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (247/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey. That dude we haven't seen in a minute. Wonder what HE'S up to?

Enjoy.

\~

Master Sergeant Nguyen marched brusquely towards the command tent from the Miffy, and now drone control, tent.

Over the past few weeks here he'd been relegated from being the de facto second in command to basically being the Major's gofer. At first he'd been somewhat annoyed at the sudden lack of involvement in anything, usually being snubbed in favor of Chief Driscoll and his crew instead. But, then he'd seen the way things seemed to be going, and realized that his position actually had some advantages.

"Orders from the Major." He said as he stepped into the tent and sat next to Isaacs.

"What's she want this time?" He asked as he sipped his cool coffee. "Tanks? A few of those new F-40R's? Maybe a personal massage therapist?"

Nguyen glanced around at the other techs, some of whom he knew were more in the Major's camp than his. Most of them were still busily working at their stations. But one or two had looked over at the outburst.

Nguyen leaned in as he slid some papers over.

"Chill." He said. He looked around again, then lowered his voice to a barely audible whisper. "What's the word on the other side?"

Isaacs peered around for a moment. Nguyen couldn't help but notice that the Special Forces member was better at being sly than he was. When he was comfortable with the lack of attention he slipped a paper over to Nguyen, who quickly pocketed it.

"No M.S." He said quickly and quietly. "But they're doing what they can to put that damper on both sides of the equation."

Nguyen considered the news, knowing the note would say more. He slowly rose to his feet with a small nod.

"Get those ammo requests in. Let me know when they get here." He said. Then he turned to one of the other techs. "Airman Eirnet." He called. "Chief's got some comm requests on the list for you." The tech nodded and made to set their work aside and come over.

Nguyen gave Isaacs a pat on the shoulder as he stepped back out of the tent.

"Keep up the good work guys." He said as he stepped back out into the sand.

\----------

James and Vickers reached the mountain pass just before sundown, and one day early for Amina and the army to arrive. Vickers helped Choi set up camp for the night, pulling from his bottomless bag to set up tents for the two of them and one small one for their two captives.

They both watched in silent curiosity as Kai sneered at the setting sun. Then he played a series of chords on his harp and Vickers watched as the sand nearby seemed to sink in. The mass of spiders that had been hording around him moving out to interact with whatever was happening there.

"I'll be back at first light." He said as he removed the darkened goggles he'd put on shortly after getting to the surface and later removing the crystal from his forehead.

"Can't stay?" James asked. "Cause of the moon thing?"

"Moon thing?" Vickers wondered as Kai nodded. A few moments later he was slowly descending back into the ground and out of sight.

"Long story." James replied. "Lot's of long stories."

"Well, you're gonna have to tell some of em." Vickers shot back as he dragged one of the two soldiers, still bound and gagged by spider silk, over to the small tent and threw him in. "We got all night and I gotta get back out in the morning."

"You're not staying either?" James asked.

"Can't." Vickers said simply. "Was on an op when you and spider guy made me shit myself. Still need to get eyes on that FOB and see what I can see. Otherwise we're liable to get turned into mincemeat."

"Yeah. I didn't really think about why you were out there in a ghillie suit." James realized.

"No." Vickers agreed. "And we probably set off half the sensors in their command room. Odds are that little hole in the ground is swarming with their people."

He drew out a small folding chair from his bag and set it down. He gestured for James to sit.

"Now tell me what the hell happened to you." He demanded.

James looked over the edge of the nearby ledge, down into the valley below. He could see them, down at the bottom of the mountain pass. The soldiers that Amina had amassed. Their camp stretched for at least a mile or so, and he could see campfires, moving torches, and the occasional colored light that meant someone was using magic. He longed to rush down on his jets and join her.

He turned back and accepted the offered chair. He and Vickers both had jobs to do now. Sappy romantic gestures could come later when they might not cost lives.

"I was flying." James said as his hands wrapped around himself. "I'd finally gotten to where I could see the camp and I put on the glasses. I was zooming in on the Miffy's because I wasn't sure what they were." He shook his head and pressed his eyes shut. "And then I saw one fire. Just these little flashes at the end of their barrels." He looked up at Vickers, who was doing what he could to hide his concern and awe. "Instincts took over." He continued. "And I tried to dodge."

Then he told him the rest. Vickers' eyes widened as he heard about James's fall. James saw the anger rising as the SEAL's jaw clenched when he heard about the dwarven clan. About the royal army patrol.

About everything.

When it was done Vickers put his pack back on. James was about to question the move. Then thought better of it.

"Choi." He said as he filled his CamelBak with a canteen from his bag. "These Muck Marchers. If they're here than it means these guys have support from on high."

"I know." James replied. "It's not good."

"No." Vickers agreed. "Cause if they're here than it means that we can't count on this FOB to have only what we can see. It also means that Earth can, and probably will, send help if shit gets nasty for em. Hell, the dwarves even said that they only showed up AFTER they and the soldiers had just about pacified the initial Earth party."

"Yeah." James agreed.

Vickers looked off into the darkness, in the direction of the desert base.

"Not gonna pretend I haven't done dirt for the Gov." He said with a look of regret. "Been a lotta ops where we had to do stuff that wasn't exactly kosher. But the objective was always to be in and out with as little mess as possible." He nodded. "Best jobs were always the ones where nobody even knew anything was wrong until we were already long gone."

James looked at him, shocked by how upset the usually stoic man seemed.

"And WE..." He jabbed himself in the chest with his thumb. "Were never the ones to do it to allies. That's what shit-bag contractors and the CIA are for."

And just like that, Vickers was stalking out into the darkness, a cold chill emanating from his entire body.

"What are you gonna do?" James asked into the darkness beyond the light of their fire.

"Sneaky shit." Vickers said simply. Then he was gone.

James couldn't even hear the sand or gravel shifting.

\----------

"So let me get this straight." Margaret asked as she, Shrend, and Ambassador Werner spoke. "Healing magic is less about the...." She grasped at the idea. "Chemical? Mechanical?.... Function of the person you're working on healing. And more about.... resetting their injuries to their previous status?"

"That's.... MY... understanding of it." Werner admitted sheepishly. "It's about being able to visualize how a person's body is SUPPOSED to be and using magic to make it that way."

Margaret looked at Shrend and he shrugged. "That's.... a simplification of it." He said. "And also why beginning healers such as Ambassador Werner are limited to practicing on INJURIES. Not sicknesses."

Werner shrank a little. Margaret thought she saw a bit of anger there. Though the Ambassador was good at hiding it.

"And what about healing sicknesses?" She asked curiously? She noticed Werner perk up a bit. She also knew what James had told her about his Sergeant's death when he'd first gotten here.

Shrend gave a curt nod. "Sickness is.... more.... difficult." He said. He gestured to the room. "Would you like to try a hand at basic healing? Or would you like to learn more about the many ailments of our world?"

She looked at Werner and saw just a hint of jealousy there, though Werner quickly looked back at her notes when she saw Margaret's gaze land on her.

"I can come back to this." She said. "One of the biggest problems any healthcare environment can tackle is infection response and prevention." She said, quoting one of her first college professors.

"I whole heartedly agree." Shrend said with a smile as he gestured for her to follow. "I will warn you." He said as they began walking. "Our Sick-soothers are um.... interesting... individuals. And startlingly rigid."

"Ours tend to be much the same." She said. She looked back at Werner, who was watching her and the massive minotaur leave.

She thought about it for a second. Something there wasn't quite right. But something, her nurse's intuition she thought, made her think that it wasn't malicious.

She gestured for the Ambassador to follow. Werner looked at her in surprise.

Margaret nodded as she waved the woman over. Shrend was too busy talking to notice.

Werner looked around for a moment, then rushed to catch up quietly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ye9p0o/wait_is_this_just_gate_248/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (246/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Battle buddies are always gonna be battle buddies. Even if antagonistic ones. ^(Halfhearted Hooah.)

Enjoy.

\~

Driscoll entered the decontamination chamber with a clang as he closed the door. then he hit the blue pad with his armored hand, informing it that he was ready for the decon action to start.

A series of nozzles blasted him from all sides with alternating streams of boiling hot water and jets of high pressure air, cleaning the sand and other debris off of him and doing their best to sanitize his armor at the same time. Once they were done with their thirty second cycle a series of heat panels activated to dry him and kill off anything that remained. He watched patiently as the temperature outside the suit rose to nearly three hundred degrees and then remained there for another thirty seconds.

Once the cycle was complete the door on the wall in front of him opened and he stepped into a smaller room that had cold, air conditioned, air blasted right onto him. It cooled the exterior of his armor until it would be safe to touch.

Then he stepped into the sterilized room beyond and saw Rodriguez.

The Toolies, that was what they called their combination doctors and suit mechanics, were working on him in their inflated sterile room suits. One was slowly but surely laying down the fiber optic based panels that made up the interiors of their helmets. Each cell was less than three millimeters wide and hexagon shaped. They had to be layered in a specific pattern and order, and he knew it would take hours to even get half the display mapped.

The other Toolie was working on Rodriguez himself.

It had been more than five years since Driscoll had seen Rodriguez's body, such as it was, out of his suit. He looked down at his own armored chest and wondered how long it had even been since he'd seen his own body.

Rodriguez was, like most of their crew, a lifer. He'd signed on for the experimental program because his only other option had been to spend his remaining days sitting in a hospital somewhere, letting machines do most of his living for him anyways. Like Driscoll, the military had given him an offer. To still be hooked up to machines, and dependent on them to live, but also to be ambulatory and capable of interacting with the world, even if through a mechanical filter. The other upside was that doing so would give him a chance to get back at the people that had put him in his condition in the first place.

Just like Driscoll, and so many others, Rodriguez had jumped at the opportunity.

Driscoll looked at the third of a body that was Rodriguez's entirety with shame. There were no arms, those had been reduced to stubs that ended just below his shoulder joints, each of them had a series of metal sensors embedded in them. His torso ended at an angle, the lower end of which stopped just below his left rib-cage, and the higher end of which was just below his right nipple. There was the standard interface collar, a mixture of steel braided cables and hoses layered over a metal plate, that plate was fastened to each side of his collar bone and shoulder blades, and had a series of plugs that ran up his back before going into the base of his skull.

Below the end of Rodriguez's torso was what all of them called the shit can. It was designed to look like a continuation of their bodies, for the sake of symmetry inside their suits. But there was no disguising the carbon nanotube reinforced mixture of metal and ceramic sections that, for all intents and purposes made up whatever organs they needed to live. In Rodriguez's case that consisted of his liver, a kidney that also doubled as an automatic oncocidal monitor/injector, one lung, and his entire gut. All of which were lab designed for efficiency, and grown with stem cells and REG-TEK cell recombination technology.

They called it the shit can because the one thing that each and every one of them had had replaced was their digestive system. That, and the fact that if the metal housing was ever breached or compromised, it was basically a death sentence for whoever it was attached to.

Luckily for Driscoll's shame that wasn't what had happened to Rodriguez.

He watched for a moment as the Toolie continued working on the two implants in the man's eye sockets. When the tech paused to grab a tool, Driscoll spoke up.

"Hey Rod." He said as he gingerly tapped a finger to the man's forehead.

"Boss?" Rodriguez asked as he lifted his head up to touch the finger in return. It was the only movement any of them were really capable of out of the suits, and so the traditional method of returning the greeting.

"Yeah." Driscoll replied. "How you doin?"

"Felt like takin' a walk. Gettin' some nice, fresh air. You know?" Rodriguez said with a grin. "Shame about the view."

And just like that Driscoll's tension eased. Rodriguez had always been the one person in the crew that could make any of the others cool down. He was, as far as the suits allowed, their big man. The guy they all looked to for reassuring words or a good laugh. Even Driscoll.

"What's the damage?" He asked.

"Pretty much what you see." Rodriguez replied with an attempted shrug. "Burns on my face, not that I was winning any beauty contests anyways. And my eyes. I'll be using the pinhole interface from here on out."

Driscoll nodded solemnly. He knew several other members of their force that had the same interface. It allowed them to see. But not the same way they'd been seeing their whole lives up until that point. Less like actual eyes and more like a simplified, permanent HUD. And only when they had their suit's helmet on.

He reached out and rubbed a knuckle on the man's sternum for a moment. Their equivalent of a hand on the shoulder for those who.... no longer had shoulders to speak of.

"I'm sorry." He said. "I-" He began.

"Don't be." Rodriguez cut him off. "It was a shit op, and some bad luck against an enemy we had no intel on. If I hadn't been rockin' the shotty and some fire shells I'd've probably tried the same thing." He said as he looked, so to speak, off to the side. "I was in the wrong spot at the wrong time and even with the suit's warning I didn't have the time to react. Noone would've."

Driscoll hung his head a bit. He knew that his friend was right. But it still didn't make him feel that much better.

"You want someone to blame?" Rodriguez continued. "Blame those fuckin' smart ass spiders." He said. "I mean... spiders dodging bullets? That's some bullshit."

Driscoll let out a quick, half hearted, laugh. "It is aint it?" He asked. He'd had more than his fair share of time to think of that too.

"Fuckin' hated spiders even before that fight." Rodriguez said with a look of disgust. "Now I really hate em."

"That's right." Driscoll said. "I remember that op in the Bering. You got scared of-"

"Fuck them king crabs man." Rodriguez cut him off with a shudder that made the nearby tech place a hand on his chest to still him. "Fuckin big ass spider motherfuckers with their big ass claws."

Driscoll full on bellowed laughter through his speakers. "You started stomping and chopping every crab that touched you. You churned up the water so bad our sensors started to have trouble finding you."

Rodriguez's eyebrows furrowed in anger even as he fought not to laugh himself.

"Like, the closest thing to being in a nightmare." He said. "And all in the black and green of my HUD. Fuckin' terrifying."

"They couldn't have hurt you if they'd wanted to." Driscoll reminded him as he continued laughing.

The two of them stayed like that for a minute. Driscoll laughing and Rodriguez shaking his head and trying to be angry at the memory.

Eventually they calmed down though. Rodriguez broke the ensuing silence first.

"Lost Mudder on that one." He said, his voice growing solemn. "Got caught under that sub when it drifted after we popped it."

Driscoll nodded. "Yeah." He said.

"Happens." Rodriguez said. Then he turned to try to look at Driscoll, though he was off by a few degrees. "But it didn't happen this time."

Driscoll nodded.

"Are you nodding?" Rodriguez asked. "You always nod. I can't see that shit dude."

"You're right." Driscoll said. "Still. Sorry bout the eyes."

"All good boss. Suit's still moving." Rodriguez said.

"Good." Driscoll shot back as he made to leave. "Better get back in it soon. Looks like a fight's comin'."

"On the double boss." Rodriguez replied. "Tell Doc to come see me. I know he got all pissy like he always does."

"Will do." Driscoll said as he stepped back into the decontamination room and closed the door behind him.

\----------

"I must admit I was a touch skeptical when you told me that everyone dies of shock Mrs. Choi." Shrend said as he looked over the translated version of the text book she had been going over with the large minotaur and a few of his fellow healers. "Though, once you explained that you weren't talking about electricity, and that shock actually had a different meaning when it came to medicine it began to make more sense."

"It was one of the first things I was ever taught when I was becoming a paramedic many years ago." Margaret explained. "It's a vast oversimplification of what goes on in a dying body. But it is technically true."

Shrend nodded. "Now, I have seen this Ox-I-Jen mentioned many times in these books. And Arch-Mage Veliry tried to explain it to me once. Though, in her typical fashion, she spoke too fast for most of us to keep up."

Margaret nodded back. "She has that tendency doesn't she." She turned her English version of the book to its appendix to find the section on oxygenation. She was about to flip to the page in question when her son walked in.

"Hi mom." He said. "Hello Mr. Farstorm." He said with a wave.

"Mr. Choi." Shrend said with a smile. "Good to see you again. Is everything okay?"

Joey nodded. "Just here to see my mom. Someone said she was here."

"You know Mr. Shrend?" Margaret asked.

Joey nodded again. "I met him one of the first days we were allowed to move about freely. I couldn't help but introduce myself and ask him some questions." He said with just a hint of embarrassment.

"We were just going over the medical textbooks James had brought over." Margaret said as she pointed at the book resting on the meeting table in front of them. "Seeing if we can bridge the gap between Earth Science and Petravian Magic."

"Cool." Joey said as he looked at the book. He touched his finger to the page just under the chapter title before quickly pulling his hand back with a look of disgust. "Are you going to learn healing magic?" He asked.

"I uh..." She began with a confused look around the room. The other healers looked at her curiously. "I don't... know." She looked back at Shrend. "Can I?"

Shrend shrugged with a look of confusion himself. "I assumed that was part of why you wanted to work with us." He said simply. "To learn healing magic and see if your knowledge helped with it."

Joey bounced lightly on his feet as he placed a hand on her shoulder. "You should do it mom." He said excitedly. "Then we'll have an entire adventure party family. Amina as the tank. James as the half caster. Me as the mage. And you for healing."

She looked at him with her eyebrows knit in concern. "Joey I am NOT an adventurer." She said in a slightly frustrated tone. "And I do NOT know any magic."

"We can teach you." Said an older looking, short statured, woman at the table. "We are already teaching your ambassador healing magic. Though she hasn't had the results she was hoping for just yet."

Margaret turned to look at the speaker in shock. "Ambassador Werner is learning healing magic?" She asked. I thought James said she was a cold b-word. Why would she want to learn healing magic.

"Indeed." Shrend confirmed. "Though, I would be uncomfortable speaking of HER... reasoning." He said with a hint of venom as he emphasized the word while glaring at the other healers. "Without her permission."

Margaret nodded. "I see that patient confidentiality is a thing here too." She said. Shrend nodded "Good."

"I will tell you that she is here though." Shrend said. "She's in a lesson right now. Would you care to meet her? Maybe she can help you learn healing magic. Since she would likely have had a similar starting point to you."

"Do it mom." Joey said as he continued bouncing.

"I... I guess." She said as she started to stand up.

I guess I'm learning magic now too. She thought, slightly irritated at the idea. I'm too old to be back in school.

\---

"James." Kai said softly as he nudged James's shoulder.

"Hmm?" James grumbled as he faded back into wakefulness.

"Wake up. We are only a few minutes away from the surface."

"Already?" James said as he yawned and straightened out his legs to stretch.

"It has been three hours since last we spoke." Kai said in response. "Another few hundred meters and we should be back roughly where you were retrieved by the dwarves. Though my spiders tell me that that position is guarded, so we are emerging a few dozen yards away.

James slowly gained his feet, stretching his back as he rolled to an upright standing position. He jammed his arms out ramrod straight, the muscles tensing as he yawned again and rolled his hands around in a slow, shaky, circular motion.

"You ready for this?" He asked as he double checked his newly rebuilt weapons. He shook the sleep out with a quick crack of his neck. "Can you go on the surface?" James wondered.

Kai nodded. "I can. So long as I return before nightfall."

James looked at him curiously.

Kai peered at James's left arm. "The same god that granted you that arm happens to be an enemy of the god that granted me MY powers." He said sternly.

James looked at the wolf arm for a moment. Then nodded understanding.

"Fuck em all. Right?" He said.

Kai thought for a moment, then nodded once. James watched as he pulled the harp over his arm like he had when he'd been fighting the Muck Marchers.... how many days ago now?

Kai's left hand reached out and the many-eyed mask glided into his hand. Instead of placing the mask on his face Kai pulled a single gem from it and then placed it on his belt. He took the single, slightly green, gem and pressed it to his forehead. James watched as the flesh there parted with a barely audible pop. Then the gem settled in place and began glowing.

He could ask questions later, he hoped. Before them, a bit of rock crumbled away from the ceiling and sand began to pour into the tunnel before a spray of webs crossed underneath the opening and halted the flow. A wave of spiders skittered up the walls and across the ceiling and made quick work of moving the sand aside and creating a vertical shaft large enough for their platform.

"Not to offend or anything." James said. "But I just thought you should know that I'm really scared of spiders."

Kai turned and raised an eyebrow. James noticed that the eyes beneath were both sealed shut. Then the elf turned back to the opening as their platform began moving again.

"Noted." He said as they began to rise.

"Remember." James said just as they were about to emerge into the daylight. "Only kill if you have to."

Kai nodded. "I'll try." He said.

\----------

Vickers was only ten yards away from the two lackadaisical soldiers now. He'd spent nearly three hours crossing the desert between his former position and their canopy in small bursts of movement that at times only resulted in inches of gained ground.

Neither of the young soldiers, a specialist and a corporal, had seen him somehow. He wanted to be proud of his training and take credit for being as proficient in stealth as he was. But at some point it stopped being a matter of his skill and more a sign of THEIR incompetence.

For god's sake, this was an empty desert. How had neither of them seen the moving mound of scrub brush and odd looking sand slowly making its way closer? They were, for all purposes, on an alien world. How were they not being more observant.

He was about to make his move, hitting them with a few of the green polymer training rounds that he'd taken from Choi without the young captain knowing. It would beat them up, and shock them off foot, allowing him to close the last few yards and neutralize them easily.

Then something entirely unexpected happened.

The sand beneath him began to rumble softly, vibrating and shifting under him in a way that made his position feel unstable. The two guards seemed to notice too as they both shot to their feet. The one whose rifle had been slung to the canopy retrieved it and checked its safety.

Then Vickers saw something he never could have expected.

Some two dozen yards away Choi appeared, standing next to a tall, midnight black elf. The two of them burst from the ground as if they were part of a magician's stage act.

And they were surrounded by an explosion of moving creatures that made Vickers' skin crawl as he realized what they were.

"Fucking spiders?" He asked under his breath.

The two soldiers seemed to be in a similar state of distress.

"WHAT THE FUCK!" One of them yelled as they raised their weapon to fire.

Something blurred and suddenly the soldier was falling to the ground, their weapon knocked out of their hands as they fell unconscious from some unseen impact.

Vickers watched as Choi recovered the chain weapon, though he also noticed that it looked different. Choi had a look of shocked concern on his face.

The other soldier, the one that hadn't checked his weapon, attempted to fire. The weapon didn't report and they began looking at it. They had forgotten their safety switch.

Before they could correct the mistake a mass of spiders was engulfing them.

Vickers watched in horror as the soldier was quickly rolled across the sand, screaming the entire time. After a few moments the screams were muffled and the swarm of spiders parted to show the soldier bundled as though they were being saved for later. Their mouth was covered in web. Though, not the rest of their face.

Then Vickers saw the swarm turn towards him.

"Oh. Fuck!" He said as he burst to his feet. Rifle held above his head in one hand. "CHOI!" He yelled.

The spiders were only a few feet away.

"CHOIIIII!!!!!" He yelled again, louder.

Choi reached over to the elf and shook their shoulder. His head tilted to the side and Vickers ripped the ghillie covering off of his face.

"Vickers?" Choi asked. "What are you doing here?"

Vickers looked down at the mass of differently colored arachnids. They'd stopped only inches away from him. He resisted the urge to shake a large red and green one off of his boot as it peered up at him.

"What am I doin' here?" He shot back, suddenly angry at how scared he'd just been. "WHAT THE FUCK IS GOING ON?"

The elf looked at Choi curiously. Choi held a hand up as he looked back. "He's cool Kai. He's.... a friend."

Vickers breathed a sigh of relief as the spiders began to draw back.

"As you say." The elf said.

Choi quickly jogged over to the soldier that he'd attacked with his chain, who Vickers now noticed was also bundled like an insect, and reached down to touch the man's neck. After a few moments he nodded.

"Oh thank god." He said as Vickers slowly, and uncertainly, walked over to meet him. "I thought I'd killed him."

"Choi." Vickers said. "What the hell's going on?" He pointed at the elf. "Who the hell is that? And why the FUCK!... did I almost become spider food?"

"Right." Choi said as he stood up and, in a move that surprised Vickers, wrapped him in a hug. "It is so good to see you man. I was worried you'd died. How's Amina?"

Vickers returned the hug awkwardly. "She's worried about you dude." He pushed the smaller man off of him and held him at arms length as he looked at him.

There was something different about the young soldier. He could see it in his eyes and the way he looked back at the SEAL with a sort of tired wariness.

"What the hell happened?" Vickers asked, legitimately concerned.

Choi looked away uncertainly. "I kinda.... died again." He said after a few moments. "Like with the fire elemental. Only... I think I was a bit closer to the edge this time." He looked down at the ground and Vickers felt him shudder. "I thought the Miffy's had gotten you two too."

Suddenly Vickers knew what had happened to the young man.

"Jesus." He said as he began to notice the odd lines that were barely visible at various spots on Choi's face and neck. They looked like old scars. "You got intercepted didn't you?" He asked in awe. Suddenly he couldn't help but look Choi up and down again. "How are you alive?"

The elf cleared their throat noisily, and in a fashion that made it obvious it was just for attention. Vickers looked over and saw an odd light coming from the elf's forehead, and that its eyes were shut.

"Oh. Right." Choi said. "Vickers this is Kai. He's some kind of Spider Prince." He gestured at the elf, who nodded. "Kai this is Chief Vickers. Closest thing I have to a right hand man."

Vickers' eyebrows wrinkled as he scoffed a bit. "I am n-"

"Kai is the one that put me back together." Choi interrupted. "But there's worse than all this stuff Vickers."

Vickers looked back down at him. Choi met his gaze with an anger that was unexpected.

"They've got Muck Marchers. And they're using em." Choi said.

Vickers' jaw clenched as he heard the announcement.

"I know." He said. "Come on. We gotta warn your girl."

"Where is she?" Choi asked.

"Bringing the cavalry." Vickers replied.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ycnj4i/wait_is_this_just_gate_247/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (246/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Battle buddies are always gonna be battle buddies. Even if antagonistic ones. ^(Halfhearted Hooah.)

Enjoy.

Edit: God, there were some formatting issues with this one. Think I lost a few paragraphs. Let me know if anything looks iffy as a miffy.

\~

Driscoll entered the decontamination chamber with a clang as he closed the door. then he hit the blue pad with his armored hand, informing it that he was ready for the decon action to start.

A series of nozzles blasted him from all sides with alternating streams of boiling hot water and jets of high pressure air, cleaning the sand and other debris off of him and doing their best to sanitize his armor at the same time. Once they were done with their thirty second cycle a series of heat panels activated to dry him and kill off anything that remained. He watched patiently as the temperature outside the suit rose to nearly three hundred degrees and then remained there for another thirty seconds.

Once the cycle was complete the door on the wall in front of him opened and he stepped into a smaller room that had cold, air conditioned, air blasted right onto him. It cooled the exterior of his armor until it would be safe to touch.

Then he stepped into the sterilized room beyond and saw Rodriguez.

The Toolies, that was what they called their combination doctors and suit mechanics, were working on him in their inflated sterile room suits. One was slowly but surely laying down the fiber optic based panels that made up the interiors of their helmets. Each cell was less than three millimeters wide and hexagon shaped. They had to be layered in a specific pattern and order, and he knew it would take hours to even get half the display mapped.

The other Toolie was working on Rodriguez himself.

It had been more than five years since Driscoll had seen Rodriguez's body, such as it was, out of his suit. He looked down at his own armored chest and wondered how long it had even been since he'd seen his own body.

Rodriguez was, like most of their crew, a lifer. He'd signed on for the experimental program because his only other option had been to spend his remaining days sitting in a hospital somewhere, letting machines do most of his living for him anyways. Like Driscoll, the military had given him an offer. To still be hooked up to machines, and dependent on them to live, but also to be ambulatory and capable of interacting with the world, even if through a mechanical filter. The other upside was that doing so would give him a chance to get back at the people that had put him in his condition in the first place.

Just like Driscoll, and so many others, Rodriguez had jumped at the opportunity.

Driscoll looked at the third of a body that was Rodriguez's entirety with shame. There were no arms, those had been reduced to stubs that ended just below his shoulder joints, each of them had a series of metal sensors embedded in them. His torso ended at an angle, the lower end of which stopped just below his left rib-cage, and the higher end of which was just below his right nipple. There was the standard interface collar, a mixture of steel braided cables and hoses layered over a metal plate, that plate was fastened to each side of his collar bone and shoulder blades, and had a series of plugs that ran up his back before going into the base of his skull.

Below the end of Rodriguez's torso was what all of them called the shit can. It was designed to look like a continuation of their bodies, for the sake of symmetry inside their suits. But there was no disguising the carbon nanotube reinforced mixture of metal and ceramic sections that, for all intents and purposes made up whatever organs they needed to live. In Rodriguez's case that consisted of his liver, a kidney that also doubled as an automatic oncocidal monitor/injector, one lung, and his entire gut. All of which were lab designed for efficiency, and grown with stem cells and REG-TEK cell recombination technology.

They called it the shit can because the one thing that each and every one of them had had replaced was their digestive system. That, and the fact that if the metal housing was ever breached or compromised, it was basically a death sentence for whoever it was attached to.

Luckily for Driscoll's shame that wasn't what had happened to Rodriguez.

He watched for a moment as the Toolie continued working on the two implants in the man's eye sockets. When the tech paused to grab a tool, Driscoll spoke up.

"Hey Rod." He said as he gingerly tapped a finger to the man's forehead.

"Boss?" Rodriguez asked as he lifted his head up to touch the finger in return. It was the only movement any of them were really capable of out of the suits, and so the traditional method of returning the greeting.

"Yeah." Driscoll replied. "How you doin?"

"Felt like takin' a walk. Gettin' some nice, fresh air. You know?" Rodriguez said with a grin. "Shame about the view."

And just like that Driscoll's tension eased. Rodriguez had always been the one person in the crew that could make any of the others cool down. He was, as far as the suits allowed, their big man. The guy they all looked to for reassuring words or a good laugh. Even Driscoll.

"What's the damage?" He asked.

"Pretty much what you see." Rodriguez replied with an attempted shrug. "Burns on my face, not that I was winning any beauty contests anyways. And my eyes. I'll be using the pinhole interface from here on out."

Driscoll nodded solemnly. He knew several other members of their force that had the same interface. It allowed them to see. But not the same way they'd been seeing their whole lives up until that point. Less like actual eyes and more like a simplified, permanent HUD. And only when they had their suit's helmet on.

He reached out and rubbed a knuckle on the man's sternum for a moment. Their equivalent of a hand on the shoulder for those who.... no longer had shoulders to speak of.

"I'm sorry." He said. "I-" He began.

"Don't be." Rodriguez cut him off. "It was a shit op, and some bad luck against an enemy we had no intel on. If I hadn't been rockin' the shotty and some fire shells I'd've probably tried the same thing." He said as he looked, so to speak, off to the side. "I was in the wrong spot at the wrong time and even with the suit's warning I didn't have the time to react. Noone would've."

Driscoll hung his head a bit. He knew that his friend was right. But it still didn't make him feel that much better.

"You want someone to blame?" Rodriguez continued. "Blame those fuckin' smart ass spiders." He said. "I mean... spiders dodging bullets? That's some bullshit."

Driscoll let out a quick, half hearted, laugh. "It is aint it?" He asked. He'd had more than his fair share of time to think of that too.

"Fuckin' hated spiders even before that fight." Rodriguez said with a look of disgust. "Now I really hate em."

"That's right." Driscoll said. "I remember that op in the Bering. You got scared of-"

"Fuck them king crabs man." Rodriguez cut him off with a shudder that made the nearby tech place a hand on his chest to still him. "Fuckin big ass spider motherfuckers with their big ass claws."

Driscoll full on bellowed laughter through his speakers. "You started stomping and chopping every crab that touched you. You churned up the water so bad our sensors started to have trouble finding you."

Rodriguez's eyebrows furrowed in anger even as he fought not to laugh himself.

"Like, the closest thing to being in a nightmare." He said. "And all in the black and green of my HUD. Fuckin' terrifying."

"They couldn't have hurt you if they'd wanted to." Driscoll reminded him as he continued laughing.

The two of them stayed like that for a minute. Driscoll laughing and Rodriguez shaking his head and trying to be angry at the memory.

Eventually they calmed down though. Rodriguez broke the ensuing silence first.

"Lost Mudder on that one." He said, his voice growing solemn. "Got caught under that sub when it drifted after we popped it."

Driscoll nodded. "Yeah." He said.

"Happens." Rodriguez said. Then he turned to try to look at Driscoll, though he was off by a few degrees. "But it didn't happen this time."

Driscoll nodded.

"Are you nodding?" Rodriguez asked. "You always nod. I can't see that shit dude."

"You're right." Driscoll said. "Still. Sorry bout the eyes."

"All good boss. Suit's still moving." Rodriguez said.

"Good." Driscoll shot back as he made to leave. "Better get back in it soon. Looks like a fight's comin'."

"On the double boss." Rodriguez replied. "Tell Doc to come see me. I know he got all pissy like he always does."

"Will do." Driscoll said as he stepped back into the decontamination room and closed the door behind him.

\----------

"I must admit I was a touch skeptical when you told me that everyone dies of shock Mrs. Choi." Shrend said as he looked over the translated version of the text book she had been going over with the large minotaur and a few of his fellow healers. "Though, once you explained that you weren't talking about electricity, and that shock actually had a different meaning when it came to medicine it began to make more sense."

"It was one of the first things I was ever taught when I was becoming a paramedic many years ago." Margaret explained. "It's a vast oversimplification of what goes on in a dying body. But it is technically true."

Shrend nodded. "Now, I have seen this Ox-I-Jen mentioned many times in these books. And Arch-Mage Veliry tried to explain it to me once. Though, in her typical fashion, she spoke too fast for most of us to keep up."

Margaret nodded back. "She has that tendency doesn't she." She turned her English version of the book to its appendix to find the section on oxygenation. She was about to flip to the page in question when her son walked in.

"Hi mom." He said. "Hello Mr. Farstorm." He said with a wave.

"Mr. Choi." Shrend said with a smile. "Good to see you again. Is everything okay?"

Joey nodded. "Just here to see my mom. Someone said she was here."

"You know Mr. Shrend?" Margaret asked.

Joey nodded again. "I met him one of the first days we were allowed to move about freely. I couldn't help but introduce myself and ask him some questions." He said with just a hint of embarrassment.

"We were just going over the medical textbooks James had brought over." Margaret said as she pointed at the book resting on the meeting table in front of them. "Seeing if we can bridge the gap between Earth Science and Petravian Magic."

"Cool." Joey said as he looked at the book. He touched his finger to the page just under the chapter title before quickly pulling his hand back with a look of disgust. "Are you going to learn healing magic?" He asked.

"I uh..." She began with a confused look around the room. The other healers looked at her curiously. "I don't... know." She looked back at Shrend. "Can I?"

Shrend shrugged with a look of confusion himself. "I assumed that was part of why you wanted to work with us." He said simply. "To learn healing magic and see if your knowledge helped with it."

Joey bounced lightly on his feet as he placed a hand on her shoulder. "You should do it mom." He said excitedly. "Then we'll have an entire adventure party family. Amina as the tank. James as the half caster. Me as the mage. And you for healing."

She looked at him with her eyebrows knit in concern. "Joey I am NOT an adventurer." She said in a slightly frustrated tone. "And I do NOT know any magic."

"We can teach you." Said an older looking, short statured, woman at the table. "We are already teaching your ambassador healing magic. Though she hasn't had the results she was hoping for just yet."

Margaret turned to look at the speaker in shock. "Ambassador Werner is learning healing magic?" She asked. I thought James said she was a cold b-word. Why would she want to learn healing magic.

"Indeed." Shrend confirmed. "Though, I would be uncomfortable speaking of HER... reasoning." He said with a hint of venom as he emphasized the word while glaring at the other healers. "Without her permission."

Margaret nodded. "I see that patient confidentiality is a thing here too." She said. Shrend nodded "Good."

"I will tell you that she is here though." Shrend said. "She's in a lesson right now. Would you care to meet her? Maybe she can help you learn healing magic. Since she would likely have had a similar starting point to you."

"Do it mom." Joey said as he continued bouncing.

"I... I guess." She said as she started to stand up.

I guess I'm learning magic now too. She thought, slightly irritated at the idea. I'm too old to be back in school.

\---

"James." Kai said softly as he nudged James's shoulder.

"Hmm?" James grumbled as he faded back into wakefulness.

"Wake up. We are only a few minutes away from the surface."

"Already?" James said as he yawned and straightened out his legs to stretch.

"It has been three hours since last we spoke." Kai said in response. "Another few hundred meters and we should be back roughly where you were retrieved by the dwarves. Though my spiders tell me that that position is guarded, so we are emerging a few dozen yards away.

James slowly gained his feet, stretching his back as he rolled to an upright standing position. He jammed his arms out ramrod straight, the muscles tensing as he yawned again and rolled his hands around in a slow, shaky, circular motion.

"You ready for this?" He asked as he double checked his newly rebuilt weapons. He shook the sleep out with a quick crack of his neck. "Can you go on the surface?" James wondered.

Kai nodded. "I can. So long as I return before nightfall."

James looked at him curiously.

Kai peered at James's left arm. "The same god that granted you that arm happens to be an enemy of the god that granted me MY powers." He said sternly.

James looked at the wolf arm for a moment. Then nodded understanding.

"Fuck em all. Right?" He said.

Kai thought for a moment, then nodded once. James watched as he pulled the harp over his arm like he had when he'd been fighting the Muck Marchers.... how many days ago now?

Kai's left hand reached out and the many-eyed mask glided into his hand. Instead of placing the mask on his face Kai pulled a single gem from it and then placed it on his belt. He took the single, slightly green, gem and pressed it to his forehead. James watched as the flesh there parted with a barely audible pop. Then the gem settled in place and began glowing.

He could ask questions later, he hoped. Before them, a bit of rock crumbled away from the ceiling and sand began to pour into the tunnel before a spray of webs crossed underneath the opening and halted the flow. A wave of spiders skittered up the walls and across the ceiling and made quick work of moving the sand aside and creating a vertical shaft large enough for their platform.

"Not to offend or anything." James said. "But I just thought you should know that I'm really scared of spiders."

Kai turned and raised an eyebrow. James noticed that the eyes beneath were both sealed shut. Then the elf turned back to the opening as their platform began moving again.

"Noted." He said as they began to rise.

"Remember." James said just as they were about to emerge into the daylight. "Only kill if you have to."

Kai nodded. "I'll try." He said.

\----------

Vickers was only ten yards away from the two lackadaisical soldiers now. He'd spent nearly three hours crossing the desert between his former position and their canopy in small bursts of movement that at times only resulted in inches of gained ground.

Neither of the young soldiers, a specialist and a corporal, had seen him somehow. He wanted to be proud of his training and take credit for being as proficient in stealth as he was. But at some point it stopped being a matter of his skill and more a sign of THEIR incompetence.

For god's sake, this was an empty desert. How had neither of them seen the moving mound of scrub brush and odd looking sand slowly making its way closer? They were, for all purposes, on an alien world. How were they not being more observant.

He was about to make his move, hitting them with a few of the green polymer training rounds that he'd taken from Choi without the young captain knowing. It would beat them up, and shock them off foot, allowing him to close the last few yards and neutralize them easily.

Then something entirely unexpected happened.

The sand beneath him began to rumble softly, vibrating and shifting under him in a way that made his position feel unstable. The two guards seemed to notice too as they both shot to their feet. The one whose rifle had been slung to the canopy retrieved it and checked its safety.

Then Vickers saw something he never could have expected.

Some two dozen yards away Choi appeared, standing next to a tall, midnight black elf. The two of them burst from the ground as if they were part of a magician's stage act.

And they were surrounded by an explosion of moving creatures that made Vickers' skin crawl as he realized what they were.

"Fucking spiders?" He asked under his breath.

The two soldiers seemed to be in a similar state of distress.

"WHAT THE FUCK!" One of them yelled as they raised their weapon to fire.

Something blurred and suddenly the soldier was falling to the ground, their weapon knocked out of their hands as they fell unconscious from some unseen impact.

Vickers watched as Choi recovered the chain weapon, though he also noticed that it looked different. Choi had a look of shocked concern on his face.

The other soldier, the one that hadn't checked his weapon, attempted to fire. The weapon didn't report and they began looking at it. They had forgotten their safety switch.

Before they could correct the mistake a mass of spiders was engulfing them.

Vickers watched in horror as the soldier was quickly rolled across the sand, screaming the entire time. After a few moments the screams were muffled and the swarm of spiders parted to show the soldier bundled as though they were being saved for later. Their mouth was covered in web. Though, not the rest of their face.

Then Vickers saw the swarm turn towards him.

"Oh. Fuck!" He said as he burst to his feet. Rifle held above his head in one hand. "CHOI!" He yelled.

The spiders were only a few feet away.

"CHOIIIII!!!!!" He yelled again, louder.

Choi reached over to the elf and shook their shoulder. His head tilted to the side and Vickers ripped the ghillie covering off of his face.

"Vickers?" Choi asked. "What are you doing here?"

Vickers looked down at the mass of differently colored arachnids. They'd stopped only inches away from him. He resisted the urge to shake a large red and green one off of his boot as it peered up at him.

"What am I doin' here?" He shot back, suddenly angry at how scared he'd just been. "WHAT THE FUCK IS GOING ON?"

The elf looked at Choi curiously. Choi held a hand up as he looked back. "He's cool Kai. He's.... a friend."

Vickers breathed a sigh of relief as the spiders began to draw back.

"As you say." The elf said.

Choi quickly jogged over to the soldier that he'd attacked with his chain, who Vickers now noticed was also bundled like an insect, and reached down to touch the man's neck. After a few moments he nodded.

"Oh thank god." He said as Vickers slowly, and uncertainly, walked over to meet him. "I thought I'd killed him."

"Choi." Vickers said. "What the hell's going on?" He pointed at the elf. "Who the hell is that? And why the FUCK!... did I almost become spider food?"

"Right." Choi said as he stood up and, in a move that surprised Vickers, wrapped him in a hug. "It is so good to see you man. I was worried you'd died. How's Amina?"

Vickers returned the hug awkwardly. "She's worried about you dude." He pushed the smaller man off of him and held him at arms length as he looked at him.

There was something different about the young soldier. He could see it in his eyes and the way he looked back at the SEAL with a sort of tired wariness.

"What the hell happened?" Vickers asked, legitimately concerned.

Choi looked away uncertainly. "I kinda.... died again." He said after a few moments. "Like with the fire elemental. Only... I think I was a bit closer to the edge this time." He looked down at the ground and Vickers felt him shudder. "I thought the Miffy's had gotten you two too."

Suddenly Vickers knew what had happened to the young man.

"Jesus." He said as he began to notice the odd lines that were barely visible at various spots on Choi's face and neck. They looked like old scars. "You got intercepted didn't you?" He asked in awe. Suddenly he couldn't help but look Choi up and down again. "How are you alive?"

The elf cleared their throat noisily, and in a fashion that made it obvious it was just for attention. Vickers looked over and saw an odd light coming from the elf's forehead, and that its eyes were shut.

"Oh. Right." Choi said. "Vickers this is Kai. He's some kind of Spider Prince." He gestured at the elf, who nodded. "Kai this is Chief Vickers. Closest thing I have to a right hand man."

Vickers' eyebrows wrinkled as he scoffed a bit. "I am n-"

"Kai is the one that put me back together." Choi interrupted. "But there's worse than all this stuff Vickers."

Vickers looked back down at him. Choi met his gaze with an anger that was unexpected.

"They've got Muck Marchers. And they're using em." Choi said.

Vickers' jaw clenched as he heard the announcement.

"I know." He said. "Come on. We gotta warn your girl."

"Where is she?" Choi asked.

"Bringing the cavalry." Vickers replied.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ycnhc4/wait_is_this_just_gate_247/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (245/?)

Previous

Writer's note: And so we begin to see things draw together. James has just a tiny bit of PTSD, in case that hasn't been obvious these past few chapters. Getting killed for like.... the twentieth time, will do that to a guy.

But guess what. So does our favorite Bostonian.

Enjoy.

\~

As James and Kai slowly floated through the tunnels on the piece of webbed stone that served as a moving platform, James thought of the weapon that rested in its new scabbard under his hand. Kai stood nearby playing his control harp in a pattern that wasn't QUITE a melody, though James had noticed several repeating patterns.

"It's good." Wry'Mis had said as he'd studied the final result with a series of alternating lens goggles. "It's got some changes from the original pattern that the pieces had. Could be ACTUAL changes, or it could just be things we couldn't see because of how weak it had been."

He looked down at the short sword in his hand as the spiders moved he and Kai along, clearing their own webs and any rubble out of their way as the platform ascended through the deep dark at an upward angle. Occasionally they would pause as the spiders found a thin wall between passageways and burrowed their way through it to shorten the trip.

It's blade was no longer the dark grayish blue that it had been before. Instead it was a multicolored array of darkness that even the prismatic light of the scant crystals on their platform couldn't confuse. There were several spots where lines of the original color shone through, they marked where the blade had been pressed and forged back together. The rest of it was a patchy oil-sheen-esque array of different hues, altering between a dark blood red, a slightly glimmering purple, and a dark jade green.

"What do you mean?" He'd asked the enchanter.

"Well." Wry'Mis had said. "We knew that getting it EXACTLY the same would be next to impossible. And we we're right. It's enchantment has been.... not changed... not exactly. But you held the enchantment together based on everything you knew of it. Used the impression it's left on your soul as the mould by which it's been recast."

"So.... what? It's a copy?" James asked.

"More or less." Sary'on had chimed in. "Think of it like this. You have a house that you've lived in for years. You know every hall and doorway like a muscle memory. You know when you walk down the stairs which one will creak and how that creak will sound before you even step on them. You know how a certain door sticks no matter how many times you grease it."

James had nodded. His mother's house had a window that always sounded like it farted whenever it hinged open. He and Joey had always giggled any time it had done so.

"Now imagine that one day your house gets destroyed." Sary'on had said. "You salvage as much of it as you can, and replace the bits that you can't. And you set about rebuilding it as it was."

James had nodded again. "Got it." He'd said. "Sometimes the stair doesn't squeak. Or the door doesn't stick anymore."

"And sometimes it's for the better." Wry'Mis had chimed in. "Sometimes not. That step not squeaking might let a robber get in unheard. But that door not sticking might also let you escape the robber more easily."

"Now." Sary'on had begun. "What do you want to do about the handle?"

James examined the new handle. It was simultaneously simpler looking, and yet infinitely more devious than the original. It was only large enough for a single hand now, and ended in a weighty pommel that had one of the softly glowing crystals on both sides of it.

At the end of the pommel was a small, but sturdy, steel ring.

"You should rest." Kai said. "It will only take a few more hours before we're back at the surface."

James looked at the elf with weary eyes. He could use some sleep he supposed. But too much had gone on without him. He still didn't know what had happened with Vickers and Amina.

Had they rushed after him and met the same fate, but with nobody to retrieve them and bring them back to health?

Had they been captured?

Had they somehow destroyed what had to have been a full military FOB and started the first Inter-Dimensional war? He had no way of knowing.

"You sure you want to come with me?" He asked.

Kai didn't so much as hesitate.

"Of course." He said simply. "I saved your life. It is my responsibility to ensure that that life is not wasted. Or used for nefarious reasons." He said flatly. "Besides. I am still quite angry about what happened to the dwarves. They did not deserve their fate at the hands of these... Muck Marchers." He dipped his head a bit. "Besides. How often does a person, even a long lived elf, get to help someone as important as the Summoned Hero?"

James's head slumped a bit at the mention of his title as he listened to the elf.

Then Kai's tone shifted as he muttered to himself.

"They must learn the trapped fly's fear." He said in a barely audible growl.

James peered over at the slightly scowling elf warily as he heard the angry oath.

After a few minutes of awkward silence James sat down on one of the slightly raised rocks on the platform.

"By the way." He started as he rested his arms on the new chain wrapped around his chest using it as a sort of sling. It wasn't as thick as the last chain. But Sary'on had assured him that it was even tougher. And she said that she'd had Wry'Mis put a few enchantments on his handle before they'd attached the two to each other."What are you?" James asked.

Kai raised an eyebrow.

"I take it that you're not confused about my species." He replied flatly.

James shook his head. "What's a 'Prince of Eyes'?" He asked. "And who is this 'Prince of Webs' that the two guards asked about?"

Kai nodded curtly.

"In the Deep Dark there are monsters and devils and other entities that the surface is not prepared to face." Kai said in a trembling, half whispered way, as though recalling a dream or perhaps a nightmare.

Having faced the blight and its hordes, James wondered about the validity of the statement.

"Life down here is difficult. Dangerous. Those who aren't vigilant can be lost in the space of a heartbeat." Kai continued. "When my people fled the surface countless aeons ago we lost many. To the darkness, AND to the things lurking within it. We made the first fortress towns. Like the one we were just in. But they were few and far between. Some of those fell to the nightmares. Their numbers too vast, and strength too great for my people to fight on their own."

James listened intently even as his eyelids began fighting gravity. He wondered if Grabber Clans had caused some of those losses.

"So we begged the very gods that had forced us to flee in the first place." Kai said. "Only one would listen. And the great irony of it was that it was the Darkness. That great shadow that had been the very thing plaguing us in our new refuges." He held the harp up and stared at it even as he continued using it to move them along. "Darkness promised my people that they would be remade for this new life. And that every generation, guardians would arise. Chosen by the Deep Dark itself to defend us. Twelve of us there would be. And each would command the hordes of the darkness in masses great enough to control hundreds of miles, thousands even, of tunnels and caverns."

Kai's head dropped down even as James's began to loll to the side. He thought he saw the elf shudder.

"Never to know rest or peace." Kai said so softly that James almost couldn't hear it.

"Says who?" James asked, startling the suddenly gloomy elf out of his reverie.

Kai looked at him. Then his eyes seemed to dart around as a susurration of noise seemed to emanate from around the platform. Kai grimaced as his harp began to twang violently without his interference. James heard chittering from all around them, and he thought he knew the answer to the question.

"We all reside in webs of our own weaving." Kai said as he violently ran his fingers across the strings of the instrument with a manic look on his face. "I'm just one of the few who acknowledges the strings."

There were screeches and the sounds of some wet... things.... bursting in the dark. The noise was hard to describe as their platform seemed to shake violently for a moment.

Then Kai brushed a stand of hair away from his face as he stood up to his full height again, and the platform resumed its normal movement.

"Rest James." He said as he turned to face the tunnel in front of them, leaving James behind him. "We'll be there soon."

James slid down until the rock was propping his back up and tried to heed the advice. But the sounds of, what he assumed was the spiders around them revolting against Kai's doubts, made it hard for him to do so despite his weariness.

Still; a soldier can sleep anywhere if they need to, and after a few minutes of watching the dark around them suspiciously James faded into sleep. His dreams were full of hairy legs, beady eyes, and sharp fangs.

In his sleep he unconsciously gripped at the handles to both his new sword, and the new chain.

\----------

Driscoll was greeted by the stern, unforgiving, glare of the Major as his suit jumped out of the hole in the desert sand.

"Major." He said simply.

"Bit overdue." She replied coldly. "Got a good reason?" She asked as she turned to walk away.

Driscoll matched her pace. "No." He replied just as coldly.

She glanced sidelong at him. But after a moment she moved on. Driscoll smiled behind his reflective face plate. She may have had the rank here. But they both knew that he didn't REALLY answer to her. As always, power resided with the person who could actually bring it to bear. And there weren't many settings where that didn't mean him. He glanced at the rear camera feed on his display and looked at the hole as they left it behind. It robbed the smile from his face.

"You looked at what I sent you?" She asked.

"Of course." He said. "Any sign of them?"

"Not since the Chief made his exit." She said. "But we requested and received drone support. There's troop movement in the valleys around this desert. Looks like they're heading south of us."

"How many?" He asked.

"Hard to tell." She admitted. "We're still maneuvering the drones into position. They're the small ones like what they gave Choi and Vickers over in their part of the country. Short range and they need to work WITH each other to actually transmit. But easily hidden." She looked at her tablet for a moment. "But the units we saw were each company sized."

Driscoll did some mental math. "Impressive for only a few weeks work." He said.

"Vickers did say that this country's military, and communication methods, were more efficient than we might expect." She said.

Driscoll nodded. "Plan?" He asked.

The major looked over at him warily for a second, as if unsure of him. He stopped walking and moved so that his faceplate was centered on her. It was a habit that he and his kind had learned to imitate a stare, and had a habit of unnerving most people.

She stopped in her tracks only a step later and didn't even turn back to look at him. She seemed to think for a moment.

"We learned from the fight when you were first sent over." She began. "These people are more than capable of holding their own against conventional human forces. Their physical prowess makes them more than a match for a standard soldier."

Driscoll tilted his head a bit. "But WE..." He emphasized the word so she would know he was talking about his squad. "Aren't standard soldiers." He said.

She nodded. "And this base is no longer reliant on simple handheld firearms either." She said. "But your little... tunnel scuffle.... proves what we already knew. And what you only overcame during that initial fight because you had the element of surprise."

Under his helmet Driscoll scowled.

"MAGIC...." She continued. "Is a game changer." She finally turned back to him. "And with Vickers seemingly on their side, they will know that."

"It hasn't stopped us yet." Driscoll said venomously.

"Hasn't it?" She asked as she turned and began walking again. "You should check in with Rodriguez. He'll be happy to.... SEE... you."

Driscoll chewed his lip as he watched her leave.

\-------------------------

Several hundred yards away, nestled into the side of a dune under his ghillie cloak, Vickers sat watching the two people in a cold sweat. And it wasn't just the gently flowing magic that made it cold.

Vickers looked at them in his scope, the barrel of his rifle just barely protruding from the sand.

The fact that there had been a full military FOB, complete with Miffy's for defense, had been bad enough. The cold blooded Major that he'd spoke to days before had been another tick on the bad side of the equation.

Now he had seen Muck Marchers.

As a Navy SEAL Vickers was probably one of the few people out there who knew just how dangerous the cyborgs were. In fact, he was one of the few people who knew for a fact that they were IN FACT cyborgs. He'd been on more than his fair share of ops that had been in conjunction with Deep Strike forces, or whatever their official name was. He'd seen the armored cyborgs emerge from the water, or mud, or shadows as efficiently as any of his people could. But he'd also seen them walk through walls of intercepting enemy fire as if it was just a slight downpour. Their armor protecting them from the incoming rounds as easily as if they weren't there. Hell, he'd seen one muck marcher take an old pre-war model RPG to the gut and thought they were dead. Then only a week later had seen the same Muck Marcher walk into an enemy compound with a semi automatic shotgun and clean house.

Or, more accurately, he'd been moving to secure a compound when the Muck Marcher in question had emerged from it covered in soot, ricochet marks, and enemy blood. It had been one of the few times in Vickers' military career where he'd looked at someone who was, at least ostensibly, on his side and been afraid.

So what were they doing here? HOW could they be here? He wondered, as he watched the two figures crest a dune and continue on toward the base, suddenly glad that he was so far away. Had that one sensed him there? He THOUGHT he could avoid the sensors of the Miffy's. But he had NO idea whether he could avoid detection by a Muck Marcher. He had no idea what kind of sensor suites those things even had.

Wait. He thought. How did that one just pop up out of the ground like that?

He panned his rifle scope slowly towards where the armored figure had popped out of the ground. He'd done so in a similar fashion to how Vickers had seen them land themselves on enemy docks after bursting from the water.

Can they move through the sand the same way they can move through the water? He wondered with a mounting sense of dread. If so than Amina and the other Petravians were already dead and just didn't know it.

No. He realized. There was something there. The sand in that spot was indented oddly, and as he switched over to infrared he saw a large difference in temperature there. It was colder, and he could see cold air occasionally flow out of it before the heat of the desert whisked it away.

There's gotta be some kind of opening there. He realized. But what were they doing down there?

He looked around, surveying the area to see if anyone else was there. Then he had a chilling thought.

That void that was hiding when I spoke to the Major. He realized. He didn't know how he knew it. But the new information made him certain. It was one of them. He shuddered. They could have taken me whenever they wanted.

After a few minutes of ensuring that the area was more or less empty, Vickers began to slowly inch his way toward the opening in the ground. It still had a few soldiers sitting in chairs near it under a small canopy. One of them was eating what he assumed was part of an MRE. But they were just ordinary soldiers. One of them even had their rifle hanging from one of the legs of the canopy, as if it were a jacket or hat.

A couple amateurs. He thought. So a little motion out here shouldn't set off any sensors.

Vickers continued slowly inching forward.

\-------------------------

"Are you sure I can't go with you?" Joey asked as he helped Veliry pack her things into the bottomless bag that matched her robes.

"No Joey." She said with surprising firmness. "You're still only an apprentice. And this is a dangerous situation."

"But. James is in trouble." He replied. "I wanna help."

She took a deep breath as she finished placing a bundle of glowing rocks into a sack and stuffed it into her bag.

"I know." She said. "But it's not safe for you. It's not even safe for me. And I promised your mother AND James that I wouldn't let you get hurt." She picked up an orb that looked like it was made of pink glass, it let off small firework-like sparks when she touched it. She looked at it for a moment then decided against bringing it and set it down. "Besides. This will also be a good chance to test our new discovery over long distances. I'll need you here to ensure it works on this end. You remember the signal right?"

Joey nodded eagerly. "You'll throw a signal stone through." He said. "Then we'll send Sergeant Marius through to assess the situation."

Veliry nodded. "Good." She said. "With any luck it will simply be a successful test. But... It could also end up saving our lives."

"What should I do while I wait for everyone to come back?" He asked.

"Marcos can lead you in your studies if you'd like." She replied. "I know he's not terribly exciting to listen to. But he is still an incredibly knowledgeable mage. And an expert on fields that I struggle with." She said, not mentioning how similar Joey's explanation of learning had resembled the reason she also struggled with those subjects. "Just no using necromancy. You'll end up enslaved by a demon."

Joey's eyes went wide. "There's necromancy?" He wondered softly to himself. "That's not good."

Suddenly Veliry wrapped her arms around him in a hug, breaking him out of his thought process. She made it a quick one, knowing how uncomfortable he was with unexpected contact.

"You've made incredible progress. But be safe with your studies." She said with a raised finger. "Take your mother out into the capital or something." She said as she began flying toward the door. Then she seemed to remember something and turned to the door. "Door." She said.

"Yes madame Veliry?" It asked.

"Joseph Choi is allowed provisional entry to the laboratory while I'm gone." She turned back to look at him. "For ACADEMIC PURPOSES ONLY." She said as he avoided eye contact. "And he is not to stay here over night, or for more than four hours at a time. Understood?"

"YES." Both Joey and the door said in unison. Joey pursed his lips in a pout. Four hours was when his phone alarms went off to remind him to take care of himself.

"Joey." Said Veliry in a much happier tone.

He looked up at her. "Yeah?"

"Don't slack off while I'm gone." She said with a smile. "If you get that fire spell figured out before I get back we'll move onto the deathbolts."

Joey smiled back.

Then she flew past the hidden door and out of sight.

He looked out one of the side windows, past a jar with what looked like a three headed dragon fetus in it that she'd never explained. He saw her a moment later as she emerged from the side entrance to one of the balconies. She landed for a moment.

Then she began flying away on the magically created jet thrusters that she and his brother had figured out only a few weeks ago. Several other royal mages struggled to keep up using different methods of flight.

Joey's eyes bulged as he saw one on what he was fairly certain was a magic carpet.

Then they were gone into the sky.

He turned back and looked at the books he'd left on the table the day before. He focused his energy, drawing it in from everything around him. His clothes fluttered for a moment and he had to fight not to use the wind magic.

He had other ideas in mind. And in magic, ideas were what mattered.

He held his hand out, fingers splayed like so many movies he'd watched as a child. He focused on reaching out with the energy.

The book began to rattle as he focused more and more on it.

It leapt into the air a few inches and looked almost like it was going to head towards him. He smiled with excitement.

Then there was a loud ripping noise and the two halves of the book slid off the table in different directions, one of them knocking over a glass of water as it went.

Joey peeked over and saw a series of eyes form on the door, peering around the room to find the source of the disturbance. The uncanny visage made him even more uncomfortable than normal people's faces did and he quickly set about cleaning his mess.

I'll get that sooner or later. He thought as he examined the ruined book. Hopefully sooner.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ya3ikq/wait_is_this_just_gate_246/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (245/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: And so we begin to see things draw together. James has just a tiny bit of PTSD, in case that hasn't been obvious these past few chapters. Getting killed for like.... the twentieth time, will do that to a guy.

But guess what. So does our favorite Bostonian.

Enjoy.

\~

As James and Kai slowly floated through the tunnels on the piece of webbed stone that served as a moving platform, James thought of the weapon that rested in its new scabbard under his hand. Kai stood nearby playing his control harp in a pattern that wasn't QUITE a melody, though James had noticed several repeating patterns.

"It's good." Wry'Mis had said as he'd studied the final result with a series of alternating lens goggles. "It's got some changes from the original pattern that the pieces had. Could be ACTUAL changes, or it could just be things we couldn't see because of how weak it had been."

He looked down at the short sword in his hand as the spiders moved he and Kai along, clearing their own webs and any rubble out of their way as the platform ascended through the deep dark at an upward angle. Occasionally they would pause as the spiders found a thin wall between passageways and burrowed their way through it to shorten the trip.

It's blade was no longer the dark grayish blue that it had been before. Instead it was a multicolored array of darkness that even the prismatic light of the scant crystals on their platform couldn't confuse. There were several spots where lines of the original color shone through, they marked where the blade had been pressed and forged back together. The rest of it was a patchy oil-sheen-esque array of different hues, altering between a dark blood red, a slightly glimmering purple, and a dark jade green.

"What do you mean?" He'd asked the enchanter.

"Well." Wry'Mis had said. "We knew that getting it EXACTLY the same would be next to impossible. And we we're right. It's enchantment has been.... not changed... not exactly. But you held the enchantment together based on everything you knew of it. Used the impression it's left on your soul as the mould by which it's been recast."

"So.... what? It's a copy?" James asked.

"More or less." Sary'on had chimed in. "Think of it like this. You have a house that you've lived in for years. You know every hall and doorway like a muscle memory. You know when you walk down the stairs which one will creak and how that creak will sound before you even step on them. You know how a certain door sticks no matter how many times you grease it."

James had nodded. His mother's house had a window that always sounded like it farted whenever it hinged open. He and Joey had always giggled any time it had done so.

"Now imagine that one day your house gets destroyed." Sary'on had said. "You salvage as much of it as you can, and replace the bits that you can't. And you set about rebuilding it as it was."

James had nodded again. "Got it." He'd said. "Sometimes the stair doesn't squeak. Or the door doesn't stick anymore."

"And sometimes it's for the better." Wry'Mis had chimed in. "Sometimes not. That step not squeaking might let a robber get in unheard. But that door not sticking might also let you escape the robber more easily."

"Now." Sary'on had begun. "What do you want to do about the handle?"

James examined the new handle. It was simultaneously simpler looking, and yet infinitely more devious than the original. It was only large enough for a single hand now, and ended in a weighty pommel that had one of the softly glowing crystals on both sides of it.

At the end of the pommel was a small, but sturdy, steel ring.

"You should rest." Kai said. "It will only take a few more hours before we're back at the surface."

James looked at the elf with weary eyes. He could use some sleep he supposed. But too much had gone on without him. He still didn't know what had happened with Vickers and Amina.

Had they rushed after him and met the same fate, but with nobody to retrieve them and bring them back to health?

Had they been captured?

Had they somehow destroyed what had to have been a full military FOB and started the first Inter-Dimensional war? He had no way of knowing.

"You sure you want to come with me?" He asked.

Kai didn't so much as hesitate.

"Of course." He said simply. "I saved your life. It is my responsibility to ensure that that life is not wasted. Or used for nefarious reasons." He said flatly. "Besides. I am still quite angry about what happened to the dwarves. They did not deserve their fate at the hands of these... Muck Marchers." He dipped his head a bit. "Besides. How often does a person, even a long lived elf, get to help someone as important as the Summoned Hero?"

James's head slumped a bit at the mention of his title as he listened to the elf.

Then Kai's tone shifted as he muttered to himself.

^("They must learn the trapped fly's fear.") He said in a barely audible growl.

James peered over at the slightly scowling elf warily as he heard the angry oath.

After a few minutes of awkward silence James sat down on one of the slightly raised rocks on the platform.

"By the way." He started as he rested his arms on the new chain wrapped around his chest using it as a sort of sling. It wasn't as thick as the last chain. But Sary'on had assured him that it was even tougher. And she said that she'd had Wry'Mis put a few enchantments on his handle before they'd attached the two to each other."What are you?" James asked.

Kai raised an eyebrow.

"I take it that you're not confused about my species." He replied flatly.

James shook his head. "What's a 'Prince of Eyes'?" He asked. "And who is this 'Prince of Webs' that the two guards asked about?"

Kai nodded curtly.

"In the Deep Dark there are monsters and devils and other entities that the surface is not prepared to face." Kai said in a trembling, half whispered way, as though recalling a dream or perhaps a nightmare.

Having faced the blight and its hordes, James wondered about the validity of the statement.

"Life down here is difficult. Dangerous. Those who aren't vigilant can be lost in the space of a heartbeat." Kai continued. "When my people fled the surface countless aeons ago we lost many. To the darkness, AND to the things lurking within it. We made the first fortress towns. Like the one we were just in. But they were few and far between. Some of those fell to the nightmares. Their numbers too vast, and strength too great for my people to fight on their own."

James listened intently even as his eyelids began fighting gravity. He wondered if Grabber Clans had caused some of those losses.

"So we begged the very gods that had forced us to flee in the first place." Kai said. "Only one would listen. And the great irony of it was that it was the Darkness. That great shadow that had been the very thing plaguing us in our new refuges." He held the harp up and stared at it even as he continued using it to move them along. "Darkness promised my people that they would be remade for this new life. And that every generation, guardians would arise. Chosen by the Deep Dark itself to defend us. Twelve of us there would be. And each would command the hordes of the darkness in masses great enough to control hundreds of miles, thousands even, of tunnels and caverns."

Kai's head dropped down even as James's began to loll to the side. He thought he saw the elf shudder.

^("Never to know rest or peace.") Kai said so softly that James almost couldn't hear it.

"Says who?" James asked, startling the suddenly gloomy elf out of his reverie.

Kai looked at him. Then his eyes seemed to dart around as a susurration of noise seemed to emanate from around the platform. Kai grimaced as his harp began to twang violently without his interference. James heard chittering from all around them, and he thought he knew the answer to the question.

"We all reside in webs of our own weaving." Kai said as he violently ran his fingers across the strings of the instrument with a manic look on his face. "I'm just one of the few who acknowledges the strings."

There were screeches and the sounds of some wet... things.... bursting in the dark. The noise was hard to describe as their platform seemed to shake violently for a moment.

Then Kai brushed a stand of hair away from his face as he stood up to his full height again, and the platform resumed its normal movement.

"Rest James." He said as he turned to face the tunnel in front of them, leaving James behind him. "We'll be there soon."

James slid down until the rock was propping his back up and tried to heed the advice. But the sounds of, what he assumed was the spiders around them revolting against Kai's doubts, made it hard for him to do so despite his weariness.

Still; a soldier can sleep anywhere if they need to, and after a few minutes of watching the dark around them suspiciously James faded into sleep. His dreams were full of hairy legs, beady eyes, and sharp fangs.

In his sleep he unconsciously gripped at the handles to both his new sword, and the new chain.

\----------

Driscoll was greeted by the stern, unforgiving, glare of the Major as his suit jumped out of the hole in the desert sand.

"Major." He said simply.

"Bit overdue." She replied coldly. "Got a good reason?" She asked as she turned to walk away.

Driscoll matched her pace. "No." He replied just as coldly.

She glanced sidelong at him. But after a moment she moved on. Driscoll smiled behind his reflective face plate. She may have had the rank here. But they both knew that he didn't REALLY answer to her. As always, power resided with the person who could actually bring it to bear. And there weren't many settings where that didn't mean him. He glanced at the rear camera feed on his display and looked at the hole as they left it behind. It robbed the smile from his face.

"You looked at what I sent you?" She asked.

"Of course." He said. "Any sign of them?"

"Not since the Chief made his exit." She said. "But we requested and received drone support. There's troop movement in the valleys around this desert. Looks like they're heading south of us."

"How many?" He asked.

"Hard to tell." She admitted. "We're still maneuvering the drones into position. They're the small ones like what they gave Choi and Vickers over in their part of the country. Short range and they need to work WITH each other to actually transmit. But easily hidden." She looked at her tablet for a moment. "But the units we saw were each company sized."

Driscoll did some mental math. "Impressive for only a few weeks work." He said.

"Vickers did say that this country's military, and communication methods, were more efficient than we might expect." She said.

Driscoll nodded. "Plan?" He asked.

The major looked over at him warily for a second, as if unsure of him. He stopped walking and moved so that his faceplate was centered on her. It was a habit that he and his kind had learned to imitate a stare, and had a habit of unnerving most people.

She stopped in her tracks only a step later and didn't even turn back to look at him. She seemed to think for a moment.

"We learned from the fight when you were first sent over." She began. "These people are more than capable of holding their own against conventional human forces. Their physical prowess makes them more than a match for a standard soldier."

Driscoll tilted his head a bit. "But WE..." He emphasized the word so she would know he was talking about his squad. "Aren't standard soldiers." He said.

She nodded. "And this base is no longer reliant on simple handheld firearms either." She said. "But your little... tunnel scuffle.... proves what we already knew. And what you only overcame during that initial fight because you had the element of surprise."

Under his helmet Driscoll scowled.

"MAGIC...." She continued. "Is a game changer." She finally turned back to him. "And with Vickers seemingly on their side, they will know that."

"It hasn't stopped us yet." Driscoll said venomously.

"Hasn't it?" She asked as she turned and began walking again. "You should check in with Rodriguez. He'll be happy to.... SEE... you."

Driscoll chewed his lip as he watched her leave.

\-------------------------

Several hundred yards away, nestled into the side of a dune under his ghillie cloak, Vickers sat watching the two people in a cold sweat. And it wasn't just the gently flowing magic that made it cold.

Vickers looked at them in his scope, the barrel of his rifle just barely protruding from the sand.

The fact that there had been a full military FOB, complete with Miffy's for defense, had been bad enough. The cold blooded Major that he'd spoke to days before had been another tick on the bad side of the equation.

Now he had seen Muck Marchers.

As a Navy SEAL Vickers was probably one of the few people out there who knew just how dangerous the cyborgs were. In fact, he was one of the few people who knew for a fact that they were IN FACT cyborgs. He'd been on more than his fair share of ops that had been in conjunction with Deep Strike forces, or whatever their official name was. He'd seen the armored cyborgs emerge from the water, or mud, or shadows as efficiently as any of his people could. But he'd also seen them walk through walls of intercepting enemy fire as if it was just a slight downpour. Their armor protecting them from the incoming rounds as easily as if they weren't there. Hell, he'd seen one muck marcher take an old pre-war model RPG to the gut and thought they were dead. Then only a week later had seen the same Muck Marcher walk into an enemy compound with a semi automatic shotgun and clean house.

Or, more accurately, he'd been moving to secure a compound when the Muck Marcher in question had emerged from it covered in soot, ricochet marks, and enemy blood. It had been one of the few times in Vickers' military career where he'd looked at someone who was, at least ostensibly, on his side and been afraid.

So what were they doing here? HOW could they be here? He wondered, as he watched the two figures crest a dune and continue on toward the base, suddenly glad that he was so far away. Had that one sensed him there? He THOUGHT he could avoid the sensors of the Miffy's. But he had NO idea whether he could avoid detection by a Muck Marcher. He had no idea what kind of sensor suites those things even had.

Wait. He thought. How did that one just pop up out of the ground like that?

He panned his rifle scope slowly towards where the armored figure had popped out of the ground. He'd done so in a similar fashion to how Vickers had seen them land themselves on enemy docks after bursting from the water.

Can they move through the sand the same way they can move through the water? He wondered with a mounting sense of dread. If so than Amina and the other Petravians were already dead and just didn't know it.

No. He realized. There was something there. The sand in that spot was indented oddly, and as he switched over to infrared he saw a large difference in temperature there. It was colder, and he could see cold air occasionally flow out of it before the heat of the desert whisked it away.

There's gotta be some kind of opening there. He realized. But what were they doing down there?

He looked around, surveying the area to see if anyone else was there. Then he had a chilling thought.

That void that was hiding when I spoke to the Major. He realized. He didn't know how he knew it. But the new information made him certain. It was one of them. He shuddered. They could have taken me whenever they wanted.

After a few minutes of ensuring that the area was more or less empty, Vickers began to slowly inch his way toward the opening in the ground. It still had a few soldiers sitting in chairs near it under a small canopy. One of them was eating what he assumed was part of an MRE. But they were just ordinary soldiers. One of them even had their rifle hanging from one of the legs of the canopy, as if it were a jacket or hat.

A couple amateurs. He thought. So a little motion out here shouldn't set off any sensors.

Vickers continued slowly inching forward.

\-------------------------

"Are you sure I can't go with you?" Joey asked as he helped Veliry pack her things into the bottomless bag that matched her robes.

"No Joey." She said with surprising firmness. "You're still only an apprentice. And this is a dangerous situation."

"But. James is in trouble." He replied. "I wanna help."

She took a deep breath as she finished placing a bundle of glowing rocks into a sack and stuffed it into her bag.

"I know." She said. "But it's not safe for you. It's not even safe for me. And I promised your mother AND James that I wouldn't let you get hurt." She picked up an orb that looked like it was made of pink glass, it let off small firework-like sparks when she touched it. She looked at it for a moment then decided against bringing it and set it down. "Besides. This will also be a good chance to test our new discovery over long distances. I'll need you here to ensure it works on this end. You remember the signal right?"

Joey nodded eagerly. "You'll throw a signal stone through." He said. "Then we'll send Sergeant Marius through to assess the situation."

Veliry nodded. "Good." She said. "With any luck it will simply be a successful test. But... It could also end up saving our lives."

"What should I do while I wait for everyone to come back?" He asked.

"Marcos can lead you in your studies if you'd like." She replied. "I know he's not terribly exciting to listen to. But he is still an incredibly knowledgeable mage. And an expert on fields that I struggle with." She said, not mentioning how similar Joey's explanation of learning had resembled the reason she also struggled with those subjects. "Just no using necromancy. You'll end up enslaved by a demon."

Joey's eyes went wide. "There's necromancy?" He wondered softly to himself. "That's not good."

Suddenly Veliry wrapped her arms around him in a hug, breaking him out of his thought process. She made it a quick one, knowing how uncomfortable he was with unexpected contact.

"You've made incredible progress. But be safe with your studies." She said with a raised finger. "Take your mother out into the capital or something." She said as she began flying toward the door. Then she seemed to remember something and turned to the door. "Door." She said.

"Yes madame Veliry?" It asked.

"Joseph Choi is allowed provisional entry to the laboratory while I'm gone." She turned back to look at him. "For ACADEMIC PURPOSES ONLY." She said as he avoided eye contact. "And he is not to stay here over night, or for more than four hours at a time. Understood?"

"YES." Both Joey and the door said in unison. Joey pursed his lips in a pout. Four hours was when his phone alarms went off to remind him to take care of himself.

"Joey." Said Veliry in a much happier tone.

He looked up at her. "Yeah?"

"Don't slack off while I'm gone." She said with a smile. "If you get that fire spell figured out before I get back we'll move onto the deathbolts."

Joey smiled back.

Then she flew past the hidden door and out of sight.

He looked out one of the side windows, past a jar with what looked like a three headed dragon fetus in it that she'd never explained. He saw her a moment later as she emerged from the side entrance to one of the balconies. She landed for a moment.

Then she began flying away on the magically created jet thrusters that she and his brother had figured out only a few weeks ago. Several other royal mages struggled to keep up using different methods of flight.

Joey's eyes bulged as he saw one on what he was fairly certain was a magic carpet.

Then they were gone into the sky.

He turned back and looked at the books he'd left on the table the day before. He focused his energy, drawing it in from everything around him. His clothes fluttered for a moment and he had to fight not to use the wind magic.

He had other ideas in mind. And in magic, ideas were what mattered.

He held his hand out, fingers splayed like so many movies he'd watched as a child. He focused on reaching out with the energy.

The book began to rattle as he focused more and more on it.

It leapt into the air a few inches and looked almost like it was going to head towards him. He smiled with excitement.

Then there was a loud ripping noise and the two halves of the book slid off the table in different directions, one of them knocking over a glass of water as it went.

Joey peeked over and saw a series of eyes form on the door, peering around the room to find the source of the disturbance. The uncanny visage made him even more uncomfortable than normal people's faces did and he quickly set about cleaning his mess.

I'll get that sooner or later. He thought as he examined the ruined book. Hopefully sooner.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ya3hn8/wait_is_this_just_gate_246/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (244/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Find out next episode whether or not it will KEAL!

Enjoy.

PS: I've also added a few more visual posts for several of the characters here in r/GATEhouse check em out.

Gixelle (more or less)

Kai (whose full name is a nod to the Shilvati universe)

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So it's my slightly.... different.... thought processes that shapes my energy flow?" Joey asked.

"Yes." Veliry replied. "Just like any other aspect of magical abilities, your thoughts and visualizations are what shape it."

"And James and I are both different because we're from Earth?"

"Of course." She said simply. "We Petravians, and people from other nations in this world, obviously, have lived our entire lives with magic. Even non casters are effected by it and exposed to it from before they're even born. We learn about it in school when we're children. Hard not to when so many things in the world rely on it."

"Whereas we don't." Joey said curiously.

"Right. Your exposure to magic, such as it is, is through your stories. Myths, movies, ANIMES. You don't learn the fundamentals because you don't have them. You just see a bunch of heroes and villains doing incredibly bombastic, world altering, things with whatever version of magic they use." She shrugged. "That's not how it works, as you now know. But it does cause you both to visualize your spells entirely different from how we do. And, as a result, they develop differently than ours." Then she muttered under her breath. ^("Like flying with explosions.")

Joey was about to ask what it would mean for his limits on magical exertion when the door spoke up.

"An urgent message from the General for you madame Veliry." It said in its harmoniously flat voice.

"Send them in." Veliry said as she set down the book she'd been using to explain how energy flowed through a mage's body and stood up.

The door melted into its frame, as it usually did, and revealed a rather uncomfortable looking royal soldier on the other side. After a moment of looking at the door frame the young man stepped in.

"Message for the Arch-Mage." He said, holding out a rolled and sealed scroll. "From the General."

Veliry took the scroll and cracked the seal to unravel it. "Which General?" She asked as she fiddled with it.

"The Princess, ma'am." He said.

"She sent a message?" Joey wondered. "I thought she was out in the dessert with James and Chief Vickers."

"She's supposed to be." Veliry said as she nodded thanks at the soldier, who nodded back and hurried out of the cluttered lab.

Veliry quickly scanned over the message. He eyebrows raising with each line.

"That doesn't look like a good expression." Joey said.

"It's not." She confirmed. "Joey, I need to speak with King Farrick. You can stay here and study if you want. But I'd suggest going back to you and your mother's room for now."

Joey's face scrunched a bit in confusion. "Is everything okay?" He asked.

"Not really. But I'm going to go find out more." She replied. "I'm sure someone will come get you if something comes up. Or I will once I know what's going on."

Before he could say anything else his teacher was already flying, literally, out of the room.

"She never flies in the castle." He said. "That is bad." Then he gathered a few of the books he'd been reading and also left, taking her advice.

\------------------------

"You're sure you don't want to help me guide the men up there?" Amina asked as Vickers shrugged on his backpack. "You know more about what to expect than we do."

"Yeah." He said as he cinched one of the shoulder straps tighter and fastened the chest strap. "This is your army. Not mine. Besides I specialize in stealth, recon, and target elimination. Asymmetrical warfare. Leading troops isn't my bag."

"And you don't want to take Tom?" She asked, looking over at the stable that Vickers had set the griffin up in.

Vickers sighed and Amina thought she sensed actual hurt there.

"Love to." He admitted. "He's my boy. But... their defenses are practically made to shut down flyers. That's why I kept reiterating not to bring in any air units. He'd be at risk." He reached into the bag in front of him on the table and pulled out some kind of netting that had sheets of ragged cloth and bits of brush attached to it, seemingly at random. "Plus, he doesn't exactly blend in, even on the ground."

She nodded understanding.

Vickers looked over at the small army that had amassed in the field. Even as they spoke more soldiers and mages were marching in at the edge of the valley. It had only been a few days and already they'd gained another two hundred, with more promised from other garrisons over the next week or so.

"On top of that." Vickers said. "Much as I don't like what's going on. It still feels wrong to be acting AGAINST people from my world. I mean....." He sighed. "I know I might've seemed like a bit of a dickhead when I first got to the capital. But, in my defense, y'all'd just blown my op. And Choi is kind of a dumbass. Especially back then."

Amina looked at the man in surprise as he lifted the dingy looking netting over his head and slid it on like a cloak. It lay bundled around his neck with the back of it draping down his back. Then he pulled out a pair of stones from the bag the bundle had been in.

"Had one of these mages," He pointed at the camp. "Make these. Took a bit of work apparently. But they knew I was working with you so they did it." He handed one to Amina and tucked the other in his pocket. "We can't use the radios anymore. Or our phones or tablets. Something goes wrong. Or goes really right. Activate that and it'll send a message to me. I can do the same with mine."

"Message stones?" She asked, looking at the stone in surprise.

"Yeah, that's what they called em too."

"These require copious amounts of elemental obsidian." She said as she peered at him.

Vickers shrugged. "Eh. I pocketed some after Choi got his hand all crisped off."

He made a point of ignoring her glare as he double checked his improvised ghillie shroud. After a moment she just sighed a bit.

"We're giving it another three days." She said. "After that we're leaving a rear detachment here to receive any additional reinforcements and receive anyone who might end up wounded."

"Peace first." He reminded her. "Remember; we're trying NOT to fight them." He left the part about how Earth was at an advantage here unspoken. They both knew it.

"Obviously." She said with a nod. "But they've already slaughtered my countrymen, and my soldiers. I won't back down either."

"Right." He said as he slid his shield under the cloak and locked it onto the two hooks he'd made for his vest to hold it. Then he pulled the cloak down to conceal it.

"And what's your objective going up there?" She asked.

He pulled out the spitting scope he'd used days before and switched it to thermal vision. Then he focused on his hand and lowering the temperature.

"Recon primarily." He said as he mentally strained himself and watched the temperature of his hand drop. "Figure out how many there are. What other stuff they've got. Which tent that Major is in." His hand got a bit too cold, reading as a dark spot on the camera instead of matching the ambient temperature. He grunted in annoyance. "Maybe pop a few tires and cut some break-lines on those Miffy's if I can." He didn't mention that if it came down to a fight, he intended to be the one to drop the Major. He did NOT like her.

"What are you doing?" She asked as she felt the magical energy flow through him.

"Tell me when my hand is the same color as the ground." He instructed.

She looked through and saw the multicolored display.

"What in the-" She began.

"Thermal vision." He cut her off. "How's the hand?"

She looked back. "It's dark blue." She said.

"And the ground?"

"Like a blue green." She answered.

He focused a bit more. "Now?" He asked.

"Closer. Are you warming up or cooling-THERE!" She said.

"Yeah?" He asked in surprise.

"Now it's brighter." She said. "Go back."

He snapped his eyes shut and focused again.

"There." She said. "Now it's matching. Hold that."

He held out his other hand and she put the scope in it. He pressed it to an eye and examined his hand.

"Ah hell yeah." He said after a moment. Then he handed it back to her. "Now the hard part."

She looked at him curiously.

"Move back." He said. "I'm gonna try to do that all over."

It took a few more minutes, and a lot of strain and exertion. But eventually Vickers got his whole body to match the ambient temperature of the ground beneath him.

Once he was satisfied he fell to a knee as he released the energy. Small black veins had formed on his temples.

"Why did you do that?" She asked.

Vickers pulled his Camelbak hose off his shoulder and drank deeply as he caught his breath before speaking.

"Those vehicles. One of the big ways they sense stuff is through thermal. The other is through movement. Radar, Lidar, Sonar. You name it." He said before taking another drink. "But when it comes to ground troops." He jerked a thumb up to point at himself. "The big ones are thermal and motion." He chuckled. "And the ole classic. Having some low rank peon stare at a camera feed."

She understood. "So you're masking your presence?" She asked.

Vickers nodded. He tugged at the ghillie cloak. "This'll keep me hard to see by the eye. My training SHOULD help avoid the motion detection, especially in a desert full of shifting dunes. And the magic should help avoid the thermal." He nodded a little. "Gonna be a hell of a balancing act though." He admitted.

"And if it doesn't work?" She asked.

He tilted his head as his eyebrows rose.

"That'll be up to them." He replied. "Either way I probably won't have much time to worry about it."

Before she could say anything else the large man was walking away, toward the mountain pass that would take him into the desert.

"Three days right?" He asked over his shoulder.

"That's right." She answered.

"Do me a favor and make it four. I'll meet you at the desert entrance then." He shot back. "If I'm still alive."

"I can't-" She began. But then he was running in that way that only he and James could manage for very long.

"I can't wait that long." She said to herself.

Then the commander of the newly arrived unit cleared his throat to get her attention. She turned to face him.

I need to know what happened to James. She thought as she returned the salute of the Orc standing in front of her.

\-------------------------

"Alright! Rotate!" Sary'on instructed with a twitch of her hammer to indicate the direction.

James angled his arms so that the tongs turned the red hot metal the way she'd said.

CLANG! Went her magically glowing hammer as it slammed into the slowly forming sword. He adjusted his grip to get the metal back in position before the hammer fell again.

CLANG! Adjust. CLANG! Adjust and change grip. CLANG!

They kept at it for hours, him holding the metal as she pounded it. Then putting the metal of the blade back in the forge from time to time to reheat it.

James had to be in contact, even if indirectly through the tongs, with the metal at all times. He also had to keep himself focused on the enchantment of the blade as he knew it.

An enchantment was a malleable thing, according to Sary'on and the enchanter mage she'd brought in to help, an ashen skinned dwarf named Wry'Mis. This was doubly true when the enchanted item was being changed or, in this case, remade. It was very easy for current enchantment to be altered or even destroyed while it was being rebuilt. The fact that it was being reforged put it at even more danger.

As a result James, and more importantly his magical energy AND his memories of how the blade had worked and behaved, became an anchor point for keeping the enchantment in place.

It wasn't a guarantee. The only way to guarantee the successful maintenance of the enchantment was if the original creator of it was the one doing the work.

But it was the only real chance they had of getting the blade back to some semblance of wholeness. And even with James focusing on the enchantment, there was a high chance that the blade would never behave QUITE the same way as it had before. It certainly wouldn't be the same shape. Instead he'd opted for a slightly shorter, narrower form. More akin to a Roman Gladius than to the long straight two handed sword it had been before.

As he and the dark elf blacksmith hammered away at the metal, forging the pieces back together and reshaping them at the same time, he focused on his memories of the blade.

He remembered how, in his early days with it, it had practically pulled him off his feet. How it had drawn him across the castle's training yard in massive bounds toward Amina as she shot lances of fire at him. How it had clanged off of her own relic shield as it had automatically defended her from his attack because he hadn't been in complete control of the weapon.

How, after he'd killed the Grinner, Veliry and Marcos had used Necromancy in the middle of the night. He and Amina had woken up from the nightmares that that had caused because both the sword and her shield had been rattling loudly while trying to protect them from what they viewed as danger. How it had shaken and rattled for hours as the foul interrogation had continued many floors below their room, and he and Amina had lain there holding each other through the sleepless, terror inducing, night.

He remembered flying through the Elemental that had destroyed the capital, letting the blade drink in the magical fire it was made of as he spun his way through what would inevitably become one of the most scarring experiences of his life.

How it had saved him from the golems that the Agency had sent to him. Each thrust and stab and slash causing gobbets of blood-stone to sizzle and dry and become useless to the disgusting blob-like creatures.

Most importantly, he remembered how drawing the blade in a fight had become so instinctive to him. How it had become like an extension of his arm. The same way his pistol had over the years, and even more so since coming to this world. It had felt like a part of him, and in a way it HAD become a part of him.

Sary'on had explained that if a person used a soul-forged item long enough, even if they weren't the creator of it, it would bond to them. How it would entangle itself in the person's soul. Not as effectively as the person it had been created for originally. But it still became bonded to them. When he'd explained the sense of loss he'd felt while holding its pieces, she had confirmed that his feelings were not entirely inaccurate.

The concept reminded him of the bond he had with Steve.

It was these thoughts that he focused on as he poured magical energy down through his arms, out of his hands, and into the blade as the blacksmith hammered away at it.

"Adjust!" She yelled again, breaking him out of his thoughts as he rotated the blade again.

Several more hours they worked like that. On into what James felt was becoming night, though he couldn't tell in the crystal and fungus lit darkness of the fortress town. Eventually he had to switch the tongs over to his wolf arm, as his human arm began to cramp and strain with the force necessary to keep the burning hot metal in place.

But he never dropped it, and never let the memories of the Mage's Blade stop flowing through his mind.

Once the blade was shaped and heated to near white hot levels Kai came forward with a a trough of some strange liquid that glowed a faint blue color.

Sary'on looked at him in amazement. "Soul Harvester milk?" She asked in awe.

James simply held the blade impatiently.

"If we're going to reforge something of that quality." Kai said simply as he set the trough down with a twang of his instrument. "We might as well do it correctly."

"Guys." James said with a hint of upset.

"Oh. Of course." Sary'on said as she remembered what was happening. She gestured at the trough.

James rushed forward and dunked the blade in the strange liquid. It let out a hiss that almost sounded like a scream. The liquid was like a thick gel and it slowly filled in the gap that the hot blade had pressed into it.

James cringed as he smelled the awful stench of the liquid as it steamed from the heat.

"Oh!" He exclaimed, not letting go of the tongs. "What the fuck?"

"Right." Kai said as a cloth veil wove itself across his nose and mouth. "I should have warned about the stench."

"Ugh. Ya think?" James said as he struggled to breath through his mouth.

The smell was like burnt hair, old vomit, and the faintly rotten smell of a garbage can on a hot day.

Despite this, Sary'on practically had her head in the liquid as she watched the blade rapidly cool. Once it had cooled adequately she gestured for James to pull it out. He did and she grabbed a towel and a file. She wiped the now blackened goop of of the side of the blade and ran the file down its still dull edge.

It made a long, raspy, note that reverberated despite the blade being held in two separate places.

"Oh, and she slides like a beauty." The blacksmith said with a wicked Grin. "Come on!" She said excitedly as she pulled the blade, and James along with it, over to the table where Wry'mis was waiting.

"Now the hard part humie." Said the grey dwarf. James ignored what he assumed was meant as some kind of light insult. "Hope you got all that magical memory energy in it right."

James nodded sternly.

"Then let's get enchanting." The dwarf said with a crazy look in his eyes.

Kai and Sary'on stood back and watched in amazement as magical energy began to flow from the blade into the table that it had been set upon.

And the two casters began to work.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y9ad5m/wait_is_this_just_gate_245/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (244/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Find out next episode whether or not it will KEAL!

Enjoy.

PS: I've also added a few more visual posts for several of the characters over in r/GATEhouse check em out.

Gixelle (more or less)

[Kai (whose full name is a nod to the Shilvati universe)](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y582in/shilvaryon kai_the_weaver/)

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So it's my slightly.... different.... thought processes that shapes my energy flow?" Joey asked.

"Yes." Veliry replied. "Just like any other aspect of magical abilities, your thoughts and visualizations are what shape it."

"And James and I are both different because we're from Earth?"

"Of course." She said simply. "We Petravians, and people from other nations in this world, obviously, have lived our entire lives with magic. Even non casters are effected by it and exposed to it from before they're even born. We learn about it in school when we're children. Hard not to when so many things in the world rely on it."

"Whereas we don't." Joey said curiously.

"Right. Your exposure to magic, such as it is, is through your stories. Myths, movies, ANIMES. You don't learn the fundamentals because you don't have them. You just see a bunch of heroes and villains doing incredibly bombastic, world altering, things with whatever version of magic they use." She shrugged. "That's not how it works, as you now know. But it does cause you both to visualize your spells entirely different from how we do. And, as a result, they develop differently than ours." Then she muttered under her breath. ^("Like flying with explosions.")

Joey was about to ask what it would mean for his limits on magical exertion when the door spoke up.

"An urgent message from the General for you madame Veliry." It said in its harmoniously flat voice.

"Send them in." Veliry said as she set down the book she'd been using to explain how energy flowed through a mage's body and stood up.

The door melted into its frame, as it usually did, and revealed a rather uncomfortable looking royal soldier on the other side. After a moment of looking at the door frame the young man stepped in.

"Message for the Arch-Mage." He said, holding out a rolled and sealed scroll. "From the General."

Veliry took the scroll and cracked the seal to unravel it. "Which General?" She asked as she fiddled with it.

"The Princess, ma'am." He said.

"She sent a message?" Joey wondered. "I thought she was out in the dessert with James and Chief Vickers."

"She's supposed to be." Veliry said as she nodded thanks at the soldier, who nodded back and hurried out of the cluttered lab.

Veliry quickly scanned over the message. Her eyebrows raising with each line.

"That doesn't look like a good expression." Joey said.

"It's not." She confirmed. "Joey, I need to speak with King Farrick. You can stay here and study if you want. But I'd suggest going back to you and your mother's room for now."

Joey's face scrunched a bit in confusion. "Is everything okay?" He asked.

"Not really. But I'm going to go find out more." She replied. "I'm sure someone will come get you if something comes up. Or I will once I know what's going on."

Before he could say anything else his teacher was already flying, literally, out of the room.

"She never flies in the castle." He said. "That is bad." Then he gathered a few of the books he'd been reading and also left, taking her advice.

\------------------------

"You're sure you don't want to help me guide the men up there?" Amina asked as Vickers shrugged on his backpack. "You know more about what to expect than we do."

"Yeah." He said as he cinched one of the shoulder straps tighter and fastened the chest strap. "This is your army. Not mine. Besides I specialize in stealth, recon, and target elimination. Asymmetrical warfare. Leading troops isn't my bag."

"And you don't want to take Tom?" She asked, looking over at the stable that Vickers had set the griffin up in.

Vickers sighed and Amina thought she sensed actual hurt there.

"Love to." He admitted. "He's my boy. But... their defenses are practically made to shut down flyers. That's why I kept reiterating not to bring in any air units. He'd be at risk." He reached into the bag in front of him on the table and pulled out some kind of netting that had sheets of ragged cloth and bits of brush attached to it, seemingly at random. "Plus, he doesn't exactly blend in, even on the ground."

She nodded understanding.

Vickers looked over at the small army that had amassed in the field. Even as they spoke more soldiers and mages were marching in at the edge of the valley. It had only been a few days and already they'd gained another two hundred, with more promised from other garrisons over the next week or so.

"On top of that." Vickers said. "Much as I don't like what's going on. It still feels wrong to be acting AGAINST people from my world. I mean....." He sighed. "I know I might've seemed like a bit of a dickhead when I first got to the capital. But, in my defense, y'all'd just blown my op. And Choi is kind of a dumbass. Especially back then."

Amina looked at the man in surprise as he lifted the dingy looking netting over his head and slid it on like a cloak. It lay bundled around his neck with the back of it draping down his back. Then he pulled out a pair of stones from the bag the bundle had been in.

"Had one of these mages," He pointed at the camp. "Make these. Took a bit of work apparently. But they knew I was working with you so they did it." He handed one to Amina and tucked the other in his pocket. "We can't use the radios anymore. Or our phones or tablets. Something goes wrong. Or goes really right. Activate that and it'll send a message to me. I can do the same with mine."

"Message stones?" She asked, looking at the stone in surprise.

"Yeah, that's what they called em too."

"These require copious amounts of elemental obsidian." She said as she peered at him.

Vickers shrugged. "Eh. I pocketed some after Choi got his hand all crisped off."

He made a point of ignoring her glare as he double checked his improvised ghillie shroud. After a moment she just sighed a bit.

"We're giving it another three days." She said. "After that we're leaving a rear detachment here to receive any additional reinforcements and receive anyone who might end up wounded."

"Peace first." He reminded her. "Remember; we're trying NOT to fight them." He left the part about how Earth was at an advantage here unspoken. They both knew it.

"Obviously." She said with a nod. "But they've already slaughtered my countrymen, and my soldiers. I won't back down either."

"Right." He said as he slid his shield under the cloak and locked it onto the two hooks he'd made for his vest to hold it. Then he pulled the cloak down to conceal it.

"And what's your objective going up there?" She asked.

He pulled out the spotting scope he'd used days before and switched it to thermal vision. Then he focused on his hand and lowering the temperature.

"Recon primarily." He said as he mentally strained himself and watched the temperature of his hand drop. "Figure out how many there are. What other stuff they've got. Which tent that Major is in." His hand got a bit too cold, reading as a dark spot on the camera instead of matching the ambient temperature. He grunted in annoyance. "Maybe pop a few tires and cut some break-lines on those Miffy's if I can." He didn't mention that if it came down to a fight, he intended to be the one to drop the Major. He did NOT like her.

"What are you doing?" She asked as she felt the magical energy flow through him.

"Tell me when my hand is the same color as the ground." He instructed.

She looked through and saw the multicolored display.

"What in the-" She began.

"Thermal vision." He cut her off. "How's the hand?"

She looked back. "It's dark blue." She said.

"And the ground?"

"Like a blue green." She answered.

He focused a bit more. "Now?" He asked.

"Closer. Are you warming up or cooling-THERE!" She said.

"Yeah?" He asked in surprise.

"Now it's brighter." She said. "Go back."

He snapped his eyes shut and focused again.

"There." She said. "Now it's matching. Hold that."

He held out his other hand and she put the scope in it. He pressed it to an eye and examined his hand.

"Ah hell yeah." He said after a moment. Then he handed it back to her. "Now the hard part."

She looked at him curiously.

"Move back." He said. "I'm gonna try to do that all over."

It took a few more minutes, and a lot of strain and exertion. But eventually Vickers got his whole body to match the ambient temperature of the ground beneath him.

Once he was satisfied he fell to a knee as he released the energy. Small black veins had formed on his temples.

"Why did you do that?" She asked.

Vickers pulled his Camelbak hose off his shoulder and drank deeply as he caught his breath before speaking.

"Those vehicles. One of the big ways they sense stuff is through thermal. The other is through movement. Radar, Lidar, Sonar. You name it." He said before taking another drink. "But when it comes to ground troops." He jerked a thumb up to point at himself. "The big ones are thermal and motion." He chuckled. "And the ole classic. Having some low rank peon stare at a camera feed."

She understood. "So you're masking your presence?" She asked.

Vickers nodded. He tugged at the ghillie cloak. "This'll keep me hard to see by the eye. My training SHOULD help avoid the motion detection, especially in a desert full of shifting dunes. And the magic should help avoid the thermal." He nodded a little. "Gonna be a hell of a balancing act though." He admitted.

"And if it doesn't work?" She asked.

He tilted his head as his eyebrows rose.

"That'll be up to them." He replied. "Either way I probably won't have much time to worry about it."

Before she could say anything else the large man was walking away, toward the mountain pass that would take him into the desert.

"Three days right?" He asked over his shoulder.

"That's right." She answered.

"Do me a favor and make it four. I'll meet you at the desert entrance then." He shot back. "If I'm still alive."

"I can't-" She began. But then he was running in that way that only he and James could manage for very long.

"I can't wait that long." She said to herself.

Then the commander of the newly arrived unit cleared his throat to get her attention. She turned to face him.

I need to know what happened to James. She thought as she returned the salute of the Orc standing in front of her.

\--------------------------

"Alright! Rotate!" Sary'on instructed with a twitch of her hammer to indicate the direction.

James angled his arms so that the tongs turned the red hot metal the way she'd said.

CLANG! Went her magically glowing hammer as it slammed into the slowly forming sword. He adjusted his grip to get the metal back in position before the hammer fell again.

CLANG! Adjust. CLANG! Adjust and change grip. CLANG!

They kept at it for hours, him holding the metal as she pounded it. Then putting the metal of the blade back in the forge from time to time to reheat it.

James had to be in contact, even if indirectly through the tongs, with the metal at all times. He also had to keep himself focused on the enchantment of the blade as he knew it.

An enchantment was a malleable thing, according to Sary'on and the enchanter mage she'd brought in to help, an ashen skinned dwarf named Wry'Mis. This was doubly true when the enchanted item was being changed or, in this case, remade. It was very easy for current enchantment to be altered or even destroyed while it was being rebuilt. The fact that it was being reforged put it at even more danger.

As a result James, and more importantly his magical energy AND his memories of how the blade had worked and behaved, became an anchor point for keeping the enchantment in place.

It wasn't a guarantee. The only way to guarantee the successful maintenance of the enchantment was if the original creator of it was the one doing the work.

But it was the only real chance they had of getting the blade back to some semblance of wholeness. And even with James focusing on the enchantment, there was a high chance that the blade would never behave QUITE the same way as it had before. It certainly wouldn't be the same shape. Instead he'd opted for a slightly shorter, narrower form. More akin to a Roman Gladius than to the long straight two handed sword it had been before.

As he and the dark elf blacksmith hammered away at the metal, forging the pieces back together and reshaping them at the same time, he focused on his memories of the blade.

He remembered how, in his early days with it, it had practically pulled him off his feet. How it had drawn him across the castle's training yard in massive bounds toward Amina as she shot lances of fire at him. How it had clanged off of her own relic shield as it had automatically defended her from his attack because he hadn't been in complete control of the weapon.

How, after he'd killed the Grinner, Veliry and Marcos had used Necromancy in the middle of the night. He and Amina had woken up from the nightmares that had been interrupted because both the sword and her shield had been rattling loudly while trying to protect them from what they viewed as danger. How it had shaken and rattled for hours as the foul interrogation had continued many floors below their room, and he and Amina had lain there holding each other through the sleepless, terror inducing, night.

He remembered flying through the Elemental that had destroyed the capital, letting the blade drink in the magical fire it was made of as he spun his way through what would inevitably become one of the most scarring experiences of his life.

How it had saved him from the golems that the Agency had sent to him. Each thrust and stab and slash causing gobbets of blood-stone to sizzle and dry and become useless to the disgusting blob-like creatures.

Most importantly, he remembered how drawing the blade in a fight had become so instinctive to him. How it had become like an extension of his arm. The same way his pistol had over the years, and even more so since coming to this world. It had felt like a part of him, and in a way it HAD become a part of him.

Sary'on had explained that if a person used a soul-forged item long enough, even if they weren't the creator of it, it would bond to them. How it would entangle itself in the person's soul. Not as effectively as the person it had been created for originally. But it still became bonded to them. When he'd explained the sense of loss he'd felt while holding its pieces, she had confirmed that his feelings were not entirely inaccurate.

The concept reminded him of the bond he had with Steve.

It was these thoughts that he focused on as he poured magical energy down through his arms, out of his hands, and into the blade as the blacksmith hammered away at it.

"Adjust!" She yelled again, breaking him out of his thoughts as he rotated the blade again.

Several more hours they worked like that. On into what James felt was becoming night, though he couldn't tell in the crystal and fungus lit darkness of the fortress town. Eventually he had to switch the tongs over to his wolf arm, as his human arm began to cramp and strain with the force necessary to keep the burning hot metal in place.

But he never dropped it, and never let the memories of the Mage's Blade stop flowing through his mind.

Once the blade was shaped and heated to near white hot levels Kai came forward with a a trough of some strange liquid that glowed a faint blue color.

Sary'on looked at him in amazement. "Soul Harvester milk?" She asked in awe.

James simply held the blade impatiently.

"If we're going to reforge something of that quality." Kai said simply as he set the trough down with a twang of his instrument. "We might as well do it correctly."

"Guys." James said with a hint of upset.

"Oh. Of course." Sary'on said as she remembered what was happening. She gestured at the trough.

James rushed forward and dunked the blade in the strange liquid. It let out a hiss that almost sounded like a scream. The liquid was like a thick gel and it slowly filled in the gap that the hot blade had pressed into it.

James cringed as he smelled the awful stench of the liquid as it steamed from the heat.

"Oh!" He exclaimed, not letting go of the tongs. "What the fuck?"

"Right." Kai said as a cloth veil wove itself across his nose and mouth. "I should have warned about the stench."

"Ugh. Ya think?" James said as he struggled to breath through his mouth.

The smell was like burnt hair, old vomit, and the faintly rotten smell of a garbage can on a hot day.

Despite this, Sary'on practically had her head in the liquid as she watched the blade rapidly cool. Once it had cooled adequately she gestured for James to pull it out. He did and she grabbed a towel and a file. She wiped the now blackened goop of of the side of the blade and ran the file down its still dull edge.

It made a long, raspy, note that reverberated despite the blade being held in two separate places.

"Oh, and she slides like a beauty." The blacksmith said with a wicked grin. "Come on!" She said excitedly as she pulled the blade, and James along with it, over to the table where Wry'mis was waiting.

"Now the hard part humie." Said the grey dwarf. James ignored what he assumed was meant as some kind of light insult. "Hope you got all that magical memory energy in it right."

James nodded sternly.

"Then let's get enchanting." The dwarf said with a crazy look in his eyes.

Kai and Sary'on stood back and watched in amazement as magical energy began to flow from the blade into the table that it had been set upon.

And the two casters began to work.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y9aarm/wait_is_this_just_gate_245/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (243/?)

Previous

Writer's note: You know what? I don't really have a note for today. So, how bout a tidbit of information that none of the characters are aware of?

^(Tom the griffin is actually the griffin that ran away from the mayhem when the James Gang got ambushed by grabbers waaaaaay back in the simple days. It was assumed that he followed his training and headed back to the capital. But he actually went the wrong direction because he'd gotten scared by the reinforcements sent by the capital.)

Enjoy.

\~

"Well, I can reforge what's left of the blade." Sary'on said with a hint of skepticism. "But you're missing some pieces. So it'll either be shorter, or thinner." The tall, golden haired deep elf said as she examined the bits of broken blade. She ran a finger over one of the warped edges where a bullet had bent the edge before shattering it. "How'd you say you did this?"

"I didn't." James replied as he watched the Blacksmith's examination. "I was blocking an attack."

Sary'on ran a thumb along the flat of the blade as she looked at it closely. "This is soul-forged steel." She said. "Or it was." She looked at James curiously. "What did you get hit by that could do this?"

"It's.... a long story." James said. "What's soul-forged steel?"

"It's when a crafter puts their heart and soul into what they create, or in this case smith." She said. "Not literally. But... It's a craft of passion. When this blade was made it was the pride and joy of its creator. Both in terms of its physical creation AND its enchantment."

"And that makes it stronger?" He asked.

"Course it does." She scoffed. "It's a rare thing that ANY kind of craftsman can even make something like it. The epitome of their crafting skill, the epitome of their enchanting skill. A pure representation, through creation, of who they were as a person. No ordinary person can soul forge something. A blacksmith like myself can go their entire life without creating even a single soul-forged item. And I'll live nearly three thousand years before age takes me." She examined the handle of the sword. "And this was made by a human."

"How can you tell?" James asked.

"Because the maker's mark," She pointed at a small symbol that James had seen before just below the hand guard. "is in an old human dialect. I can't tell you what it says. But it's old Raynian. They ruled Petravus before the current King's lineage took over." She scratched her head a bit. "To think that a HUMAN could make something like this."

"What about the enchantment?" James wondered.

Sary'on placed the piece of the sword down gently with a look of sadness.

"I can make an animated blade." She said. "That's easy enough.... well. Maybe not easy. But I know how to do it." She stroked her chin. "Creating an animated blade that craves AND devours magical energy? And at the same time? And WITHOUT... it gaining TRUE sentience and potentially fighting you for control of itself?" She asked. "Now that's a different story." She looked at the fragments of blade curiously. "But, you said that you think it might still have some magic in it?"

"Yeah." James replied. "I think I felt something when I had Kai pretend like he was gonna hit me with a spell."

"Hmmm." The blacksmith hummed. Before James could react a hammer appeared in her hand and began to glow with a dull greenish black energy. She raised it up like she was about to bring it down on the blade.

One of the pieces jumped just a tiny bit. It lay wobbling from the motion. James thought he heard a faint buzzing from another piece.

"I'll be damned." She said. The hammer faded as she set it back down.

She picked up the piece that had jumped. Her eyes glowed with a dull red as she looked at it.

"How long did you say you were using this as a weapon?" She asked.

"Almost a year now." He answered.

"And you've been in lots of fights with it? Against casters and magical creations?" She continued.

"Yeah."

"Hmm." She looked at the piece curiously. Then she turned to him. "D you know how to enchant things?" She asked.

James gulped. "I had.... started... to get lessons on it before I left on this trip."

Sary'on clamped a hand on his shoulder.

"Want your blade back as close to the way it was as possible?" She asked with a stern eye fixed on his.

"Yes." He said flatly. "That's why I came here."

"Then time to finish learning." She said as she turned him toward the forge and pushed him.

\---------------------------

"General!" The commander of the company yelled in a loud, raspy, voice as Amina marched toward him. The soldiers behind him all jumped to attention as he raised his fist to his chest.

"Commander." She replied firmly. Behind her Vickers stood with the reins of the two griffins in hand as he walked them over to a nearby hitch. "Is this the followup force for the group sent out to the desert?"

"Aye ma'am." The large man said as he lowered the salute. She extended her arm and he took it, clasping it at the elbow as they officially greeted each other. "May I ask? How do you know that? And why the unexpected visit?"

She looked over his shoulder at the other soldiers. "As you were!" She yelled, they immediately jumped to do whatever they'd been doing before. Though some of them decided that looking busy was better than standing or sitting around as they had been.

Then she turned to him. "What do you know of the lost patrol?" She asked.

"Only that they went out based on some suspicions by the dwarves. Clan Dunebasher." He said. "They missed their return date. And the dwarves stopped their messages with their people here in the valley."

She nodded. The information matching the reports she'd read. This company was supposed to go determine the remaining information by searching the area that the unit had disappeared in. They just didn't know what she and Vickers did.

"That's what we'd read in the reports." She said. "How many do you have? And what's the disposition? Also, what's your name commander?"

He stood up straighter, glad to be acknowledged a bit more formally. "Commander Kamil Dreng Ma'am." He said proudly. Then he fished a small scroll from a pouch on his belt. "As for the force; we have one hundred fifty seven foot soldiers, mainly pikeman and swordsman, seventy eight archers, thirty cavalry lancers, twelve dedicated healers and their attached stretchermen, and twenty three royal mages, including one grand mage and a druid."

She listened to the list with rapt attention. When she was sure he was done, the scroll once again rolled up, she asked one question.

"Does your dispatching garrison have more it can spare? Especially mages."

He looked at her in surprise. "Um.... Yes General." He said uncertainly. "But why? What's up there?" He asked as he glanced in the direction of the mountains concealing the desert.

She looked back at Vickers for a moment. He was busy undoing the bag around Steve's head as a couple of the soldiers gawked at the odd site of a bottomless bag restrained drake.

"An enemy who will consider three hundred and fifty seven soldiers easy work. Though I hope it doesn't come to that." She said with a hint of uncertainty that she hoped the man didn't pick up on.

Dreng gulped as he considered the words. He wondered what kind of enemy or monster could survive in a barren desert AND handle a force that size as easily as the General had implied. Surely something from the depths of the Deep Dark.

"Where's your command tent?" She asked, snapping him out of his thoughts. "We'll draft the orders for more men and I'll sign it personally."

"Aye ma'am." He said as he gestured toward the tent with his arm and began walking.

\------------------

"Boss." Five said from where she was marching behind Driscoll and Doc.

They'd been marching for almost four days now. In that time they'd covered nearly three hundred miles of the deep underground labyrinth hiding beneath the desert. They'd even set their suits to cruise control a few times so they could rest. The suits had continued walking for them, using automated warnings to wake them anytime something hazardous came up.

They'd crossed chasms, dipped beneath underground lakes and rivers, killed more than a few monsters that had looked like something out of a child's nightmare. And in one instance they'd come across an off-shooting tunnel that had looked like it was moving.

The whole time they'd been following the trail of spiderwebs that had matched the ones that had attacked them. Doc had take more than a few liberties with his burner kit when it came to punishing the few lingering spiders that had been unfortunate to stick around.

But they'd seen zero sign of the massive, sentient, swarm that had ambushed them days before. And even less signs of Choi.

"Boss." Five chimed in again.

He knew what she was going to say.

"What?" He asked anyways.

"Major needs us back." She said. He looked at the little symbol for a message. "Came in an hour ago. You've just been ignoring it because you're pissed." She stepped up next to him and pointed at where doc was scorching a bit of webbing. "Plus, minus Doc's flames, the trail's cold. We lost em."

Driscoll simmered within his helmet. She was right of course. But, like Doc, he was pissed at the spiders. And even more pissed at himself for what had happened to Rodriguez.

He looked at five and simply nodded. She squeezed past him and went up to Doc, talking to him on a one to one channel.

Driscoll opened the message and heard the Major's voice.

"Driscoll. We've had an unexpected development here at the camp. You haven't radioed in in almost two days. But we can talk about that later.

Rodriguez is alive. Either you've got your man, or he's gone. Either way. We need you and your crew here ASAP. Message when you get this and make for the camp on the double. I've attached a file for your eyes only with the details."

That was it. No pleasantries, not that he'd expected any, no name or rank. Not even a "That's an order." from the Major. Just a simple message that didn't allow any questions or doubts.

He hated that he kind of appreciated the straight forward nature of it.

"Alright guys." He said as he watched Five and Doc turn around and begin walking toward him. he could see Doc's defeated posture even as his suit tried to keep him straightened up. "The Major needs us for something. Trail's cold. We'll get em back another day. Retrace and retract. Back to camp."

The readout in his helmet showed the remaining members of the team turning around and heading back the way they'd come, as well as the crawler drones retracing their paths back to the main tunnel they were in so they could be picked up.

He took one look back down the tunnel as Doc stomped angrily past him.

One of these days we're gonna come back and get even for that. He thought before turning and beginning to walk again.

A series of spiders, small and simple as they were, saw the mechanical figures begin to withdraw and relayed the information down the remaining webs in a series of week thrums.

Driscoll opened the file the Major had sent.

He grinned as he saw the images within.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y8bcb4/wait_is_this_just_gate_244/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (243/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: You know what? I don't really have a note for today. So, how bout a tidbit of information that none of the characters are aware of?

^(Tom the griffin is actually the griffin that ran away from the mayhem when the James Gang got ambushed by grabbers waaaaaay back in the simple days. It was assumed that he followed his training and headed back to the capital. But he actually went the wrong direction because he'd gotten scared by the reinforcements sent by the capital.)

Enjoy.

\~

"Well, I can reforge what's left of the blade." Sary'on said with a hint of skepticism. "But you're missing some pieces. So it'll either be shorter, or thinner." The tall, golden haired deep elf said as she examined the bits of broken blade. She ran a finger over one of the warped edges where a bullet had bent the edge before shattering it. "How'd you say you did this?"

"I didn't." James replied as he watched the Blacksmith's examination. "I was blocking an attack."

Sary'on ran a thumb along the flat of the blade as she looked at it closely. "This is soul-forged steel." She said. "Or it was." She looked at James curiously. "What did you get hit by that could do this?"

"It's.... a long story." James said. "What's soul-forged steel?"

"It's when a crafter puts their heart and soul into what they create, or in this case smith." She said. "Not literally. But... It's a craft of passion. When this blade was made it was the pride and joy of its creator. Both in terms of its physical creation AND its enchantment."

"And that makes it stronger?" He asked.

"Course it does." She scoffed. "It's a rare thing that ANY kind of craftsman can even make something like it. The epitome of their crafting skill, the epitome of their enchanting skill. A pure representation, through creation, of who they were as a person. No ordinary person can soul forge something. A blacksmith like myself can go their entire life without creating even a single soul-forged item. And I'll live nearly three thousand years before age takes me." She examined the handle of the sword. "And this was made by a human."

"How can you tell?" James asked.

"Because the maker's mark," She pointed at a small symbol that James had seen before just below the hand guard. "is in an old human dialect. I can't tell you what it says. But it's old Raynian. They ruled Petravus before the current King's lineage took over." She scratched her head a bit. "To think that a HUMAN could make something like this."

"What about the enchantment?" James wondered.

Sary'on placed the piece of the sword down gently with a look of sadness.

"I can make an animated blade." She said. "That's easy enough.... well. Maybe not easy. But I know how to do it." She stroked her chin. "Creating an animated blade that craves AND devours magical energy? And at the same time? And WITHOUT... it gaining TRUE sentience and potentially fighting you for control of itself?" She asked. "Now that's a different story."

She looked at the fragments of blade curiously. "But, you said that you think it might still have some magic in it?"

"Yeah." James replied. "I think I felt something when I had Kai pretend like he was gonna hit me with a spell."

"Hmmm." The blacksmith hummed. Before James could react a hammer appeared in her hand and began to glow with a dull greenish black energy. She raised it up like she was about to bring it down on the blade.

One of the pieces jumped just a tiny bit. It lay wobbling from the motion. James thought he heard a faint buzzing from another piece.

"I'll be damned." She said. The hammer faded as she set it back down.

She picked up the piece that had jumped. Her eyes glowed with a dull red as she looked at it.

"How long did you say you were using this as a weapon?" She asked.

"Almost a year now." He answered.

"And you've been in lots of fights with it? Against casters and magical creations?" She continued.

"Yeah."

"Hmm." She looked at the piece curiously. Then she turned to him. "D you know how to enchant things?" She asked.

James gulped. "I had.... started... to get lessons on it before I left on this trip."

Sary'on clamped a hand on his shoulder.

"Want your blade back as close to the way it was as possible?" She asked with a stern eye fixed on his.

"Yes." He said flatly. "That's why I came here."

"Then time to finish learning." She said as she turned him toward the forge and pushed him.

\----------

"General!" The commander of the company yelled in a loud, raspy, voice as Amina marched toward him. The soldiers behind him all jumped to attention as he raised his fist to his chest.

"Commander." She replied firmly. Behind her Vickers stood with the reins of the two griffins in hand as he walked them over to a nearby hitch. "Is this the followup force for the group sent out to the desert?"

"Aye ma'am." The large man said as he lowered the salute. She extended her arm and he took it, clasping it at the elbow as they officially greeted each other. "May I ask? How do you know that? And why the unexpected visit?"

She looked over his shoulder at the other soldiers. "As you were!" She yelled, they immediately jumped to do whatever they'd been doing before. Though some of them decided that looking busy was better than standing or sitting around as they had been.

Then she turned to him. "What do you know of the lost patrol?" She asked.

"Only that they went out based on some suspicions by the dwarves. Clan Dunebasher." He said. "They missed their return date. And the dwarves stopped their messages with their people here in the valley."

She nodded. The information matching the reports she'd read. This company was supposed to go determine the remaining information by searching the area that the unit had disappeared in. They just didn't know what she and Vickers did.

"That's what we'd read in the reports." She said. "How many do you have? And what's the disposition? Also, what's your name commander?"

He stood up straighter, glad to be acknowledged a bit more formally. "Commander Kamil Dreng Ma'am." He said proudly. Then he fished a small scroll from a pouch on his belt. "As for the force; we have one hundred fifty seven foot soldiers, mainly pikeman and swordsman, seventy eight archers, thirty cavalry lancers, twelve dedicated healers and their attached stretchermen, and twenty three royal mages, including one grand mage and a druid."

She listened to the list with rapt attention. When she was sure he was done, the scroll once again rolled up, she asked one question.

"Does your dispatching garrison have more it can spare? Especially mages."

He looked at her in surprise. "Um.... Yes General." He said uncertainly. "But why? What's up there?" He asked as he glanced in the direction of the mountains concealing the desert.

She looked back at Vickers for a moment. He was busy undoing the bag around Steve's head as a couple of the soldiers gawked at the odd site of a bottomless bag restrained drake.

"An enemy who will consider three hundred and fifty seven soldiers easy work. Though I hope it doesn't come to that." She said with a hint of uncertainty that she hoped the man didn't pick up on.

Dreng gulped as he considered the words. He wondered what kind of enemy or monster could survive in a barren desert AND handle a force that size as easily as the General had implied. Surely something from the depths of the Deep Dark.

"Where's your command tent?" She asked, snapping him out of his thoughts. "We'll draft the orders for more men and I'll sign it personally."

"Aye ma'am." He said as he gestured toward the tent with his arm and began walking.

\-------------------

"Boss." Five said from where she was marching behind Driscoll and Doc.

They'd been marching for almost four days now. In that time they'd covered nearly three hundred miles of the deep underground labyrinth hiding beneath the desert. They'd even set their suits to cruise control a few times so they could rest. The suits had continued walking for them, using automated warnings to wake them anytime something hazardous came up.

They'd crossed chasms, dipped beneath underground lakes and rivers, killed more than a few monsters that had looked like something out of a child's nightmare. And in one instance they'd come across an off-shooting tunnel that had looked like it was moving.

The whole time they'd been following the trail of spiderwebs that had matched the ones that had attacked them. Doc had take more than a few liberties with his burner kit when it came to punishing the few lingering spiders that had been unfortunate to stick around.

But they'd seen zero sign of the massive, sentient, swarm that had ambushed them days before. And even less signs of Choi.

"Boss." Five chimed in again.

He knew what she was going to say.

"What?" He asked anyways.

"Major needs us back." She said. He looked at the little symbol for a message. "Came in an hour ago. You've just been ignoring it because you're pissed." She stepped up next to him and pointed at where doc was scorching a bit of webbing. "Plus, minus Doc's flames, the trail's cold. We lost em."

Driscoll simmered within his helmet. She was right of course. But, like Doc, he was pissed at the spiders. And even more pissed at himself for what had happened to Rodriguez.

He looked at five and simply nodded. She squeezed past him and went up to Doc, talking to him on a one to one channel.

Driscoll opened the message and heard the Major's voice.

"Driscoll. We've had an unexpected development here at the camp. You haven't radioed in in almost two days. But we can talk about that later.

Rodriguez is alive. Either you've got your man, or he's gone. Either way. We need you and your crew here ASAP. Message when you get this and make for the camp on the double. I've attached a file for your eyes only with the details."

That was it. No pleasantries, not that he'd expected any, no name or rank. Not even a "That's an order." from the Major. Just a simple message that didn't allow any questions or doubts.

He hated that he kind of appreciated the straight forward nature of it.

"Alright guys." He said as he watched Five and Doc turn around and begin walking toward him. he could see Doc's defeated posture even as his suit tried to keep him straightened up. "The Major needs us for something. Trail's cold. We'll get em back another day. Retrace and retract. Back to camp."

The readout in his helmet showed the remaining members of the team turning around and heading back the way they'd come, as well as the crawler drones retracing their paths back to the main tunnel they were in so they could be picked up.

He took one look back down the tunnel as Doc stomped angrily past him.

One of these days we're gonna come back and get even for that. He thought before turning and beginning to walk again.

A series of spiders, small and simple as they were, saw the mechanical figures begin to withdraw and relayed the information down the remaining webs in a series of weak thrums.

Driscoll opened the file the Major had sent.

He grinned as he saw the images within.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y8b81i/wait_is_this_just_gate_244/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (242/?)

Previous

Writer's note: A bit of insight on our favorite little bro. And, sadly, confirmation about the state of an important piece of equipment.

Enjoy.

Edit: I'm not gonna pretend to know how anyone on the spectrum feels about their lives. I'm not on it so I have no frame of reference. Joey's speech is actually based very closely on the way someone I know worked through their issues with being on the spectrum. But I in no way wish to cheapen anyone else's experiences.

\~

James held the handle gently as he inspected the once marvelous weapon. It was hard to tell in the multi-colored, low, lighting of the crystalline room, but he felt like its once bluish grey blade had dimmed.

"Kai." He said softly as he gripped what was left of the mage's blade. "Can you cast any offensive magic?"

"I can." Kai replied.

"Would you mind building up an attack against me for a moment?" James requested. "No need to actually attack. Just act like you're going to."

Kai looked at him curiously. He could tell that James wasn't alright. So he didn't question the odd request. He gathered energy into his hand. Small, black and blue flames danced on his finger tips.

James looked at the oddly colored flames with mild curiosity.

It was hard to tell, but he thought he felt just the slightest twitch from the sword, then it seemed to vibrate lightly for a second before stilling again.

The oddness of the feeling within James wasn't lost on him. He knew the blade had been semi-sentient, in the fashion that any enchanted item could be. It wasn't like it had ever SPOKEN to him, or used its animated nature to write him any messages. It had only ever driven him toward magical danger, and even tried to pull him into fights that he had no business being in.

But... it had also saved his life more times than he could count. And it WAS still a present from Amina and the King.

And it was his sword.

Looking down at the piece in his hand. At the two fragments lying on the small piece of cloth on his lap.

It felt like he'd lost another friend. Seeing its ruined state had felt akin to when he'd realized he was missing a hand after the battle with the elemental that had ruined the capital.

As if he'd lost a part of his body.

And that was to say nothing of the handle to his chain, which sat on the table with only a handful of links still attached to it. He'd had that weapon even longer. Since his first REAL battle in this world. The one that had set him on the path toward a future with Amina at his side.

"Is there a blacksmith in this fortress?" He asked after staring at the two fragmented weapons for several seconds more.

Kai nodded. "There are."

"Any of them good with enchantments?"

"I don't know." Kai admitted. "I haven't been to this place in several decades now. But I'd be surprised if there weren't."

James nodded and wrapped the sword back in its cloth bundle. He put both of them back in the repaired bottomless bag. Once they were in he pulled out some new clothes and a handful of armor pieces that he hadn't worn in months and began putting them on. He also drew out his shield and the plain steel sword he'd gotten from Kraug back when he was still new to this world.

"Will you be needing this?" Kai asked as James's assault rifle lowered from the ceiling.

James looked at it, doing what he could to hide his discomfort at the elf still having it.

"No." He said as he grabbed it. "But I will take it back." The weapon held fast, secured by unseen spider webs that even James's strength struggled to break. He let go. "Kai?"

"I need your word that you are no threat to my people." The elf said sternly. "That you're not aligned with these.... 'muck marchers' as you call them."

James's jaw clenched as he stared ahead, not looking at the elf.

"Kai." He said after several long seconds of silent anger. "I owe you my life. Several times over from the sounds of things." He looked over at the dark elf, who met his gaze with no expression. He continued. "So I'm not a threat to you or yours. As for whether I'm 'aligned' with them. I've already told you that TECHNICALLY we serve the same government... more or less. But I don't kill people just for being around like they did." He placed his left hand on the rifle's stock and pulled, using his magic and wolf enhanced strength to break the invisible threads with audible twangs. "But I DO kill people that fuck with me." He said as he stuffed the rifle into his bag. "And if I see THEM... we're gonna have words about what they did. Both to the dwarves and to me." He said as he looked down at his still sore body."

Kai's eyebrow raised at the display of anger.

Then he nodded and James heard his harp send out several sharp chords. He looked back just in time to see several spiders retreat back up their webs and out of sight.

"I'll take you down to the fortress market." Kai said after a moment. "We'll see about getting your items repaired. Then we can leave for the surface at your leisure."

"Thank you." James said as he slid his pistol holster onto his belt and clasped it in place. Then he snapped the pistol into the holster with a click. "And thank you for... healing... me."

Kai nodded solemnly. "When you get to your people. See about getting to a human healer." Kai said. "Myself and the sporesman may have healed your body. But spiders and fungi can do very little for souls."

James didn't say anything as he strapped the now multi-colored bottomless bag to his back.

"This way." Kai said as his spiders opened the sliding main door.

\---------------

"Sooo." Joey began as he and Veliry sat, reading notes in the lab. "Why is my energy different from yours? Or even James's?" He asked, causing his teacher to look up at him curiously.

"That's right. James let you use the monocle didn't he?" She said in response as she set her notes down.

"Yeah." Joey said as he squeezed his left eye shut and strained. To Veliry's surprise, after a moment Joey's right eye began to glow with a dull orange light. He looked around for a moment, then shut the eye and began blinking rapidly. "I don't get why he can't do that spell yet." He said. "I mean. It's difficult. And startlingly energy inefficient. But it's not anything special."

Veliry stared at him in shock for a moment. "You can already see magical energy?" She asked. "I haven't even taught you that yet." She reached across the table and pried his eye open with one hand, causing him to flinch and look away. Her own eyes glowed in the same light as she studied him. "And it's only energy inefficient because you aren't as magically saturated as the rest of us yet. That's why I haven't taught you any body altering abilities yet."

Joey pulled back, swatting her hand away lightly as he did, then began rubbing at his eye.

"That still doesn't explain why mine and James's energy looks different from everyone else's." He said. "Also, all I did was read notes and visualized what the monocle showed me. The rest was just focus."

Veliry sat back, impressed at her student's unexpected progress. He's learning faster than James did. She thought. Hell. He's learning faster than I did. And I'm the third youngest Arch Mage in the history of the kingdom.

She took a deep breath. She'd actually been curious about the difference herself. And she thought she had an idea as to the reason. But she hadn't been able to confirm from the books James had brought over, and the information available on her tablet was spotty on the subject at best. But it also seemed like the kind of subject that might require.... delicacy.

"Your brother tells me that you suffer from a.... condition.... known as Autism." She said hesitantly. "That it makes you process information differently than other people."

"I don't consider it suffering." Joey said simply, Veliry relaxed at the easy tone. "And I doubt James used that term either." He said as he sat up a bit straighter. "I... struggle with it... sometimes. But... I've never known any other way of being." His left hand shot up for a moment and she worried that it was going to clamp onto his ear. But instead it simply scratched the side of his head. "It's... difficult. Sometimes. But, compared to some of the people I've met who are also on the spectrum, I got off pretty light."

"What do you mean?" She asked, legitimately curious.

"Well." He said. "I'm what's considered 'high functioning'. I can speak to people. I can learn new things, albeit with difficulty sometimes. I can live a... more or less, normal life."

"I'll say." She said. "You're learning magic at a startling rate."

"That's part of it though." He said, his hand tapping at his leg a bit. A sign she'd learned meant that he'd been just a bit annoyed at something, likely her interruption. "I.... like magic. Just like I like video games and anime... and mechanical engineering. I can.... get obsessed with these subjects very easily and, as you've seen, I can get so caught up in them that I forget basic things. Like.... dinner with my mom and James. Or... eating at all."

She nodded. They had needed to set a schedule for him to stop researching and check in with his mother AND take care of personal responsibilities very quickly once his mother had realized that he'd had a new obsession. Veliry had felt somewhat uncomfortable due to how much it had reminded her of how SHE could get when she was diving too deep into her studies. Now Joey had a series of alarms, some of which had already been in place, on his phone to remind him to stop his studies for a while and check his basic needs.

"On the one hand." He continued, breaking her out of her thoughts. "If I find a subject I like... I learn it quickly... and completely. I... can't help it. I can list off the animators and voice actors of over a hundred animes from back home." His head tilted a bit. "BUT... I also struggle to focus on things that I don't... care.... about. Like I said; I love mechanical engineering. And back home I wanted to become a mechanical engineer. But I..." He shook his head a bit and his left hand rose up a bit toward his ear before he firmly pressed it back to his lap. "I hate.... math. I cannot stand it. And... in my brain... that makes it very difficult for me to focus on anything math related. Which is.... an issue... for an aspiring engineer since it's necessary for it." His head dipped and he stared at his hands. "It took me three attempts to pass my Trig class." He said softly, as if more to himself than to her. "But I liked learning how things work together, and wanted to get into that field. So, with a... LOT... of help. I eventually got through it."

Veliry didn't interrupt.

"I also struggle with social interactions." He said softly. "I have a hard time reading boundaries and social cues that other people take for granted. When I get really excited about a subject I can talk about it for hours, but not everybody wants to hear about something that long. When we were kids, if James caught me babbling to someone like that he would tap me on the shoulder." As if by muscle memory Joey's hand reached up and rapidly tapped at his collar bone three times with two fingers. "It was how he reminded me to ask the person I was talking to whether or not they cared about what I was talking about." He said this as if it made him sad. "But I struggled to understand how people COULDN'T be interested in the same thing. So that made accepting their answers to that question difficult too."

Now that he mentioned it, she hadn't noticed the habit of his because she tended to do the same thing, though people usually just ignored her and walked away after a while. But she remembered that he'd talked her ear off a few times, she just hadn't realized it at the time because he'd done so about magic, and that was something SHE could talk about for hours.

"And as you've seen a few times." He continued. "I also get overwhelmed if too many things are happening at once. Or if something unexpected or bad happens." He looked back down at his hands and seemed to realize how hard they were tapping at his legs. "Plus I have a few automatic reactions to certain situations that I do reflexively. Like my hands right now." He said as he lifted them and forced the fingers to spread and clench repeatedly. "Or when I press them to my ears." He pressed them together as if praying before setting them to his sides and looking up and away from them.

He was quiet for a moment. "You said you don't consider it suffering." She mused. "Yet you refer to these things as struggles."

"Well. Yeah." He said. He looked at her for a moment with a smile, before his eyes darted away again. "Like I said. I've never known any other way to be. I was born this way. It makes my life difficult, sure." The smile faded again. "And I know it's made my mom's life difficult. And James's. And my dad's when he was still alive." He looked back up and the smile came back. "And I used to think of it as a struggle. But... one of my therapists gave me a challenge during one of my sessions with them. Told me to ask James a question since he was becoming a nursing student."

Veliry tilted her head in curiosity.

"She told me to ask James about muscle hypertrophy. Do you know what that is?" He asked.

Veliry thought about it. She thought she might have read something about it in one of the medical books James had given them. But she couldn't remember it. She shook her head.

"Muscle hypertrophy is when muscles, through strain or overuse, get little tears in them. It actually happens all the time. It's part of why, if you work out or go for a long walk or run, your muscles can be sore for the rest of the day, or even days after if you went too hard." He said in a rapid, yet familiar excitement. "Well. That and lactic acid."

"Okay?" She said curiously. "What does this have to do with the way you think?"

"Well." He said with a smile. "James explained it to me. That's only the first half of muscular hypertrophy. The second half is that your muscles heal. They make little miniature scars over the tears they made. That scar tissue BECOMES muscle too. As a result your muscles get bigger and, as long as you keep working out, they get stronger over time. It turns out bones do something similar, but for them its not about size, but density."

She thought about the concept. It made sense in theory. Though, medical knowledge and healing weren't her specialty. She'd have to ask one of the healers about it.

"I still don't understand how that relates to you switching from thinking of your condition as suffering versus struggling." She admitted.

"It's kind of like your theory on Magical Overuse." He said simply.

"You... read my theory?" She asked in surprise. She had honestly forgotten that she had a copy of the thesis in her lab.

"It was attached to one of your unsent memos to the King about how James is becoming so strong so fast." He said, causing her face to flush. Those letters were meant only for the King. One being read by anyone else was an accident and completely her fault. "And it very closely resembles the way muscle growth works." He said, completely unaware of the potential security breach he'd just brushed over.

"The idea that repeated magical exertion makes a mage stronger?" She asked.

"Exactly." He said with another smile. "I asked my therapist why she wanted me to learn about muscular hypertrophy and she asked me to ask JAMES about his first few times doing long distance runs. And also about how running was for him now that he did it for fun."

"Okay...." She said uncertainly.

"James said they sucked. They sucked a lot at first. Hell, he said he thought he was gonna die after his first full marathon." Joey grinned.

"But he also said that after he'd recovered he felt like he could run laps around the world."

Veliry nodded. She'd seen James AND Vickers go for runs, and according to Amina and Kela, both of them could run for days compared to most Petravians.

"He struggled." Joey said. "Hell, he suffered. He showed me a picture of one of his toes after that first marathon. The nail on his big toe fell off after a few days."

Veliry cringed.

"But." Joey continued. "He pushed through the suffering and became stronger because of it. Maybe only at running, sure. But still. He saw a goal. He struggled and suffered until he could achieve it. And he came out the other side of it alive, and with a new hobby that he enjoyed." He smiled again. "My therapist put it in those terms and suddenly I just... understood what I had to do to become WHO I want to be. Struggled my way through a difficult math class THREE TIMES. Because I knew that on the other side was the ability to become a Mechanical Engineer."

Suddenly, everything about the two brothers started to make sense to her.

"Struggled my way through all the issues that my A.S.D. causes for me because I knew that someday I'd get where I needed to be. And that might not have been somewhere CONVENTIONALLY successful. But I knew that I'd know it when I got to it."

That made Veliry's thoughts crash to a halt.

"But." She began. "Now you're here."

"Yeah." He said, still smiling.

"And you might never return."

He shrugged. "Yeah."

"So you'll never be a mechanical engineer." She said. "Or at least it's unlikely."

Joey nodded a bit. "And that sucks." He admitted. "Makes me pissed that I DID fight my way through that class a bit. But I've also got my brother back. And," He held his hand up and his clothes began to flutter around him. He let go of a piece of parchment and it flew up until it touched the ceiling, then fluttered off to the side. "I've got freaking magic. That's WAAAAAY cooler than being an engineer. And uses way less math." He looked back at her again. "I may struggle a bit. I did those first few days for sure. I may even suffer a bit. James sure has since he got here." He said with a solemn look. "But on the other side of that is a stronger me. Just like James has become stronger." He nodded his head a bit. "He moves like an anime character. I can't wait to do that."

You two really are different aren't you? She wondered as she watched him follow the piece of paper with his eyes.

"Now seriously." He said. "I know we got sidetracked. Sorry about that. But seriously, why is my energy flow so different from anyone else?"

"Oh, shit." She said. "I completely forgot that was how we started this conversation." She admitted.

"It's okay." Joey reassured her. "Like I said; I ramble."

\----------

"IS THAT IT?" Vickers yelled through the rushing air as he and Amina flew. He pointed at the small gap between two of the mountains.

She looked over at where he'd been pointing and then looked back and nodded.

"THAT'S THE TOWN THAT THE ARMY DETACHMENT WAS DISPATCHED FROM!" She confirmed, her throat and mouth glowing as she used her magic to amplify her speech. "IF THE FOLLOW UP FORCE IS BEING MUSTERED, THAN THAT'S WHERE IT'LL BE!"

Vickers nodded as they banked their griffins around the forested hill they'd been flying past. They'd been flying for three days now, having gone around and below the elevated desert where they knew the Earth Military had set up its outpost.

If there was one upside, one she was very happy about, it was the fact that Steve had regained some of his liveliness over the past few days. He still grumbled occasionally, but he was doing better.

Which meant that James was doing better. Wherever he was.

She lightly kicked her griffin, Ciaphas, to go faster.

Tom matched the speed easily.

She had a country to save, her country, from war.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y7g9sn/wait_is_this_just_gate_243/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (242/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: A bit of insight on our favorite little bro. And, sadly, confirmation about the state of an important piece of equipment.

Enjoy.

Edit: I'm not gonna pretend to know how anyone on the spectrum feels about their lives. I'm not on it so I have no frame of reference. Joey's speech is actually based very closely on the way someone I know worked through their issues with being on the spectrum. But I in no way wish to cheapen anyone else's experiences.

\~

James held the handle gently as he inspected the once marvelous weapon. It was hard to tell in the multi-colored, low, lighting of the crystalline room, but he felt like its once bluish grey blade had dimmed.

"Kai." He said softly as he gripped what was left of the mage's blade. "Can you cast any offensive magic?"

"I can." Kai replied.

"Would you mind building up an attack against me for a moment?" James requested. "No need to actually attack. Just act like you're going to."

Kai looked at him curiously. He could tell that James wasn't alright. So he didn't question the odd request. He gathered energy into his hand. Small, black and blue flames danced on his finger tips.

James looked at the oddly colored flames with mild curiosity.

It was hard to tell, but he thought he felt just the slightest twitch from the sword, then it seemed to vibrate lightly for a second before stilling again.

The oddness of the feeling within James wasn't lost on him. He knew the blade had been semi-sentient, in the fashion that any enchanted item could be. It wasn't like it had ever SPOKEN to him, or used its animated nature to write him any messages. It had only ever driven him toward magical danger, and even tried to pull him into fights that he had no business being in.

But... it had also saved his life more times than he could count. And it WAS still a present from Amina and the King.

And it was his sword.

Looking down at the piece in his hand. At the two fragments lying on the small piece of cloth on his lap.

It felt like he'd lost another friend. Seeing its ruined state had felt akin to when he'd realized he was missing a hand after the battle with the elemental that had ruined the capital.

As if he'd lost a part of his body.

And that was to say nothing of the handle to his chain, which sat on the table with only a handful of links still attached to it. He'd had that weapon even longer. Since his first REAL battle in this world. The one that had set him on the path toward a future with Amina at his side.

"Is there a blacksmith in this fortress?" He asked after staring at the two fragmented weapons for several seconds more.

Kai nodded. "There are."

"Any of them good with enchantments?"

"I don't know." Kai admitted. "I haven't been to this place in several decades now. But I'd be surprised if there weren't."

James nodded and wrapped the sword back in its cloth bundle. He put both of them back in the repaired bottomless bag. Once they were in he pulled out some new clothes and a handful of armor pieces that he hadn't worn in months and began putting them on. He also drew out his shield and the plain steel sword he'd gotten from Kraug back when he was still new to this world.

"Will you be needing this?" Kai asked as James's assault rifle lowered from the ceiling.

James looked at it, doing what he could to hide his discomfort at the elf still having it.

"No." He said as he grabbed it. "But I will take it back." The weapon held fast, secured by unseen spider webs that even James's strength struggled to break. He let go. "Kai?"

"I need your word that you are no threat to my people." The elf said sternly. "That you're not aligned with these.... 'muck marchers' as you call them."

James's jaw clenched as he stared ahead, not looking at the elf.

"Kai." He said after several long seconds of silent anger. "I owe you my life. Several times over from the sounds of things." He looked over at the dark elf, who met his gaze with no expression. He continued. "So I'm not a threat to you or yours. As for whether I'm 'aligned' with them. I've already told you that TECHNICALLY we serve the same government... more or less. But I don't kill people just for being around like they did." He placed his left hand on the rifle's stock and pulled, using his magic and wolf enhanced strength to break the invisible threads with audible twangs. "But I DO kill people that fuck with me." He said as he stuffed the rifle into his bag. "And if I see THEM... we're gonna have words about what they did. Both to the dwarves and to me." He said as he looked down at his still sore body."

Kai's eyebrow raised at the display of anger.

Then he nodded and James heard his harp send out several sharp chords. He looked back just in time to see several spiders retreat back up their webs and out of sight.

"I'll take you down to the fortress market." Kai said after a moment. "We'll see about getting your items repaired. Then we can leave for the surface at your leisure."

"Thank you." James said as he slid his pistol holster onto his belt and clasped it in place. Then he snapped the pistol into the holster with a click. "And thank you for... healing... me."

Kai nodded solemnly. "When you get to your people. See about getting to a human healer." Kai said. "Myself and the sporesman may have healed your body. But spiders and fungi can do very little for souls."

James didn't say anything as he strapped the now multi-colored bottomless bag to his back.

"This way." Kai said as his spiders opened the sliding main door.

\---------------

"Sooo." Joey began as he and Veliry sat, reading notes in the lab. "Why is my energy different from yours? Or even James's?" He asked, causing his teacher to look up at him curiously.

"That's right. James let you use the monocle didn't he?" She said in response as she set her notes down.

"Yeah." Joey said as he squeezed his left eye shut and strained. To Veliry's surprise, after a moment Joey's right eye began to glow with a dull orange light. He looked around for a moment, then shut the eye and began blinking rapidly. "I don't get why he can't do that spell yet." He said. "I mean. It's difficult. And startlingly energy inefficient. But it's not anything special."

Veliry stared at him in shock for a moment. "You can already see magical energy?" She asked. "I haven't even taught you that yet." She reached across the table and pried his eye open with one hand, causing him to flinch and look away. Her own eyes glowed in the same light as she studied him. "And it's only energy inefficient because you aren't as magically saturated as the rest of us yet. That's why I haven't taught you any body altering abilities yet."

Joey pulled back, swatting her hand away lightly as he did, then began rubbing at his eye.

"That still doesn't explain why mine and James's energy looks different from everyone else's." He said. "Also, all I did was read notes and visualized what the monocle showed me. The rest was just focus."

Veliry sat back, impressed at her student's unexpected progress. He's learning faster than James did. She thought. Hell. He's learning faster than I did. And I'm the third youngest Arch Mage in the history of the kingdom.

She took a deep breath. She'd actually been curious about the difference herself. And she thought she had an idea as to the reason. But she hadn't been able to confirm from the books James had brought over, and the information available on her tablet was spotty on the subject at best. But it also seemed like the kind of subject that might require.... delicacy.

"Your brother tells me that you suffer from a.... condition.... known as Autism." She said hesitantly. "That it makes you process information differently than other people."

"I don't consider it suffering." Joey said simply, Veliry relaxed at the easy tone. "And I doubt James used that term either." He said as he sat up a bit straighter. "I... struggle with it... sometimes. But... I've never known any other way of being." His left hand shot up for a moment and she worried that it was going to clamp onto his ear. But instead it simply scratched the side of his head. "It's... difficult. Sometimes. But, compared to some of the people I've met who are also on the spectrum, I got off pretty light."

"What do you mean?" She asked, legitimately curious.

"Well." He said. "I'm what's considered 'high functioning'. I can speak to people. I can learn new things, albeit with difficulty sometimes. I can live a... more or less, normal life."

"I'll say." She said. "You're learning magic at a startling rate."

"That's part of it though." He said, his hand tapping at his leg a bit. A sign she'd learned meant that he'd been just a bit annoyed at something, likely her interruption. "I.... like magic. Just like I like video games and anime... and mechanical engineering. I can.... get obsessed with these subjects very easily and, as you've seen, I can get so caught up in them that I forget basic things. Like.... dinner with my mom and James. Or... eating at all."

She nodded. They had needed to set a schedule for him to stop researching and check in with his mother AND take care of personal responsibilities very quickly once his mother had realized that he'd had a new obsession. Veliry had felt somewhat uncomfortable due to how much it had reminded her of how SHE could get when she was diving too deep into her studies. Now Joey had a series of alarms, some of which had already been in place, on his phone to remind him to stop his studies for a while and check his basic needs.

"On the one hand." He continued, breaking her out of her thoughts. "If I find a subject I like... I learn it quickly... and completely. I... can't help it. I can list off the animators and voice actors of over a hundred animes from back home." His head tilted a bit. "BUT... I also struggle to focus on things that I don't... care.... about. Like I said; I love mechanical engineering. And back home I wanted to become a mechanical engineer. But I..." He shook his head a bit and his left hand rose up a bit toward his ear before he firmly pressed it back to his lap. "I hate.... math. I cannot stand it. And... in my brain... that makes it very difficult for me to focus on anything math related. Which is.... an issue... for an aspiring engineer since it's necessary for it." His head dipped and he stared at his hands. "It took me three attempts to pass my Trig class." He said softly, as if more to himself than to her. "But I liked learning how things work together, and wanted to get into that field. So, with a... LOT... of help. I eventually got through it."

Veliry didn't interrupt.

"I also struggle with social interactions." He said softly. "I have a hard time reading boundaries and social cues that other people take for granted. When I get really excited about a subject I can talk about it for hours, but not everybody wants to hear about something that long. When we were kids, if James caught me babbling to someone like that he would tap me on the shoulder." As if by muscle memory Joey's hand reached up and rapidly tapped at his collar bone three times with two fingers. "It was how he reminded me to ask the person I was talking to whether or not they cared about what I was talking about." He said this as if it made him sad. "But I struggled to understand how people COULDN'T be interested in the same thing. So that made accepting their answers to that question difficult too."

Now that he mentioned it, she hadn't noticed the habit of his because she tended to do the same thing, though people usually just ignored her and walked away after a while. But she remembered that he'd talked her ear off a few times, she just hadn't realized it at the time because he'd done so about magic, and that was something SHE could talk about for hours.

"And as you've seen a few times." He continued. "I also get overwhelmed if too many things are happening at once. Or if something unexpected or bad happens." He looked back down at his hands and seemed to realize how hard they were tapping at his legs. "Plus I have a few automatic reactions to certain situations that I do reflexively. Like my hands right now." He said as he lifted them and forced the fingers to spread and clench repeatedly. "Or when I press them to my ears." He pressed them together as if praying before setting them to his sides and looking up and away from them.

He was quiet for a moment. "You said you don't consider it suffering." She mused. "Yet you refer to these things as struggles."

"Well. Yeah." He said. He looked at her for a moment with a smile, before his eyes darted away again. "Like I said. I've never known any other way to be. I was born this way. It makes my life difficult, sure." The smile faded again. "And I know it's made my mom's life difficult. And James's. And my dad's when he was still alive." He looked back up and the smile came back. "And I used to think of it as a struggle. But... one of my therapists gave me a challenge during one of my sessions with them. Told me to ask James a question since he was becoming a nursing student."

Veliry tilted her head in curiosity.

"She told me to ask James about muscle hypertrophy. Do you know what that is?" He asked.

Veliry thought about it. She thought she might have read something about it in one of the medical books James had given them. But she couldn't remember it. She shook her head.

"Muscle hypertrophy is when muscles, through strain or overuse, get little tears in them. It actually happens all the time. It's part of why, if you work out or go for a long walk or run, your muscles can be sore for the rest of the day, or even days after if you went too hard." He said in a rapid, yet familiar excitement. "Well. That and lactic acid."

"Okay?" She said curiously. "What does this have to do with the way you think?"

"Well." He said with a smile. "James explained it to me. That's only the first half of muscular hypertrophy. The second half is that your muscles heal. They make little miniature scars over the tears they made. That scar tissue BECOMES muscle too. As a result your muscles get bigger and, as long as you keep working out, they get stronger over time. It turns out bones do something similar, but for them its not about size, but density."

She thought about the concept. It made sense in theory. Though, medical knowledge and healing weren't her specialty. She'd have to ask one of the healers about it.

"I still don't understand how that relates to you switching from thinking of your condition as suffering versus struggling." She admitted.

"It's kind of like your theory on Magical Overuse." He said simply.

"You... read my theory?" She asked in surprise. She had honestly forgotten that she had a copy of the thesis in her lab.

"It was attached to one of your unsent memos to the King about how James is becoming so strong so fast." He said, causing her face to flush. Those letters were meant only for the King. One being read by anyone else was an accident and completely her fault. "And it very closely resembles the way muscle growth works." He said, completely unaware of the potential security breach he'd just brushed over.

"The idea that repeated magical exertion makes a mage stronger?" She asked.

"Exactly." He said with another smile. "I asked my therapist why she wanted me to learn about muscular hypertrophy and she asked me to ask JAMES about his first few times doing long distance runs. And also about how running was for him now that he did it for fun."

"Okay...." She said uncertainly.

"James said they sucked. They sucked a lot at first. Hell, he said he thought he was gonna die after his first full marathon." Joey grinned. "But he also said that after he'd recovered he felt like he could run laps around the world."

Veliry nodded. She'd seen James AND Vickers go for runs, and according to Amina and Kela, both of them could run for days compared to most Petravians.

"He struggled." Joey said. "Hell, he suffered. He showed me a picture of one of his toes after that first marathon. The nail on his big toe fell off after a few days."

Veliry cringed.

"But." Joey continued. "He pushed through the suffering and became stronger because of it. Maybe only at running, sure. But still. He saw a goal. He struggled and suffered until he could achieve it. And he came out the other side of it alive, and with a new hobby that he enjoyed." He smiled again. "My therapist put it in those terms and suddenly I just... understood what I had to do to become WHO I want to be. Struggled my way through a difficult math class THREE TIMES. Because I knew that on the other side was the ability to become a Mechanical Engineer."

Suddenly, everything about the two brothers started to make sense to her.

"Struggled my way through all the issues that my A.S.D. causes for me because I knew that someday I'd get where I needed to be. And that might not have been somewhere CONVENTIONALLY successful. But I knew that I'd know it when I got to it."

That made Veliry's thoughts crash to a halt.

"But." She began. "Now you're here."

"Yeah." He said, still smiling.

"And you might never return."

He shrugged. "Yeah."

"So you'll never be a mechanical engineer." She said. "Or at least it's unlikely."

Joey nodded a bit. "And that sucks." He admitted. "Makes me pissed that I DID fight my way through that class a bit. But I've also got my brother back. And," He held his hand up and his clothes began to flutter around him. He let go of a piece of parchment and it flew up until it touched the ceiling, then fluttered off to the side. "I've got freaking magic. That's WAAAAAY cooler than being an engineer. And uses way less math." He looked back at her again. "I may struggle a bit. I did those first few days for sure. I may even suffer a bit. James sure has since he got here." He said with a solemn look. "But on the other side of that is a stronger me. Just like James has become stronger." He nodded his head a bit. "He moves like an anime character. I can't wait to do that."

You two really are different aren't you? She wondered as she watched him follow the piece of paper with his eyes.

"Now seriously." He said. "I know we got sidetracked. Sorry about that. But seriously, why is my energy flow so different from anyone else?"

"Oh, shit." She said. "I completely forgot that was how we started this conversation." She admitted.

"It's okay." Joey reassured her. "Like I said; I ramble."

\-----------------

"IS THAT IT?" Vickers yelled through the rushing air as he and Amina flew. He pointed at the small gap between two of the mountains.

She looked over at where he'd been pointing and then looked back and nodded.

"THAT'S THE TOWN THAT THE ARMY DETACHMENT WAS DISPATCHED FROM!" She confirmed, her throat and mouth glowing as she used her magic to amplify her speech. "IF THE FOLLOW UP FORCE IS BEING MUSTERED, THAN THAT'S WHERE IT'LL BE!"

Vickers nodded as they banked their griffins around the forested hill they'd been flying past. They'd been flying for three days now, having gone around and below the elevated desert where they knew the Earth Military had set up its outpost.

If there was one upside, one she was very happy about, it was the fact that Steve had regained some of his liveliness over the past few days. He still grumbled occasionally, but he was doing better.

Which meant that James was doing better. Wherever he was.

She lightly kicked her griffin, Ciaphas, to go faster.

Tom matched the speed easily.

She had a country to save, her country, from war.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y7g7yg/wait_is_this_just_gate_243/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (241/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Listen to some old school spaghetti western music for the second section.

Also: Momma Choi still exists. Yaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James sat patiently as the sporesman, a dark elf woman who apparently specialized in fungus based healing and magic, went over his injuries under the watchful eyes of Kai.

"By the Dark's shadows Prince." The woman said in an accent that sounded to James like a mixture of a southern drawl and an Irish brogue. If he was honest the accent made his head hurt a bit. "What'd you do to the man?"

"Kept him alive." Kai responded flatly. "The same way a frugal person keeps their favorite jacket in one piece."

James sat quietly as the woman rubbed the fungal powders and salves into some of the lines of stitches across his body.

I look like an Asian Frankenstein's monster He thought glumly. Mom's gonna kill me. His head drooped. Amina's gonna kill me.

"And how's this arm work?" The sporesman asked. "Never seent an arm like that before."

"Long story." James said softly.

The woman looked at James's face for a moment and saw the discomfort there.

"Aye." She said simply. "Imagine it is. Takes all sorts."

She rubbed a patch of some kind of brown matter on her arm. James assumed it was more spores of some kind. They glowed a faint purplish color for a moment as some of them floated off and into the air. Then the glowing spores in the air seemed to almost animate. The sporesman pointed the rubbing finger at James and the lights moved toward him. He instinctively backed up a bit.

"Let em do." She said. One of the purple spores touched on his shoulder and the ointment she'd rubbed there also began glowing, though in a dull reddish brown light instead. James felt the shoulder begin warming, and his skin felt movement.

The other floating spores began to touch other parts of his body, and similar lights and sensations began to occur in the areas they affected.

"I'll have the boys downstairs bring up a bit o' chow." She said with a satisfied smile on her face as she stood up. "Eat hearty. Go to sleep." She instructed. "When you wake the work'll be done. Then we'll rinse you off and deactivate any stubborn ones."

As if on cue a small mushroom sprouted on the top of James's right thigh. He looked at it with wide eyes.

"Uhhhhh." He began.

"Just a Leech cap." She said as if it explained everything. "Pulls out toxins. Leave it be. It'll fall off when it's done."

And with that, she was gone out the small sliding door on the side of the room.

"I don't like mushrooms." James said under his breath.

"You'll have to get used to them." Kai said. "They make up a large portion of the food down here." he quirked his head. "And building materials. Get some rest James. We'll talk more when you wake up."

Before James could respond Kai had ascended to the, startlingly high, ceiling and out of sight. Where he'd gone, James had no idea. He couldn't see anything past the glowing webs that covered most of it, and Kai had gone through an opening that appeared and disappeared faster than made sense.

He looked down at his hand, and the several small bits of fungus that had formed a rather uncomfortable shape in between his knuckles. He flicked the wet looking.... folds.... with his left hand's clawed pointer finger. They made a discomforting squelching noise and James cringed.

"Don't play with them." Kai said in that close-yet-echoing way that the chamber seemed to cause. "Rest."

James didn't think that was gonna happen.

\----------

The Major stood on the top of the dune next to the M.F.F.V. as the talk, bulky, person walked across the desert toward their camp. He was wearing a tan and brown cloak that concealed his form and anything that they might have been holding, and its hood kept their face in shade.

Still, she'd seen the enhanced footage from the aerial encounter two days before. The colors and shape of the clothing he'd been wearing while riding his griffin, which was itself fairly recognizable at least in her mind, coupled with the fact that he'd been analyzing their camp with an easily identified sniper rifle, had made it easy to tell who the approaching man was.

But she knew better than to trust anything, and she also knew that he hadn't been alone then and so he probably wasn't alone now. Appearances be damned.

She wasn't alone either.

Twenty yards away, just below the sand, Chief Carroll sat waiting. She'd had her leg repaired by the technicians that her team had brought along with them, and now she was sitting with her weapon in a plastic bag. She'd synced her suit up to the cameras that the Miffy had all over it, and the Major had direct contact with her over the radio.

"Definitely one of ours." Carroll said as the man approached. "He's got a vest on. And a pistol on his hip."

The Major didn't say anything in response.

The man stopped some ten yards away. He didn't even pretend to be a local as he spoke in plain English, with his natural Boston accent.

"Bit surprised seein' you guys out here." He said without dropping his hood.

"Funny." She replied. "That's my line..... Chief."

"Strange thermal readings on his left side." Carroll chimed in. "Like he's holding an ice pack or something."

The two of them, Chief and Major, stared at each other for several long moments.

In a quick, fluid, motion that made her tense for just a moment, his left hand rose up and pulled back his hood. Underneath was the close cropped hair that she expected, with a bit of fuzz on his face from not having shaved in a week or so.

"Major." He replied coolly. "Care to explain why there's an army base surrounded by Miffy's way out in the desert?" He asked while pointing at the vehicle in question. "I mean, I knew the initial team was coming out here to set up a small post. But... this seems.... excessive."

"It was always the plan sooner or later." She admitted. "But our hand was forced by the locals getting a bit.... aggressive... themselves."

Vickers' nodded as if that made sense to him. "Fair enough." He said after a moment. "You kill that royal guard platoon that came out here?"

"You know about that?" She shot back, answering without actually answering.

"It may not seem like it." He began. "But these guys actually have their lines of communication pretty well nailed down for how simple they are. And their Military actually functions better than you'd think."

"Does it?" She asked. "I'll have to take your word for it. Now what, are you doing here Chief? And where's your friend? Was that Choi?"

Vickers didn't let his emotions show. So they don't know either. He thought.

"Actually no." He answered. "That's just a traveling partner. We were on Choi's trail though."

"Oh?"

"Yeah." He said. "We got word of an issue with the blight down near the coast on the other side of the mountain range." He lied. "Choi was asked to take a look at it. He moves a lot faster than we do so he was a couple days ahead. But he missed his check in."

"So that's what those radio signals we detected were?" She asked. "You and him trying to get in touch."

"Yeah." He said again. "Haven't seen him around here have you? Woulda been flying around like a human missile." He made a point of looking at the vehicle next to her. "Wouldn't want him to have uh... alarmed.... anyone."

The major bit her lower lip a bit as she thought. On the one hand this all but confirmed Driscoll's suspicion. But on the other hand she didn't like the idea that she might have killed Choi. It was obvious that Earth Command wanted him alive, even if they were also clearly uncertain of his allegiance nowadays.

"Afraid nobody like that has come around." She said finally. "Also, the M.F.F.V.'s are set to standard combat S.O.P.'s."

"Right." He said with a nod. "Course they are. After all, y'all came under attack. Right?"

"That's right." She said smugly.

A long silence took place as the two people stared each other down. Vickers broke it first.

"Well. I guess I'll get back to my traveling companion." He said as he took a half step back. "We'll uh. Get out of you guys' hair and uh... give you a wide berth."

"You do that Chief." She said. "And come up with a good cover story for the princess for us." She said with a smirk.

Vickers froze for a split second, staring at her again. Then he nodded. "Will do ma'am." He said.

Then he turned around and began walking away, his back turned to the Major, the weapon platform and, unknown to him, the armored Carroll.

"I can take him." Carroll radioed in her ear. "I'll have him pinned before he even has time to turn around."

The Major was about to reply with an order to stand down when something unexpected happened.

In a spray of desert sand Vickers began to run. She flinched back at the sudden burst of speed even as the Miffy right next to her came to life, activated by the Chief's acceleration. It's massive barrels turned to track him.

"Ma'am what the hell is that?" The marine currently at the Miffy's control panel asked. "It's moving nearly seventy miles per hour."

She looked at the vehicle in shock at the announcement.

"How the hell?" A tinny, speaker amplified, voice asked from beside her. She turned back and Carroll was standing next to her. She hadn't even heard the massive armored woman move.

"Let him go." She said into her mic, even as she struggled to understand what she'd just seen.

The spray of sand that marked Vickers' retreat went around a dune, and out of sight.

THAT was his threat. She thought, anger clenching her jaw as she realized that she'd been played. And he probably wasn't even surprised by ours.

\-------------------------

"They saw him." Vickers said a little over an hour later as he got to the small camp site that the princess had set up for them on the side same mountain from before. "I don't know what happened. But he came through here. And they interacted."

"He must be alive." She said as she brushed Steve's fur. "Steve wouldn't be if he'd died."

She'd let the massive drake out the night before when he'd been writhing and groaning in some kind of discomfort. If it was pain then it was of a limited kind, unlike when he'd bellowed and roared during their flight several days before, forcing them to land for a moment before he'd entered a stupor. He was more relaxed now, but still occasionally grumbled and shifted from some unseen aches that she knew had to be from James.

"I don't think they have him." Vickers said as he gave Tom a few reassuring pats on the head. "Least that wasn't the vibe I got. Course, she was a cold bitch. So who knows."

"She?" Amina asked.

"Yeah. A Major." He replied. "And I was right. Those were Miffy's. Plus there was someone else there. Someone hiding in the sand."

"How do you know?" She asked.

"You know how you can sense the magic around you if you try?" He asked in return. She nodded and he continued. "Felt like there was.... I don't know... a void... nearby. One that was about my size and sitting just a few inches below the sand."

"Your senses are that fine tuned?" She wondered, though it didn't surprise her. James's magic had progressed with startling speed. Vickers had managed to develop ice magic without anyone else even knowing.

"Part of the job." He said. "Stealth specialist, remember? Being aware of my surroundings is an important trait. Once I got the juice I focused a lot of my energy on sensing stuff around me. Made my head hurt like a bitch for the first few weeks. But. Meh." He shrugged. "Still got a ways to go."

"They didn't kill him." She whispered, more to herself than anyone else. Steve's massive yellowish green eye turned lazily to look at her. She stroked the fur behind his jaw. "And they don't have him boy." She said as the massive lizard's secondary eyelid shut in contentment. "We'll get him back to you."

And to me. She thought.

\----------

Mrs. Choi stepped through the doors uncertainly. She still didn't understand the language of this world when it came to writing. But the King had given her pretty clear directions on where to go. And with James on a trip and Joey practically living in his teacher's lab nowadays, she needed something to do.

The view on the other side of the door instantly made her feel more at ease. The building was still the same stone and wood that she'd become accustomed to over the past months. But the furniture and the dress of the staff was as reassuringly familiar as a favorite jacket to her.

This... was a where a nurse, which she was, was supposed to be.

"Good morning." Said a young elf man behind the desk. "How can I help you today? This isn't an emergency is it?"

"No." She said with a smile. "I'm Margaret Choi." She added as she walked over to the desk. "The King said that I might be able to help here."

"Oh. But of course Mrs. Choi. He sent word ahead. Let me go grab the lead healer on duty today." He said as he quickly stood up, gave a small bow, and then walked around his side of the desk and through the nearby opening into the back.

While she waited she looked around at the waiting room once more. Barring the fact that all the chairs were old fashioned, and likely hand made, and also the fact that there was no T.V. or radio playing old soap operas or cheesy court shows, it was very clearly a hospital waiting room.

"Greetings Mrs. Choi." Said a booming voice behind her.

She turned around and then took a half step backwards in surprise as she craned her neck upward to look at the source of the voice.

There was no way to describe the.... man... standing just inside of the doorway.

"Minotaur?" She asked under her breath.

"You're familiar with my people?" He asked. "I'd heard reports that the young Captain was familiar with some of the races of this world. I'm glad to know that they were true."

He bowed and then held out a hand. She took it tentatively, awed at how much larger the three fingered hand was than her own.

"I'm druidic healer Shrend Farstorm." He said. "I'm so excited to work with you Mrs. Choi. Hopefully you'll be able to help us apply some of the knowledge that your son's books have given us to our practices."

He extended his arm in a gesture toward the door that was several feet too small for him. She stiffly walked through it, eyes wide as she did.

"Glad I can help." She said uncertainly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y6na38/wait_is_this_just_gate_242/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (241/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Listen to some old school spaghetti western music for the second section.

Also: Momma Choi still exists. Yaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James sat patiently as the sporesman, a dark elf woman who apparently specialized in fungus based healing and magic, went over his injuries under the watchful eyes of Kai.

"By the Dark's shadows Prince." The woman said in an accent that sounded to James like a mixture of a southern drawl and an Irish brogue. If he was honest the accent made his head hurt a bit. "What'd you do to the man?"

"Kept him alive." Kai responded flatly. "The same way a frugal person keeps their favorite jacket in one piece."

James sat quietly as the woman rubbed the fungal powders and salves into some of the lines of stitches across his body.

I look like an Asian Frankenstein's monster He thought glumly. Mom's gonna kill me. His head drooped. Amina's gonna kill me.

"And how's this arm work?" The sporesman asked. "Never seent an arm like that before."

"Long story." James said softly.

The woman looked at James's face for a moment and saw the discomfort there.

"Aye." She said simply. "Imagine it is. Takes all sorts."

She rubbed a patch of some kind of brown matter on her arm. James assumed it was more spores of some kind. They glowed a faint purplish color for a moment as some of them floated off and into the air. Then the glowing spores in the air seemed to almost animate. The sporesman pointed the rubbing finger at James and the lights moved toward him. He instinctively backed up a bit.

"Let em do." She said. One of the purple spores touched on his shoulder and the ointment she'd rubbed there also began glowing, though in a dull reddish brown light instead. James felt the shoulder begin warming, and his skin felt movement.

The other floating spores began to touch other parts of his body, and similar lights and sensations began to occur in the areas they affected.

"I'll have the boys downstairs bring up a bit o' chow." She said with a satisfied smile on her face as she stood up. "Eat hearty. Go to sleep." She instructed. "When you wake the work'll be done. Then we'll rinse you off and deactivate any stubborn ones."

As if on cue a small mushroom sprouted on the top of James's right thigh. He looked at it with wide eyes.

"Uhhhhh." He began.

"Just a Leech cap." She said as if it explained everything. "Pulls out toxins. Leave it be. It'll fall off when it's done."

And with that, she was gone out the small sliding door on the side of the room.

"I don't like mushrooms." James said under his breath.

"You'll have to get used to them." Kai said. "They make up a large portion of the food down here." he quirked his head. "And building materials. Get some rest James. We'll talk more when you wake up."

Before James could respond Kai had ascended to the, startlingly high, ceiling and out of sight. Where he'd gone, James had no idea. He couldn't see anything past the glowing webs that covered most of it, and Kai had gone through an opening that appeared and disappeared faster than made sense.

He looked down at his hand, and the several small bits of fungus that had formed a rather uncomfortable shape in between his knuckles. He flicked the wet looking.... folds.... with his left hand's clawed pointer finger. They made a discomforting squelching noise and James cringed.

"Don't play with them." Kai said in that close-yet-echoing way that the chamber seemed to cause. "Rest."

James didn't think that was gonna happen.

\----------

The Major stood on the top of the dune next to the M.F.F.V. as the tall, bulky, person walked across the desert toward their camp. He was wearing a tan and brown cloak that concealed his form and anything that they might have been holding, and its hood kept their face in shade.

Still, she'd seen the enhanced footage from the aerial encounter two days before. The colors and shape of the clothing he'd been wearing while riding his griffin, which was itself fairly recognizable at least in her mind, coupled with the fact that he'd been analyzing their camp with an easily identified sniper rifle, had made it easy to tell who the approaching man was.

But she knew better than to trust anything, and she also knew that he hadn't been alone then and so he probably wasn't alone now. Appearances be damned.

She wasn't alone either.

Twenty yards away, just below the sand, Chief Carroll sat waiting. She'd had her leg repaired by the technicians that her team had brought along with them, and now she was sitting with her weapon in a plastic bag. She'd synced her suit up to the cameras that the Miffy had all over it, and the Major had direct contact with her over the radio.

"Definitely one of ours." Carroll said as the man approached. "He's got a vest on. And a pistol on his hip."

The Major didn't say anything in response.

The man stopped some ten yards away. He didn't even pretend to be a local as he spoke in plain English, with his natural Boston accent.

"Bit surprised seein' you guys out here." He said without dropping his hood.

"Funny." She replied. "That's my line..... Chief."

"Strange thermal readings on his left side." Carroll chimed in. "Like he's holding an ice pack or something."

The two of them, Chief and Major, stared at each other for several long moments.

In a quick, fluid, motion that made her tense for just a moment, his left hand rose up and pulled back his hood. Underneath was the close cropped hair that she expected, with a bit of fuzz on his face from not having shaved in a week or so.

"Major." He replied coolly. "Care to explain why there's an army base surrounded by Miffy's way out in the desert?" He asked while pointing at the vehicle in question. "I mean, I knew the initial team was coming out here to set up a small post. But... this seems.... excessive."

"It was always the plan sooner or later." She admitted. "But our hand was forced by the locals getting a bit.... aggressive... themselves."

Vickers' nodded as if that made sense to him. "Fair enough." He said after a moment. "You kill that royal guard platoon that came out here?"

"You know about that?" She shot back, answering without actually answering.

"It may not seem like it." He began. "But these guys actually have their lines of communication pretty well nailed down for how simple they are. And their Military actually functions better than you'd think."

"Does it?" She asked. "I'll have to take your word for it. Now what, are you doing here Chief? And where's your friend? Was that Choi?"

Vickers didn't let his emotions show. So they don't know either. He thought.

"Actually no." He answered. "That's just a traveling partner. We were on Choi's trail though."

"Oh?"

"Yeah." He said. "We got word of an issue with the blight down near the coast on the other side of the mountain range." He lied. "Choi was asked to take a look at it. He moves a lot faster than we do so he was a couple days ahead. But he missed his check in."

"So that's what those radio signals we detected were?" She asked. "You and him trying to get in touch."

"Yeah." He said again. "Haven't seen him around here have you? Woulda been flying around like a human missile." He made a point of looking at the vehicle next to her. "Wouldn't want him to have uh... alarmed.... anyone."

The major bit her lower lip a bit as she thought. On the one hand this all but confirmed Driscoll's suspicion. But on the other hand she didn't like the idea that she might have killed Choi. It was obvious that Earth Command wanted him alive, even if they were also clearly uncertain of his allegiance nowadays.

"Afraid nobody like that has come around." She said finally. "Also, the M.F.F.V.'s are set to standard combat S.O.P.'s."

"Right." He said with a nod. "Course they are. After all, y'all came under attack. Right?"

"That's right." She said smugly.

A long silence took place as the two people stared each other down. Vickers broke it first.

"Well. I guess I'll get back to my traveling companion." He said as he took a half step back. "We'll uh. Get out of you guys' hair and uh... give you a wide berth."

"You do that Chief." She said. "And come up with a good cover story for the princess for us." She said with a smirk.

Vickers froze for a split second, staring at her again. Then he nodded. "Will do ma'am." He said.

Then he turned around and began walking away, his back turned to the Major, the weapon platform and, unknown to him, the armored Carroll.

"I can take him." Carroll radioed in her ear. "I'll have him pinned before he even has time to turn around."

The Major was about to reply with an order to stand down when something unexpected happened.

In a spray of desert sand Vickers began to run. She flinched back at the sudden burst of speed even as the Miffy right next to her came to life, activated by the Chief's acceleration. It's massive barrels turned to track him.

"Ma'am what the hell is that?" The marine currently at the Miffy's control panel asked. "It's moving nearly seventy miles per hour."

She looked at the vehicle in shock at the announcement.

"How the hell?" A tinny, speaker amplified, voice asked from beside her. She turned back and Carroll was standing next to her. She hadn't even heard the massive armored woman move.

"Let him go." She said into her mic, even as she struggled to understand what she'd just seen.

The spray of sand that marked Vickers' retreat went around a dune, and out of sight.

THAT was his threat. She thought, anger clenching her jaw as she realized that she'd been played. And he probably wasn't even surprised by ours.

\-------------------------

"They saw him." Vickers said a little over an hour later as he got to the small camp site that the princess had set up for them on the side same mountain from before. "I don't know what happened. But he came through here. And they interacted."

"He must be alive." She said as she brushed Steve's fur. "Steve wouldn't be if he'd died."

She'd let the massive drake out the night before when he'd been writhing and groaning in some kind of discomfort. If it was pain then it was of a limited kind, unlike when he'd bellowed and roared during their flight several days before, forcing them to land for a moment before he'd entered a stupor. He was more relaxed now, but still occasionally grumbled and shifted from some unseen aches that she knew had to be from James.

"I don't think they have him." Vickers said as he gave Tom a few reassuring pats on the head. "Least that wasn't the vibe I got. Course, she was a cold bitch. So who knows."

"She?" Amina asked.

"Yeah. A Major." He replied. "And I was right. Those were Miffy's. Plus there was someone else there. Someone hiding in the sand."

"How do you know?" She asked.

"You know how you can sense the magic around you if you try?" He asked in return. She nodded and he continued. "Felt like there was.... I don't know... a void... nearby. One that was about my size and sitting just a few inches below the sand."

"Your senses are that fine tuned?" She wondered, though it didn't surprise her. James's magic had progressed with startling speed. Vickers had managed to develop ice magic without anyone else even knowing.

"Part of the job." He said. "Stealth specialist, remember? Being aware of my surroundings is an important trait. Once I got the juice I focused a lot of my energy on sensing stuff around me. Made my head hurt like a bitch for the first few weeks. But. Meh." He shrugged. "Still got a ways to go."

"They didn't kill him." She whispered, more to herself than anyone else. Steve's massive yellowish green eye turned lazily to look at her. She stroked the fur behind his jaw. "And they don't have him boy." She said as the massive lizard's secondary eyelid shut in contentment. "We'll get him back to you."

And to me. She thought.

\----------

Mrs. Choi stepped through the doors uncertainly. She still didn't understand the language of this world when it came to writing. But the King had given her pretty clear directions on where to go. And with James on a trip and Joey practically living in his teacher's lab nowadays, she needed something to do.

The view on the other side of the door instantly made her feel more at ease. The building was still the same stone and wood that she'd become accustomed to over the past months. But the furniture and the dress of the staff was as reassuringly familiar as a favorite jacket to her.

This... was a place where a nurse, which she was, was supposed to be.

"Good morning." Said a young elf man behind the desk. "How can I help you today? This isn't an emergency is it?"

"No." She said with a smile. "I'm Margaret Choi." She added as she walked over to the desk. "The King said that I might be able to help here."

"Oh. But of course Mrs. Choi. He sent word ahead. Let me go grab the lead healer on duty today." He said as he quickly stood up, gave a small bow, and then walked around his side of the desk and through the nearby opening into the back.

While she waited she looked around at the waiting room once more. Barring the fact that all the chairs were old fashioned, and likely hand made, and also the fact that there was no T.V. or radio playing old soap operas or cheesy court shows, it was very clearly a hospital waiting room.

"Greetings Mrs. Choi." Said a booming voice behind her.

She turned around and then took a half step backwards in surprise as she craned her neck upward to look at the source of the voice.

There was no way to describe the.... man... standing just inside of the doorway.

"Minotaur?" She asked under her breath.

"You're familiar with my people?" He asked. "I'd heard reports that the young Captain was familiar with some of the races of this world. I'm glad to know that they were true."

He bowed and then held out a hand. She took it tentatively, awed at how much larger the three fingered hand was than her own.

"I'm druidic healer Shrend Farstorm." He said. "I'm so excited to work with you Mrs. Choi. Hopefully you'll be able to help us apply some of the knowledge that your son's books have given us to our practices."

He extended his arm in a gesture toward the door that was several feet too small for him. She stiffly walked through it, eyes wide as she did.

"Glad I can help." She said uncertainly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y6n6bx/wait_is_this_just_gate_242/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (240/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James's explosive style is very obviously modeled after Bakugo from MHA.

Joey's personality is based on being a cross between Lemillion and Amajiki. I HAVE SPOKEN!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"So they're men?" Kai asked uncertainly. "That is.... armor?"

"Yes." James answered as he continued to float in the air. "They're called..... actually I don't remember their official name. Most people call them Muck Marchers. Or Great Value Brand Spartans."

"Spartans?" Kai wondered.

"Not important." James replied with a shake of his head. "But, they're not golems."

"That.... armor... is so slim." Kai said. "How do they fit inside of it? It must be thinner than parchment."

"That's the kind of info that guys at my level of the military don't get to learn." James said. "Top secret type stuff. There's theories. Some of the crazies say that it's alien tech. Some say that it's nano-tech."

"Aliens?" Kai asked curiously.

James ignored it. He didn't have the energy to explain E.T. to a dark elf spider wizard.

"The theory that makes the most sense though is that they're some kind of cyborgs." He said instead. "That they're all brains in jars or something similar."

"Cyborgs?" Kai asked, still confused.

"Blendings of man and machine." James said as if that was all there was to it.

Kai stared at him for a moment.

"Okay." James said, realizing that he was going to fast. "You ever have someone lose a hand or leg or something?"

Kai looked at James's wolf hand for a moment.

"Fair." James said. "But like.... Without literal divine intervention. And in a way that they can't get it reattached." He said, remembering how Gixelle had had her hand reattached after the Grabber battle.

"Yes." Kai replied.

"Okay. And they usually get a peg leg or something right? Or a simple wooden hand or something similar?" James continued.

"We use crystals down here. But I get your meaning." Kai said.

"Okay. Now, you ever have a mage or someone enchant that prosthetic so that it can move in a more life-like manner?" James asked.

Kai wobbled a bit. "I've heard of it." He admitted. "It's difficult and expensive. And the people that can do it tend not to be easy to find."

"Also... totally fair." James said. "But that's basically what a cyborg is. It's someone who has parts of their body replaced by artificial body parts that can recreate the original function passably. We just do it with technology instead of magic."

"This is all very far fetched." Kai said with furrowed eyebrows.

"I'm a gun wielding combat mage from another dimension, whose marrying a gorgeous fantasy princess, and is supposedly fated to save this world. And your a midnight black elf... prince thing.... that controls spiders. And we're currently discussing the death of a clan of sand mage dwarves at the hands of things you thought were golems that are actually super advanced robo-warriors that are ALSO from another dimension.... My dimension precisely." James said. Then he made an exaggerated sweep of his head to gesture at the room. "While we're sitting inside a giant amethyst castle tower in an underground fortress that is also made of amethyst." He tilted his head a bit. "Far fetched seems to be the name of the game."

"It's actually a combination of amethyst and topaz." Kai replied.

"Yes." James said. He didn't know enough about geology for that to mean anything to him. "That makes this place sooo much more believable.

"You've made your point." Kai said flatly.

"So look." James said. "I'm sorry about the dwarves..... And the spiders you lost. But I need to get to the surface and warn Princess Amina and my comrade about what they're potentially flying into before it's too late and they end up like me. And we need to dodge the Muck Marchers while we do it. Can you help me?"

There was a soft twang from Kai's instrument, James suddenly felt several spiders crawl onto his neck. He stiffened and gulped in surprise.

"You swear on your life that you had nothing to do with these.... things... slaughtering the dwarves?" Kai asked, suddenly stern again.

"I know what they are... more or less." James said as he felt one of the spiders shift. "And we're TECHNICALLY serving the same military.... also more or less." He swallowed nervously. "But I'm not in charge of them. I had no idea they were even here until you showed them to me. And I have NO... idea... why... they're being so damn aggro."

Kai looked him in the eyes as he pleaded his case.

"Will they be able to find you?" Kai asked, not releasing James as he floated closer.

James wondered that himself.

"Probably." He said after a moment's thought. "On my world they're the military version of the boogeyman." Kai looked at him curiously. "Amina told me this world has something similar. A Stew Wight? I don't know what the Deep Dark's version is. But that kinda fairy tale creature used to scare kids into behaving. That one that your brain can't get rid of even as an adult even though logically it doesn't make any sense."

Kai nodded understanding.

"These guys are the war version of that thing." James continued. "Details are kept secret by our government. Some stories are probably exaggerated. Some are probably even fake. But nobody knows which ones are which. And even if you eliminate almost all of em. The ones left behind would still make them damn scary." He swallowed again. "But if anyone from my world can not only find their way through the Deep Dark, but also fight off the things in it. It's probably them. And they have stuff that would make tracking us easier than you think."

Again, Kai looked him in the eyes as he said this. Then his eyes glanced down at the spiders still resting on James's throat.

He played a soft strum on his instrument. Before James knew it he was sitting on the side of a soft bed, his limbs and body released from their unseen restraints. He felt himself over with his hands, ignoring the dull throbbing that ached through his whole body as he did. There was no sign that the spiders had ever been there.

Then he realized that his clothes were different. Made of a material that felt like nothing he'd ever felt before, and as he looked down he saw that they were different hues of green and brown that somewhat mimicked the gear he'd been wearing while flying.

"Did you.... change my clothes?" He asked.

Kai held a hand up and James's bag floated into it again. He reached in and pulled out something that looked like a cross between a Ghillie suit and a horror movie villain's leather jacket.

"Your clothes were more badly damaged than you were." Kai replied simply. "I repaired the other stuff. But... leather tends not to look too good when stitched that extensively."

That reminded James of his injuries. He reached his hand into the new shirt and felt his chest.

They were fine. So small that he might not have noticed them if he'd had more body hair than he did. But his body was a patchwork of fine, spider silk, stitches.

He sagged with the realization.

"How bad was I?" He asked.

Kai looked at him with pity. "When the dwarves brought you to me I thought you were already dead." He admitted. "Your survival is nothing short of miraculous. The fact that you're up and talking? And so soon?" He tilted his head. "It makes me wonder if maybe you're getting MORE divine intervention." He looked up warily. "Though. Hopefully not from the same source." He said in a startlingly harsh whisper.

\---

Pneumatic punch. Joey reminded himself as he focused on the energy flowing through his hands. James calls it a pneumatic punch. You understand pneumatics. Small area, high pressure, quick burst. Dummy's twenty feet away. Rusty metal armor.

Veliry, eyes glowing, watched him from the side of the training yard. "Good control." She said under her breath as her student stood, clothes flapping in the unseen wind, only a few yards away.

Joey took a step forward, eyes still closed, as his arm swept around him in a circle. He didn't know why, but emulating the old Air Bender show his father had shown him and his brother, felt natural to do.

As he brought his hand forward and swung it at the dummy, he opened his eyes and released the energy.

"Hah!" He exclaimed as he did.

The center of the dummy's chest exploded away from him in a blast of straw, wood splinters, and metal fragmentation.

Then, a moment later, a foot wide hole punched through the wooden back wall some ten feet behind it.

Then there was a yell as a cloud of dust and debris appeared at the base of the castle wall some twenty feet behind that, causing a passing soldier to jump out of the way. Several of the guards on top rushed to peer over the side of the wall in confusion.

Joey stood, frozen in place, with wide eyes. His hand was still in the outstretched position it had been when he'd released the attack.

Veliry, eyes still glowing, was wearing an incredibly similar look of shock as she looked at the destruction her pupil had just caused.

Joey lowered his hand as he slowly bent down to look through the hole in the wooden barrier. One of the planks it was made of clattered to the ground as he did and he winced. Behind it there was a massive indentation in the stone of the castle wall, and a pile of loose rubble beneath it and scattered outward a bit.

He looked up at the guards, who all had confused or angry looks on their face. Without realizing it, his hands went up to cover his ears.

"Sorry." He said weakly as he turned to walk over to Veliry.

Veliry had the opposite kind of reaction.

"Joey?" She asked as he neared her. "That was... INCREDIBLE!"

Joey quickly turned away and froze as his teacher began eagerly jumping up and down in excitement. She quickly flew over to the stone wall and began inspecting the damage to it, completely oblivious of the glares from the royal soldiers.

Even though he agreed with his teacher's assessment, and was incredibly proud to have pulled off the same attack as his brother. The unexpected violence of the event, far more than he'd expected, coupled with the staring eyes of the soldiers, and his teachers overabundance of excitement, were just too much at once for him.

He turned away from all of it as his hands covered his ears and he hunched down a bit.

"And you didn't even need a life or death situation to make it happen!" Veliry exclaimed excitedly from somewhere behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y44pia/wait_is_this_just_gate_241/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (240/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James's explosive style is very obviously modeled after Bakugo from MHA.

Joey's personality is based on being a cross between Lemillion and Amajiki. I HAVE SPOKEN!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"So they're men?" Kai asked uncertainly. "That is.... armor?"

"Yes." James answered as he continued to float in the air. "They're called..... actually I don't remember their official name. Most people call them Muck Marchers. Or Great Value Brand Spartans."

"Spartans?" Kai wondered.

"Not important." James replied with a shake of his head. "But, they're not golems."

"That.... armor... is so slim." Kai said. "How do they fit inside of it? It must be thinner than parchment."

"That's the kind of info that guys at my level of the military don't get to learn." James said. "Top secret type stuff. There's theories. Some of the crazies say that it's alien tech. Some say that it's nano-tech."

"Aliens?" Kai asked curiously.

James ignored it. He didn't have the energy to explain E.T. to a dark elf spider wizard.

"The theory that makes the most sense though is that they're some kind of cyborgs." He said instead. "That they're all brains in jars or something similar."

"Cyborgs?" Kai asked, still confused.

"Blendings of man and machine." James said as if that was all there was to it.

Kai stared at him for a moment.

"Okay." James said, realizing that he was going to fast. "You ever have someone lose a hand or leg or something?"

Kai looked at James's wolf hand for a moment.

"Fair." James said. "But like.... Without literal divine intervention. And in a way that they can't get it reattached." He said, remembering how Gixelle had had her hand reattached after the Grabber battle.

"Yes." Kai replied.

"Okay. And they usually get a peg leg or something right? Or a simple wooden hand or something similar?" James continued.

"We use crystals down here. But I get your meaning." Kai said.

"Okay. Now, you ever have a mage or someone enchant that prosthetic so that it can move in a more life-like manner?" James asked.

Kai wobbled a bit. "I've heard of it." He admitted. "It's difficult and expensive. And the people that can do it tend not to be easy to find."

"Also... totally fair." James said. "But that's basically what a cyborg is. It's someone who has parts of their body replaced by artificial body parts that can recreate the original function passably. We just do it with technology instead of magic."

"This is all very far fetched." Kai said with furrowed eyebrows.

"I'm a gun wielding combat mage from another dimension, whose marrying a gorgeous fantasy princess, and is supposedly fated to save this world. And you're a midnight black elf... prince thing.... that controls spiders. And we're currently discussing the death of a clan of sand mage dwarves at the hands of things you thought were golems that are actually super advanced robo-warriors that are ALSO from another dimension.... My dimension precisely." James said. Then he made an exaggerated sweep of his head to gesture at the room. "While we're sitting inside a giant amethyst castle tower in an underground fortress that is also made of amethyst." He tilted his head a bit. "Far fetched seems to be the name of the game."

"It's actually a combination of amethyst and topaz." Kai replied.

"Yes." James said. He didn't know enough about geology for that to mean anything to him. "That makes this place sooo much more believable.

"You've made your point." Kai said flatly.

"So look." James said. "I'm sorry about the dwarves..... And the spiders you lost. But I need to get to the surface and warn Princess Amina and my comrade about what they're potentially flying into before it's too late and they end up like me. And we need to dodge the Muck Marchers while we do it. Can you help me?"

There was a soft twang from Kai's instrument, James suddenly felt several spiders crawl onto his neck. He stiffened and gulped in surprise.

"You swear on your life that you had nothing to do with these.... things... slaughtering the dwarves?" Kai asked, suddenly stern again.

"I know what they are... more or less." James said as he felt one of the spiders shift. "And we're TECHNICALLY serving the same military.... also more or less." He swallowed nervously. "But I'm not in charge of them. I had no idea they were even here until you showed them to me. And I have NO... idea... why... they're being so damn aggro."

Kai looked him in the eyes as he pleaded his case.

"Will they be able to find you?" Kai asked, not releasing James as he floated closer.

James wondered that himself.

"Probably." He said after a moment's thought. "On my world they're the military version of the boogeyman." Kai looked at him curiously. "Amina told me this world has something similar. A Stew Wight? I don't know what the Deep Dark's version is. But that kinda fairy tale creature used to scare kids into behaving. That one that your brain can't get rid of even as an adult even though logically it doesn't make any sense."

Kai nodded understanding.

"These guys are the war version of that thing." James continued. "Details are kept secret by our government. Some stories are probably exaggerated. Some are probably even fake. But nobody knows which ones are which. And even if you eliminate almost all of em. The ones left behind would still make them damn scary." He swallowed again. "But if anyone from my world can not only find their way through the Deep Dark, but also fight off the things in it. It's probably them. And they have stuff that would make tracking us easier than you think."

Again, Kai looked him in the eyes as he said this. Then his eyes glanced down at the spiders still resting on James's throat.

He played a soft strum on his instrument. Before James knew it he was sitting on the side of a soft bed, his limbs and body released from their unseen restraints. He felt himself over with his hands, ignoring the dull throbbing that ached through his whole body as he did. There was no sign that the spiders had ever been there.

Then he realized that his clothes were different. Made of a material that felt like nothing he'd ever felt before, and as he looked down he saw that they were different hues of green and brown that somewhat mimicked the gear he'd been wearing while flying.

"Did you.... change my clothes?" He asked.

Kai held a hand up and James's bag floated into it again. He reached in and pulled out something that looked like a cross between a Ghillie suit and a horror movie villain's leather jacket.

"Your clothes were more badly damaged than you were." Kai replied simply. "I repaired the other stuff. But... leather tends not to look too good when stitched that extensively."

That reminded James of his injuries. He reached his hand into the new shirt and felt his chest.

They were fine. So small that he might not have noticed them if he'd had more body hair than he did. But his body was a patchwork of fine, spider silk, stitches.

He sagged with the realization.

"How bad was I?" He asked.

Kai looked at him with pity. "When the dwarves brought you to me I thought you were already dead." He admitted. "Your survival is nothing short of miraculous. The fact that you're up and talking? And so soon?" He tilted his head. "It makes me wonder if maybe you're getting MORE divine intervention." He looked up warily. "Though. Hopefully not from the same source." He said in a startlingly harsh whisper.

\----------

Pneumatic punch. Joey reminded himself as he focused on the energy flowing through his hands. James calls it a pneumatic punch. You understand pneumatics. Small area, high pressure, quick burst. Dummy's twenty feet away. Rusty metal armor.

Veliry, eyes glowing, watched him from the side of the training yard. "Good control." She said under her breath as her student stood, clothes flapping in the unseen wind, only a few yards away.

Joey took a step forward, eyes still closed, as his arm swept around him in a circle. He didn't know why, but emulating the old Air Bender show his father had shown him and his brother, felt natural to do.

As he brought his hand forward and swung it at the dummy, he opened his eyes and released the energy.

"Hah!" He exclaimed as he did.

The center of the dummy's chest exploded away from him in a blast of straw, wood splinters, and metal fragmentation.

Then, a moment later, a foot wide hole punched through the wooden back wall some ten feet behind it.

Then there was a yell as a cloud of dust and debris appeared at the base of the castle wall some twenty feet behind that, causing a passing soldier to jump out of the way. Several of the guards on top rushed to peer over the side of the wall in confusion.

Joey stood, frozen in place, with wide eyes. His hand was still in the outstretched position it had been when he'd released the attack.

Veliry, eyes still glowing, was wearing an incredibly similar look of shock as she looked at the destruction her pupil had just caused.

Joey lowered his hand as he slowly bent down to look through the hole in the wooden barrier. One of the planks it was made of clattered to the ground as he did and he winced. Behind it there was a massive indentation in the stone of the castle wall, and a pile of loose rubble beneath it and scattered outward a bit.

He looked up at the guards, who all had confused or angry looks on their face. Without realizing it, his hands went up to cover his ears.

"Sorry." He said weakly as he turned to walk over to Veliry.

Veliry had the opposite kind of reaction.

"Joey?" She asked as he neared her. "That was... INCREDIBLE!"

Joey quickly turned away and froze as his teacher began eagerly jumping up and down in excitement. She quickly flew over to the stone wall and began inspecting the damage to it, completely oblivious of the glares from the royal soldiers.

Even though he agreed with his teacher's assessment, and was incredibly proud to have pulled off the same attack as his brother. The unexpected violence of the event, far more than he'd expected, coupled with the staring eyes of the soldiers, and his teachers overabundance of excitement, were just too much at once for him.

He turned away from all of it as his hands covered his ears and he hunched down a bit.

"And you didn't even need a life or death situation to make it happen!" Veliry exclaimed excitedly from somewhere behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y44nsc/wait_is_this_just_gate_241/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (239/?)

Previous

Writer's note:

ROLL FOR PERSUASION!!! AT DISADVANTAGE!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"Sooooo." James began. "When you say that golems killed the dwarves. What do you mean?"

"Precisely what I said." Kai said with a slight scowl on his face. James felt his head pulled back by the unseen strands holding it in place. He also began rotating in the air, and felt things moving around his feet.

"Am I being..... cocooned?" He asked with a hint of fear.

"Worry about that later." Kai said sternly. "WHO... is following you?"

"My fiance and my.... subordinate... technically." James answered as he felt his head being angled further back, exposing his neck uncomfortably.

"Not golems?"

"Not unless the Agency is making attempt number five hundred to kill me." James replied. His feet felt like they'd been saran wrapped as he tried to struggle for movement. "And they SHOULDN'T have any weapons like my rifle. Not unless they really are dimension hopping."

"And why would the Agency bother with killing a human like you?" Kai asked.

"Because I've pissed them off. Because my fiance is a princess. Because I killed the Grinner and fucked up their plans. Hell, maybe just because I'm the summoned hero. Or maybe MY government has gone full villain mode and made some kind of deal with them." James said frantically as he felt the spiders finish wrapping his calves and move up to his knees.

He was surprised at the last statement. He'd never thought of it before. But now that he'd said it, it did sound like something he needed to worry about.

Suddenly, as Kai played a discordant note, James stopped spinning. He felt the spiders stop their progress on his legs.

"Did you just say that you're the summoned hero?" Kai asked, his formerly aggressive tone set aside in favor of curiosity.

"Uh.... yeah." James said. "You've been through my bag apparently. My medallion is in there."

He heard Kai rustling through his belongings. He didn't like the idea of someone going through his stuff. But he also wasn't in a position to complain.

A chord played and James found himself mostly upright as Kai held up the jade green piece of royal jewelry in question.

"Okay." The elf said as he looked past it at James. "That confirms at least that part. It still doesn't explain why those golems had weapons like yours."

As if by magic, and James realized it probably was, the rifle lowered from the ceiling back into Kai's hands.

The elf grabbed it by its pistol grip and pointed the barrel at him.

James's worry dissolved as he became angry.

"DON'T....FUCKING....AIM. THAT. AT. ME." He said, enunciating each word harshly as he did.

Kai flinched back slightly at the sudden change in his prisoner's tone. Hesitantly, he released the weapon and it floated sideways and pressed to the wall.

"So you do know how it operates." He said.

James attempted to cock his head to the side, but his restraints prevented it.

"How do YOU... know how it operates?" He asked back.

"I witnessed it myself. Not firsthand, technically. But close enough." Kai answered.

James's eyebrows furrowed at the statement. "You saw them being used." He asked. "What? Like.... you fought these.... golems?"

Kai held a hand up and a black and brown furred spider the size of a cat lowered gently onto it.

"Not.... directly." Kai admitted. "But I was there."

James gulped at the sight of the massive arachnid.

"Okay." He said. "I know what the golems I'm thinking of look like. But can you show me what these ones looked like?" He asked. "Can.... can these things.... do visual stuff?"

Kai raised an eyebrow and seemed to almost scoff.

"Of course they can." He said. "I'm called the Weaver for a reason."

"I thought you were the Prince of Eyes or whatever those other two called you." James said curiously. "I wasn't hallucinating that, was I?"

Kai's eyebrow raised up even higher. "You remember that?" He asked. "You are remarkably resistant to venom." He said softly. "Must be the arm."

James didn't notice the comment as he watched a set of small, fast moving, spiders begin weaving a formation of multicolored web threads in front of him into an almost holographic display. The motions of the small arachnids was mesmerizing, like watching a 3d printer time-lapse video.

Then he began to realize what they were showing him.

"Oh fuck." He said as the image gained clarity.

"What is it?" Kai asked. "Are those your friends?"

"No." James replied grimly. "But if they're in this world now. Then we've got bigger problems than I realized." He struggled to turn his head to look past the three dimensional image at Kai. After a moment he sighed. "Can you let my head move?" Kai played a note and James felt a release. He turned and looked at the elf. "Tell me you put some serious distance between us and them." He said with a look of concern. "Also; they're not golems."

Kai's head tilted a bit just as there came a faint ringing resonance from nearby.

"Sporesman here." Said a woman's voice that sounded loud enough to be nearby, but also echoed like they were in a cave. "As summoned."

"Just curious." James added as he looked around a bit more. "What the fuck is this room made of?"

\-------------------------

"Okay." Vickers said as he and Amina hovered on their griffins, Vickers looking down at the valley nearly two miles beneath them. "Think I know what happened to Choi."

"What?" Amina asked eagerly. "Do you see him?"

"Nah." Vickers said. "But... I got eyes on the base. And I think I see what might've caused him to not check in, although I hope I'm wrong." He pointed at a series of small rectangular shapes that formed a large ring around the camp.

She lifted her looking glass to her eye as Vickers placed his rifle back on his shoulder and retrieved an odd looking looking glass of his own from one of his bags.

"This'll make their sensors freak out." He said under his breath.

She looked through her glass, down at the camp below. There were several tents that looked just like any travelers tents you might see in the country. But scattered randomly between them were much more difficult to spot shapes of some kind. They blended in with the sand beneath them almost too well and had hard to define edges.

"Those camouflaged tents are ours." Vickers said as he saw her focusing. "They have these nets that are coated in a weak adhesive. They rub em all over the sand so it sticks to em. Then they place em OVER the tents. Makes em hard to spot. Helps with heat dissipation. But it works in almost any environment."

Amina considered the idea. Veliry would love to hear about it. It was simple, quick, and much more effective than expected.

But she had to set those thoughts aside. She was a General, yes. But right now her love was missing.

"See that ring they made around the camp? Looks like a couple miles out on all sides." Vickers asked as he panned the device around.

She adjusted her glass and looked at them curiously.

"Those look similar to the vehicle James arrived to this world in." She said after a moment.

"Yeah." Vickers agreed. "Same chassis. Just ten feet longer and with deploy-able support braces. See those two massive sets of tubes on top? The ones that are pointed right at us?"

"Is that what those are?" She asked.

"Yeah." He said grimly.

He looked at the readout on his device and then pointed it straight down. He pulled out his tablet and pulled up a program that Amina recognized. James had called it a calculator, though she didn't understand how it worked. After a moment he turned back, thinking hard.

"Wanna say their maximum range is like... three and a half miles.... maybe four." He said. "We're sitting at just over that." He turned to her. "We can't go any closer." He said. "Not on our birds anyways."

"Why not?" She asked.

"Those are M.F.F.V.'s." He said as if that was an answer. "Don't worry about what those letters mean. You can call em Miffy's if you want."

"Okay?" She said curiously. "What's a Miffy?"

Vickers sighed and his face turned downcast.

"It's an aerial interception system." He said. "Those tubes that they're pointing at us are actually massive rotary cannons." He used his hand to jiggle his rifle a bit. "Like one of these, only about a hundred times bigger, and capable of shooting a few thousand rounds a minute. Bullets are the size of.... I don't know, that dagger on your hip maybe."

She looked down at the dagger in question. She knew what all the words he'd said meant. But what did they have to do with James?

"They shoot down planes. Missiles. Incoming artillery." Vickers continued, his face darkening with each word. "And probably guys that fly like missiles too."

Then she understood his meaning.

"No." She said in a hiss.

She was about to dive when Vickers' hand grabbed her shoulder.

"No." He echoed, only much more sternly. He pointed down at the vehicles in question. "They already see us." He said as she glared at him. "They know we're here. They also know that I just ranged em. Those things can detect range finders like this one." He said while holding up the device he'd been using. "Only reason they aint knocked us out of the sky is because we're just outside of their effective range. We go closer? They turn us into freakin' Swiss cheese."

"And if James went closer?" She asked, almost yelling.

"That's what we gotta find out." He said. "You got a bow and arrow right?" He asked.

Her eyebrows furrowed. "Of course. Why?"

"Grab it." He said. "I got an idea." He began rummaging through his bags.

\----------

The Major watched from over Johannson's shoulder as the two mounted flyers held some kind of conversation.

"You're sure it was a ranging laser?" She asked.

"If it wasn't than the locals have got something close enough for the Miffy's to call it one." He replied as he kept an eye on HIS range readout.

"And they're out of range?" She asked.

"By about a hundred meters ma'am."

"Can you work that?" She asked with a cocked eyebrow.

He thought for a moment. It wouldn't be the hardest shot he'd ever made. "Could." He admitted. "But they're clearly aware of-SHIT!" He interrupted himself as the control panel read an incoming projectile. Then he saw the speed and his head angled a bit in confusion. It was never going to hit anything.

"What?" She asked.

He looked at one of the tracking sensors. The main camera remained fixated on the two riders now that he had control of his reflexes again.

"Looks like... an arrow?" He said in confusion. "Oh hey. It has a white piece of cloth attached to it." He turned back to look at her for a moment. "They.... surrender?"

On the main screen the two riders had turned and were flying away.

"Aaaaand they're leaving?" He turned back to the Major, whose expression bore no sign of confusion.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y3551i/wait_is_this_just_gate_240/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (239/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note:

ROLL FOR PERSUASION!!! AT DISADVANTAGE!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"Sooooo." James began. "When you say that golems killed the dwarves. What do you mean?"

"Precisely what I said." Kai said with a slight scowl on his face. James felt his head pulled back by the unseen strands holding it in place. He also began rotating in the air, and felt things moving around his feet.

"Am I being..... cocooned?" He asked with a hint of fear.

"Worry about that later." Kai said sternly. "WHO... is following you?"

"My fiance and my.... subordinate... technically." James answered as he felt his head being angled further back, exposing his neck uncomfortably.

"Not golems?"

"Not unless the Agency is making attempt number five hundred to kill me." James replied. His feet felt like they'd been saran wrapped as he tried to struggle for movement. "And they SHOULDN'T have any weapons like my rifle. Not unless they really are dimension hopping."

"And why would the Agency bother with killing a human like you?" Kai asked.

"Because I've pissed them off. Because my fiance is a princess. Because I killed the Grinner and fucked up their plans. Hell, maybe just because I'm the summoned hero. Or maybe MY government has gone full villain mode and made some kind of deal with them." James said frantically as he felt the spiders finish wrapping his calves and move up to his knees.

He was surprised at the last statement. He'd never thought of it before. But now that he'd said it, it did sound like something he needed to worry about.

Suddenly, as Kai played a discordant note, James stopped spinning. He felt the spiders stop their progress on his legs.

"Did you just say that you're the summoned hero?" Kai asked, his formerly aggressive tone set aside in favor of curiosity.

"Uh.... yeah." James said. "You've been through my bag apparently. My medallion is in there."

He heard Kai rustling through his belongings. He didn't like the idea of someone going through his stuff. But he also wasn't in a position to complain.

A chord played and James found himself mostly upright as Kai held up the jade green piece of royal jewelry in question.

"Okay." The elf said as he looked past it at James. "That confirms at least that part. It still doesn't explain why those golems had weapons like yours."

As if by magic, and James realized it probably was, the rifle lowered from the ceiling back into Kai's hands.

The elf grabbed it by its pistol grip and pointed the barrel at him.

James's worry dissolved as he became angry.

"DON'T....FUCKING....AIM. THAT. AT. ME." He said, enunciating each word harshly as he did.

Kai flinched back slightly at the sudden change in his prisoner's tone. Hesitantly, he released the weapon and it floated sideways and pressed to the wall.

"So you do know how it operates." He said.

James attempted to cock his head to the side, but his restraints prevented it.

"How do YOU... know how it operates?" He asked back.

"I witnessed it myself. Not firsthand, technically. But close enough." Kai answered.

James's eyebrows furrowed at the statement. "You saw them being used." He asked. "What? Like.... you fought these.... golems?"

Kai held a hand up and a black and brown furred spider the size of a cat lowered gently onto it.

"Not.... directly." Kai admitted. "But I was there."

James gulped at the sight of the massive arachnid.

"Okay." He said. "I know what the golems I'm thinking of look like. But can you show me what these ones looked like?" He asked. "Can.... can these things.... do visual stuff?"

Kai raised an eyebrow and seemed to almost scoff.

"Of course they can." He said. "I'm called the Weaver for a reason."

"I thought you were the Prince of Eyes or whatever those other two called you." James said curiously. "I wasn't hallucinating that, was I?"

Kai's eyebrow raised up even higher. "You remember that?" He asked. "You are remarkably resistant to venom." He said softly. "Must be the arm."

James didn't notice the comment as he watched a set of small, fast moving, spiders begin weaving a formation of multicolored web threads in front of him into an almost holographic display. The motions of the small arachnids was mesmerizing, like watching a 3d printer time-lapse video.

Then he began to realize what they were showing him.

"Oh fuck." He said as the image gained clarity.

"What is it?" Kai asked. "Are those your friends?"

"No." James replied grimly. "But if they're in this world now. Then we've got bigger problems than I realized." He struggled to turn his head to look past the three dimensional image at Kai. After a moment he sighed. "Can you let my head move?" Kai played a note and James felt a release. He turned and looked at the elf. "Tell me you put some serious distance between us and them." He said with a look of concern. "Also; they're not golems."

Kai's head tilted a bit just as there came a faint ringing resonance from nearby.

"Sporesman here." Said a woman's voice that sounded loud enough to be nearby, but also echoed like they were in a cave. "As summoned."

"Just curious." James added as he looked around a bit more. "What the fuck is this room made of?"

\------------------------

"Okay." Vickers said as he and Amina hovered on their griffins, Vickers looking down at the valley nearly two miles beneath them. "Think I know what happened to Choi."

"What?" Amina asked eagerly. "Do you see him?"

"Nah." Vickers said. "But... I got eyes on the base. And I think I see what might've caused him to not check in, although I hope I'm wrong." He pointed at a series of small rectangular shapes that formed a large ring around the camp.

She lifted her looking glass to her eye as Vickers placed his rifle back on his shoulder and retrieved an odd looking looking glass of his own from one of his bags.

"This'll make their sensors freak out." He said under his breath.

She looked through her glass, down at the camp below. There were several tents that looked just like any travelers tents you might see in the country. But scattered randomly between them were much more difficult to spot shapes of some kind. They blended in with the sand beneath them almost too well and had hard to define edges.

"Those camouflaged tents are ours." Vickers said as he saw her focusing. "They have these nets that are coated in a weak adhesive. They rub em all over the sand so it sticks to em. Then they place em OVER the tents. Makes em hard to spot. Helps with heat dissipation. But it works in almost any environment."

Amina considered the idea. Veliry would love to hear about it. It was simple, quick, and much more effective than expected.

But she had to set those thoughts aside. She was a General, yes. But right now her love was missing.

"See that ring they made around the camp? Looks like a couple miles out on all sides." Vickers asked as he panned the device around.

She adjusted her glass and looked at them curiously.

"Those look similar to the vehicle James arrived to this world in." She said after a moment.

"Yeah." Vickers agreed. "Same chassis. Just ten feet longer and with deploy-able support braces. See those two massive sets of tubes on top? The ones that are pointed right at us?"

"Is that what those are?" She asked.

"Yeah." He said grimly.

He looked at the readout on his device and then pointed it straight down. He pulled out his tablet and pulled up a program that Amina recognized. James had called it a calculator, though she didn't understand how it worked. After a moment he turned back, thinking hard.

"Wanna say their maximum range is like... three and a half miles.... maybe four." He said. "We're sitting at just over that." He turned to her. "We can't go any closer." He said. "Not on our birds anyways."

"Why not?" She asked.

"Those are M.F.F.V.'s." He said as if that was an answer. "Don't worry about what those letters mean. You can call em Miffy's if you want."

"Okay?" She said curiously. "What's a Miffy?"

Vickers sighed and his face turned downcast.

"It's an aerial interception system." He said. "Those tubes that they're pointing at us are actually massive rotary cannons." He used his hand to jiggle his rifle a bit. "Like one of these, only about a hundred times bigger, and capable of shooting a few thousand rounds a minute. Bullets are the size of.... I don't know, that dagger on your hip maybe."

She looked down at the dagger in question. She knew what all the words he'd said meant. But what did they have to do with James?

"They shoot down planes. Missiles. Incoming artillery." Vickers continued, his face darkening with each word. "And probably guys that fly like missiles too."

Then she understood his meaning.

"No." She said in a hiss.

She was about to dive when Vickers' hand grabbed her shoulder.

"No." He echoed, only much more sternly. He pointed down at the vehicles in question. "They already see us." He said as she glared at him. "They know we're here. They also know that I just ranged em. Those things can detect range finders like this one." He said while holding up the device he'd been using. "Only reason they aint knocked us out of the sky is because we're just outside of their effective range. We go closer? They turn us into freakin' Swiss cheese."

"And if James went closer?" She asked, almost yelling.

"That's what we gotta find out." He said. "You got a bow and arrow right?" He asked.

Her eyebrows furrowed. "Of course. Why?"

"Grab it." He said. "I got an idea." He began rummaging through his bags.

\----------

The Major watched from over Johannson's shoulder as the two mounted flyers held some kind of conversation.

"You're sure it was a ranging laser?" She asked.

"If it wasn't than the locals have got something close enough for the Miffy's to call it one." He replied as he kept an eye on HIS range readout.

"And they're out of range?" She asked.

"By about a hundred meters ma'am."

"Can you work that?" She asked with a cocked eyebrow.

He thought for a moment. It wouldn't be the hardest shot he'd ever made. "Could." He admitted. "But they're clearly aware of-SHIT!" He interrupted himself as the control panel read an incoming projectile. Then he saw the speed and his head angled a bit in confusion. It was never going to hit anything.

"What?" She asked.

He looked at one of the tracking sensors. The main camera remained fixated on the two riders now that he had control of his reflexes again.

"Looks like... an arrow?" He said in confusion. "Oh hey. It has a white piece of cloth attached to it." He turned back to look at her for a moment. "They.... surrender?"

On the main screen the two riders had turned and were flying away.

"Aaaaand they're leaving?" He turned back to the Major, whose expression bore no sign of confusion.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y352px/wait_is_this_just_gate_240/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (238/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hope yall enjoyed the long weekend (those who had one). I know I did. Downside is that my place also got the years first snow. So.... yaaaaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James fought his way to consciousness in the pitch black of the Deep Dark. His mind felt like mush as he swam in and out of coherency. The fact that he couldn't see anything, and seemed to be floating, didn't help him latch onto anything that might be an anchor point to latch onto as he felt himself pulling out of the venom induced haze.

"Greetings Prince of Eyes." An unfamiliar woman's voice said. James struggled to focus on it. "I take it that the Prince of Webs was informed of your approach?"

"Of course. And he understands that it is under duress and with a ward under my care." Kai replied.

Prince? James wondered, though the thought felt like wet sand flowing between his fingers.

"We have heard a great commotion. Was that you?" Another voice asked, though they were heavily accented.

"Parts of it." Kai responded. "Though, most of it was caused by a clan of dwarves and their attackers. The ones that I am currently hoping to evade."

"And your ward?" The first voice asked.

"A human. Badly injured. The dwarves asked me to mend him to the best of my abilities." Kai said simply.

"Why?" The second voice asked.

"Because the ones that killed them also attacked him." Kai said.

"You have always been the most generous of the Princes." The second voice said. "The others would have let him die."

"And would have saved themselves only moments of their millennia of life." Kai said. "He wasn't far off from it when I received him."

"Come." Said the first voice. "As is custom, you have the Count's Quarters. We'll fetch the Sporesman."

"Thank you." Kai replied. "He is stable enough for now. They can take their time. I have some questions for my ward. And he's waking up, so now is a perfect time."

"Noooo..." James mumbled through numb lips. "Noooo more... spider bites." He said weakly.

James got the sense that the two other voice's owners were staring at him in surprise, though he couldn't see them. Then Kai spoke again.

"See?" He asked.

"Did you use a dream weaver to put him under?" Asked the first voice. "Looks like a weaver's bite."

"I did." Kai admitted.

"How in the hells is he waking up?" The first voice asked curiously. "And why's his arm like that?"

"He is.... different." Kai said uncertainly. "Hence... the questions."

"Understood." Said the second voice. "You know where you're going." They said, less like a question and more like a statement.

"Of course." Kai replied.

"Then at your leisure sir." The second voice affirmed.

"Thank you." Kai said warmly. Then James felt himself move. "Come James. I know you have questions. We'll get to them soon enough."

James slurred something in response, though even he wasn't sure what. Then things got hazy and hard to focus on again, though not as deeply.

\----------

"No spiders in site." Five said as she swept the hallway they'd just come up from.

Driscoll didn't respond.

"Fuck'd you use thermite for you sonofabitch?" Doc muttered under his breath as he continued treating Rodriguez. "Fuckin' spiders made us eat it. Should've known."

Driscoll ignored this. Doc always got uppity when he was dealing with an injury.

The fact that he was right only made it worse.

"Johnson." He said instead, as he switched Doc's volume down to minimum. "You and Carroll at the entrance?"

"Carroll is." Johnson answered. "I'm already on my way back."

"Acknowledged." Driscoll said, hearing the barely audible vitriol spewing from doc's set as a sort of white noise. "Carroll. You good?"

"Yeah boss." She replied. "Toolies are already on the way. Had two of em bring burners."

"Good girl." He said, not hiding the pleasure in his voice. "I was just about to tell you to relay that."

"I saw the fight." She said, instead of accepting the praise like she normally would. "Rod's fucked up, aint he?"

Driscoll took a deep breath, or as deep a breath as his physiology would allow nowadays, as he looked down at where doc was gingerly removing the molten remains of Rodriguez's face plate.

"Yeah." He said simply. He kneeled down next to the badly disfigured Rodriguez and took the mask from Doc's hand. Doc flinched as he quickly turned to look at him. Then accepted the help as he began pulling tools from his arm panel and placing them on his fingers.

Driscoll pressed the mask to the heavily burned flesh of Rodriguez's face, letting the oxygen rich, slightly anesthetized, air flow through it as Doc began to work on the flesh around the small rubber mask. Rodriguez flinched. Or rather, his face flinched in an almost grimace like expression as the small mask pressed in place. Then he began to relax as he took deep lungfuls of the air it provided.

Doc pressed a small rubbery pad over Rodriguez's ruined left eye, then injected a dark blue fluid into the space beneath. Once he was satisfied that the job was complete, he did the same to the right eye. Then he began spraying a combination sealant/antibiotic foam, that was usually reserved for gun shot wounds and amputations, onto the area around the eye patches and mask. Driscoll lifted the mask just long enough for him to spray some onto the edges of it. Then he placed the mask back on as the sealant hardened into a semi-rigid foam. It would hold the mask on until the Toolies could get him.

Doc picked up the discarded face plate of Rodriguez's armor, inspected it for a moment, then used his suits fingers to break out the polymer mask and reshape some of the edge a bit. After a few moments of work he placed it back on Rodriguez's face, securing the air hose in place with the small channel he'd opened on the edge. He stretched a bit of clear bandage plastic over it, making an approximation of its original visor, then stood up.

"He'll live." Doc said simply. Driscoll hadn't even noticed how silent the channel was until he heard the statement. "They'll have to give him optic interface plugs. But he'll live."

"Good." Driscoll said.

Doc didn't say anything else. He simply walked over to where Johnson had arrived and took two of the burner rigs. They were designed to let the squad cut through anchor chains, submarine hulls, underwater facility hulls and more while underwater. But when used on dry land they could be adjusted into high heat, low range, flamethrowers very easily. Doc quickly placed them on his arms, running their control cables into the ports at his wrist, and turned so Johnson could secure the fuel cylinders to his back and legs. Once that was done he quickly stomped past Driscoll.

Driscoll watched him go silently.

\----------

Amina and Vickers stood on the same peak that James had only a few days prior. Vickers looked out at the vast expanse of desert below through his rifle's scope.

"I don't like this." He said after a few minutes.

"Why?" She asked with a hint of worry.

"I don't know. I just don't." He replied. "It's just... too quiet for me."

"I thought you liked quiet?" She asked.

"I do." He agreed. "But this..." He shrugged. "I don't know. Like I said. It's TOO quiet."

They stood that way for several minutes as they continued to look around.

"He'd have found this." She said, finally braking the silence. "There's no way he missed it."

Vickers just nodded as he continued looking around. Something ate at him. Something at the edge of his mind, but he couldn't figure out what.

He tried to sus it out for another minute or so when Tom squeaked with a yawn. He looked at his faithful griffin for a moment as Tom stretched and sat down.

Then he looked back out at the desert.

At the sky.

"Hey." He said. "This place got birds? Or is it supposed to?" He asked. He lifted his rifle again and began panning around once more, but higher this time.

"A few species of predatory birds. Plus some carrion scavengers. Yes." She answered. "Why?"

Vickers looked around a moment longer. "Any of em impressively large?"

She thought for a moment. "Better question for Marcos really." She admitted. "I think one of the scavengers is large." She held her arms out as if to demonstrate.

He looked and nodded. "Well." He said. "We're pretty far away. But I don't see any."

"Really?" She asked. "None at all?"

"Couldn't even see a single bird. Big. Small. Nothing." He confirmed.

"Strange." She said as she placed her hand on her chin. "But we are far away like you said. Let's get closer."

He stood up, slinging his rifle as he did. "Yeah." He agreed. "But lets go slow." He jerked a thumb over his shoulder at the two griffins. "How high can these things fly?"

\-------------------

"James?" Kai asked as he lightly tapped at James's cheek. "Are you awake?"

James slowly opened his eyes and was startled to see an actual lit room around him. It wasn't lit in the traditional sense that he was used to. No candles or lamps, no torches. There was a fireplace, but its flames were small and relatively weak. They also produced no smoke that he could see, and he couldn't smell them. There were glowing webs all over the ceiling. Kai's doing, he had no doubt.

The room itself was also not normal. For starters it was round. But it also seemed to be made of some kind of opaque, purplish-blue, glass. Or at least that was what the odd web-based lighting made it look like. There were windows, though they were small, and seemed to have a layer of mesh as a barrier between the inside and outside.

"Kai?" He asked. "Where am I?" His head hurt.

"You are in the Koridian fortress town of my people." Kai replied. "Much deeper than you were when I first met you. But you're safe. And your body is almost finished healing."

"Deeper?" He said. Something about that made his head hurt with memory. Without knowing why he added. "Can't go deeper."

Kai looked at him curiously. "Oh. Why's that?" He asked.

James struggled to know why himself. His head pounded, and he felt something move along his forehead, rustling his hair somewhat. He heard a quick chord played by Kai's instrument. Suddenly his forehead felt as though it had an ice-pack pressed to it. It felt divine.

Then he remembered. His hand reached out, though he wasn't sure why.

"Have to warn them." He said, his lips dry and his throat feeling raw. "The desert. They can't fly into it."

Kai nodded, then grabbed something out of James's sight. A moment later he was pressing a small cup of water to James's lips and letting him sip it. It was cool and refreshing, even if it tasted heavily mineralized and earthy.

"You have friends coming for you?" Kai asked.

James nodded as he eagerly drank at the water.

"Do your friends wear armor?" Kai asked. "Carry weapons similar to your own?"

James nodded. "Yes." He said as he licked his lips.

Suddenly something made the ceiling in front of him darken somewhat. James opened his eyes further and, after a moment of regaining his focus, saw his rifle.

"Is this your weapon James." Kai asked, a hint of menace in his voice now.

James looked at him curiously and was surprised to see the formerly serene, angular, elf face hardened and grim.

"It's.... one of them." James answered. "But... how did you get that? It was in my bottomless bag."

Kai held his hand up and a familiar bag swung into it. But unlike the last time James had seen it, now it had a series of fine, and he was sure spider-wrought, stitches holding it together in several places.

"The bottomless bag that the dwarves had to stabilize, and that I had to help them repair lest it eject its contents all over my webs and potentially cause problems?" Kai asked with a tilted head. "Because it was nearly as damaged as you were?"

"Yeah." James admitted. "That's probably accurate."

Kai took the rifle in his hands awkwardly, James wanted to reach out and stop him. But when he did his muscles ached, and he felt the tension of the webbing holding him in place. Kai had restrained him even more intensely than before.

"What is this James?" He asked as he cautiously turned it over. For a brief second he looked down the barrel curiously and James almost screamed at him to drop it.

Instead, he kept calm.

"It's called a rifle." James said. "Do yourself a favor. Don't point that end at yourself." He looked down at the grip of the weapon and was glad to see that Kai was holding it by its stock instead. "And keep your fingers out of that little loop."

Kai pointed at the trigger guard. "Does this set it off?" He asked. "Like a crossbow?"

James tried to nod. But the webs stopped him. Still, Kai got the idea. He released it and it slowly floated up in front of James again, held by unseen web strands.

"Tell me something James." He said as he took a position reminiscent of being in a chair despite there not being one. "Why do you have the same kind of weapon as those Golems that killed all the dwarves? And when you say that you have friends coming for you. Who do you mean?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y2jq4o/wait_is_this_just_gate_239/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (238/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hope yall enjoyed the long weekend (those who had one). I know I did. Downside is that my place also got the years first snow. So.... yaaaaaaaay.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James fought his way to consciousness in the pitch black of the Deep Dark. His mind felt like mush as he swam in and out of coherency. The fact that he couldn't see anything, and seemed to be floating, didn't help him latch onto anything that might be an anchor point to latch onto as he felt himself pulling out of the venom induced haze.

"Greetings Prince of Eyes." An unfamiliar woman's voice said. James struggled to focus on it. "I take it that the Prince of Webs was informed of your approach?"

"Of course. And he understands that it is under duress and with a ward under my care." Kai replied.

Prince? James wondered, though the thought felt like wet sand flowing between his fingers.

"We have heard a great commotion. Was that you?" Another voice asked, though they were heavily accented.

"Parts of it." Kai responded. "Though, most of it was caused by a clan of dwarves and their attackers. The ones that I am currently hoping to evade."

"And your ward?" The first voice asked.

"A human. Badly injured. The dwarves asked me to mend him to the best of my abilities." Kai said simply.

"Why?" The second voice asked.

"Because the ones that killed them also attacked him." Kai said.

"You have always been the most generous of the Princes." The second voice said. "The others would have let him die."

"And would have saved themselves only moments of their millennia of life." Kai said. "He wasn't far off from it when I received him."

"Come." Said the first voice. "As is custom, you have the Count's Quarters. We'll fetch the Sporesman."

"Thank you." Kai replied. "He is stable enough for now. They can take their time. I have some questions for my ward. And he's waking up, so now is a perfect time."

"Noooo..." James mumbled through numb lips. "Noooo more... spider bites." He said weakly.

James got the sense that the two other voice's owners were staring at him in surprise, though he couldn't see them. Then Kai spoke again.

"See?" He asked.

"Did you use a dream weaver to put him under?" Asked the first voice. "Looks like a weaver's bite."

"I did." Kai admitted.

"How in the hells is he waking up?" The first voice asked curiously. "And why's his arm like that?"

"He is.... different." Kai said uncertainly. "Hence... the questions."

"Understood." Said the second voice. "You know where you're going." They said, less like a question and more like a statement.

"Of course." Kai replied.

"Then at your leisure sir." The second voice affirmed.

"Thank you." Kai said warmly. Then James felt himself move. "Come James. I know you have questions. We'll get to them soon enough."

James slurred something in response, though even he wasn't sure what. Then things got hazy and hard to focus on again, though not as deeply.

\------------------------

"No spiders in site." Five said as she swept the hallway they'd just come up from.

Driscoll didn't respond.

"Fuck'd you use thermite for you sonofabitch?" Doc muttered under his breath as he continued treating Rodriguez. "Fuckin' spiders made us eat it. Should've known."

Driscoll ignored this. Doc always got uppity when he was dealing with an injury.

The fact that he was right only made it worse.

"Johnson." He said instead, as he switched Doc's volume down to minimum. "You and Carroll at the entrance?"

"Carroll is." Johnson answered. "I'm already on my way back."

"Acknowledged." Driscoll said, hearing the barely audible vitriol spewing from doc's set as a sort of white noise. "Carroll. You good?"

"Yeah boss." She replied. "Toolies are already on the way. Had two of em bring burners."

"Good girl." He said, not hiding the pleasure in his voice. "I was just about to tell you to relay that."

"I saw the fight." She said, instead of accepting the praise like she normally would. "Rod's fucked up, aint he?"

Driscoll took a deep breath, or as deep a breath as his physiology would allow nowadays, as he looked down at where doc was gingerly removing the molten remains of Rodriguez's face plate.

"Yeah." He said simply. He kneeled down next to the badly disfigured Rodriguez and took the mask from Doc's hand. Doc flinched as he quickly turned to look at him. Then accepted the help as he began pulling tools from his arm panel and placing them on his fingers.

Driscoll pressed the mask to the heavily burned flesh of Rodriguez's face, letting the oxygen rich, slightly anesthetized, air flow through it as Doc began to work on the flesh around the small rubber mask. Rodriguez flinched. Or rather, his face flinched in an almost grimace like expression as the small mask pressed in place. Then he began to relax as he took deep lungfuls of the air it provided.

Doc pressed a small rubbery pad over Rodriguez's ruined left eye, then injected a dark blue fluid into the space beneath. Once he was satisfied that the job was complete, he did the same to the right eye. Then he began spraying a combination sealant/antibiotic foam, that was usually reserved for gun shot wounds and amputations, onto the area around the eye patches and mask. Driscoll lifted the mask just long enough for him to spray some onto the edges of it. Then he placed the mask back on as the sealant hardened into a semi-rigid foam. It would hold the mask on until the Toolies could get him.

Doc picked up the discarded face plate of Rodriguez's armor, inspected it for a moment, then used his suits fingers to break out the polymer mask and reshape some of the edge a bit. After a few moments of work he placed it back on Rodriguez's face, securing the air hose in place with the small channel he'd opened on the edge. He stretched a bit of clear bandage plastic over it, making an approximation of its original visor, then stood up.

"He'll live." Doc said simply. Driscoll hadn't even noticed how silent the channel was until he heard the statement. "They'll have to give him optic interface plugs. But he'll live."

"Good." Driscoll said.

Doc didn't say anything else. He simply walked over to where Johnson had arrived and took two of the burner rigs. They were designed to let the squad cut through anchor chains, submarine hulls, underwater facility hulls and more while underwater. But when used on dry land they could be adjusted into high heat, low range, flamethrowers very easily. Doc quickly placed them on his arms, running their control cables into the ports at his wrist, and turned so Johnson could secure the fuel cylinders to his back and legs. Once that was done he quickly stomped past Driscoll.

Driscoll watched him go silently.

\--------------------

Amina and Vickers stood on the same peak that James had only a few days prior. Vickers looked out at the vast expanse of desert below through his rifle's scope.

"I don't like this." He said after a few minutes.

"Why?" She asked with a hint of worry.

"I don't know. I just don't." He replied. "It's just... too quiet for me."

"I thought you liked quiet?" She asked.

"I do." He agreed. "But this..." He shrugged. "I don't know. Like I said. It's TOO quiet."

They stood that way for several minutes as they continued to look around.

"He'd have found this." She said, finally braking the silence. "There's no way he missed it."

Vickers just nodded as he continued looking around. Something ate at him. Something at the edge of his mind, but he couldn't figure out what.

He tried to sus it out for another minute or so when Tom squeaked with a yawn. He looked at his faithful griffin for a moment as Tom stretched and sat down.

Then he looked back out at the desert.

At the sky.

"Hey." He said. "This place got birds? Or is it supposed to?" He asked. He lifted his rifle again and began panning around once more, but higher this time.

"A few species of predatory birds. Plus some carrion scavengers. Yes." She answered. "Why?"

Vickers looked around a moment longer. "Any of em impressively large?"

She thought for a moment. "Better question for Marcos really." She admitted. "I think one of the scavengers is large." She held her arms out as if to demonstrate.

He looked and nodded. "Well." He said. "We're pretty far away. But I don't see any."

"Really?" She asked. "None at all?"

"Couldn't even see a single bird. Big. Small. Nothing." He confirmed.

"Strange." She said as she placed her hand on her chin. "But we are far away like you said. Let's get closer."

He stood up, slinging his rifle as he did. "Yeah." He agreed. "But lets go slow." He jerked a thumb over his shoulder at the two griffins. "How high can these things fly?"

\----------

"James?" Kai asked as he lightly tapped at James's cheek. "Are you awake?"

James slowly opened his eyes and was startled to see an actual lit room around him. It wasn't lit in the traditional sense that he was used to. No candles or lamps, no torches. There was a fireplace, but its flames were small and relatively weak. They also produced no smoke that he could see, and he couldn't smell them. There were glowing webs all over the ceiling. Kai's doing, he had no doubt.

The room itself was also not normal. For starters it was round. But it also seemed to be made of some kind of opaque, purplish-blue, glass. Or at least that was what the odd web-based lighting made it look like. There were windows, though they were small, and seemed to have a layer of mesh as a barrier between the inside and outside.

"Kai?" He asked. "Where am I?" His head hurt.

"You are in the Koridian fortress town of my people." Kai replied. "Much deeper than you were when I first met you. But you're safe. And your body is almost finished healing."

"Deeper?" He said. Something about that made his head hurt with memory. Without knowing why he added. "Can't go deeper."

Kai looked at him curiously. "Oh. Why's that?" He asked.

James struggled to know why himself. His head pounded, and he felt something move along his forehead, rustling his hair somewhat. He heard a quick chord played by Kai's instrument. Suddenly his forehead felt as though it had an ice-pack pressed to it. It felt divine.

Then he remembered. His hand reached out, though he wasn't sure why.

"Have to warn them." He said, his lips dry and his throat feeling raw. "The desert. They can't fly into it."

Kai nodded, then grabbed something out of James's sight. A moment later he was pressing a small cup of water to James's lips and letting him sip it. It was cool and refreshing, even if it tasted heavily mineralized and earthy.

"You have friends coming for you?" Kai asked.

James nodded as he eagerly drank at the water.

"Do your friends wear armor?" Kai asked. "Carry weapons similar to your own?"

James nodded. "Yes." He said as he licked his lips.

Suddenly something made the ceiling in front of him darken somewhat. James opened his eyes further and, after a moment of regaining his focus, saw his rifle.

"Is this your weapon James." Kai asked, a hint of menace in his voice now.

James looked at him curiously and was surprised to see the formerly serene, angular, elf face hardened and grim.

"It's.... one of them." James answered. "But... how did you get that? It was in my bottomless bag."

Kai held his hand up and a familiar bag swung into it. But unlike the last time James had seen it, now it had a series of fine, and he was sure spider-wrought, stitches holding it together in several places.

"The bottomless bag that the dwarves had to stabilize, and that I had to help them repair lest it eject its contents all over my webs and potentially cause problems?" Kai asked with a tilted head. "Because it was nearly as damaged as you were?"

"Yeah." James admitted. "That's probably accurate."

Kai took the rifle in his hands awkwardly, James wanted to reach out and stop him. But when he did his muscles ached, and he felt the tension of the webbing holding him in place. Kai had restrained him even more intensely than before.

"What is this James?" He asked as he cautiously turned it over. For a brief second he looked down the barrel curiously and James almost screamed at him to drop it.

Instead, he kept calm.

"It's called a rifle." James said. "Do yourself a favor. Don't point that end at yourself." He looked down at the grip of the weapon and was glad to see that Kai was holding it by its stock instead. "And keep your fingers out of that little loop."

Kai pointed at the trigger guard. "Does this set it off?" He asked. "Like a crossbow?"

James tried to nod. But the webs stopped him. Still, Kai got the idea. He released it and it slowly floated up in front of James again, held by unseen web strands.

"Tell me something James." He said as he took a position reminiscent of being in a chair despite there not being one. "Why do you have the same kind of weapon as those Golems that killed all the dwarves? And when you say that you have friends coming for you. Who do you mean?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y2jojr/wait_is_this_just_gate_239/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (237/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Colonel Colt may have made men equal. But Magic made spiders just a tiny MORE equal. And dwarves. And a lot of stuff really.

Enjoy.

\~

Driscoll walked silently through the tunnel roughly fifty yards behind Rodriguez as they stalked through the subterranean labyrinth following the trail of footprints and blood. Behind him, the other six members of the team followed in similar spacing, all sensors synced and set to maximum sensitivity.

"How's it looking in the back?" He asked, whispering even though he didn't need to.

"Same as twenty minutes ago." Carroll replied flatly, not intending offense. "Quiet."

"Same here." Rodriguez said from his position at the front.

"Still no offshoots?" He asked the whole group.

"Nothing big enough to fit people." Johnson chimed in. He was the group navigator, his controls having been synced with the small scuttling drones they'd released before they'd even come in. "Just the occasional rat holes and air flues." He added. "We have lost a few of the scuttlers though."

"Reason?" Driscoll asked.

"Two are stuck in this webbing. They're already working on self extricating, though they're struggling, seems like this stuff is tougher than it looks. Sierra bot seems to have gotten crushed by something. Feed looked like a minor collapse of some rocks it was crawling over."

"Nothing living right?" Driscoll prodded.

"I'd've said if it was." Johnson shot back.

"Not MAGICAL, either.... was it?" Driscoll asked icily.

"You can see the feed if you want boss." Johnson replied. "Plus. How the hell would any of us know that?"

"Just keep us updated Johnson." Rodriguez cut in. "Last thing I want is to get turned into a frog or some shit because you didn't take the time to watch a vid."

"Still don't believe in that magic shit." Five said from her position in the middle of the pack. "Sure they shot some lightning and shit at us when we fought em up top. But there's tons of explanations for that kinda stuff."

"Like?" Doc asked, beating Driscoll to the obvious question.

"I don't know doc." Five replied. "Nanites, or fuckin tesla guns or some kinda sci-fi shit. Hell, you can shoot lightning at people by knocking over a transformer pole back home. And fireballs are easy. It's called a molotov."

"Soo.... no?" Doc countered.

"Fuck yo-"

They all froze and shut up as Rodriguez raised a hand in a fist, causing a fist symbol to appear on their HUDs as well.

"Movement." He said on the radio. "Plus heat and tremors."

"Cover if you got it." Driscoll ordered. "Rod, sensors."

Without saying a word Rodriguez's suit sent the data to theirs and their suits began focusing on the areas indicated by it.

"That aint fuckin right." Doc said after a moment.

"Two and Ten." Driscoll said as Doc pulled up just behind him. He shot his left hand off to the wall on his left and Doc aimed that way. "Rod. Obviously front."

"Yep." Rodriguez said simply as he took a knee, weapon raised.

"How the hell are they IN the walls?" Five asked.

"That stuff that you think was done with nanites, probably." Carroll replied.

"Shut up." Driscoll said harshly. "Fight time."

Their suits kept them from having their ears deafened in the tight confines of the underground quarters. But there was no mistaking the muffled sound of a twelve gauge semi-automatic shotgun beginning to go to work.

Only a moment later the wall that Driscoll had been aimed at exploded toward him. An angry, heavily armored, dwarf wielding an oversized axe launched out of the wall at him.

"FOR CLAN DU-!" They yelled.

Driscoll felt the incredibly minimal recoil of the rifle in his armored hands as he cut the dwarf off. The body fell to the ground in a heap as the axe skidded across the ground toward him. He peeked at the side camera feed in the corner of his display as he got a warning of movement there.

Next to him, doc opened up with his own rifle. Two dwarves collapsed to the ground in a bloody tangle, one of them dropping a short sword as they clutched at their chest. Another muted pop and they went limp.

"We've got action in the re-THE FUCK!" Carroll radioed from the back of the line.

"Report." Driscoll added.

"Motherf-" Carroll said before cutting off.

Driscolls HUD flashed with the notification for a suit compromise from Carroll's armor.

"Carroll report!" He yelled into his comm.

"Fine." Carroll replied in a huff. "Bastards hit me with the goddam tunnel wall. Lost a leg. Sealant's already in place."

"Are you injured?" Doc asked.

"Nah. Missed me. No target visual though. Has to be that magic bullshit." Carroll said with a hint of anger. "Still engaging."

"Moving to reinforce." Johnson said reflexively.

"They can hit hard enough to break our suits?" Doc asked.

"Not the core." Carroll answered. "Only the limbs. I broke my way out with my arms, so it looks like it was just the impact that got it."

"Acknowledged. Take note." Driscoll said.

"NOTED!" The rest of the team said simultaneously.

"Johnson. Get a read on whoever hit her. Keep us informed."

"Got it boss."

Driscoll looked back, not surprised to find two more dead dwarves in the hole he'd been covering. His suits warning sensors and his long drilled reflexes allowing him to engage even as he focused on other parts of the battle field.

"Boss. I'm not getting any more up here." Rodriguez said. "Mag's at a quarter, gonna swap."

"Copy. Doc, your tunnel good?"

"Quieter than yours was." Doc replied.

"What's the situation back there?" Driscoll asked. "And how's mid?"

"Mid's good." Five replied before Johnsons or Carroll could. "No noise here."

"Carrolls hop-scotching." Johnson replied. "Sensors are reading movement in the stone, but no shot."

"Looks like they're falling back, whoever they are." Driscoll said in response. "Doc, you got a crutch?"

"Ya." Doc said simply. Next to him he turned. Driscoll reached over and grabbed the device off of the other suit's back as a panel opened to reveal it. He handed it to Doc. "Conga pass." He said as he tossed it into the darkness. There was a soft clank as it was caught by Devato behind them.

"Crutch en route." Driscoll radioed.

"Fuck." Carroll said. "Hate the crutch."

"Next time don't get a leg broken off in your ass." Five replied.

"FU-"

"Enough." Driscoll said dryly. "Sensors are showing green minus wall boy. Johnson you stay with Carroll until she's mobile again. Try to get that leg back if possible. Once you're ready, take her back for the Toolies then secure the entrance site and wait for us."

"Copy." Johnson said.

"Come on boss. I can still keep up with a crutch." Carroll whinged.

"What happens when a compartment gets compromised and doesn't eject?" He asked.

There were a few seconds of silence that he knew she was probably trying to think of a counter. Instead she simply said, "Understood boss."

"Johnson, send a few scuttlers down these side runs. Then spray-crete em sealed before you leave." He added. "Everyone else, le-"

The raised fist flashed on their screens again. They all raised their weapons and froze in place like before.

"Rodriguez. What the fuck?" Driscoll asked. "More contacts."

"Neither I, nor my sensors understand what is happening in front of me." Rodriguez said in the startlingly eloquent deadpan that Driscoll recognized as his stressed out voice.

Driscoll pulled up the feed from Rodriguez's suit.

"What the fuck?" Five asked, echoing his own thoughts. "Are those fuckin' spiders?"

"Rod. ENGAGE!" Driscoll ordered.

Rodriguez didn't answer. His shotgun did.

\------------------------

Kai's head shot back in the direction of the noise as he felt the frantic plucking vibrate his control harp.

The dwarves were understating these golems. He thought. Such power.

He raised the harp and fully immersed his hand in the strings, winding them around several of his fingers. With his other hand he braced the frame of the harp and pulled it up his arm until it had stretched out and was resting firmly against his skin from elbow to wrist. Its strings forming a lose net around his entire forearm.

The vibrations of his swarm's constant web plucking made his arm feel as though it was humming.

Once the harp had been pressed in place he pulled a small mask from the wall next to him, his spiders having brought it to him from his storage. He placed the mask to his face and smoke began to flow over his body, obscuring it and making him even harder to see.

The eight gemstone eyes on the mask melded into the skin beneath the mask. He closed his natural eyes, his birth eyes, and opened the magical ones that were now a part of him.

He saw the battle from the eyes of his children.

No. My swarm. He reminded himself calmly. You are not in charge here.

He looked down at James's unconscious body from the eyes of the carrier spiders pulling him through the tunnel.

A little further. Then I'll have to hide you and hope for the best.

He flexed his arm and twitched his secondary thumb. He and James continued moving down the tunnel. Another twitch and he took a seated position as the spiders carried him.

Then he switched his view to the part of the swarm that was engaged with the golems.

Let's see how you like a bit of control. He thought as he saw the large metal creature blast holes into the ranks of his brothers and sisters. His children.

No. He reminded himself again.

"My army." He whispered to himself as he and his ward continued moving down the hall.

\----------

"Boss?" Rodriguez asked from beside him. "You seeing this."

"Ironically." Driscoll said, a hint of frustration on his voice. "It's kind of hard to miss Rod."

The two of them, plus Doc, stood in the tunnel, as close to next to each other as the limited space would allow, firing into the swelling mass of spiders and webbing that was beginning to flood the area.

Before their attacks had been gouging massive holes in the arachnid swarm in front of them. Rodriguez's shotgun had been cutting massive cones of gore in the mess of legs and eyes and webs that had been rapidly encroaching on their space.

Now the shots were hitting mostly empty air and stone. The spiders seeming to dodge out of the way, or at the very least thinning out any time one of the weapons fired. They were still taking damage, but they were minimizing it as best as they could for a mass of, presumably, dumb animals.

"Are spiders supposed to be capable of that kind of shit?" Doc asked in an angry tone that became his go to during a fight he wasn't enjoying.

"On Earth? Fuck no." Driscoll replied. "Too bad that aint where we are."

"What I'd do for a can of raid." Rodriguez weighed in. "Mag's almost dry, gonna switch to the heat."

"Kinda wish you'd already done that." Doc answered. "Covering."

Rodriguez dropped to a knee as the other two continued firing, their view cleared significantly by the lack of a third in their way. They also stopped their rearward march so that they wouldn't leave Rodriguez behind.

"Loaded." Rodriguez said as he hit his slide release. "Spiders, meet fire."

Driscoll watched as his display automatically darkened to save his eyes from the sudden introduction of fire and sparking metal that was the shotgun's dragon's breath rounds.

He smiled as the spiders, despite attempting to dodge, caught aflame.

"Hell yeah." Five said from behind them. "Nice."

The smile was quickly robbed from Driscoll's face as he saw the spiders cover their flaming kin in some kind of spray that quickly doused the majority of the flames. Then they swarmed over the dead and dying charred arachnids and surged back forward.

"Hit em again." He said.

His HUD dimmed again. But this time for only a moment. The spiders dodged as best as they could again, but this time they also preemptively sprayed whatever they'd used to stop the previous conflagration.

"What the fuck man?" Rodriguez said as he readied another shot.

"Hold." Driscoll ordered up. "Pop your black panel."

Rodriguez arrested his movement and a panel opened on his back.

Driscoll reached in and grabbed the small ball with the red band and pulled the tab off it's top.

"Fall back." He said.

"Shit boss." Someone said.

Then he hurled the thermite charge down the hall into the mass of arachnids.

It stopped mid air as it collided with an unseen bit of webbing.

"SHIT!" He yelled. "DOWN!"

"What the fu-" Doc yelled before he instinctively jumped away from the charge.

Then the charge detonated spraying jets of firework-like fire in a spinning pattern as it tried to propel itself but was held in place by the webbing.

Rodriguez began to scream.

\----------

Kai winced as the light and heat of the attack pounded into his mind from thousands of eyes and bodies and minds. His jaw clenched hard enough to make his teeth ache.

At his side his hand spasmed and jerked as it worked the controls of his harp wrapped arm.

Away from whatever that just was. He thought, despite knowing that that was not how his bond worked. He plucked the commands with his hand. Stay away if they retrieve any more of those.

Then as his swarm's vision came back in with the arrival of new spiders he saw that the enemies had managed to harm themselves from his webbing's intervention.

His hand lifted as he aimed it in front of him and his vision surged toward the three golems, one of whom was on the ground clutching at its face.

NOW!

\----------

Driscoll latched onto Rodriguez's shoulder and hooked up the recovery cable to the loop there. On his HUD Rodriguez's vitals were flashing read as his heartbeat pounded away and his blood pressure spike. The fact that it was doing so despite his suit's interventions and self medicating mechanisms told him how much pain and fear had to be occurring in the man's mind right now.

"Boss." Five said as she pulled up next to him.

"Get his other side!" Driscoll snarled. "Get him back."

"BOSS!" Doc cut in."

"WHAT!" He snapped back.

"They're coming back!"

Driscoll's feed snapped to the writhing mass that, sure enough, was rushing at them.

He dropped his rifle, letting it hang from its retention lanyard.

He picked up the shotgun and ripped its lanyard and aimed it down the hallway.

The spiders tried to dodge. He engaged the "Simulate Automatic" option on his firing hand.

As the weapon rose to where he wanted it, his finger became a blur.

He intentionally lowered the slider on the sound dampening control a few spaces.

BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BOOM!

CLI-CLI-CLI-CLI-CLICK.

Reported the shotgun as he almost immediately emptied what was left in its magazine.

"MOVE!" He commanded as his feed showed the spiders getting sprayed and torched with no time to dodge the rapid-fire attack.

And the team, for the first time in years, maybe decades, fell back in retreat.

\----------

Kai faltered, and felt beads of sweat drenching the back of his web shirt and forehead as he felt the massacre that his swarm had just been subjected to.

"Shit." He said in a tone of panic as he waited for his view of the scene to return.

"Kuuhh..." Moaned James from beside him, startling him a bit.

"What?" He wondered in surprise. "How are you waking up?" He asked.

"Kuuukai?" James tried to ask.

"Not now Mr. James." He said as more of his spiders made it to the fight and gave him his sight back. He was happy to see the golems retreating away from where they'd just been, their downed comrade dragged between them.

Good. He thought. Let's pick up some distance before they realize we're not attacking.

He pulled the mask from his face. It made a slight sucking noise as it retrieved its gemstone eyes.

His hand commanded the swarm to seal the tunnel before they joined him. In the distance they began to gather their dead as well as the stones loosened in the fight. And they began their work.

He told the carrier spiders to move faster as he and James glided through the tunnel.

\---------------

A few minutes after Driscoll and the others had left, a small tunnel opened up near the wall that the spiders had erected. Out of it an angry, tear soaked, blonde dwarf crawled.

She looked around at the burn marks and the handful of forgotten dead spiders that were still there.

She looked down the tunnel in the direction the metal murderers had retreated. Then back at the spider wall.

She bent down and picked up the large metal contraption that had brought death to her brothers before. She sniffed at the odd, shiny, metal tube at the top of it, and the opening that smelled so chemically pungent. She also picked up and inspected one of the small red and brass cylinders that it had ejected after each attack.

"Bastards." She said softly.

Her hands glowed, and another wall formed between her and the retreating enemy's path. Once it was done, she lowered back down and began crawling back through her tunnel. Her enemy's weapon clutched angrily in her hands.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/y1hwt7/wait_is_this_just_gate_238/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (237/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Colonel Colt may have made men equal. But Magic made spiders just a tiny MORE equal. And dwarves. And a lot of stuff really.

Enjoy.

\~

Driscoll walked silently through the tunnel roughly fifty yards behind Rodriguez as they stalked through the subterranean labyrinth following the trail of footprints and blood. Behind him, the other six members of the team followed in similar spacing, all sensors synced and set to maximum sensitivity.

"How's it looking in the back?" He asked, whispering even though he didn't need to.

"Same as twenty minutes ago." Carroll replied flatly, not intending offense. "Quiet."

"Same here." Rodriguez said from his position at the front.

"Still no offshoots?" He asked the whole group.

"Nothing big enough to fit people." Johnson chimed in. He was the group navigator, his controls having been synced with the small scuttling drones they'd released before they'd even come in. "Just the occasional rat holes and air flues." He added. "We have lost a few of the scuttlers though."

"Reason?" Driscoll asked.

"Two are stuck in this webbing. They're already working on self extricating, though they're struggling, seems like this stuff is tougher than it looks. Sierra bot seems to have gotten crushed by something. Feed looked like a minor collapse of some rocks it was crawling over."

"Nothing living right?" Driscoll prodded.

"I'd've said if it was." Johnson shot back.

"Not MAGICAL, either.... was it?" Driscoll asked icily.

"You can see the feed if you want boss." Johnson replied. "Plus. How the hell would any of us know that?"

"Just keep us updated Johnson." Rodriguez cut in. "Last thing I want is to get turned into a frog or some shit because you didn't take the time to watch a vid."

"Still don't believe in that magic shit." Five said from her position in the middle of the pack. "Sure they shot some lightning and shit at us when we fought em up top. But there's tons of explanations for that kinda stuff."

"Like?" Doc asked, beating Driscoll to the obvious question.

"I don't know doc." Five replied. "Nanites, or fuckin tesla guns or some kinda sci-fi shit. Hell, you can shoot lightning at people by knocking over a transformer pole back home. And fireballs are easy. It's called a molotov."

"Soo.... no?" Doc countered.

"Fuck yo-"

They all froze and shut up as Rodriguez raised a hand in a fist, causing a fist symbol to appear on their HUDs as well.

"Movement." He said on the radio. "Plus heat and tremors."

"Cover if you got it." Driscoll ordered. "Rod, sensors."

Without saying a word Rodriguez's suit sent the data to theirs and their suits began focusing on the areas indicated by it.

"That aint fuckin right." Doc said after a moment.

"Two and Ten." Driscoll said as Doc pulled up just behind him. He shot his left hand off to the wall on his left and Doc aimed that way. "Rod. Obviously front."

"Yep." Rodriguez said simply as he took a knee, weapon raised.

"How the hell are they IN the walls?" Five asked.

"That stuff that you think was done with nanites, probably." Carroll replied.

"Shut up." Driscoll said harshly. "Fight time."

Their suits kept them from having their ears deafened in the tight confines of the underground quarters. But there was no mistaking the muffled sound of a twelve gauge semi-automatic shotgun beginning to go to work.

Only a moment later the wall that Driscoll had been aimed at exploded toward him. An angry, heavily armored, dwarf wielding an oversized axe launched out of the wall at him.

"FOR CLAN DU-!" They yelled.

Driscoll felt the incredibly minimal recoil of the rifle in his armored hands as he cut the dwarf off. The body fell to the ground in a heap as the axe skidded across the ground toward him. He peeked at the side camera feed in the corner of his display as he got a warning of movement there.

Next to him, doc opened up with his own rifle. Two dwarves collapsed to the ground in a bloody tangle, one of them dropping a short sword as they clutched at their chest. Another muted pop and they went limp.

"We've got action in the re-THE FUCK!" Carroll radioed from the back of the line.

"Report." Driscoll added.

"Motherf-" Carroll said before cutting off.

Driscolls HUD flashed with the notification for a suit compromise from Carroll's armor.

"Carroll report!" He yelled into his comm.

"Fine." Carroll replied in a huff. "Bastards hit me with the goddam tunnel wall. Lost a leg. Sealant's already in place."

"Are you injured?" Doc asked.

"Nah. Missed me. No target visual though. Has to be that magic bullshit." Carroll said with a hint of anger. "Still engaging."

"Moving to reinforce." Johnson said reflexively.

"They can hit hard enough to break our suits?" Doc asked.

"Not the core." Carroll answered. "Only the limbs. I broke my way out with my arms, so it looks like it was just the impact that got it."

"Acknowledged. Take note." Driscoll said.

"NOTED!" The rest of the team said simultaneously.

"Johnson. Get a read on whoever hit her. Keep us informed."

"Got it boss."

Driscoll looked back, not surprised to find two more dead dwarves in the hole he'd been covering. His suits warning sensors and his long drilled reflexes allowing him to engage even as he focused on other parts of the battle field.

"Boss. I'm not getting any more up here." Rodriguez said. "Mag's at a quarter, gonna swap."

"Copy. Doc, your tunnel good?"

"Quieter than yours was." Doc replied.

"What's the situation back there?" Driscoll asked. "And how's mid?"

"Mid's good." Five replied before Johnsons or Carroll could. "No noise here."

"Carrolls hop-scotching." Johnson replied. "Sensors are reading movement in the stone, but no shot."

"Looks like they're falling back, whoever they are." Driscoll said in response. "Doc, you got a crutch?"

"Ya." Doc said simply. Next to him he turned. Driscoll reached over and grabbed the device off of the other suit's back as a panel opened to reveal it. He handed it to Doc. "Conga pass." He said as he tossed it into the darkness. There was a soft clank as it was caught by Devato behind them.

"Crutch en route." Driscoll radioed.

"Fuck." Carroll said. "Hate the crutch."

"Next time don't get a leg broken off in your ass." Five replied.

"FU-"

"Enough." Driscoll said dryly. "Sensors are showing green minus wall boy. Johnson you stay with Carroll until she's mobile again. Try to get that leg back if possible. Once you're ready, take her back for the Toolies then secure the entrance site and wait for us."

"Copy." Johnson said.

"Come on boss. I can still keep up with a crutch." Carroll whinged.

"What happens when a compartment gets compromised and doesn't eject?" He asked.

There were a few seconds of silence that he knew she was probably trying to think of a counter. Instead she simply said, "Understood boss."

"Johnson, send a few scuttlers down these side runs. Then spray-crete em sealed before you leave." He added. "Everyone else, le-"

The raised fist flashed on their screens again. They all raised their weapons and froze in place like before.

"Rodriguez. What the fuck?" Driscoll asked. "More contacts?"

"Neither I, nor my sensors understand what is happening in front of me." Rodriguez said in the startlingly eloquent deadpan that Driscoll recognized as his stressed out voice.

Driscoll pulled up the feed from Rodriguez's suit.

"What the fuck?" Five asked, echoing his own thoughts. "Are those fuckin' spiders?"

"Rod. ENGAGE!" Driscoll ordered.

Rodriguez didn't answer. His shotgun did.

\------------------------

Kai's head shot back in the direction of the noise as he felt the frantic plucking vibrate his control harp.

The dwarves were understating these golems. He thought. Such power.

He raised the harp and fully immersed his hand in the strings, winding them around several of his fingers. With his other hand he braced the frame of the harp and pulled it up his arm until it had stretched out and was resting firmly against his skin from elbow to wrist. Its strings forming a lose net around his entire forearm.

The vibrations of his swarm's constant web plucking made his arm feel as though it was humming.

Once the harp had been pressed in place he pulled a small mask from the wall next to him, his spiders having brought it to him from his storage. He placed the mask to his face and smoke began to flow over his body, obscuring it and making him even harder to see.

The eight gemstone eyes on the mask melded into the skin beneath the mask. He closed his natural eyes, his birth eyes, and opened the magical ones that were now a part of him.

He saw the battle from the eyes of his children.

No. My swarm. He reminded himself calmly. You are not in charge here.

He looked down at James's unconscious body from the eyes of the carrier spiders pulling him through the tunnel.

A little further. Then I'll have to hide you and hope for the best.

He flexed his arm and twitched his secondary thumb. He and James continued moving down the tunnel. Another twitch and he took a seated position as the spiders carried him.

Then he switched his view to the part of the swarm that was engaged with the golems.

Let's see how you like a bit of control. He thought as he saw the large metal creature blast holes into the ranks of his brothers and sisters. His children.

No. He reminded himself again.

"My army." He whispered to himself as he and his ward continued moving down the hall.

\----------

"Boss?" Rodriguez asked from beside him. "You seeing this?"

"Ironically." Driscoll said, a hint of frustration on his voice. "It's kind of hard to miss Rod."

The two of them, plus Doc, stood in the tunnel, as close to next to each other as the limited space would allow, firing into the swelling mass of spiders and webbing that was beginning to flood the area.

Before their attacks had been gouging massive holes in the arachnid swarm in front of them. Rodriguez's shotgun had been cutting massive cones of gore in the mess of legs and eyes and webs that had been rapidly encroaching on their space.

Now the shots were hitting mostly empty air and stone. The spiders seeming to dodge out of the way, or at the very least thinning out any time one of the weapons fired. They were still taking damage, but they were minimizing it as best as they could for a mass of, presumably, dumb animals.

"Are spiders supposed to be capable of that kind of shit?" Doc asked in an angry tone that became his go to during a fight he wasn't enjoying.

"On Earth? Fuck no." Driscoll replied. "Too bad that aint where we are."

"What I'd do for a can of raid." Rodriguez weighed in. "Mag's almost dry, gonna switch to the heat."

"Kinda wish you'd already done that." Doc answered. "Covering."

Rodriguez dropped to a knee as the other two continued firing, their view cleared significantly by the lack of a third in their way. They also stopped their rearward march so that they wouldn't leave Rodriguez behind.

"Loaded." Rodriguez said as he hit his slide release. "Spiders, meet fire."

Driscoll watched as his display automatically darkened to save his eyes from the sudden introduction of fire and sparking metal that was the shotgun's dragon's breath rounds.

He smiled as the spiders, despite attempting to dodge, caught aflame.

"Hell yeah." Five said from behind them. "Nice."

The smile was quickly robbed from Driscoll's face as he saw the spiders cover their flaming kin in some kind of spray that quickly doused the majority of the flames. Then they swarmed over the dead and dying charred arachnids and surged back forward.

"Hit em again." He said.

His HUD dimmed again. But this time for only a moment. The spiders dodged as best as they could again, but this time they also preemptively sprayed whatever they'd used to stop the previous conflagration.

"What the fuck man?" Rodriguez said as he readied another shot.

"Hold." Driscoll ordered up. "Pop your black panel."

Rodriguez arrested his movement and a panel opened on his back.

Driscoll reached in and grabbed the small ball with the red band and pulled the tab off it's top.

"Fall back." He said.

"Shit boss." Someone said.

Then he hurled the thermite charge down the hall into the mass of arachnids.

It stopped mid air as it collided with an unseen bit of webbing.

"SHIT!" He yelled. "DOWN!"

"What the fu-" Doc yelled before he instinctively jumped away from the charge.

Then the charge detonated spraying jets of firework-like fire in a spinning pattern as it tried to propel itself but was held in place by the webbing.

Rodriguez began to scream.

\----------

Kai winced as the light and heat of the attack pounded into his mind from thousands of eyes and bodies and minds. His jaw clenched hard enough to make his teeth ache.

At his side his hand spasmed and jerked as it worked the controls of his harp wrapped arm.

Away from whatever that just was. He thought, despite knowing that that was not how his bond worked. He plucked the commands with his hand. Stay away if they retrieve any more of those.

Then as his swarm's vision came back in with the arrival of new spiders he saw that the enemies had managed to harm themselves from his webbing's intervention.

His hand lifted as he aimed it in front of him and his vision surged toward the three golems, one of whom was on the ground clutching at its face.

NOW!

\----------

Driscoll latched onto Rodriguez's shoulder and hooked up the recovery cable to the loop there. On his HUD Rodriguez's vitals were flashing red as his heartbeat pounded away and his blood pressure spike. The fact that it was doing so despite his suit's interventions and self medicating mechanisms told him how much pain and fear had to be occurring in the man's mind right now.

"Boss." Five said as she pulled up next to him.

"Get his other side!" Driscoll snarled. "Get him back."

"BOSS!" Doc cut in."

"WHAT!" He snapped back.

"They're coming back!"

Driscoll's feed snapped to the writhing mass that, sure enough, was rushing at them.

He dropped his rifle, letting it hang from its retention lanyard.

He picked up the shotgun and ripped its lanyard and aimed it down the hallway.

The spiders tried to dodge. He engaged the "Simulate Automatic" option on his firing hand.

As the weapon rose to where he wanted it, his finger became a blur.

He intentionally lowered the slider on the sound dampening control a few spaces.

BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BO-BOOM!

CLI-CLI-CLI-CLI-CLICK.

Reported the shotgun as he almost immediately emptied what was left in its magazine.

"MOVE!" He commanded as his feed showed the spiders getting sprayed and torched with no time to dodge the rapid-fire attack.

And the team, for the first time in years, maybe decades, fell back in retreat.

\----------

Kai faltered, and felt beads of sweat drenching the back of his web shirt and forehead as he felt the massacre that his swarm had just been subjected to.

"Shit." He said in a tone of panic as he waited for his view of the scene to return.

"Kuuhh..." Moaned James from beside him, startling him a bit.

"What?" He wondered in surprise. "How are you waking up?" He asked.

"Kuuukai?" James tried to ask.

"Not now Mr. James." He said as more of his spiders made it to the fight and gave him his sight back. He was happy to see the golems retreating away from where they'd just been, their downed comrade dragged between them.

Good. He thought. Let's pick up some distance before they realize we're not attacking.

He pulled the mask from his face. It made a slight sucking noise as it retrieved its gemstone eyes.

His hand commanded the swarm to seal the tunnel before they joined him. In the distance they began to gather their dead as well as the stones loosened in the fight. And they began their work.

He told the carrier spiders to move faster as he and James glided through the tunnel.

\---------------

A few minutes after Driscoll and the others had left, a small tunnel opened up near the wall that the spiders had erected. Out of it an angry, tear soaked, blonde dwarf crawled.

She looked around at the burn marks and the handful of forgotten dead spiders that were still there.

She looked down the tunnel in the direction the metal murderers had retreated. Then back at the spider wall.

She bent down and picked up the large metal contraption that had brought death to her brothers before. She sniffed at the odd, shiny, metal tube at the top of it, and the opening that smelled so chemically pungent. She also picked up and inspected one of the small red and brass cylinders that it had ejected after each attack.

"Bastards." She said softly.

Her hands glowed, and another wall formed between her and the retreating enemy's path. Once it was done, she lowered back down and began crawling back through her tunnel. Her enemy's weapon clutched angrily in her hands.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/y1hv4c/wait_is_this_just_gate_238/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (236/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah. Things are about to go poorly for a lot of people. But also, POWER ARMOR FIIIIIIIIGHT!!!!

BTW u/bamssbam used some AI to render a dope view of our Main Boi Choi over on r/GATEhouse

Enjoy

\~

"Okay, send it through in THREE..." Veliry yelled from the other side of the courtyard, her voice amplified by magic so Joey could hear. "TWO..... ONE!"

Joey rushed at the small pig-like creature, startling it into running into the faintly glowing opening on the castle wall. A pair of small mesh and wood fences kept it from running anywhere else. It hit the glowing membrane that marked the "inside" of the bottomless... door.

It paused in confusion for a second, then Joey tapped his foot on its butt. The animal startled and ran all the way through.

"GOT IT!" Veliry said from the other side of the courtyard.

Joey's arms shot up into the air.

"YES!" He yelled, causing the handful of onlookers to look at him. Then his discomfort took over and his hands dropped back to his side.

Joey looked around curiously for a moment, then when he didn't see his mom anywhere he turned back.

"STAY THERE!" He yelled.

"WHAT?" Veliry asked back, having not heard him as well as he could hear her.

Instead of answering Joey leapt into the opening.

And promptly landed on top of the pig thing in a heap.

"JOEY! BY THE-" She began before realizing that she still had her voice magically amplified. She coughed. "By the gods what are you doing?" She helped him up to his feet and he dusted himself off. "Your mother said not to use you for any magical tests."

"We didn't." He replied with a smile. He pointed at the pig creature. "We used that. And the test was successful."

Before Joey realized it, she was up in the air hugging him. His face flushed as he awkwardly hugged back. Then she dropped back to the ground.

"With this we should be able to make travel sooo much quicker." She said as she shooed the creature back through the door. Then she pulled the cover over and shut it. "Plus this will help us find the Agency." She added.

"And if it can be extended even further than it should massively cut down on nationwide logistics." Joey chimed in. "Which should help a lot with the current refugee problem from the elemental attack. Both in terms of getting them to places they can live, and keeping them fed and supplied."

She looked at him in surprise. She hadn't realized he'd been thinking that far ahead.

"What?" He asked as he looked away.

"Nothing." She replied. "Just... I didn't realize that was something you'd thought of."

Joey scratched his temple in discomfort as he looked down. "I feel bad for them." He said quietly. "I know what that's like. My whole family does."

"They're being well taken care of." Veliry assured him, her focus on the experiment set aside for now. "The King has put a lot of resources toward helping them get back on their feet."

"I know." Joey said with a smile. "But I still want to help."

Veliry matched the smile. "And you will." She said. "Now go seal that door up and then head back to the lab. I've got to go report this to King Farrick. How is the wind magic coming."

Joey held his hands up and aimed them at the ground. He focused for a moment and the hair on his head rustled a little. A small, fairly weak, gust of wind disturbed the grass there.

"Very good." Veliry said with a large smile. "You, Joey, are OFFICIALLY, a mage."

Joey's eyes widened, and the unfelt wind that was messing his hair up intensified and began shaking the hood of his robes.

"Really?" He asked with a look of concern.

Veliry cocked an eyebrow. "You're casting a spell while under the tutelage of an Arch-Mage aren't you?" She asked.

"Yeah." He answered.

"Then you're a mage." She said sternly. "Welcome to the profession." She looked down at where his hands were pointed. "New lesson: Try not to destroy Royal Property. And yes." She shrugged a bit. "I do get how that's hypocritical coming from me."

Joey looked down and was shocked to see the dirt and stones beneath him getting blasted away as if by a pressure washer.

"Shit." He said as he lowered his arms.

He turned to apologize, but his teacher was already jogging toward the castle.

"I'm a mage." He said to himself, a smile spread from ear to ear.

\----------

Driscoll and the other members of his team looked at the spray-crete secured hole in the sand before them.

"Alright." He said over the private channel that only they and, if he wanted, the Major could listen to. "We've got our sonic maps. Scuttlers are already down there getting us even more detail. And we've already got a route to below the impact site."

"Any half a k away." Said Rodriguez, who'd been the one to find the crater in the first place. "Easy route."

Driscoll nodded. "Easy op." He said. "Find the body or trail. Secure. Deal with anything in the way."

The others nodded silently.

"Any volunteers?" He asked rhetorically. They knew he would always be the first to dive. When none of them said anything he nodded himself. "Alright. Let's go."

He jumped up and forward.

Then he dropped the fifteen feet down into the sand coated darkness below.

The pads on the bottom of his suit's feet expanded, flaring out to the sides while also inflating with a bit of water. In normal deep water operations this helped them walk along the silty, muddy floors of the oceans or lakes that they maneuvered across. But in this situation it just helped soften, and silence, the impact of the nearly three hundred Kilogram armor.

His weapon raised as he looked down the lengths of the long passageway. His suit's cameras gave him a visual of the space behind and around him as he did, granting him three hundred sixty degrees of vision and sensor data.

He flicked through his different camera feeds, looking at thermal, night vision, and motion based vision as he did.

"Clear." He said, once he was satisfied that he was alone. He walked a few yards toward their destination. A muffled impact tremor told him that the next member of the team had jumped in too. His HUD told him that it was Rodriguez, not that that surprised him. Rodriguez panned the other direction as he stepped out of the way as well.

The other members of the team were quick to follow them down as they slowly spread out along the corridor. Only a few minutes later they were all accounted for.

"Hate caves." Milano said after she'd dropped down.

"You got stuck ONE time." Replied Rodriguez.

"I'm claustrophobic." Milano shot back.

"You live inside a tin can." Doc cut in.

"I'd say to maintain silence." Driscoll said over the radio, silencing the others. "But nobody can hear anything we say in these suits anyways. So let me say what I've said a hundred times before when we're on mission-"

"Shut up!" Four of his crew said in unison before he had a chance.

He paused in his tracks and angled his head back.

"If you know it so well, than do it." He said.

"Every time." Doc chimed in.

"You too doc."

"Copy." Doc answered.

The eight of them proceeded in suit imposed silence for another twelve minutes before reaching their destination. Their suits occasionally pinged them with heat or motion warnings on either side of the linear formation, causing Driscoll or Carroll, the rear guard, to pause as they waited for their suits to get a better read on the cause. But so far they'd only ever been minor wildlife, insects or rodents, and nothing worth halting the formation fully.

They stopped only a hundred yards from their intended goal, a sudden offshooting tunnel and a set of tracks giving them pause as they came across it.

The tracks had a trail of dried blood drops trailing along on either side of them.

"Doc." Driscoll said as he forwarded his feed to the group.

"Moving up." Doc replied, not needing to be told what to do.

Getting past the other team members was a hassle, their oversized suits took up most of the space in the tunnel and Doc had to carefully maneuver around them to get to the site where Driscoll and Rodriguez had taken position, their weapons aimed down each path.

Doc pulled a panel open on his left arm and pulled an attachment out that looked like a small spoon at the end of a straw. He placed the attachment on the index finger of his suit with a soft snap. With it he scooped up some of the sand dried blood. Once he had a large enough sample he froze, the spoon folded in on itself and some of the water from Doc's suit flowed into it, turning the blood and sand into a slurry that his suit analyzed.

"What do we got?" Driscoll asked after a minute.

"Human, lupine....ish.... blood cells look like the ones from the dead locals at the camp. Though the structure is a little.... off." Doc replied.

"Explain." Driscoll prodded.

"Their structure is similar to the locals, but the shape isn't as pronounced. Here I'll show you my view." Doc said as he pulled the attachment off of his finger and placed it back into the panel, where it would clean itself.

Driscoll watched as a view of one of the odd, triangular, blood cells unique to this world appeared on his HUD.

"That's from the locals." Doc said. "We've all seen that before in our briefings."

A second image of a similar blood cell appeared next to it.

"That's the stuff I just scooped." Doc said. "Notice that the points are a bit more rounded, the inner angles not as deep. Plus, it appears to be more damaged than the locals were, even though both samples were dead and dried by the time of their imaging."

"What's that mean?" Driscoll asked. "A different species?"

"Could be." Doc admitted. "Our database on local cell structures is, understandably, incomplete. But the structure analysis still recognizes it as being in line with local human types, with hints of lupine structures. That matches the state of the arm we found. But usually werewolves are either FULL wolf, or heavily humanized. This is more like a mixture of different cells. As if this person was a human AND a fully turned werewolf."

Driscoll's head tilted as he thought, while he did he also pulled up a few files that this was reminding him of.

"Boss?" Carroll asked from the back of the line. "We good."

Driscoll closed the file he'd been looking at.

"I know who it is." He said, causing several of the others too look at him curiously.

"What?" Asked Rodriguez curiously. "Who do you know in this world that that rings a bell."

Driscoll looked down the hall toward where the impact crater was. "Someone who's gone native." He said. He kicked at the bloodied sand on the floor. "And decided to drop by to greet the new neighbors."

The others looked at each-other curiously before an image popped up on their HUD's.

"Shit." Doc said as he realized what he was looking at. He looked back down at the blood. "That makes a lot of sense, actually."

"New mission folks." Driscoll said as he began walking past Rodriguez, brushing a cobweb aside as he did. "Search and.... rescue."

\------------------------

"Kai?" James asked as he groggily woke back up. "Do I still have spiders inside me?"

"Will you faint if I say yes?" Kai asked in return.

"Jury's out." James said. "We'll see." He added when he realized that the phrase likely didn't make sense to the Deep Elf.

"Then... no." Kai replied.

James wanted to argue the obvious lie. But then thought better of it. Blissful ignorance. He told himself. It's fine. Everything's fine.

"Can I... Can I move?" He asked instead. "How am I doing now?"

There was a familiar cord played by Kai's odd, circular control instrument, and James felt his arms and head release from the grip of the spider that he knew was somewhere on him.

"You are much improved James." Kai said. "You even have most of your hand back."

James looked and, sure enough, he had most of his hand back, though it ended in a few stubby little bits of flesh that he assumed were going to form the long, clawed, fingers he'd grown used to over the past few months.

"Sweeeeet." He said.

"How are you sonny?" Asked a startlingly loud voice that came from right next to him, causing him to jump in surprise.

"JESUS!" He blurted out as he flailed.

Next to him was a short, blonde haired dwarf woman. He recognized her.

"You were.... the one that brought me here." He said as the recognition snapped into place.

"One of them. Yes." She said as she grabbed a plate from somewhere out of James's sight. She held it up in front of James. "We brought you to Weaver here, figured he might be able to save you after those bastards knocked you out of the sky."

James's stomach did a cartwheel as he smelled whatever kind of stew or sauced meat that was on the plate.

"Once again, I am A weaver. Weaver is not my name." Kai said in a mildly scolding tone.

"And once again, aint nobody can say your actual name." The dwarf shot back.

"Then do as Mr. James does and simply call me Kai."

"Who's Mr. James?" The dwarf asked.

"That'd be me. James weighed in weakly as his hands reached for the plate. Then he paused as he realized how useless that was for the left hand. "And it's just James. No mister required."

"James." The dwarf said as she picked up a piece of something on the plate and shoved it into James's mouth. Startled by the sudden intrusion, and surprised by the pain in his jaw, he gagged a bit. "James..... I feel like I know a James." The dwarf continued. "Why does the name James sound a horn for me?"

>!"Ow."!< James said through the piece of.... mushroom(?) as he tenderly chewed and swallowed it.

"Ya happen to be from Goldbrook Mr. James?" The dwarf asked as she picked up another piece of food.

James barely swallowed the first piece of food in time to say "No." before another piece of something that felt like a chunk of rubber. But the savory flavor it exuded once he'd bitten it made his mouth salivate. It tasted like a piece of carne asada, even as his brain struggled with the texture.

"No?" She asked. She looked him over. "No." She agreed. "You're too scrawny to be one o' the brook fishers." She shoved a piece of rock hard bread that was coated in the juices from the plate into his mouth. He hadn't even finished chewing and swallowing the previous piece of food yet.

>!"Ooo-muh."!< He tried to say.

"Lady Dunebasher. Please slow down. I've just barely managed to keep him alive. I don't need you choking him to death." Kai said.

"Oh he'll be fine." The dwarf countered as she raised something to James's mouth.

James spluttered as, remarkably cold, ale sloshed over his face and into his already full mouth.

"See?" She said. "He's takin' his ale."

James forced the food and drink, painfully, down his throat with a large gulp that he struggled to keep down.

"Now how long do ya-" The dwarf began, her hand already grabbing another morsel from the plate.

"Enough!" James interjected. "God damn." He paused as he coughed, trying not to bring any of the food up as he did. "Slow down with the food." He wheezed. "My throat hurts like fuck."

"Not a surprise." The dwarf said with a smile. "You had about ten pounds of sand and blood in it when my cousin pulled you down here."

"You're clan Dunebasher?" James asked as he rubbed his chest. It ached where his hand pressed.

Of to the side Kai's head cocked to the side curiously, though neither of the other two noticed.

"The one and only." The dwarf replied. Then her head dropped a little. "Though... who knows how long that'll last?" She said with a hint of sorrow.

"What?" James asked. "What happened?"

"That's right." She said. "News hasn't gotten out of the valley yet."

"News of what?" James asked. "Kai?" He called as he looked over to the Deep Elf's location on the nearby wall.

"Clan Dunebasher was annihilated." Kai said softly as he looked off into the distance. He lifted his instrument to his ear and plucked several of the chords on it, though James couldn't hear the notes it caused. "Lady Dunebasher and seven others are the only survivors left." He said as he tilted his head closer to the spider webbed device in his hands.

"Is he okay?" James asked the dwarf, who was also looking at Kai curiously.

"Don't know." She admitted. "Only time I've seen him like this is when some of his little critters are about to bag him some dinner in the tunnels. But he's usually not so focused like this."

"Kai?" James asked. "Everything okay?"

"Unfortunately it seems as though Clan Dunebasher's days are fewer than previously expected." He said as he plucked rapidly at the strings, though they still emitted no audible noise.

"What did you say Elf?" The dwarf asked with acid in her tone.

"There are..... eight... golems.... I believe.... heading this way from near where you said you retrieved James's body." Kai said. "They match the appearance of the creatures you and your clan mates said were summoned against you."

"Wha?" James asked. Then he jumped as the plate of food clattered to the ground. James felt some of its contents splash against his back somehow.

He looked over and saw a look of rage on the dwarf's face.

Before he could react she was bolting out of the opening that passed for a door.

"CLAN DUNEBASHER!" She yelled as she exited. As she did she picked up a weapon that looked like the bastard offspring of a pickax and a broadsword. "VENGEANCE!!!"

James faintly heard a series of echoing cries and whoops from outside.

"Kai what the fuck is going on?" James asked as his head snapped back to the elf.

"I do not know if these golems are communicating with each-other." Kai replied. "But one thing is obvious." He plucked a string and began lowering to the ground again. "They are following the trail the dwarves left behind."

He plucked another string and James felt himself lower down and touch the ground. Another pluck and his head and arms were pulled back and held in place again.

"They are coming here." Kai said before James could ask any more questions. "They are coming for you. You are not repaired yet James. We need to leave."

Another pluck of the string, and James was moving across the floor.

"Wait!" James said, though the outburst fell on deaf ears as he kept moving. "How long have I been down here?"

Kai kept his ear pressed to his instrument as he seemed to flow through the room just above the ground. He was plucking at it rapidly.

"KAI!" He yelled now. "HOW LONG HAVE I BEEN DOWN HERE?!?!"

"Five days." Said Kai in an unexpectedly harsh voice. "Now please. I need to hear their plucking." He plucked a string himself, and James felt a pinch in his neck.

"Ow." He said in surprise. "What the..." He suddenly felt dizzy. "Kai didju... dijuuuu..." His tongue and eyelids suddenly felt heavy.

GODDAMIT! I need to radio back. He thought as he slipped back into unconsciousness. They don't kn^(ow about) ^(the Miffy's... Need to... tell...)

Then he was fully under. His mind and his body entered the darkness as Kai and his spiders bore him to safety.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xyct5l/wait_is_this_just_gate_237/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (236/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah. Things are about to go poorly for a lot of people. But also, POWER ARMOR FIIIIIIIIGHT!!!!

BTW u/bamssbam used some AI to render a dope view of our Main Boi Choi over on r/GATEhouse

Enjoy

\~\~\~

Joey looked around curiously for a moment, then when he didn't see his mom anywhere he turned back.

"STAY THERE!" He yelled.

"WHAT?" Veliry asked back, having not heard him as well as he could hear her.

Instead of answering Joey leapt into the opening.

And promptly landed on top of the pig thing in a heap.

"JOEY! BY THE-" She began before realizing that she still had her voice magically amplified. She coughed. "By the gods what are you doing?" She helped him up to his feet and he dusted himself off. "Your mother said not to use you for any magical tests."

"We didn't." He replied with a smile. He pointed at the pig creature. "We used that. And the test was successful."

Before Joey realized it, she was up in the air hugging him. His face flushed as he awkwardly hugged back. Then she dropped back to the ground.

"With this we should be able to make travel sooo much quicker." She said as she shooed the creature back through the door. Then she pulled the cover over and shut it. "Plus this will help us find the Agency." She added.

"And if it can be extended even further than it should massively cut down on nationwide logistics." Joey chimed in. "Which should help a lot with the current refugee problem from the elemental attack. Both in terms of getting them to places they can live, and keeping them fed and supplied."

She looked at him in surprise. She hadn't realized he'd been thinking that far ahead.

"What?" He asked as he looked away.

"Nothing." She replied. "Just... I didn't realize that was something you'd thought of."

Joey scratched his temple in discomfort as he looked down. "I feel bad for them." He said quietly. "I know what that's like. My whole family does."

"They're being well taken care of." Veliry assured him, her focus on the experiment set aside for now. "The King has put a lot of resources toward helping them get back on their feet."

"I know." Joey said with a smile. "But I still want to help."

Veliry matched the smile. "And you will." She said. "Now go seal that door up and then head back to the lab. I've got to go report this to King Farrick. How is the wind magic coming."

Joey held his hands up and aimed them at the ground. He focused for a moment and the hair on his head rustled a little. A small, fairly weak, gust of wind disturbed the grass there.

"Very good." Veliry said with a large smile. "You, Joey, are OFFICIALLY, a mage."

Joey's eyes widened, and the unfelt wind that was messing his hair up intensified and began shaking the hood of his robes.

"Really?" He asked with a look of concern.

Veliry cocked an eyebrow. "You're casting a spell while under the tutelage of an Arch-Mage aren't you?" She asked.

"Yeah." He answered.

"Then you're a mage." She said sternly. "Welcome to the profession." She looked down at where his hands were pointed. "New lesson: Try not to destroy Royal Property. And yes." She shrugged a bit. "I do get how that's hypocritical coming from me."

Joey looked down and was shocked to see the dirt and stones beneath him getting blasted away as if by a pressure washer.

"Shit." He said as he lowered his arms.

He turned to apologize, but his teacher was already jogging toward the castle.

"I'm a mage." He said to himself, a smile spread from ear to ear.

\----------

Driscoll and the other members of his team looked at the spray-crete secured hole in the sand before them.

"Alright." He said over the private channel that only they and, if he wanted, the Major could listen to. "We've got our sonic maps. Scuttlers are already down there getting us even more detail. And we've already got a route to below the impact site."

"Only half a k away." Said Rodriguez, who'd been the one to find the crater in the first place. "Easy route."

Driscoll nodded. "Easy op." He said. "Find the body or trail. Secure. Deal with anything in the way."

The others nodded silently.

"Any volunteers?" He asked rhetorically. They knew he would always be the first to dive. When none of them said anything he nodded himself. "Alright. Let's go."

He jumped up and forward.

Then he dropped the fifteen feet down into the sand coated darkness below.

The pads on the bottom of his suit's feet expanded, flaring out to the sides while also inflating with a bit of water. In normal deep water operations this helped them walk along the silty, muddy floors of the oceans or lakes that they maneuvered across. But in this situation it just helped soften, and silence, the impact of the nearly three hundred Kilogram armor.

His weapon raised as he looked down the lengths of the long passageway. His suit's cameras gave him a visual of the space behind and around him as he did, granting him three hundred sixty degrees of vision and sensor data.

He flicked through his different camera feeds, looking at thermal, night vision, and motion based vision as he did.

"Clear." He said, once he was satisfied that he was alone. He walked a few yards toward their destination. A muffled impact tremor told him that the next member of the team had jumped in too. His HUD told him that it was Rodriguez, not that that surprised him. Rodriguez panned the other direction as he stepped out of the way as well.

The other members of the team were quick to follow them down as they slowly spread out along the corridor. Only a few minutes later they were all accounted for.

"Hate caves." Milano said after she'd dropped down.

"You got stuck ONE time." Replied Rodriguez.

"I'm claustrophobic." Milano shot back.

"You live inside a tin can." Doc cut in.

"I'd say to maintain silence." Driscoll said over the radio, silencing the others. "But nobody can hear anything we say in these suits anyways. So let me say what I've said a hundred times before when we're on mission-"

"Shut up!" Four of his crew said in unison before he had a chance.

He paused in his tracks and angled his head back.

"If you know it so well, than do it." He said.

"Every time." Doc chimed in.

"You too doc."

"Copy." Doc answered.

The eight of them proceeded in suit imposed silence for another twelve minutes before reaching their destination. Their suits occasionally pinged them with heat or motion warnings on either side of the linear formation, causing Driscoll or Carroll, the rear guard, to pause as they waited for their suits to get a better read on the cause. But so far they'd only ever been minor wildlife, insects or rodents, and nothing worth halting the formation fully.

They stopped only a hundred yards from their intended goal, a sudden offshooting tunnel and a set of tracks giving them pause as they came across it.

The tracks had a trail of dried blood drops trailing along on either side of them.

"Doc." Driscoll said as he forwarded his feed to the group.

"Moving up." Doc replied, not needing to be told what to do.

Getting past the other team members was a hassle, their oversized suits took up most of the space in the tunnel and Doc had to carefully maneuver around them to get to the site where Driscoll and Rodriguez had taken position, their weapons aimed down each path.

Doc pulled a panel open on his left arm and pulled an attachment out that looked like a small spoon at the end of a straw. He placed the attachment on the index finger of his suit with a soft snap. With it he scooped up some of the sand dried blood. Once he had a large enough sample he froze, the spoon folded in on itself and some of the water from Doc's suit flowed into it, turning the blood and sand into a slurry that his suit analyzed.

"What do we got?" Driscoll asked after a minute.

"Human, lupine....ish.... blood cells look like the ones from the dead locals at the camp. Though the structure is a little.... off." Doc replied.

"Explain." Driscoll prodded.

"Their structure is similar to the locals, but the shape isn't as pronounced. Here I'll show you my view." Doc said as he pulled the attachment off of his finger and placed it back into the panel, where it would clean itself.

Driscoll watched as a view of one of the odd, triangular, blood cells unique to this world appeared on his HUD.

"That's from the locals." Doc said. "We've all seen that before in our briefings."

A second image of a similar blood cell appeared next to it.

"That's the stuff I just scooped." Doc said. "Notice that the points are a bit more rounded, the inner angles not as deep. Plus, it appears to be more damaged than the locals were, even though both samples were dead and dried by the time of their imaging."

"What's that mean?" Driscoll asked. "A different species?"

"Could be." Doc admitted. "Our database on local cell structures is, understandably, incomplete. But the structure analysis still recognizes it as being in line with local human types, with hints of lupine structures. That matches the state of the arm we found. But usually werewolves are either FULL wolf, or heavily humanized. This is more like a mixture of different cells. As if this person was a human AND a fully turned werewolf."

Driscoll's head tilted as he thought, while he did he also pulled up a few files that this was reminding him of.

"Boss?" Carroll asked from the back of the line. "We good."

Driscoll closed the file he'd been looking at.

"I know who it is." He said, causing several of the others to look at him curiously.

"What?" Asked Rodriguez curiously. "Who do you know in this world that that rings a bell."

Driscoll looked down the hall toward where the impact crater was. "Someone who's gone native." He said. He kicked at the bloodied sand on the floor. "And decided to drop by to greet the new neighbors."

The others looked at each-other curiously before an image popped up on their HUD's.

"Shit." Doc said as he realized what he was looking at. He looked back down at the blood. "That makes a lot of sense, actually."

"New mission folks." Driscoll said as he began walking past Rodriguez, brushing a cobweb aside as he did. "Search and.... rescue."

\------------------------

"Kai?" James asked as he groggily woke back up. "Do I still have spiders inside me?"

"Will you faint if I say yes?" Kai asked in return.

"Jury's out." James said. "We'll see." He added when he realized that the phrase likely didn't make sense to the Deep Elf.

"Then... no." Kai replied.

James wanted to argue the obvious lie. But then thought better of it. Blissful ignorance. He told himself. It's fine. Everything's fine.

"Can I... Can I move?" He asked instead. "How am I doing now?"

There was a familiar cord played by Kai's odd, circular control instrument, and James felt his arms and head release from the grip of the spider that he knew was somewhere on him.

"You are much improved James." Kai said. "You even have most of your hand back."

James looked and, sure enough, he had most of his hand back, though it ended in a few stubby little bits of flesh that he assumed were going to form the long, clawed, fingers he'd grown used to over the past few months.

"Sweeeeet." He said.

"How are you sonny?" Asked a startlingly loud voice that came from right next to him, causing him to jump in surprise.

"JESUS!" He blurted out as he flailed.

Next to him was a short, blonde haired dwarf woman. He recognized her.

"You were.... the one that brought me here." He said as the recognition snapped into place.

"One of them. Yes." She said as she grabbed a plate from somewhere out of James's sight. She held it up in front of James. "We brought you to Weaver here, figured he might be able to save you after those bastards knocked you out of the sky."

James's stomach did a cartwheel as he smelled whatever kind of stew or sauced meat that was on the plate.

"Once again, I am A weaver. Weaver is not my name." Kai said in a mildly scolding tone.

"And once again, aint nobody can say your actual name." The dwarf shot back.

"Then do as Mr. James does and simply call me Kai."

"Who's Mr. James?" The dwarf asked.

"That'd be me. James weighed in weakly as his hands reached for the plate. Then he paused as he realized how useless that was for the left hand. "And it's just James. No mister required."

"James." The dwarf said as she picked up a piece of something on the plate and shoved it into James's mouth. Startled by the sudden intrusion, and surprised by the pain in his jaw, he gagged a bit. "James..... I feel like I know a James." The dwarf continued. "Why does the name James sound a horn for me?"

>!"Ow."!< James said through the piece of.... mushroom(?) as he tenderly chewed and swallowed it.

"Ya happen to be from Goldbrook Mr. James?" The dwarf asked as she picked up another piece of food.

James barely swallowed the first piece of food in time to say "No." before another piece of something that felt like a chunk of rubber. But the savory flavor it exuded once he'd bitten it made his mouth salivate. It tasted like a piece of carne asada, even as his brain struggled with the texture.

"No?" She asked. She looked him over. "No." She agreed. "You're too scrawny to be one o' the brook fishers." She shoved a piece of rock hard bread that was coated in the juices from the plate into his mouth. He hadn't even finished chewing and swallowing the previous piece of food yet.

>!"Ooo-muh."!< He tried to say.

"Lady Dunebasher. Please slow down. I've just barely managed to keep him alive. I don't need you choking him to death." Kai said.

"Oh he'll be fine." The dwarf countered as she raised something to James's mouth.

James spluttered as, remarkably cold, ale sloshed over his face and into his already full mouth.

"See?" She said. "He's takin' his ale."

James forced the food and drink, painfully, down his throat with a large gulp that he struggled to keep down.

"Now how long do ya-" The dwarf began, her hand already grabbing another morsel from the plate.

"Enough!" James interjected. "God damn." He paused as he coughed, trying not to bring any of the food up as he did. "Slow down with the food." He wheezed. "My throat hurts like fuck."

"Not a surprise." The dwarf said with a smile. "You had about ten pounds of sand and blood in it when my cousin pulled you down here."

"You're clan Dunebasher?" James asked as he rubbed his chest. It ached where his hand pressed.

Of to the side Kai's head cocked to the side curiously, though neither of the other two noticed.

"The one and only." The dwarf replied. Then her head dropped a little. "Though... who knows how long that'll last?" She said with a hint of sorrow.

"What?" James asked. "What happened?"

"That's right." She said. "News hasn't gotten out of the valley yet."

"News of what?" James asked. "Kai?" He called as he looked over to the Deep Elf's location on the nearby wall.

"Clan Dunebasher was annihilated." Kai said softly as he looked off into the distance. He lifted his instrument to his ear and plucked several of the chords on it, though James couldn't hear the notes it caused. "Lady Dunebasher and seven others are the only survivors left." He said as he tilted his head closer to the spider webbed device in his hands.

"Is he okay?" James asked the dwarf, who was also looking at Kai curiously.

"Don't know." She admitted. "Only time I've seen him like this is when some of his little critters are about to bag him some dinner in the tunnels. But he's usually not so focused like this."

"Kai?" James asked. "Everything okay?"

"Unfortunately it seems as though Clan Dunebasher's days are fewer than previously expected." He said as he plucked rapidly at the strings, though they still emitted no audible noise.

"What did you say Elf?" The dwarf asked with acid in her tone.

"There are..... eight... golems.... I believe.... heading this way from near where you said you retrieved James's body." Kai said. "They match the appearance of the creatures you and your clan mates said were summoned against you."

"Wha?" James asked. Then he jumped as the plate of food clattered to the ground. James felt some of its contents splash against his back somehow.

He looked over and saw a look of rage on the dwarf's face.

Before he could react she was bolting out of the opening that passed for a door.

"CLAN DUNEBASHER!" She yelled as she exited. As she did she picked up a weapon that looked like the bastard offspring of a pickax and a broadsword. "VENGEANCE!!!"

James faintly heard a series of echoing cries and whoops from outside.

"Kai what the fuck is going on?" James asked as his head snapped back to the elf.

"I do not know if these golems are communicating with each-other." Kai replied. "But one thing is obvious." He plucked a string and began lowering to the ground again. "They are following the trail the dwarves left behind."

He plucked another string and James felt himself lower down and touch the ground. Another pluck and his head and arms were pulled back and held in place again.

"They are coming here." Kai said before James could ask any more questions. "They are coming for you. You are not repaired yet James. We need to leave."

Another pluck of the string, and James was moving across the floor.

"Wait!" James said, though the outburst fell on deaf ears as he kept moving. "How long have I been down here?"

Kai kept his ear pressed to his instrument as he seemed to flow through the room just above the ground. He was plucking at it rapidly.

"KAI!" He yelled now. "HOW LONG HAVE I BEEN DOWN HERE?!?!"

"Five days." Said Kai in an unexpectedly harsh voice. "Now please. I need to hear their plucking." He plucked a string himself, and James felt a pinch in his neck.

"Ow." He said in surprise. "What the..." He suddenly felt dizzy. "Kai didju... dijuuuu..." His tongue and eyelids suddenly felt heavy.

GODDAMIT! I need to radio back. He thought as he slipped back into unconsciousness. They don't kn^(ow about)* ^(the Miffy's... Need to... tell...)

Then he was fully under. His mind and his body entered the darkness as Kai and his spiders bore him to safety.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xyco86/wait_is_this_just_gate_237/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (235/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Why yes. Being 20% werewolf does have some sweet benefits. Especially since James will never need to buy a backscratcher ever again..

Oh yea.

NEW CHARACTER INTRODUCTION.

And a bit of insight onto ONE faction in the Deep Dark, albeit only a little bit.

Enjoy.

BTW here's a visual for Amina.

\~

"He should have contacted us by now." Amina said as she sat, staring at the long range radio set that Vickers had turned on for the fourth day now. "Sunrise, noon, sunset. That was when we agreed we'd be on. He should have radioed by now."

Vickers ignored her as best he could as he used a set of headphones and a separate tuner to check the other frequencies. She was right, of course. But feeding her worry was the last thing he needed right now. He'd noticed over the past two days that several of the other frequencies had faint sounds in them that he could occasionally recognize as people speaking. Though they were faint and static laden to the point that he couldn't understand them.

"Where is he?" She asked.

"He might still be looking." Vickers answered, setting down the headset. "maybe this isnt the right mountain range? Any other ranges with enclosed deserts?" He unrolled the map that was set next to the radio set and began looking.

"There's the Salahi desert in the north west." She replied, slowing her pacing down as she thought. Vickers was about to speak when she continued. "But its not fully enclosed. It's western edge is open. Plus nobody in their right mind would set a base there."

"Why not?" He asked curiously as he found what he thought was the desert in question on the map.

"Sand mammoths." She answered as if it was a completely normal, well known, fact.

Vickers ALMOST asked a follow up question, then thought better of it.

"Okay." He said hesitantly. "Not that place. Any chance that he missed this one while he was flying?"

"No." She said simply. "If he had he'd have hit the borreal valley on the other side." She pointed out the swampy, wooded forest on the other side on the map. "Then more mountains. Then the ocean." She shook her head. "Besides, the way he would have been flying, he would have ran into it at its widest point. It's nearly one hundred fifty miles wide at that point. It would've been visible from horizon to horizon. And he'd have had to fly nearly seventy to cross it at that angle. There's no missing that."

Vickers studied the oblong, slightly dog legged, desert on the map. He had to admit that it was a fair point.

"Okay." He said again. "Besides potentially a secret Earth Military base, what else lives in that desert?"

She thought for a moment. "Clan Dunebasher according to the report. A few species of foxling unique to this desert. A unique variant of burrowing hawk. And whatever the deep dark might spit out from time to time, though they never stay there long. Too hot and bright for them."

"Hmmm." Vickers hummed to himself as he thought. He had to admit that the math wasn't adding up. "Wasn't there a patrol that was supposed to go check the 'cartographer camp' thanks to the dwarves?"

"Yes a full long distance patrol unit." She said. "Though unless the message arrived while we were travelling, they haven't come back yet."

"When were they due back?" Vickers followed up.

"A little over a week ago?" She answered.

"Is that normal?"

"For a long range patrol?" She wondered. "It's odd. But not outside of reason. Any number of things can cause that much of a delay. Their official follow up time would be two weeks. At that point another, larger, better equipped unit would be dispatched."

"And," He began. "if they weren't delayed?"

"A long range patrol consists of anywhere from fifteen to thirty people, all of whom would have at least passable combat magic. A good portion of them would be archers or other ranged specialists. There'd be at least five mages and a dedicated healer. The rest would be skilled combat veterans, and they'd usually be led by a Sergeant or Guardian."

"None of that matters if they're up against rifles." Vickers countered.

Amina's eyes widened at the idea.

"Oh no." She said.

Vickers began putting things away. "We leave at first light." He said as he unhooked the headset and put it into his bottomless bag. "We'll leave this going for one last call. But whether he answers or not, we're moving."

Amina simply nodded and left for her room, grabbing her sword from beside the table as she did.

I hope we're both wrong. She thought as she opened the door.

\---------------------------

James awoke to something that sounded oddly musical.

He thought for a moment that he was hearing someone playing an instrument. But there seemed to be no melody to the plucking of the strings. Also the tone and reverberation seemed different.

A harp? He wondered. Or maybe some weird kind of suitar or something?

Then the pain returned.

It was everywhere.

"Hrrrrnnnng." He groaned as he tried to move. But his arms stayed fast at his sides. The left one still felt oddly numb, though not as far up as before. The odd, random, notes stopped abruptly. He had the sensation of something suddenly stilling around him.

He opened his eyes, and was startled to find that he could actually see this time.

"You're awake?" Said a halting, faintly masculine voice from somewhere out of sight. "Glad.... to see it."

He was in some kind of room. Though as his eyes moved around (he was glad the left one had decided to join the party) he had the thought that "Room" might have been a touch generous. Where he would've normally expected to see ceiling corners, instead he saw rounded or even jagged slopes. There were also bits of moss, and the occasional stalactite. Odd web-like formations hung from everything, and these seemed to be what was supplying the low level of light that was allowing him to see.

He was in some kind of cave.

"Wh-who..." He began to say, though his throat felt raw and bruised. Most of him did, now that he thought of it. "Who is that?" He struggled to swallow. His throat was so dry. "Where am I?"

Suddenly he felt something move on his face in a way that made him think of an insect. He wanted to brush it away, but like before his arms remained pinned at his sides. Something touched the corner of his mouth and suddenly he felt, and tasted, the flow of some sweet and faintly spicy fluid flow into his mouth.

He tried to fight it. To spit the unexpected intrusion out. But his parched throat and dry tongue worked against him and he drank deeply of the concoction.

"Worry not... little... human." The voice said. "It is safe. You have been without true sustenance for several days now. This shall help.... wean... you back to health."

"Who?" James said, spluttering a bit of the liquid out now that his mouth was re-hydrated. He marveled at the fact that his throat felt so much better now, as if it hadn't been raw only moments before. "Who are you?" He asked again.

"The dwarves brought you to me." The voice answered. "They call me Weaver. Though this is not accurate. I am A... weaver. Weaver is a title.... My title. But not my name."

What the fuck? James wondered.

"Okay." James replied uncertainly. "What's your ACTUAL name then? I'm James by the way."

"James?" It said. "James. James-James." It said, as if testing the name out. "Well met James." It said after a moment. My true name is Shil'Varyon'Kai of Abel'Motky'Eh the Weaver."

Despite knowing four separate languages fluently at this point in his life, James didn't even attempt to repeat the name.

"Got a shorter version?" He asked instead.

The voice stayed silent for a moment. "You may call me Kai." It said finally.

"Okay Kai." James said. "Nice to meet you. I guess. Would you mind explaining what's going on? Why can't I move."

"Well met James." It replied. "As for what is happening, as I have said; the dwarves brought you to me. I am not a healer, as they seem to treat me. But as a weaver I do have the ability to mend flesh. And that is what I have spent the past two days doing for you." James heard another string plucked note, and suddenly he felt his hands and arms gain a bit of movement. "As for your arms? I had to restrain them to prevent you from hurting yourself. Now that you're awake, you can move them freely. Though I will warn against using the left one. I will also admit some level of curiosity as to its nature."

James brought the two arms up to where he could see them, albeit only faintly in the low, blue, light of the room.

His right arm was covered in some kind of waxy looking coating that also glowed the same faint blue as the stuff on the ceiling. As he flexed it, he felt the bruising and lacerations that were still there, though he couldn't see them past the blue material.

His left hand wasn't covered, and he suddenly understood the numb sensation. It ended just above the wrist.

Oddly, it didn't hurt. Once he'd seen the amputation he'd expected the shock of it to wear off and for pain to set in like the rest of his body. But instead, all he felt was a sort of dull, mostly numb, ache.

"I lost my wolf hand." He said softly.

"You lost most of the arm actually." The voice said with what sounded like sorrow to James. "Though, its.... unique... nature has allowed it to grow back quite a bit since you were brought to me."

"It was worse?" James asked.

"It was amputated above the elbow when you were brought here. As I have said, I am most curious as to how you obtained an arm like that."

"It's.... a long story." James said. " A uh.... gift... so to speak, from a goddess."

"The moon goddess no doubt." Kai replied. "Most fascinating."

"What's this blue stuff on my arm?" James asked. He wanted to pluck at it and poke it, but without a left hand he was stuck simply looking at it. Though he did give it a sniff.

"It is binding web." Kai said. "If you wish to know where it comes from you will need to promise not to panic. You humans tend to do that. Or so I've been told. I must admit that you are the first human I have ever encountered in person."

"Web?" James wondered. "Like.... from spiders?"

"Most correct." Kai said with a hint of cheer. "Are you familiar with spiders?"

"Isn't.....everyone?" James asked uncertainly.

"Not to the extent that myself and my people are." Kai replied. James heard another singular music note. "You may move your head."

Sure enough James suddenly felt something loosen, and was able to move his head. He looked down to try to inspect himself, and to try to see Kai. But instead was greeted by eight softly glowing eyes only a few inches below his chin.

James froze. "Uhhh..... Are you..... Kai?" He asked awkwardly.

Kai laughed, and the noise of it echoed throughout the room. James kept his eyes locked on the spider, wondering if that was where the laughter was coming from, and if so, how.

"No." He said with the last few laughs. "I am not a spider. And he name is not Kai. She is a limb stealer spider, and she is the one that has been keeping you immobile while you heal. She has no name that either of us can vocalize. You need not worry."

Kai played several notes in jarring disharmony, and the spider skittered down James's chest and out of sight.

"Uhhhh. Kai?" James asked.

"Yes James?" Kai asked in return.

"I don't have a spider phobia or anything. But I have to admit that I'm getting some real horror movie flashbacks right now. Can I... see you... real quick? I just need to know what I'm dealing with."

"Certainly." Kai replied. "I have only been remaining hidden because most surface dwellers are uncomfortable with nudity. I have been.... well.... living up to my title, and making some clothes for myself. Though I suppose the current amount covers the necessities."

"Oooooookay...." James said uncertainly.

He began craning his head around to try to see Kai. Each movement hurt like his neck had never felt before. He also felt some things grinding from time to time, though he chose to ignore that. Still, he couldn't see the owner of the voice.

"I am right here." Said Kai suddenly.

James's head snapped forward and center.

Hanging from the ceiling above him was an elf with skin darker than anyone he'd ever seen before, even compared to the few Deep Elves he'd seen in the capital. He was bare down to the waist, and James noticed that he was remarkably muscular. His long, slightly wavy, silver hair hung past his head by a few inches. Around his legs he wore what looked like a pair of yoga pants that seemed to be made of a similar material to the wrap on James's arm, though they glowed a dull red instead of blue. And in his left hand he held a small circular item that had a myriad of different length and color strings held taut across it.

A pair of spiders the size of mice rapidly ran around Kai's torso, leaving a set of webs behind them as they went, the web was the same red color as hit pants.

Kai strummed several cords on the circular instrument, and suddenly he was shifting to the right and lowering to the ground next to James.

"Woah." James said in surprise.

"How are you feeling?" Kai asked. "You were very badly injured when the dwarves brought you here."

James watched the large elf lower, spin, and eventually stand next to him.

"I'm.... a lot better than I would have expected given what happened." James said uncertainly. "Are you the one that healed me?"

Kai's face shifted, one eyebrow raising slightly.

"Healed?" He asked. "No. I don't possess healing magic."

"Then how am I alive. I was hit pretty badly. And I had to have fallen pretty far after." James said.

"True on both accounts." Kai agreed. He held up a hand next to himself. "I must admit that my little workers." A spider the size of a cat crawled over his arm and stood on the palm of his hand. "Are the ones that ACTUALLY saved you. I simply told them how."

"The... spiders.... saved me?" James said, staring at the brown and red creature in the Deep Elf's hand.

"Indeed." Kai confirmed. "They knitted you back together. Kept you from moving and agitating your injuries. Helped you with the pain. And, as you just saw a few minutes ago, kept you fed and watered. Though we will have to get you some food with more.... substance... when we can. Spider wine can only do so much for a human body."

"They knitted me back together?" James asked.

"Extensively." Kai confirmed.

"I had to have had gunshot wounds and tons of broken bones." James said. "Plus who knows how much internal bleeding?"

"I don't know what a gunshot is." Kai admitted. "But I will admit that you were in a very bad way."

"And you fixed me?" James asked. "With spiders?... In two days?"

"Well." Kai said. "We're still fixing you. And I suspect that that Werewolf arm had something to do with the rapidity of it as well."

"Still fixing me?" James wondered.

"Oh yes. As you said, you had EXTENSIVE internal bleeding." Kai repeated. "Several of my spiders are repairing that as we speak."

"You..." James began, suddenly feeling dizzy. "You have... spiders.... inside me? Like... right now?"

"Ugh." Kai huffed. "Humans ARE nervous about spiders."

"They shouldn't...." The room began to spin, James worried that maybe a spider was doing that too. "They shouldn't be inside me." He said before passing out.

Kai sat down on a a web padded rock next to James and played a few notes on his control web. The limb stealer spider brought James's head and arms back into place and held them there again.

"I suppose I should let the dwarves know that he woke up." He said. "I was hoping to learn more about him before he went back down." He said as he pouted.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xxicye/wait_is_this_just_gate_236/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (235/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Why yes. Being 20% werewolf does have some sweet benefits. Especially since James will never need to buy a backscratcher ever again..

Oh yea.

NEW CHARACTER INTRODUCTION.

And a bit of insight onto ONE faction in the Deep Dark, albeit only a little bit.

Enjoy.

BTW here's a visual for Amina.

\~\~\~

"There's the Salahi desert in the north west." She replied, slowing her pacing down as she thought. Vickers was about to speak when she continued. "But its not fully enclosed. It's western edge is open. Plus nobody in their right mind would set a base there."

"Why not?" He asked curiously as he found what he thought was the desert in question on the map.

"Sand mammoths." She answered as if it was a completely normal, well known, fact.

Vickers ALMOST asked a follow up question, then thought better of it.

"Okay." He said hesitantly. "Not that place. Any chance that he missed this one while he was flying?"

"No." She said simply. "If he had he'd have hit the borreal valley on the other side." She pointed out the swampy, wooded forest on the other side on the map. "Then more mountains. Then the ocean." She shook her head. "Besides, the way he would have been flying, he would have ran into it at its widest point. It's nearly one hundred fifty miles wide at that point. It would've been visible from horizon to horizon. And he'd have had to fly nearly seventy to cross it at that angle. There's no missing that."

Vickers studied the oblong, slightly dog legged, desert on the map. He had to admit that it was a fair point.

"Okay." He said again. "Besides potentially a secret Earth Military base, what else lives in that desert?"

She thought for a moment. "Clan Dunebasher according to the report. A few species of foxling unique to this desert. A unique variant of burrowing hawk. And whatever the deep dark might spit out from time to time, though they never stay there long. Too hot and bright for them."

"Hmmm." Vickers hummed to himself as he thought. He had to admit that the math wasn't adding up. "Wasn't there a patrol that was supposed to go check the 'cartographer camp' thanks to the dwarves?"

"Yes a full long distance patrol unit." She said. "Though unless the message arrived while we were travelling, they haven't come back yet."

"When were they due back?" Vickers followed up.

"A little over a week ago?" She answered.

"Is that normal?"

"For a long range patrol?" She wondered. "It's odd. But not outside of reason. Any number of things can cause that much of a delay. Their official follow up time would be two weeks. At that point another, larger, better equipped unit would be dispatched."

"And," He began. "if they weren't delayed?"

"A long range patrol consists of anywhere from fifteen to thirty people, all of whom would have at least passable combat magic. A good portion of them would be archers or other ranged specialists. There'd be at least five mages and a dedicated healer. The rest would be skilled combat veterans, and they'd usually be led by a Sergeant or Guardian."

"None of that matters if they're up against rifles." Vickers countered.

Amina's eyes widened at the idea.

"Oh no." She said.

Vickers began putting things away. "We leave at first light." He said as he unhooked the headset and put it into his bottomless bag. "We'll leave this going for one last call. But whether he answers or not, we're moving."

Amina simply nodded and left for her room, grabbing her sword from beside the table as she did.

I hope we're both wrong. She thought as she opened the door.

\----------

James awoke to something that sounded oddly musical.

He thought for a moment that he was hearing someone playing an instrument. But there seemed to be no melody to the plucking of the strings. Also the tone and reverberation seemed different.

A harp? He wondered. Or maybe some weird kind of suitar or something?

Then the pain returned.

It was everywhere.

"Hrrrrnnnng." He groaned as he tried to move. But his arms stayed fast at his sides. The left one still felt oddly numb, though not as far up as before. The odd, random, notes stopped abruptly. He had the sensation of something suddenly stilling around him.

He opened his eyes, and was startled to find that he could actually see this time.

"You're awake?" Said a halting, faintly masculine voice from somewhere out of sight. "Glad.... to see it."

He was in some kind of room. Though as his eyes moved around (he was glad the left one had decided to join the party) he had the thought that "Room" might have been a touch generous. Where he would've normally expected to see ceiling corners, instead he saw rounded or even jagged slopes. There were also bits of moss, and the occasional stalactite. Odd web-like formations hung from everything, and these seemed to be what was supplying the low level of light that was allowing him to see.

He was in some kind of cave.

"Wh-who..." He began to say, though his throat felt raw and bruised. Most of him did, now that he thought of it. "Who is that?" He struggled to swallow. His throat was so dry. "Where am I?"

Suddenly he felt something move on his face in a way that made him think of an insect. He wanted to brush it away, but like before his arms remained pinned at his sides. Something touched the corner of his mouth and suddenly he felt, and tasted, the flow of some sweet and faintly spicy fluid flow into his mouth.

He tried to fight it. To spit the unexpected intrusion out. But his parched throat and dry tongue worked against him and he drank deeply of the concoction.

"Worry not... little... human." The voice said. "It is safe. You have been without true sustenance for several days now. This shall help.... wean... you back to health."

"Who?" James said, spluttering a bit of the liquid out now that his mouth was re-hydrated. He marveled at the fact that his throat felt so much better now, as if it hadn't been raw only moments before. "Who are you?" He asked again.

"The dwarves brought you to me." The voice answered. "They call me Weaver. Though this is not accurate. I am A... weaver. Weaver is a title.... My title. But not my name."

What the fuck? James wondered.

"Okay." James replied uncertainly. "What's your ACTUAL name then? I'm James by the way."

"James?" It said. "James. James-James." It said, as if testing the name out. "Well met James." It said after a moment. "My true name is Shil'Varyon'Kai of Abel'Motky'Eh the Weaver."

Despite knowing four separate languages fluently at this point in his life, James didn't even attempt to repeat the name.

"Got a shorter version?" He asked instead.

The voice stayed silent for a moment. "You may call me Kai." It said finally.

"Okay Kai." James said. "Nice to meet you. I guess. Would you mind explaining what's going on? Why can't I move."

"Well met James." It replied. "As for what is happening, as I have said; the dwarves brought you to me. I am not a healer, as they seem to treat me. But as a weaver I do have the ability to mend flesh. And that is what I have spent the past two days doing for you." James heard another string plucked note, and suddenly he felt his hands and arms gain a bit of movement. "As for your arms? I had to restrain them to prevent you from hurting yourself. Now that you're awake, you can move them freely. Though I will warn against using the left one. I will also admit some level of curiosity as to its nature."

James brought the two arms up to where he could see them, albeit only faintly in the low, blue, light of the room.

His right arm was covered in some kind of waxy looking coating that also glowed the same faint blue as the stuff on the ceiling. As he flexed it, he felt the bruising and lacerations that were still there, though he couldn't see them past the blue material.

His left hand wasn't covered, and he suddenly understood the numb sensation. It ended just above the wrist.

Oddly, it didn't hurt. Once he'd seen the amputation he'd expected the shock of it to wear off and for pain to set in like the rest of his body. But instead, all he felt was a sort of dull, mostly numb, ache.

"I lost my wolf hand." He said softly.

"You lost most of the arm actually." The voice said with what sounded like sorrow to James. "Though, its.... unique... nature has allowed it to grow back quite a bit since you were brought to me."

"It was worse?" James asked.

"It was amputated above the elbow when you were brought here. As I have said, I am most curious as to how you obtained an arm like that."

"It's.... a long story." James said. " A uh.... gift... so to speak, from a goddess."

"The moon goddess no doubt." Kai replied. "Most fascinating."

"What's this blue stuff on my arm?" James asked. He wanted to pluck at it and poke it, but without a left hand he was stuck simply looking at it. Though he did give it a sniff.

"It is binding web." Kai said. "If you wish to know where it comes from you will need to promise not to panic. You humans tend to do that. Or so I've been told. I must admit that you are the first human I have ever encountered in person."

"Web?" James wondered. "Like.... from spiders?"

"Most correct." Kai said with a hint of cheer. "Are you familiar with spiders?"

"Isn't.....everyone?" James asked uncertainly.

"Not to the extent that myself and my people are." Kai replied. James heard another singular music note. "You may move your head."

Sure enough James suddenly felt something loosen, and was able to move his head. He looked down to try to inspect himself, and to try to see Kai. But instead was greeted by eight softly glowing eyes only a few inches below his chin.

James froze. "Uhhh..... Are you..... Kai?" He asked awkwardly.

Kai laughed, and the noise of it echoed throughout the room. James kept his eyes locked on the spider, wondering if that was where the laughter was coming from, and if so, how.

"No." He said with the last few laughs. "I am not a spider. And her name is not Kai. She is a limb stealer spider, and she is the one that has been keeping you immobile while you heal. She has no name that either of us can vocalize. You need not worry."

Kai played several notes in jarring disharmony, and the spider skittered down James's chest and out of sight.

"Uhhhh. Kai?" James asked.

"Yes James?" Kai asked in return.

"I don't have a spider phobia or anything. But I have to admit that I'm getting some real horror movie flashbacks right now. Can I... see you... real quick? I just need to know what I'm dealing with."

"Certainly." Kai replied. "I have only been remaining hidden because most surface dwellers are uncomfortable with nudity. I have been.... well.... living up to my title, and making some clothes for myself. Though I suppose the current amount covers the necessities."

"Oooooookay...." James said uncertainly.

He began craning his head around to try to see Kai. Each movement hurt like his neck had never felt before. He also felt some things grinding from time to time, though he chose to ignore that. Still, he couldn't see the owner of the voice.

"I am right here." Said Kai suddenly.

James's head snapped forward and center.

Hanging from the ceiling above him was an elf with skin darker than anyone he'd ever seen before, even compared to the few Deep Elves he'd seen in the capital. He was bare down to the waist, and James noticed that he was remarkably muscular. His long, slightly wavy, silver hair hung past his head by a few inches. Around his legs he wore what looked like a pair of yoga pants that seemed to be made of a similar material to the wrap on James's arm, though they glowed a dull red instead of blue.

And in his left hand he held a small circular item that had a myriad of different length and color strings held taut across it.

A pair of spiders the size of mice rapidly ran around Kai's torso, leaving a set of webs behind them as they went, the web was the same red color as his pants.

Kai strummed several cords on the circular instrument, and suddenly he was shifting to the right and lowering to the ground next to James.

"Woah." James said in surprise.

"How are you feeling?" Kai asked. "You were very badly injured when the dwarves brought you here."

James watched the large elf lower, spin, and eventually stand next to him.

"I'm.... a lot better than I would have expected given what happened." James said uncertainly. "Are you the one that healed me?"

Kai's face shifted, one eyebrow raising slightly.

"Healed?" He asked. "No. I don't possess healing magic."

"Then how am I alive. I was hit pretty badly. And I had to have fallen pretty far after." James said.

"True on both accounts." Kai agreed. He held up a hand next to himself. "I must admit that my little workers." A spider the size of a cat crawled over his arm and stood on the palm of his hand. "Are the ones that ACTUALLY saved you. I simply told them how."

"The... spiders.... saved me?" James said, staring at the brown and red creature in the Deep Elf's hand.

"Indeed." Kai confirmed. "They knitted you back together. Kept you from moving and agitating your injuries. Helped you with the pain. And, as you just saw a few minutes ago, kept you fed and watered. Though we will have to get you some food with more.... substance... when we can. Spider wine can only do so much for a human body."

"They knitted me back together?" James asked.

"Extensively." Kai confirmed.

"I had to have had gunshot wounds and tons of broken bones." James said. "Plus who knows how much internal bleeding?"

"I don't know what a gunshot is." Kai admitted. "But I will admit that you were in a very bad way."

"And you fixed me?" James asked. "With spiders?... In two days?"

"Well." Kai said. "We're still fixing you. And I suspect that that Werewolf arm had something to do with the rapidity of it as well."

"Still fixing me?" James wondered.

"Oh yes. As you said, you had EXTENSIVE internal bleeding." Kai repeated. "Several of my spiders are repairing that as we speak."

"You..." James began, suddenly feeling dizzy. "You have... spiders.... inside me? Like... right now?"

"Ugh." Kai huffed. "Humans ARE nervous about spiders."

"They shouldn't...." The room began to spin, James worried that maybe a spider was doing that too. "They shouldn't be inside me." He said before passing out.

Kai sat down on a a web padded rock next to James and played a few notes on his control web. The limb stealer spider brought James's head and arms back into place and held them there again.

"I suppose I should let the dwarves know that he woke up." He said. "I was hoping to learn more about him before he went back down." He said as he pouted.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xxiac2/wait_is_this_just_gate_236/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (234/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah yeah, plot armor and what not. It's not like you guys didn't see his survival coming. I'm like the gods of the setting (though less of a dick, at least in my opinion), Choi doesn't die until he's done with the story he's in. And yes, there are some Chekov's guns sprinkled into this chapter. You don't always need to point them out.

Enjoy.

\~

Batty smiled as he saw the Chois enter his room.

He was propped up against the headboard of his bed with a couple of pillows and had just gotten done with another healing session only a few minutes earlier. He still didn't know what he thought of the odd people running the so-called healing ward. He also didn't completely believe in the amber glow of the healing "spells" that they cast on his wounded abdomen, though he couldn't deny the effects of them either.

"Batty!" Joey exclaimed as he ran forward and hugged the wounded soldier. He quickly withdrew when he heard the gasp of pain that Batista emitted from the embrace. "Sorry." He said as he pulled back.

"All good dude." Batty said as he adjusted himself.

"We're so glad to hear that you're awake." Mrs. Choi said with a look of worry. "How are you?"

Batty considered his situation.

"I'm.... alive." He said uncertainly. He gestured at the room around him. "I don't know what the hell all this is. It seems like some kind of hallucination. But I don't think I'd hallucinate this kind of pain," He placed a hand on his vastly disfigured stomach. "if I was dreaming. Plus I always have my normal leg in my dreams."

He laughed a little, cringing as the motion made his stomach hurt again. Then he saw the looks on their faces. The discomfort.

"Hey." He said with a touch of effort. "I'm just glad I got you guys through. That was the job."

"We owe you." Mrs. Choi said with a weak smile. "You almost got killed to bring us here. And now We've got James back."

"And I'm learning magic." Joey said with a beaming smile.

Batty's eyebrows furrowed at the addition. "For real?" He asked. Joey nodded. "That's pretty fuckin' cool." He cringed at the expletive. Then he fell back a bit. "So magic is real?" He wondered.

"It is here." Mrs. Choi "And its.... a lot."

"I've seen a bit." He said. "They... use it on my stomach." He moved his head in an uncertain gesture. "It works... mostly."

"How bad is it?" She asked.

He shrugged slightly. "Could be worse." He admitted. "Coulda been crippled. But I can still feel and move my legs." He grunted with some effort as he wiggled his toes, causing the blankets to shake and flutter around them. "Well, you know.... one leg. The fake one would move no matter what."

"That's good." Mrs. Choi agreed.

"Yeah. They said it'll be a while before we know how my stomach is doing. They got all the guts more or less back in place and duct taped together. Lost a few feet of intestine and one of my kidneys. Plus some other stuff I don't know much about. I aint got the schooling that you or your son have. Didn't sound good though." He used his arms to pull himself up a bit more. He winced and his jaw hardened from clenching against the pain. "Muscles are shredded." He added. "And not in the sexy, get-chicks-at-the-beach kinda way. Hence all the difficulty moving."

"I'm sorry." She said as she placed a hand on his shoulder.

"Don't be." He said with a smile. "I did it to help my boy Choi. I'd do it again. Although I'd probably dodge." He said with a look of introspection. "Besides, they said he helped out when they first got me in here. Said he probably saved my life."

"Really?" Joey asked. "How?"

Batty shrugged. "Based on what they explained, it sounds like he hooked up a shitload of I.V.'s and even gave me some of his own blood. They said the blood was probably what did the most good too."

"His blood?" Joey wondered. "Really?"

Batty nodded. "Yep. They said that a combination of his, and I'm quoting here, MAGICALLY SATURATED blood made their healing magic more effective once it was inside me. Plus they think that his WEREWOLF ARM???" He looked at the two of them with a dubious expression. "Might have given me some limited regenerative capability?" He let the words sink in for a moment. "Does Choi have a werewolf arm now? Is that a thing?"

"He totally does." Joey said with a massive smile. "It's so awesome. It's kinda like something out of an anime."

"Okay." Batty said. "I'm gonna need to be caught up on some stuff." He placed a hand on Joey's shoulder, startling him somewhat. "You give me the info." He pointed at Mrs. Choi. "You keep him from spiraling out of control."

"I'll.... do what I can." Mrs. Choi replied. "Doubt it'll work though."

\------------------------

Nguyen watched as the Major became increasingly agitated by the search for the downed flyer.

It had been two hours since Driscoll and the other Muck Marchers, along with a small contingent of the other military personnel, had left on the search for the intruder. And so far, nothing had been found.

The command tent had grown awkwardly silent as the search had continued.

The Major, naturally, was the one who broke that silence.

"Get Corporal Johannsen on the radio." She said from where she was standing, staring at the different feeds.

"Yes ma'am." Replied the young soldier at the communication desk. "Corporal Johannsen, this is command, come in."

"Yeah. Johannsen here." The marine replied a moment later. "What's going on?"

The Major stepped up next to the comm tech and grabbed the handset.

"Johannsen this is the Major. How certain are you that the target was downed?" The way she asked the question made it sound almost like an accusation. The Corporal on the other end seemed to sense as much.

"Well ma'am." Johannsen shot back, a tone of snark that made Nguyen wince evident in his voice. "I didn't double tap like I normally would because you restricted ammo expenditures." He continued. "But you were in here when I dropped him. You saw the damage. AND you saw the enhanced footage once the rigs had parsed the data a bit better. Plus the other two triangulated the fall site." He paused for a moment, and without knowing it because of his lack of visual, cut off the Major's response before she started. "He was surrounded by debris and missing an arm. Plus he was in freefall. Probably dead. But at the very least unconscious. And nobody survives that kinda fall."

Nguyen watched her think. She HAD been in the tent with Johannsen when he'd hit the target. And Nguyen had seen the same footage. Whoever it had been, flying through the air, they'd definitely been chewed up by the incoming stream of intercepting fire.

The Major was about to speak when she was cut off again. Nguyen watched her jaw clench in frustration until she recognized the voice.

"Found it." Said Driscoll from wherever he was out in the desert. "Rodriguez found the impact site. Check his feed." He added. "Bit of an issue though."

Everyone in the command tent looked over at the monitor, one of the soldiers brought the feed in question onto the main screen.

The image it showed reminded Nguyen of.... something. Something he'd seen once, though he couldn't place it at the moment. It looked like a cone of collapsed sand. As if someone had dug a hole or, in this case, blasted one out and it had fallen back in on itself.

"Where is he?" The Major asked, her jaw clenched again.

In the collapsed hole was blood coated sand. Lots of blood coated sand. There was also debris; what looked like a bunch of bits of broken chain, some bits and pieces that looked like armor or padded clothing, a section of some kind of blade, maybe a sword or a long knife. And in the middle of the hole, was the lower half of an arm, covered in singed fur, and ending in a set of wicked clawed fingers, though two were missing.

Then the memory clicked within his mind. The images of a documentary he'd watched in middle school biology snapping into place as he looked at the hole.

"Antlions." He muttered to himself.

"What?" The Major asked.

He shook his head as he remembered her presence. And anger at the current situation.

"Nothing. Just... an old memory." He gestured for the handset she was holding.

She seemed to think for a moment, then handed it to him warily.

"Chief Rodriguez, First Sergeant Nguyen. Any sign of an exit?" He asked.

The feed panned around for a few moments, looking at the area around the hole.

"None that I can see First Sergeant. Sensors don't pick up any trails either." Rodriguez replied in a deep and scratchy voice.

"Your rigs have sensors that can penetrate underground right?" Nguyen asked.

"Ehhh. We do. But they work a lot better under water." Rodriguez said.

"What are you getting at Nguyen?" Driscoll chimed in.

"Remember how you got here Chief?" Nguyen asked. "The fight? We didn't get all the dwarves. And we haven't seen any leave via the pass."

Next to him he saw the Major realize where he was going. He continued.

"They used this desert as an entry point to the Deep Dark." He said. "And they specialized, as you saw on arrival, in magic that helped them move through the sand."

"Riiiiight." Driscoll replied. "That underground web of horror filled tunnels you guys got some minor intel about before you got to this desert." He paused as they all saw his feed show him nearing the site. "Shit." He added as he got to it.

"My rig is sensing an air pocket roughly twenty below." Rodriguez cut in.

"Fuck!" The Major exclaimed as she turned around with her hands on her head.

"We'll start sounding out an entrance." Driscoll said over the radio. "We'll figure out an op and see if he's still down there."

\------------------------

James awoke to three things in descending levels of importance:

1: Pain.

2: Complete and utter darkness.

3: The sound of shuffling feet.

The first of these he understood. He remembered the struggle to maneuver through the air, blasting and jetting his way around the sky as he attempted to avoid the incoming fire. He remembered turning and realizing how he'd been played by whoever was operating the Miffy's down below. He remembered the last act of defiant resistance as he'd seen his impending end.

As a result, the ability to wake into a world of pain came as a surprise to him. Not a pleasant one. Not in the state that his body was telling him he was in. But at the very least, it was a welcome one.

The second of these issues was a touch more troubling. He blinked, though it felt as though his left eye didn't want too, and still saw nothing. He wanted to rub his eyes, but neither arm would respond to it. His right arm screamed in pain, and his left arm felt oddly numb. He began to wonder if he had gone blind. Though, he supposed that wasn't the worst trade off considering what he'd somehow miraculously managed to survive.

Lastly, he had the issue of the noise around him.

It was muffled on his left side, and he wondered if his ear on that side was having the same kind of issue his eye and arm were. The noise was still recognizable, though it echoed oddly, and as his pain addled mind focused he estimated that there had to be at least three people around him, maybe more, but the echoes made it difficult. The throbbing pain of bobbing up and down helped him realize that he was being moved somewhere, though he couldn't feel how.

He needed to know more.

^("Wh-") He began. But he was cut off by a dreadful pain in his chest as he tried to speak. Something inside him was moving, and it wasn't supposed to. He tried again. ^("Who?")

One of the shuffling people paused, he could tell that much. But a gruff, yet understandable, voice prodded them back into movement.

"Get a move on. We gotta get 'im to Weaver fast." The voice said.

"Just thought I heard something." The stopper said as they began moving again.

Dammit. James thought as he tried to breath through the pain of whatever had happened to him.

^("Wh-") He began again. He winced as he felt the moving thing inside of him move again from his breathing. Something was broken in there. Probably a lot of things. "Who?" He forced out in a raspingly painful voice.

"Holy hells." The first voice said as they all came to a sudden stop. "He's awake."

Suddenly. Painfully. James saw a familiar light. It was amber gold in color as it encompassed a small, but broad and rough looking, hand. The light made his eyes hurt, even as it made him happy that he could see, though only barely on his left side. It rose up over his eyes and he knew what was coming. It had happened startlingly often since he'd come to this world.

But he needed to see who was around him. His pained, half broken, mind focused on that goal.

And he saw four dwarves, that he didn't recognize, surrounding him.

"Quiet lad." The owner of the hand said. "You're lucky to live, much less wake." The dwarf woman said as she pressed the hand to his eyes.

James felt the calm, pain lessening, sleepiness of a healing rest begin to take him.

"Who?" He asked weakly just as he began to fade back out.

"Friends." The first voice said. "Anyone THEY attack, is a friend of ours. What few we have down here."

Then James was back in the darkness again.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xwo6wv/wait_is_this_just_gate_235/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (234/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah yeah, plot armor and what not. It's not like you guys didn't see his survival coming. I'm like the gods of the setting (though less of a dick, at least in my opinion), Choi doesn't die until he's done with the story he's in. And yes, there are some Chekov's guns sprinkled into this chapter. You don't always need to point them out.

Enjoy.

\~

Batty smiled as he saw the Chois enter his room.

He was propped up against the headboard of his bed with a couple of pillows and had just gotten done with another healing session only a few minutes earlier. He still didn't know what he thought of the odd people running the so-called healing ward. He also didn't completely believe in the amber glow of the healing "spells" that they cast on his wounded abdomen, though he couldn't deny the effects of them either.

"Batty!" Joey exclaimed as he ran forward and hugged the wounded soldier. He quickly withdrew when he heard the gasp of pain that Batista emitted from the embrace. "Sorry." He said as he pulled back.

"All good dude." Batty said as he adjusted himself.

"We're so glad to hear that you're awake." Mrs. Choi said with a look of worry. "How are you?"

Batty considered his situation.

"I'm.... alive." He said uncertainly. He gestured at the room around him. "I don't know what the hell all this is. It seems like some kind of hallucination. But I don't think I'd hallucinate this kind of pain," He placed a hand on his vastly disfigured stomach. "if I was dreaming. Plus I always have my normal leg in my dreams."

He laughed a little, cringing as the motion made his stomach hurt again. Then he saw the looks on their faces. The discomfort.

"Hey." He said with a touch of effort. "I'm just glad I got you guys through. That was the job."

"We owe you." Mrs. Choi said with a weak smile. "You almost got killed to bring us here. And now We've got James back."

"And I'm learning magic." Joey said with a beaming smile.

Batty's eyebrows furrowed at the addition. "For real?" He asked. Joey nodded. "That's pretty fuckin' cool." He cringed at the expletive. Then he fell back a bit. "So magic is real?" He wondered.

"It is here." Mrs. Choi "And its.... a lot."

"I've seen a bit." He said. "They... use it on my stomach." He moved his head in an uncertain gesture. "It works... mostly."

"How bad is it?" She asked.

He shrugged slightly. "Could be worse." He admitted. "Coulda been crippled. But I can still feel and move my legs." He grunted with some effort as he wiggled his toes, causing the blankets to shake and flutter around them. "Well, you know.... one leg. The fake one would move no matter what."

"That's good." Mrs. Choi agreed.

"Yeah. They said it'll be a while before we know how my stomach is doing. They got all the guts more or less back in place and duct taped together. Lost a few feet of intestine and one of my kidneys. Plus some other stuff

I don't know much about. I aint got the schooling that you or your son have. Didn't sound good though." He used his arms to pull himself up a bit more. He winced and his jaw hardened from clenching against the pain. "Muscles are shredded." He added. "And not in the sexy, get-chicks-at-the-beach kinda way. Hence all the difficulty moving."

"I'm sorry." She said as she placed a hand on his shoulder.

"Don't be." He said with a smile. "I did it to help my boy Choi. I'd do it again. Although I'd probably dodge." He said with a look of introspection. "Besides, they said he helped out when they first got me in here. Said he probably saved my life."

"Really?" Joey asked. "How?"

Batty shrugged. "Based on what they explained, it sounds like he hooked up a shitload of I.V.'s and even gave me some of his own blood. They said the blood was probably what did the most good too."

"His blood?" Joey wondered. "Really?"

Batty nodded. "Yep. They said that a combination of his, and I'm quoting here, MAGICALLY SATURATED blood made their healing magic more effective once it was inside me. Plus they think that his WEREWOLF ARM???" He looked at the two of them with a dubious expression. "Might have given me some limited regenerative capability?" He let the words sink in for a moment. "Does Choi have a werewolf arm now? Is that a thing?"

"He totally does." Joey said with a massive smile. "It's so awesome. It's kinda like something out of an anime."

"Okay." Batty said. "I'm gonna need to be caught up on some stuff." He placed a hand on Joey's shoulder, startling him somewhat. "You give me the info." He pointed at Mrs. Choi. "You keep him from spiraling out of control."

"I'll.... do what I can." Mrs. Choi replied. "Doubt it'll work though."

\-------------------------

Nguyen watched as the Major became increasingly agitated by the search for the downed flyer.

It had been two hours since Driscoll and the other Muck Marchers, along with a small contingent of the other military personnel, had left on the search for the intruder. And so far, nothing had been found.

The command tent had grown awkwardly silent as the search had continued.

The Major, naturally, was the one who broke that silence.

"Get Corporal Johannsen on the radio." She said from where she was standing, staring at the different feeds.

"Yes ma'am." Replied the young soldier at the communication desk. "Corporal Johannsen, this is command, come in."

"Yeah. Johannsen here." The marine replied a moment later. "What's going on?"

The Major stepped up next to the comm tech and grabbed the handset.

"Johannsen this is the Major. How certain are you that the target was downed?" The way she asked the question made it sound almost like an accusation. The Corporal on the other end seemed to sense as much.

"Well ma'am." Johannsen shot back, a tone of snark that made Nguyen wince, evident in his voice. "I didn't double tap like I normally would because you restricted ammo expenditures." He continued. "But you were in here when I dropped him. You saw the damage. AND you saw the enhanced footage once the rigs had parsed the data a bit better. Plus the other two triangulated the fall site." He paused for a moment, and without knowing it because of his lack of visual, cut off the Major's response before she started. "He was surrounded by debris and missing an arm. Plus he was in freefall. Probably dead. But at the very least unconscious. And nobody survives that kinda fall."

Nguyen watched her think. She HAD been in the tent with Johannsen when he'd hit the target. And Nguyen had seen the same footage. Whoever it had been, flying through the air, they'd definitely been chewed up by the incoming stream of intercepting fire.

The Major was about to speak when she was cut off again. Nguyen watched her jaw clench in frustration until she recognized the voice.

"Found it." Said Driscoll from wherever he was out in the desert. "Rodriguez found the impact site. Check his feed." He added. "Bit of an issue though."

Everyone in the command tent looked over at the monitor, one of the soldiers brought the feed in question onto the main screen.

The image it showed reminded Nguyen of.... something. Something he'd seen once, though he couldn't place it at the moment. It looked like a cone of collapsed sand. As if someone had dug a hole or, in this case, blasted one out and it had fallen back in on itself.

"Where is he?" The Major asked, her jaw clenched again.

In the collapsed hole was blood coated sand. Lots of blood coated sand. There was also debris; what looked like a bunch of bits of broken chain, some bits and pieces that looked like armor or padded clothing, a section of some kind of blade, maybe a sword or a long knife. And in the middle of the hole, was the lower half of an arm, covered in singed fur, and ending in a set of wicked clawed fingers, though two were missing.

Then the memory clicked within his mind. The images of a documentary he'd watched in middle school biology snapping into place as he looked at the hole.

"Antlions." He muttered to himself.

"What?" The Major asked.

He shook his head as he remembered her presence. And anger at the current situation.

"Nothing. Just... an old memory." He gestured for the handset she was holding.

She seemed to think for a moment, then handed it to him warily.

"Chief Rodriguez, First Sergeant Nguyen. Any sign of an exit?" He asked.

The feed panned around for a few moments, looking at the area around the hole.

"None that I can see First Sergeant. Sensors don't pick up any trails either." Rodriguez replied in a deep and scratchy voice.

"Your rigs have sensors that can penetrate underground right?" Nguyen asked.

"Ehhh. We do. But they work a lot better under water." Rodriguez said.

"What are you getting at Nguyen?" Driscoll chimed in.

"Remember how you got here Chief?" Nguyen asked. "The fight? We didn't get all the dwarves. And we haven't seen any leave via the pass."

Next to him he saw the Major realize where he was going. He continued.

"They used this desert as an entry point to the Deep Dark." He said. "And they specialized, as you saw on arrival, in magic that helped them move through the sand."

"Riiiiight." Driscoll replied. "That underground web of horror filled tunnels you guys got some minor intel about before you got to this desert." He paused as they all saw his feed show him nearing the site. "Shit." He added as he got to it.

"My rig is sensing an air pocket roughly twenty below." Rodriguez cut in.

"Fuck!" The Major exclaimed as she turned around with her hands on her head.

"We'll start sounding out an entrance." Driscoll said over the radio. "We'll figure out an op and see if he's still down there."

\------------------------

James awoke to three things in descending levels of importance:

1: Pain.

2: Complete and utter darkness.

3: The sound of shuffling feet.

The first of these he understood. He remembered the struggle to maneuver through the air, blasting and jetting his way around the sky as he attempted to avoid the incoming fire. He remembered turning and realizing how he'd been played by whoever was operating the Miffy's down below. He remembered the last act of defiant resistance as he'd seen his impending end.

As a result, the ability to wake into a world of pain came as a surprise to him. Not a pleasant one. Not in the state that his body was telling him he was in. But at the very least, it was a welcome one.

The second of these issues was a touch more troubling. He blinked, though it felt as though his left eye didn't want too, and still saw nothing. He wanted to rub his eyes, but neither arm would respond to it. His right arm screamed in pain, and his left arm felt oddly numb. He began to wonder if he had gone blind. Though, he supposed that wasn't the worst trade off considering what he'd somehow miraculously managed to survive.

Lastly, he had the issue of the noise around him.

It was muffled on his left side, and he wondered if his ear on that side was having the same kind of issue his eye and arm were. The noise was still recognizable, though it echoed oddly, and as his pain addled mind focused he estimated that there had to be at least three people around him, maybe more, but the echoes made it difficult. The throbbing pain of bobbing up and down helped him realize that he was being moved somewhere, though he couldn't feel how.

He needed to know more.

^("Wh-") He began. But he was cut off by a dreadful pain in his chest as he tried to speak. Something inside him was moving, and it wasn't supposed to. He tried again. ^("Who?")

One of the shuffling people paused, he could tell that much. But a gruff, yet understandable, voice prodded them back into movement.

"Get a move on. We gotta get 'im to Weaver fast." The voice said.

"Just thought I heard something." The stopper said as they began moving again.

Dammit. James thought as he tried to breath through the pain of whatever had happened to him.

^("Wh-") He began again. He winced as he felt the moving thing inside of him move again from his breathing. Something was broken in there. Probably a lot of things. "Who?" He forced out in a raspingly painful voice.

"Holy hells." The first voice said as they all came to a sudden stop. "He's awake."

Suddenly. Painfully. James saw a familiar light. It was amber gold in color as it encompassed a small, but broad and rough looking, hand. The light made his eyes hurt, even as it made him happy that he could see, though only barely on his left side. It rose up over his eyes and he knew what was coming. It had happened startlingly often since he'd come to this world.

But he needed to see who was around him. His pained, half broken, mind focused on that goal.

And he saw four dwarves, that he didn't recognize, surrounding him.

"Quiet lad." The owner of the hand said. "You're lucky to live, much less wake." The dwarf woman said as she pressed the hand to his eyes.

James felt the calm, pain lessening, sleepiness of a healing rest begin to take him.

"Who?" He asked weakly just as he began to fade back out.

"Friends." The first voice said. "Anyone THEY attack, is a friend of ours. What few we have down here."

Then James was back in the darkness again.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xwo2vk/wait_is_this_just_gate_235/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (233/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Usually when I introduce a new weapon, or vehicle, or some other aspect of the military in this setting, y'all eat that shit up and ask me twenty billion questions that I either answer vaguely or outright ignore.

But when I introduced the Miffy you guys were REMARKABLY quiet.

Well. Now you're learning what they are first hand. Or rather, James is.

Enjoy.

Edit: I forgot to tell yall that I posted a visual for everyone's favorite manic-pixie-dream-mage on r/GATEhouse

\~

That's gotta be it. James thought as he spotted the desert that fit the description they'd been given by the General's message. Took four days instead of three, but that's alright. Knew it might be difficult. Adjusting his angle, and his casting focus, he lowered himself down a few hundred feet as he flew. He wiped some of the grime off of his goggles, which he'd bought at one of the towns on the way, with a gloved hand and looked down.

Wow, lot bigger than I thought.

He landed on a peak at the edge of the desert. It wasn't the largest, he could see one on the southern side that had to be almost twice its size. But he wanted to see just what he could see.

He pulled the pouch with the glasses out and checked to make sure that the signal blocking mesh was properly secured, not that they had much signal out here. Or at least they shouldn't. Seeing that it was still tightly fastened, he placed the glasses on his face and hit the button that turned them on. He pulled a piece of jerky out and chewed it just as he did.

His vision quickly darkened as the glasses went through their initial, though fairly quick, boot-up process. Once they were done with that he saw quick pinpricks of light lance into his eyes as the glasses user-facing sensors adjusted to his vision. He and Joey had both gotten lucky, neither of them had ended up with their father's eyes. He'd had to get surgery to fix his vision before either of them had been born. But James and Joey both saw fine without glasses.

Once the glasses had adjusted to him he turned the knob built into the left side of the frame. He watched, with only a slightly awestruck smile, as the glasses zoomed in on the landscape in front of him. But like any other digital camera, the view grew grainier and more pixelated as he zoomed. He found a happy medium, where the multiple cameras had zoomed enough to actually be useful while still being clear enough to see details, and then he began flipping through the different visual spectrums.

After a few minutes of panning around, James sighed. This was gonna be harder than he thought.

He wasn't surprised. It was, as he'd already noticed, a fairly large desert. Even with his position at least a mile up above it, human vision, enhanced or not, could only see so far. He finished the piece of jerky, drank a bit of water, and began gathering energy into his legs again.

\----------

Corporal Johannsen sipped at his re-hydrated cider absently as he watched the M.F.F.V. monitoring screens.

When he'd signed on with the corps he'd done so for the same reason a lot of young men did. He'd needed to get out of the place he'd been living and have a solid job that got him three hot meals and cot all to himself. The fact that he was a born brawler and a damn good driver had only helped him during his training, and when he'd learned that he was going to be operating an Miffy he'd been excited.

He'd forgotten that once set in their positions, M.F.F.V.'s were almost entirely automated.

That fact had been driven home very quickly once he'd gotten past boot and into job specific training. Only the first week or so had been about actually OPERATING the vehicles. The other month and a half had been focused on learning how to read their, admittedly complex, control panels and how to designate targets.

In short, Johannsen had been taught how to play Asteroid on a two and a half million dollar anti-armor interception and defense vehicle with an interface that looked less like a video game and more like the control panel to a fighter jet, but with a shittier view.

His pride had been the only thing that had prevented him from intentionally failing his way into a different field. That and the fact that he'd found one of his instructors incredibly hot, and had wanted to impress him, though sadly the SSgt in question had been straight..... and married.

If anything he'd ended up being TOO GOOD at operating the M.F.F.V. interface and controls.

Now, he was in a different world, answering to an Army Major of all people, sitting in a godforsaken desert, staring at a panel that was never going to light up with an incoming enemy drone, or jet, or missile, or.... well... anything really. Hell, he hadn't even pinged any local birds.

This posting sucked.

He spun around in his chair as he reflected on the luck of a jarhead in fantasyland.

He was so bored and half tired that he missed the blinking red light the first time he'd spun past it.

But on the second spin he saw it, and his legs quickly shot down to the rubber mat beneath him and arrested his rotation. He quickly turned back and... sure enough... there was incoming.

He flipped the toggle that activated the radio built into the panel.

"Hey.... uhhh. First Sergeant. It's Johannsen at the Miffy controls." He said uncertainly. "We got incoming."

"Say again Johannsen." Nguyen's voice crackled through the radio set. "You say we got incoming?"

"Sure do First Sergeant." He replied. "Want me to patch a barrel feed to your tab?"

"You can do that?" Nguyen asked. Johannsen resisted the urge to get snarky. Of course the Miffy's could do that. "Yeah. Uh... send it over I guess."

"Copy. I'll pull up the best visual." He said as he began switching between the camera feeds between the three different trucks that were tracking it. "Looks like Miffy three has the best view. Sending you the feed now."

"Ok.... got it." Nguyen said a moment later.

"Is that...." Johannsen started. "A person?"

"If it is, it aint one of ours." Nguyen replied. "Look at that armor. And they're flying like the damn Rocketeer."

"Sounds like you should take the shot Corporal Johannsen." The Major cut in, though her voice sounded odd to Johannsen. Suddenly the flap to his tent opened and closes and she stepped in with him. "At you're leisure corporal."

"Yes ma'am." He said, sitting up straighter. Whether she was Army or not, he knew better than to look bad in front of an officer. His hands went to the fire controls. "First burst now." He said as he lifted up the cover and held the button down for three seconds. By the book.

Outside, at a position roughly a mile away, he heard the muffled BRRRRRRRT sound of the massive rotary cannon firing.

Even though he hated his job, Corporal Johannsen loved that sound.

\----------

The only reason James didn't get shredded by the incoming fire was because of the glasses.

He'd spotted the camp only moments before. He'd had a moment of elation, silently pumping a fist as he flew, when he'd spotted the M.F.F.V.'s.

Everyone in the service knew about the legendary Miffy. They'd helped the U.S. gain fire superiority late in the war, allowing them to knock out enemy attack craft, incoming missiles, incoming artillery, and much more. The fact that they could also be aimed at ground targets, and could even be used as artillery in their own right, all while being able to move at close to highway speeds, just made them even better.

They'd practically become the golden standard for how to defend any base that didn't have the luxury of setting up permanent, and costly, defensive systems.

He'd just been about to verbalize the fact that they were there. Then the zoomed in vision of the glasses had shown rapid flashes of light emitting from the ends of the Miffy's barrel.

James had known instinctively what that meant.

In only a heartbeat he'd redirected the energy keeping him in the air, to his eyes and arms.

As his left arm shot out to the side and redirected him with a blast of high pressure air, his right arm had to reach up and rip the glasses from his face. The glare from his eyes glowing with golden light had reflected off of the inside of their lenses and nearly blinded him.

As he opened them again, he saw just how close he'd come to being shredded by the ground weapon.

He watched in the slow motion that his reflex enhancing vision gave him, as a stream of lead and depleted uranium rounds that flowed like water streamed through the spot he'd been in only a split second ago.

Even with his vision the projectiles were moving so fast

Shit. He thought. I can't outrun one of those things. They shoot down freakin' missiles.

He turned back just in time to see a second burst of fire coming toward him. It looked like an angry black blob that seemed to grow. Then he realized that that was because it was getting closer.

No time. OLD SCHOOL!!

BOOM!

\----------

"Jesus Christ, did he just explode?" Johannsen asked as his finger hovered over the fire button. Then his eyes caught the new target beacon out of the corner of his vision. He looked at truck five's feed. "What the fuck? How's he over there now?"

"What's wrong?" The Major asked over his shoulder.

"He's a zippy little shit." Johannsen said absently.

"Can you get him?"

"Course I can get him." He said with a hint of anger. "I've shot down goddamn MAC rounds. This guy's nothing."

He hit the toggles that would engage the other trucks to fire simultaneously. Though he kept the ammo conservation engaged. This would allow up to four of the Miffy's to engage at once if they had a viable shot. He also began spinning his finger in small, tight, circles on the manual targeting pad, causing the cross-hairs to spin around the intruding flyer.

"Dodge this rocket man." He said as he hit the fire button.

\------------------

I need to gain some distance. James thought as he dodged the second volley. I need more reaction time.

Then as he spun to change his angle, he saw just how screwed he was.

This time there were three separate streams of rounds coming at him from three different angles. And these ones were bigger, more spread out.

Oh, what the fuck? He thought as he felt the energy hit its crescendo in his feet.

He quickly lifted his right leg at an angle and activated the spell.

BO-BOOM!

The pressure of the two opposing explosions made his knees and hips hurt. Even with the sudden change of trajectory he knew he'd only missed that attack by inches, if even that much.

Then he saw the a fourth stream that was already about to intercept him as he flew upside down.

SHIT!

He reacted by instinct. Before he even realized what he was doing his wolf hand had the mage's blade in it. His other hand reached forward with his chain in it, it was hard to tell because of how fast he was moving, but he knew that his wind magic was bringing the chain to life as it uncoiled from around him. His mouth opened, and inky blueish-black bolts of lightning began emitting from it in a cone. He felt his feet growing hot with energy.

He didn't do it with any hope of success. He knew the kind of ammo these things fired. And he had a sword, some chain, and a bit of lightning that would probably do fuck all.

He was going to die.

That didn't stop him from trying.

FUCK YOU! He thought defiantly.

The three different projectiles; oversized intercepting bullets, wind imbued chain, and death bolts, met only a fraction of a second before the Mage's blade felt the first impact.

BOOM!

\----------

"YEAH! FUCK YOU!" Johannsen shouted triumphantly as he shot to his feet. "You dodgy little shit!"

Out of the corner of his eye he saw the little light that meant there was still a moving body in the air. But his eyes remained locked on the video feed.

On it he watched as the body of the flying intruder fell from the air. He quickly swiped up on the control next to the manual aim pad and zoomed in.

He grinned as he saw the limp form tumbling, with what looked like several parts falling beside it.

His finger hovered over the fire button, temptation to "double tap" the target, like he'd been trained, itching at it. But he'd been told on day one that they were in a limited ammunition scenario here, and he'd just spent quite a bit of the valuable commodity.

Instead he watched, and waited, for the rocket-man to do something. The feed tracking them just like the cannons they were attached to, until he'd gone low enough that dunes were between him and the cannons.

Nobody could pull up from that elevation loss in time. Not after the hit they'd just taken. He was surprised there was anything left but little bits and pieces.

He pulled his hand away.

"Target down ma'am." He said with a grin.

She smiled from where she watched the feed. "Well done Corporal. Check your ammo and have your crew redistribute if necessary." She turned to leave, activating her radio as she did. "Chief Driscoll, I assume you were watching?" She asked. She paused, and Johannsen wondered why he couldn't hear the other side of the conversation if it was on the radio. Then she spoke again. "Good. Let's go see who our visitor.... was."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xvq8zf/wait_is_this_just_gate_234/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (233/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Usually when I introduce a new weapon, or vehicle, or some other aspect of the military in this setting, y'all eat that shit up and ask me twenty billion questions that I either answer vaguely or outright ignore.

But when I introduced the Miffy you guys were REMARKABLY quiet.

Well. Now you're learning what they are first hand. Or rather, James is.

Enjoy.

*Edit: I also forgot to mention that I posted a visual for everybody's favorite manic-pixie-dream-
*mage on r/GATEhouse

\~

That's gotta be it. James thought as he spotted the desert that fit the description they'd been given by the General's message. Took four days instead of three, but that's alright. Knew it might be difficult. Adjusting his angle, and his casting focus, he lowered himself down a few hundred feet as he flew. He wiped some of the grime off of his goggles, which he'd bought at one of the towns on the way, with a gloved hand and looked down.

Wow, lot bigger than I thought.

He landed on a peak at the edge of the desert. It wasn't the largest, he could see one on the southern side that had to be almost twice its size. But he wanted to see just what he could see.

He pulled the pouch with the glasses out and checked to make sure that the signal blocking mesh was properly secured, not that they had much signal out here. Or at least they shouldn't. Seeing that it was still tightly fastened, he placed the glasses on his face and hit the button that turned them on. He pulled a piece of jerky out and chewed it just as he did.

His vision quickly darkened as the glasses went through their initial, though fairly quick, boot-up process. Once they were done with that he saw quick pinpricks of light lance into his eyes as the glasses user-facing sensors adjusted to his vision. He and Joey had both gotten lucky, neither of them had ended up with their father's eyes. He'd had to get surgery to fix his vision before either of them had been born. But James and Joey both saw fine without glasses.

Once the glasses had adjusted to him he turned the knob built into the left side of the frame. He watched, with only a slightly awestruck smile, as the glasses zoomed in on the landscape in front of him. But like any other digital camera, the view grew grainier and more pixelated as he zoomed. He found a happy medium, where the multiple cameras had zoomed enough to actually be useful while still being clear enough to see details, and then he began flipping through the different visual spectrums.

After a few minutes of panning around, James sighed. This was gonna be harder than he thought.

He wasn't surprised. It was, as he'd already noticed, a fairly large desert. Even with his position at least a mile up above it, human vision, enhanced or not, could only see so far. He finished the piece of jerky, drank a bit of water, and began gathering energy into his legs again.

\----------

Corporal Johannsen sipped at his re-hydrated cider absently as he watched the M.F.F.V. monitoring screens.

When he'd signed on with the corps he'd done so for the same reason a lot of young men did. He'd needed to get out of the place he'd been living and have a solid job that got him three hot meals and cot all to himself. The fact that he was a born brawler and a damn good driver had only helped him during his training, and when he'd learned that he was going to be operating an Miffy he'd been excited.

He'd forgotten that once set in their positions, M.F.F.V.'s were almost entirely automated.

That fact had been driven home very quickly once he'd gotten past boot and into job specific training. Only the first week or so had been about actually OPERATING the vehicles. The other month and a half had been focused on learning how to read their, admittedly complex, control panels and how to designate targets.

In short, Johannsen had been taught how to play Asteroid on a two and a half million dollar anti-armor interception and defense vehicle with an interface that looked less like a video game and more like the control panel to a fighter jet, but with a shittier view.

His pride had been the only thing that had prevented him from intentionally failing his way into a different field. That and the fact that he'd found one of his instructors incredibly hot, and had wanted to impress him, though sadly the SSgt in question had been straight..... and married.

If anything he'd ended up being TOO GOOD at operating the M.F.F.V. interface and controls.

Now, he was in a different world, answering to an Army Major of all people, sitting in a godforsaken desert, staring at a panel that was never going to light up with an incoming enemy drone, or jet, or missile, or.... well... anything really. Hell, he hadn't even pinged any local birds.

This posting sucked.

He spun around in his chair as he reflected on the luck of a jarhead in fantasyland.

He was so bored and half tired that he missed the blinking red light the first time he'd spun past it.

But on the second spin he saw it, and his legs quickly shot down to the rubber mat beneath him and arrested his rotation. He quickly turned back and... sure enough... there was incoming.

He flipped the toggle that activated the radio built into the panel.

"Hey.... uhhh. First Sergeant. It's Johannsen at the Miffy controls." He said uncertainly. "We got incoming."

"Say again Johannsen." Nguyen's voice crackled through the radio set. "You say we got incoming?"

"Sure do First Sergeant." He replied. "Want me to patch a barrel feed to your tab?"

"You can do that?" Nguyen asked. Johannsen resisted the urge to get snarky. Of course the Miffy's could do that. "Yeah. Uh... send it over I guess."

"Copy. I'll pull up the best visual." He said as he began switching between the camera feeds between the three different trucks that were tracking it. "Looks like Miffy three has the best view. Sending you the feed now."

"Ok.... got it." Nguyen said a moment later.

"Is that...." Johannsen started. "A person?"

"If it is, it aint one of ours." Nguyen replied. "Look at that armor. And they're flying like the damn Rocketeer."

"Sounds like you should take the shot Corporal Johannsen." The Major cut in, though her voice sounded odd to Johannsen. Suddenly the flap to his tent opened and closes and she stepped in with him. "At you're leisure corporal."

"Yes ma'am." He said, sitting up straighter. Whether she was Army or not, he knew better than to look bad in front of an officer. His hands went to the fire controls. "First burst now." He said as he lifted up the cover and held the button down for three seconds. By the book.

Outside, at a position roughly a mile away, he heard the muffled BRRRRRRRT sound of the massive rotary cannon firing.

Even though he hated his job, Corporal Johannsen loved that sound.

\----------

The only reason James didn't get shredded by the incoming fire was because of the glasses.

He'd spotted the camp only moments before. He'd had a moment of elation, silently pumping a fist as he flew, when he'd spotted the M.F.F.V.'s.

Everyone in the service knew about the legendary Miffy. They'd helped the U.S. gain fire superiority late in the war, allowing them to knock out enemy attack craft, incoming missiles, incoming artillery, and much more. The fact that they could also be aimed at ground targets, and could even be used as artillery in their own right, all while being able to move at close to highway speeds, just made them even better.

They'd practically become the golden standard for how to defend any base that didn't have the luxury of setting up permanent, and costly, defensive systems.

He'd just been about to verbalize the fact that they were there. Then the zoomed in vision of the glasses had shown rapid flashes of light emitting from the ends of the Miffy's barrel.

James had known instinctively what that meant.

In only a heartbeat he'd redirected the energy keeping him in the air, to his eyes and arms.

As his left arm shot out to the side and redirected him with a blast of high pressure air, his right arm had to reach up and rip the glasses from his face. The glare from his eyes glowing with golden light had reflected off of the inside of their lenses and nearly blinded him.

As he opened them again, he saw just how close he'd come to being shredded by the ground weapon.

He watched in the slow motion that his reflex enhancing vision gave him, as a stream of lead and depleted uranium rounds that flowed like water streamed through the spot he'd been in only a split second ago.

Even with his vision the projectiles were moving so fast

Shit. He thought. I can't outrun one of those things. They shoot down freakin' missiles.

He turned back just in time to see a second burst of fire coming toward him. It looked like an angry black blob that seemed to grow. Then he realized that that was because it was getting closer.

No time. OLD SCHOOL!!

BOOM!

\----------

"Jesus Christ, did he just explode?" Johannsen asked as his finger hovered over the fire button. Then his eyes caught the new target beacon out of the corner of his vision. He looked at truck five's feed. "What the fuck? How's he over there now?"

"What's wrong?" The Major asked over his shoulder.

"He's a zippy little shit." Johannsen said absently.

"Can you get him?"

"Course I can get him." He said with a hint of anger. "I've shot down goddamn MAC rounds. This guy's nothing."

He hit the toggles that would engage the other trucks to fire simultaneously. Though he kept the ammo conservation engaged. This would allow up to four of the Miffy's to engage at once if they had a viable shot. He also began spinning his finger in small, tight, circles on the manual targeting pad, causing the cross-hairs to spin around the intruding flyer.

"Dodge this rocket man." He said as he hit the fire button.

\----------

I need to gain some distance. James thought as he dodged the second volley. I need more reaction time.

Then as he spun to change his angle, he saw just how screwed he was.

This time there were three separate streams of rounds coming at him from three different angles. And these ones were bigger, more spread out.

Oh, what the fuck? He thought as he felt the energy hit its crescendo in his feet.

He quickly lifted his right leg at an angle and activated the spell.

BO-BOOM!

The pressure of the two opposing explosions made his knees and hips hurt. Even with the sudden change of trajectory he knew he'd only missed that attack by inches, if even that much.

Then he saw the a fourth stream that was already about to intercept him as he flew upside down.

SHIT!

He reacted by instinct. Before he even realized what he was doing his wolf hand had the mage's blade in it. His other hand reached forward with his chain in it, it was hard to tell because of how fast he was moving, but he knew that his wind magic was bringing the chain to life as it uncoiled from around him. His mouth opened, and inky blueish-black bolts of lightning began emitting from it in a cone. He felt his feet growing hot with energy.

He didn't do it with any hope of success. He knew the kind of ammo these things fired. And he had a sword, some chain, and a bit of lightning that would probably do fuck all.

He was going to die.

That didn't stop him from trying.

FUCK YOU! He thought defiantly.

The three different projectiles; oversized intercepting bullets, wind imbued chain, and death bolts, met only a fraction of a second before the Mage's blade felt the first impact.

BOOM!

\----------

"YEAH! FUCK YOU!" Johannsen shouted triumphantly as he shot to his feet. "You dodgy little shit!"

Out of the corner of his eye he saw the little light that meant there was still a moving body in the air. But his eyes remained locked on the video feed.

On it he watched as the body of the flying intruder fell from the air. He quickly swiped up on the control next to the manual aim pad and zoomed in.

He grinned as he saw the limp form tumbling, with what looked like several parts falling beside it.

His finger hovered over the fire button, temptation to "double tap" the target, like he'd been trained, itching at it. But he'd been told on day one that they were in a limited ammunition scenario here, and he'd just spent quite a bit of the valuable commodity.

Instead he watched, and waited, for the rocket-man to do something. The feed tracking them just like the cannons they were attached to, until he'd gone low enough that dunes were between him and the cannons.

Nobody could pull up from that elevation loss in time. Not after the hit they'd just taken. He was surprised there was anything left but little bits and pieces.

He pulled his hand away.

"Target down ma'am." He said with a grin.

She smiled from where she watched the feed. "Well done Corporal. Check your ammo and have your crew redistribute if necessary." She turned to leave, activating her radio as she did. "Chief Driscoll, I assume you were watching?" She asked. She paused, and Johannsen wondered why he couldn't hear the other side of the conversation if it was on the radio. Then she spoke again. "Good. Let's go see who our visitor.... was."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xvq6xf/wait_is_this_just_gate_234/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (232/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I don't really have a note for today. I am gonna try to make a combination of a cheesecake and a key lime pie later. Probably won't remember to update you on that after the weekend is over. But it might show up as one of the recipe's James introduces later. Who knows.

Enjoy.

\~

>Reports of individuals performing feats of so-called Magic, have been on the rise rec-

CLICK!

>\-a young woman in on of India's Mountain Refugee camps spraying fire from her hands to fend of-

CLICK!

>\-ertain groups concerned that lingering radiation from the wars may be caus-

CLICK!

>\-as our world seen the birth of TRUE super heroes?

CLICK!

Colonel Muhammed turned the T.V. off with an angry press of the red button on its remote.

Fucking..... idiots. She thought. They're trying to bottle lightning and now we're all dealing with the repercussions.

She'd been waiting in the small, but still nice, hotel room for nearly 3 hours now. She wanted to leave. Not to run away or cause problems, but just because she felt cooped up. It didn't help that there was a hipster-looking little coffee shop just across the street that she could see from her window. She disliked those kinds of shops. But she couldn't deny their affinity for their craft.

She wondered if they'd put her in this room BECAUSE of its view of the shop, to taunt her.

The door rang with the knocking of a fist, likely those of the M.P. stationed outside.

"Colonel. We've been given the go ahead. Our car will be leaving in twenty minutes." The man's voice said.

"Understood." She replied, standing up as she did.

She walked over to the nearby bed and picked up the jacket of her dress uniform, inspecting it one more time before she put it on. Then she stepped into the dress shoes that completed the uniform and grabbed her hat off of the nearby chair.

"Ready." She said through the door.

It beeped with the key-card activation of its lock, then it opened onto the hallway outside. The two M.P.s escorted her out to the waiting black SUV and they drove to the hearing.

Thirty minutes later it pulled up outside of the new congressional building, it had been rebuilt after the war. She could see the Pentagon only a few blocks away.

She placed her hat on her head and straightened it, then stepped out into the light drizzle.

\----------

"On the up side." Veliry said before grunting with exertion. "I think we may have figured out how the Agency's doors work." She wrenched on the piece of rope tied around Joey's left ankle. "Or at least something similar."

"And so you cut my son in half?" Margaret Choi said as she held Joey under his arms, keeping him in place.

"He's not cut in half." Veliry attempted to assure her. "He's simply.... er..... physically dislocated from his legs." She managed to get the movement she needed and pulled the restraint off. "Get ready. He should be loose.... now. PULL!"

Margaret and the King pulled, her from his armpits, and the King from where his arm was INSIDE the bottomless entrance. Joey practically launched out of the opening in the wall and crashed down on top of both of them.

As soon as she'd recovered she picked him up and began inspecting his waist and legs. Once she was satisfied with his... wholeness... she grabbed the lobe of his ear and wrenched back, pulling his head at a slight angle.

"Joseph Choi!" She hissed into the offending lobe. "What were you thinking?" She asked.

"Ow. Mom we were just experimenting with a new idea. It wasn't supposed to get me stuck like that." He said rapidly as he bent over to relieve the pain in his ear.

"And you!" She half yelled as she looked at Veliry, who was tempted to cower behind the King's awkwardly watching form. "How can you just have my son step into a magic hole without testing it first?"

"Um. We did test it first." Veliry said hesitantly. "We placed several items, and one test rodent, in it. They all came out the other side just fine."

"They did?" The King asked curiously. "Can you show me?"

"Of course sir." Veliry said, suddenly excited about the project again despite Mrs. Choi's anger.

"Not with my son you won't." Margaret said, reminding them of her presence as she released Joey's ear.

"Mom. It's fine." Joey cut in. "I just went through too slowly."

"No!" She scolded. "No experiments that put you at risk."

"Moooom!" He exclaimed. "I'm learning magic. Half of the lessons put me at risk." He realized the error of his statement as he was saying it.

"Then you are no longer learning magic." She said sternly as she stared him down.

Joey's hands flew to his ears, a coping habit he'd had since he was a child, one that they'd thought he had grown past, though it still popped up from time to time when he was stressed or overwhelmed. Her expression softened almost immediately as she saw him turn away from her.

"Can he please?" Veliry asked softly.

Margaret looked over at the small mage, who she knew her son had a crush on. Veliry wasn't hiding anymore, but actually looked like she was worried.

"He's quite brilliant." She continued. "His mind.... it works like I've never seen before. And he's very creative." She pointed at the opening they'd just pulled him from. "In only a day of looking at my notes he figured out a potential solution to the blight." She looked at the King, who wore a shocked expression from the statement. "AND... he may have figured out the solution to long distance travel using the same concept. Just like the Agency used." She looked back at Mrs. Choi. "And he doesn't even have a full grasp of magical theory yet."

Margaret looked over to where Joey was standing, facing away from her with his hands on his ears and humming. Though she noticed that the humming was much quieter than it usually was when he got like this. He was listening to them despite being upset, one of the things they'd worked on when he was like this.

She walked up behind him and placed her hands over his for just a second before removing them, an old sign that she wanted him to listen for a moment. He lifted his hands from his ears just a tiny bit.

"You came up with all this mijo?" She asked. "These were your ideas?"

He didn't speak, simply nodding his head up and down once.

She took a deep breath, then repeated the signal to listen.

"You can keep learning magic." She said, though her voice was laden with concern. She turned back to Veliry and the King. "But no USING my son as a guinea pig." She said to them sternly.

"I don't know what that is." Veliry admitted. "But I think I understand the concept. We..." She nodded to Joey. "Will be more careful in the future."

In a display that she'd grown used to from previous arguments with her son, Joey spun around quickly and hugged her.

"Thank you mom." He said into her ear.

And as quickly as that he'd released her back onto the ground and began explaining the concept of the openings to both her and the King.

She sighed, marveling at how unpredictable BOTH of her sons could be now.

She looked over at the small mage who was the fascination of her younger son.

Don't hurt my boy. She thought to herself as she absently listened to Joey's explanation, his face only showing excitement and none of the former upset it had had only moments before.

\------------------

Oh god. Why do I feel so tired? He thought as he opened his eyes. I just woke up. I shouldn't feel like this.

As he slowly brought everything into focus he looked around. The room looked familiar, and yet not quite right.

Is this a hospital? Why am I in a hospital?

But that wasn't quite right either. The bed and all the white fixtures around him were right. That was hospital style. But the ceiling above him looked like it was made of grey stone. And the furniture itself looked like some kind of old school wooden stuff from a farm or something.

He looked around a bit more. There wasn't an I.V. in his arm. There were no digital readouts anywhere. He looked at a wall. There weren't even any power outlets.

What the fuck? He wondered as he tried to lift himself up.

Pain shot through his body as he tried to engage his abdominal muscles.

"AAAGH!" He cried out in shock through gritted teeth as pain coursed through him.

^("What was that?") He heard from somewhere outside the room. ^("Druid Manis, please go check. It sounded like it came from room five, though I hope not.")

The voice sounded odd to him. As if it was being spoken through some kind of musical instrument instead of a human throat and vocal chords.

He tried to roll over, his legs kicking feebly as he once again felt pain flow outward from his stomach.

"HHHNNNNG!!" He groaned as he fell back. His head was spinning from a combination of fatigue and overwhelming pain.

"It is from room five!" Someone just outside the door yelled. "He's awake. Send for the Mistress, and the Ambassador!"

The door opened with a hearty wooden noise.

Batista looked up and was shocked to see someone with what looked like deer antlers sprouting from their head.

"What the fuck?" He asked as he felt himself pass out.

"Mister Batista!" They yelled as they rushed forward. ^("Mister Batista! It's going to be alr-")

Then he was back out.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xuych6/wait_is_this_just_gate_233/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (232/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I don't really have a note for today. I am gonna try to make a combination of a cheesecake and a key lime pie later. Probably won't remember to update you on that after the weekend is over. But it might show up as one of the recipe's James introduces later. Who knows.

Enjoy.

\~

>Reports of individuals performing feats of so-called Magic, have been on the rise rec-

CLICK!

>\-a young woman in one of India's Mountain Refugee camps spraying fire from her hands to fend of-

CLICK!

>\-ertain groups concerned that lingering radiation from the wars may be caus-

CLICK!

>\-as our world seen the birth of TRUE super heroes?

CLICK!

Colonel Muhammed turned the T.V. off with an angry press of the red button on its remote.

Fucking..... idiots. She thought. They're trying to bottle lightning and now we're all dealing with the repercussions.

She'd been waiting in the small, but still nice, hotel room for nearly 3 hours now. She wanted to leave. Not to run away or cause problems, but just because she felt cooped up. It didn't help that there was a hipster-looking little coffee shop just across the street that she could see from her window. She disliked those kinds of shops. But she couldn't deny their affinity for their craft.

She wondered if they'd put her in this room BECAUSE of its view of the shop, to taunt her.

The door rang with the knocking of a fist, likely those of the M.P. stationed outside.

"Colonel. We've been given the go ahead. Our car will be leaving in twenty minutes." The man's voice said.

"Understood." She replied, standing up as she did.

She walked over to the nearby bed and picked up the jacket of her dress uniform, inspecting it one more time before she put it on. Then she stepped into the dress shoes that completed the uniform and grabbed her hat off of the nearby chair.

"Ready." She said through the door.

It beeped with the key-card activation of its lock, then it opened onto the hallway outside. The two M.P.s escorted her out to the waiting black SUV and they drove to the hearing.

Thirty minutes later it pulled up outside of the new congressional building, it had been rebuilt after the war. She could see the Pentagon only a few blocks away.

She placed her hat on her head and straightened it, then stepped out into the light drizzle.

\----------

"On the up side." Veliry said before grunting with exertion. "I think we may have figured out how the Agency's doors work." She wrenched on the piece of rope tied around Joey's left ankle. "Or at least something similar."

"And so you cut my son in half?" Margaret Choi said as she held Joey under his arms, keeping him in place.

"He's not cut in half." Veliry attempted to assure her. "He's simply.... er..... physically dislocated from his legs." She managed to get the movement she needed and pulled the restraint off. "Get ready. He should be loose.... now. PULL!"

Margaret and the King pulled, her from his armpits, and the King from where his arm was INSIDE the bottomless entrance. Joey practically launched out of the opening in the wall and crashed down on top of both of them.

As soon as she'd recovered she picked him up and began inspecting his waist and legs. Once she was satisfied with his... wholeness... she grabbed the lobe of his ear and wrenched back, pulling his head at a slight angle.

"Joseph Choi!" She hissed into the offending lobe. "What were you thinking?" She asked.

"Ow. Mom we were just experimenting with a new idea. It wasn't supposed to get me stuck like that." He said rapidly as he bent over to relieve the pain in his ear.

"And you!" She half yelled as she looked at Veliry, who was tempted to cower behind the King's awkwardly watching form. "How can you just have my son step into a magic hole without testing it first?"

"Um. We did test it first." Veliry said hesitantly. "We placed several items, and one test rodent, in it. They all came out the other side just fine."

"They did?" The King asked curiously. "Can you show me?"

"Of course sir." Veliry said, suddenly excited about the project again despite Mrs. Choi's anger.

"Not with my son you won't." Margaret said, reminding them of her presence as she released Joey's ear.

"Mom. It's fine." Joey cut in. "I just went through too slowly."

"No!" She scolded. "No experiments that put you at risk."

"Moooom!" He exclaimed. "I'm learning magic. Half of the lessons put me at risk." He realized the error of his statement as he was saying it.

"Then you are no longer learning magic." She said sternly as she stared him down.

Joey's hands flew to his ears, a coping habit he'd had since he was a child, one that they'd thought he had grown past, though it still popped up from time to time when he was stressed or overwhelmed. Her expression softened almost immediately as she saw him turn away from her.

"Can he please?" Veliry asked softly.

Margaret looked over at the small mage, who she knew her son had a crush on. Veliry wasn't hiding anymore, but actually looked like she was worried.

"He's quite brilliant." She continued. "His mind.... it works like I've never seen before. And he's very creative." She pointed at the opening they'd just pulled him from. "In only a day of looking at my notes he figured out a potential solution to the blight." She looked at the King, who wore a shocked expression from the statement. "AND... he may have figured out the solution to long distance travel using the same concept. Just like the Agency used." She looked back at Mrs. Choi. "And he doesn't even have a full grasp of magical theory yet."

Margaret looked over to where Joey was standing, facing away from her with his hands on his ears and humming. Though she noticed that the humming was much quieter than it usually was when he got like this. He was listening to them despite being upset, one of the things they'd worked on when he was like this.

She walked up behind him and placed her hands over his for just a second before removing them, an old sign that she wanted him to listen for a moment. He lifted his hands from his ears just a tiny bit.

"You came up with all this mijo?" She asked. "These were your ideas?"

He didn't speak, simply nodding his head up and down once.

She took a deep breath, then repeated the signal to listen.

"You can keep learning magic." She said, though her voice was laden with concern. She turned back to Veliry and the King. "But no USING my son as a guinea pig." She said to them sternly.

"I don't know what that is." Veliry admitted. "But I think I understand the concept. We..." She nodded to Joey. "Will be more careful in the future."

In a display that she'd grown used to from previous arguments with her son, Joey spun around quickly and hugged her.

"Thank you mom." He said into her ear.

And as quickly as that he'd released her back onto the ground and began explaining the concept of the openings to both her and the King.

She sighed, marveling at how unpredictable BOTH of her sons could be now.

She looked over at the small mage who was the fascination of her younger son.

Don't hurt my boy. She thought to herself as she absently listened to Joey's explanation, his face only showing excitement and none of the former upset it had had only moments before.

\------------------

Oh god. Why do I feel so tired? He thought as he opened his eyes. I just woke up. I shouldn't feel like this.

As he slowly brought everything into focus he looked around. The room looked familiar, and yet not quite right.

Is this a hospital? Why am I in a hospital?

But that wasn't quite right either. The bed and all the white fixtures around him were right. That was hospital style. But the ceiling above him looked like it was made of grey stone. And the furniture itself looked like some kind of old school wooden stuff from a farm or something.

He looked around a bit more. There wasn't an I.V. in his arm. There were no digital readouts anywhere. He looked at a wall. There weren't even any power outlets.

What the fuck? He wondered as he tried to lift himself up.

Pain shot through his body as he tried to engage his abdominal muscles.

"AAAGH!" He cried out in shock through gritted teeth as pain coursed through him.

^("What was that?") He heard from somewhere outside the room. ^("Druid Manis, please go check. It sounded like it came from room five, though I hope not.")

The voice sounded odd to him. As if it was being spoken through some kind of musical instrument instead of a human throat and vocal chords.

He tried to roll over, his legs kicking feebly as he once again felt pain flow outward from his stomach.

"HHHNNNNG!!" He groaned as he fell back. His head was spinning from a combination of fatigue and overwhelming pain.

"It is from room five!" Someone just outside the door yelled. "He's awake. Send for the Mistress, and the Ambassador!"

The door opened with a hearty wooden noise.

Batista looked up and was shocked to see someone with what looked like deer antlers sprouting from their head.

"What the fuck?" He asked as he felt himself pass out.

"Mister Batista!" They yelled as they rushed forward. ^("Mister Batista! It's going to be alr-")

Then he was back out.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xuyavl/wait_is_this_just_gate_233/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (231/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I know I'm late. Stuff occurred IRL.

AND NO THE LAST SECTION IS NOT LEADING TO WHAT YOU THINK.... NO NOT THAT EITHER. GET YOUR MINDS OUT OF THE GUTTER.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

He'd spent the first hour or so of it whooping and hollering as he soared through the air like a superhero. He'd even done a flyby to mess with a Clan Drakrid Wyrm rider that he thought he actually might have recognized. Though he flew past far too quickly to be certain. He'd looked back and laughed a bit as the rider had almost fallen off of their mount in surprise, then proceeded to curse him with a raised fist.

This had all entertained him as he'd moved. But now he'd been flying for nearly six hours and the novelty had worn off.

Now it was just work.

Keeping the mixture of ideas flowing in his head in a manner that could maintain the burning jets that powered him was difficult. More than a few times he'd felt the power wane, especially if he flew too high where it became difficult to gather energy from the ground below.

He also noticed that flying over the city, and later the small towns, was much easier. He knew that people were a source of magical energy too. But it was magical TABOO to gather from them without consent, and James had no intention of going against that.

What he hadn't thought of, though it made sense in retrospect, was that the ACTIVITIES people took part in ALSO generated magical energy. Some were obvious; the heat of a smith's forge, or the flow of water through a mill. Others were more esoteric. He sensed an energy that made him feel warm inside coming from a seamstress's hut. He felt rage and pain, and also a startlingly strong pride as he flew over a small training area for a small army garrison. He felt a foul, malignant, sapping, energy as he flew over a graveyard. It made him wonder if some of those graves had been warded against magical energy like Kela's entombment statue had. But he also sensed darkness and a mixture of negative emotions there that he had, unfortunately, become all too familiar with within himself. He avoided drawing on that energy entirely.

In short, he felt all the energies that seemed to mark an area as being very heavily infused with human life. Good and bad.

He wished he still had the energy sensing monocle Veliry had let him, and Joey use the day before. He wanted to look down and study the flow of magical energy around him and see if it could help him understand his own abilities as well. But unfortunately, he'd left it in his little brother's possession absentmindedly, and he had yet to figure out the vision magic that allowed him to get the same effect without it.

Regardless, he flew until the sky darkened and the wind, already frigid at this altitude, began to chill even further. He only continued long enough to get to the small village that he'd seen in the distance. He landed a mile or so away and walked toward the town. Winter was all but gone now, even the trees were beginning to green again, but the chill of night still made him glad that he HAD packed his winter gear. Still, he longed for the warmth of his drake companion Steve.

"One day down." He said as he neared the town, pulling his hood up as he did. "Couple more to go."

He meandered toward the noise of the town's tavern.

\----------

Amina, Vickers, and several of the royal guard griffin riders including Guardian Ira'Nyl, flew in formation to the southeast, following James's direction.

Below her her griffin held a set of straps that led down to a large head with a leather sack around its neck.

Steve grumbled in mild distress as they flew.

"I know boy." She said, half yelling, down to the drake.

She still didn't understand what kind of mind James's little brother had to come up with the idea. She was also amazed that Steve had allowed it as much as he had. He'd still struggled and resisted, but he hadn't hurt anyone, and had actually seemed hesitant to even resist when it came to Joey.

She wondered if the drake knew that Joey was the sibling of his rider. The visual similarity was obvious enough to a person, but she didn't know if that mattered to a forty-foot-tall lizard. Maybe it was his scent.

Regardless, the drake was now almost entirely inside of a custom-made bottomless bag, with only his head sticking out.

She had no idea how James would react to the idea. Mostly she was just glad that the drake hadn't opted to use his fire breath yet. If he did it would cause more than a few problems, and maybe even the drakes own death.

The idea had her more than a little stressed. So, she'd opted to focus on the task of flying.

Right behind you dear. She thought, ignoring the groan from below. And we brought a friend.

\----------

"Alright First Sergeant." Sergeant Juliuss said nonchalantly. "Miffy's are set up. Anything attempts to come within three miles of us had better be underground when it does. Otherwise, it's getting turned into ground beef."

"Good job Sergeant." Nguyen replied. "How are they on ammo?"

Julius pulled up his tablet and looked at the manifests for each rig. "They're all rockin' eight-k in rounds. And the central truck has a full hundred of its arty rounds in case anything big comes a knockin."

"Good. I'll inform the Major. You and your crew get some rest. By tomorrow I want a draft of a schedule for you guys to rotate on checks for them okay."

Julius nodded. "Got it boss."

"Go get some chow." Nguyen said to dismiss the sergeant. He watched him go for a moment. He was uneasy about the new additions to their roster, but he couldn't deny that having the new M.F.F.V.'s was a reassuring thing.

He grimaced a bit as he saw Sgt. Julius fist bump one of Driscoll's men as he passed.

He opted to ignore it. Driscoll and the other Muck Marchers were well outside of his control. In fact, he doubted whether they'd even answer to the Major.

Speaking of the Major, he still needed to go give her an update.

As he walked to the new command tent, he looked around and noted the changes to the camp.

The original Petravian style tents, what few were left after the battle, were still around. Many of them were patched and resewn where they'd been damaged, but they were still in use. Only, unlike before, now they were mostly being used as storage for the gear from the dead soldiers and dwarves, or else as simple shade tents.

The tents they were using for actual operational purposes were all Earth Military standard InflatCrete tents with hydration seals. Though, most of those seals weren't being used at the moment. What need was there when they had a magical source of (seemingly) infinite water?

The Command tent had its seal engaged though, he noticed.

The tents weren't the only change though. An area in the center of the camp had been cleared and sprayed with layers of foam hardener. Over the course of a day, it had been transformed from a blank patch of sand to a fully functioning helipad. While it currently sat empty, save a few crates, it told Nguyen what the Major and the people on Earth had planned for them.

He also didn't like that the Muck Marchers had had a small armory sent over, complete with two people who claimed to be their armorers, while also looking like mad scientists from some cheesy b-grade film.

He opened the flap to the command tent, making sure he disengaged and reengaged the hydration seal as quickly as he could as he stepped in.

"First Sergeant." The Major greeted without looking at him.

"Ma'am." He returned. "The M.F.F.V.s are stationed according to the plan Chief Driscoll's plan, with a slight change on one position due to some unexpectedly loose sand."

"And their ammo?" She asked.

"Evenly distributed." He confirmed.

"Good." She gestured to the table at the back. "Casualties have finished being processed."

He nodded. He'd actually been surprised when the Major had taken that duty upon herself. He couldn't see an ulterior motive for why, but he suspected there was one.

"Glad to hear." He said. "Looks like that landing pad is done."

"Yes." She said. "We'll be getting the first parts of the new recon helicopter in a few days. It should help us get an eye on the region around us."

"Ah. Very good." Nguyen said, unsure of where to go with the conversation. He didn't know why he always felt so awkward talking to the Major. He knew that at least part of it was his lack of trust in her.

As if reading his thoughts, she spoke up.

"You don't trust me, do you?" She asked. Nguyen flinched from the unexpectedly insightful words. He couldn't help but notice the sudden stillness and silence of the other people in the tent. "Or Driscoll and his people?" She added.

Nguyen thought for a moment, biting his lip as he did.

Then he turned back to her.

"No." He said, standing up straighter as he did. "No, I don't."

She looked at him and he got the sense that it was the first time she'd really LOOKED at him. This despite the fact that she'd given him a rather rough inspection almost as soon as they'd met.

"May I ask why?"

He looked around at the other people. They made a point of not meeting his gaze when he did.

"Because this was originally meant to be a recon mission." He said. "We were supposed to stay low, quiet, and unseen. Make contact with home. Help them figure out a way back while also gathering intel on this world and how it works." He gestured toward the door to the tent. "And now we've got M.F.F.V.'s, Artillery, a helipad, and some goddam Muck Marchers. You've got this camp set up like we're about to wage war on these people."

He looked around again. He saw a couple people who looked like they might have been in agreement with him, but none of them spoke up or anything. He hadn't expected them to.

"What are we doing here ma'am?" He asked finally.

She stared at him for a few moments before speaking.

"We're following our orders." She said simply. "YOU.... had the mission of recon, and staying low, quiet, and unseen... as you called it." She shook her head. "You fucked it up. It's over. Now we do things the other way. We've already dispatched an entire platoon of local soldiers and some kind of Miner.... clan... thing." She tilted her head for a moment. "Low and quiet is off the table now. Odds are that there are already Petravian reinforcements coming. When they arrive, we'll greet them with an olive branch. And if that olive branch isn't accepted then we'll greet them with iron and lead."

"And what will that accomplish?" He asked, becoming aggravated. "That'll just make them give us their FULL attention."

"Probably." She admitted before sipping from a cup of tea.

"Pro-... Probably?" He wondered, a look of disbelief on his face. "Probably? You say that as if it's okay. Like you WANT to get in a fight."

She scoffed as she put the tea back down. "Of course not." She said. "What SANE soldier has ever WANTED a fight with a bunch of random people they don't know?" She said as if having a simple conversation. "But I AM an infantry commander." She said, pointing at the rifle on the shoulder of her uniform. "They sent ME here for a reason. And it wasn't to show the locals how to make friendship bracelets."

He didn't have an answer to that. He knew she was infantry. Had known since he'd first met her. And he knew better than to think that the General's or anyone at that level would send her over WITHOUT taking that into account. Once again, she spoke up as if reading his mind.

"Disagreeing with me is fine First Sergeant Nguyen." She said, interrupting his thoughts. "If anything, it's a good thing. That's simplified checks and balances in a military unit."

He waited for her to continue. But before she did, she turned and glared at him.

"But from now on." She said, much more sternly now. She glanced at the other people around the room. "I expect it to occur BEHIND.... closed.... doors." He was about to answer when she continued. "And when I give orders. I expect them to be obeyed. Any disagreements can be brought up in the same manner. Understood?"

He took a deep breath.

"Yes ma'am." He said simply.

"Good." She said, lightening her tone and facial expressions. "Now tell me how our people's morale is doing. I know they lost a lot of good people."

\------------------------

"Are you lost Madame Choi?" The King's voice boomed softly as Margaret walked hesitantly through the castle grounds, causing her to jump slightly.

"Oh. King Farrick." She said with a slight laugh as she recovered from the surprise. "I suppose I am. I'm trying to find where um... Arch Mage Veliry's... lab?... is." She said uncertainly. "He's been taking lessons from her for the past week or so. With James gone on his um... recon thing... I don't really have anyone else to talk to."

The king looked at her curiously and with a touch of sympathy. Then he held out his arm, brushing off the aide who had been attempting to hand him a sheet of paper of some kind as he did.

"Allow me." He said. "I can understand the notion feeling alone despite being in a castle full of people." He admitted. "Besides, I can show you some of the castle's history AND get an update on the Arch Mage's progress on certain.... projects."

She looked at the arm uncertainly for a moment before accepting it. She didn't know whether or not it was considered rude to decline a King's invitation.

"For the record." He said, after they'd walked in awkward silence for a few moments. "I have instructed all the staff here to treat you with all the respect and grace that they would show to any allied foreign dignitary. If you are ever in need of information, or even just wish to speak to someone, they are all available to you."

"That's.... very kind of you, your majesty." She said with a smile. "And they have been very kind to both myself, and my youngest son."

"I am glad to hear it." He said with a warm smile. "And please, call me Farrick. We're to be in-laws soon enough. We might as well be on even terms."

"I'll... try." She admitted. "Though I must admit that speaking with royalty is still... new... to me. I might slip."

"Trying is all I ever ask." He said, then he gestured at a statue of two people holding hands awkwardly, one significantly taller than the other to the point of absurdity. "One of my wife's ancestors." He said as they continued. "A giant Chieftan who won her ancient matron's hand in marriage after a brutal round of single combat with their husband." He smiled. "It is also why my children are so much taller than I am."

"That poor woman." Margaret said in a whisper. "Your daughter Amina isn't so tall." She said to him. "I mean, she is tall. But not anything I would consider abnormal."

"No." He agreed. "She's fairly human in stature. But you haven't met her youngest sister yet, and likely won't any time soon. Nor have you met the crown prince yet. Though, you will at the wedding." He held his other hand well above his head to indicate height. "Close to eight feet, that one."

"Really?" She said in surprise.

"Oh yes. And not lean either. Built as proportionally as any human soldier you'll ever meet. Just giant sized... or rather... half giant sized."

"Is your wife the same way?" She asked curiously. "I haven't met her either."

The King's face flashed a look of weariness for just a moment.

"And sadly, you never shall." He said with a weak smile. "She passed some fifteen years ago. But no. She was of an average height. Amina's height even."

"I'm sorry." Margaret apologized. "I didn't know."

"No need to apologize Mrs. Choi. It's not as if it's your fault." He pointed out a stained-glass window showing a dark-haired man emerging from a circle of flames with a sword in one hand and a book in the other. "That one is my ancestor. He was also a summoned hero, much like your son James."

"Really? So you're not... fully... native to this world?" She asked.

"Well. It was several thousand years ago. So I might as well be. But technically no." He said wistfully.

"I wonder what kind of world they were from." She wondered. "Maybe it was Earth."

"The possibility has been raised by the mages." He admitted. He pointed to a door that looked odd to her. "We're here."

"Thank you." She said as she detached from his arm. She was about to take a step forward, but his arm clamped onto her shoulder while her foot was still in the air.

"Wait." He said sternly.

She was about to turn and ask what was wrong, then she felt something sharp prick her neck just below her chin. She froze in surprise.

"Door." He said in a commanding voice. "Stand down. This is Captain Choi's mother. She is to remain unharmed.

"Apologies King Farrick." Said an odd voice that Margaret thought might have been coming from the door itself.

She looked back at it and that was when she saw what had pricked her neck. It was a long needle, so thin that she hadn't even noticed it until she'd felt its sting. It quickly retreated back into the door's wooden frame. As soon as it did it seemed to disappear, as though it was simply a part of the door.

"What the hell?" She asked.

He placed a hand on her shoulder. "My apologies Mrs. Choi. I should have warned you. This is a magical door designed to protect the room it guards. It requires its owner's permission." He pointed an angry glare at the door. "OR THAT OF THE KING OF THE CASTLE IT IS A PART OF." He said scoldingly. "Before it will open."

His hand moved forward to her neck, two fingers extended like they were pointing, and she saw a soft amber glow. The slight sting that she'd begun to feel faded to nothing. She touched it again and her hand came away with no blood.

She looked at the door and saw that it had now sprouted several eyes and mouths all over its dark wooden frame. She resisted the urge to recoil in disgust.

"Open." He commanded. The door made a movement that she thought might have been its equivalent of wincing, though it was hard to tell.

"Yes your majesty." It said before seeming to melt into the edges of its frame.

The sight behind it caused her face to flush with rage.

"JOSEPH CHOI!" She yelled. "WHAT THE HELL DO YOU THINK YOU'RE DOING!?!?"

Joey jumped at the sound of her voice.

"Mom?!?" He yelled as he spun to face her. "It's not what it looks like!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xs8w8e/wait_is_this_just_gate_232/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (231/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I know I'm late. Stuff occurred IRL.

AND NO THE LAST SECTION IS NOT LEADING TO WHAT YOU THINK.... NO NOT THAT EITHER. GET YOUR MINDS OUT OF THE GUTTER.

Enjoy.

\~

James enjoyed his new method of flight.

He'd spent the first hour or so of it whooping and hollering as he soared through the air like a superhero. He'd even done a flyby to mess with a Clan Drakrid Wyrm rider that he thought he actually might have recognized. Though he flew past far too quickly to be certain. He'd looked back and laughed a bit as the rider had almost fallen off of their mount in surprise, then proceeded to curse him with a raised fist.

This had all entertained him as he'd moved. But now he'd been flying for nearly six hours and the novelty had worn off.

Now it was just work.

Keeping the mixture of ideas flowing in his head in a manner that could maintain the burning jets that powered him was difficult. More than a few times he'd felt the power wane, especially if he flew too high where it became difficult to gather energy from the ground below.

He also noticed that flying over the city, and later the small towns, was much easier. He knew that people were a source of magical energy too. But it was magical TABOO to gather from them without consent, and James had no intention of going against that.

What he hadn't thought of, though it made sense in retrospect, was that the ACTIVITIES people took part in ALSO generated magical energy. Some were obvious; the heat of a smith's forge, or the flow of water through a mill. Others were more esoteric. He sensed an energy that made him feel warm inside coming from a seamstress's hut. He felt rage and pain, and also a startlingly strong pride as he flew over a small training area for a small army garrison. He felt a foul, malignant, sapping, energy as he flew over a graveyard. It made him wonder if some of those graves had been warded against magical energy like Kela's entombment statue had. But he also sensed darkness and a mixture of negative emotions there that he had, unfortunately, become all too familiar with within himself. He avoided drawing on that energy entirely.

In short, he felt all the energies that seemed to mark an area as being very heavily infused with human life. Good and bad.

He wished he still had the energy sensing monocle Veliry had let him, and Joey use the day before. He wanted to look down and study the flow of magical energy around him and see if it could help him understand his own abilities as well. But unfortunately, he'd left it in his little brother's possession absentmindedly, and he had yet to figure out the vision magic that allowed him to get the same effect without it.

Regardless, he flew until the sky darkened and the wind, already frigid at this altitude, began to chill even further. He only continued long enough to get to the small village that he'd seen in the distance. He landed a mile or so away and walked toward the town. Winter was all but gone now, even the trees were beginning to green again, but the chill of night still made him glad that he HAD packed his winter gear. Still, he longed for the warmth of his drake companion Steve.

"One day down." He said as he neared the town, pulling his hood up as he did. "Couple more to go."

He meandered toward the noise of the town's tavern.

\----------

Amina, Vickers, and several of the royal guard griffin riders including Guardian Ira'Nyl, flew in formation to the southeast, following James's direction.

Below her her griffin held a set of straps that led down to a large head with a leather sack around its neck.

Steve grumbled in mild distress as they flew.

"I know boy." She said, half yelling, down to the drake.

She still didn't understand what kind of mind James's little brother had to come up with the idea. She was also amazed that Steve had allowed it as much as he had. He'd still struggled and resisted, but he hadn't hurt anyone, and had actually seemed hesitant to even resist when it came to Joey.

She wondered if the drake knew that Joey was the sibling of his rider. The visual similarity was obvious enough to a person, but she didn't know if that mattered to a forty-foot-tall lizard. Maybe it was his scent.

Regardless, the drake was now almost entirely inside of a custom-made bottomless bag, with only his head sticking out.

She had no idea how James would react to the idea. Mostly she was just glad that the drake hadn't opted to use his fire breath yet. If he did it would cause more than a few problems, and maybe even the drakes own death.

The idea had her more than a little stressed. So, she'd opted to focus on the task of flying.

Right behind you dear. She thought, ignoring the groan from below. And we brought a friend.

\----------

"Alright First Sergeant." Sergeant Juliuss said nonchalantly. "Miffy's are set up. Anything attempts to come within three miles of us had better be underground when it does. Otherwise, it's getting turned into ground beef."

"Good job Sergeant." Nguyen replied. "How are they on ammo?"

Julius pulled up his tablet and looked at the manifests for each rig. "They're all rockin' eight-k in rounds. And the central truck has a full hundred of its arty rounds in case anything big comes a knockin."

"Good. I'll inform the Major. You and your crew get some rest. By tomorrow I want a draft of a schedule for you guys to rotate on checks for them okay."

Julius nodded. "Got it boss."

"Go get some chow." Nguyen said to dismiss the sergeant. He watched him go for a moment. He was uneasy about the new additions to their roster, but he couldn't deny that having the new M.F.F.V.'s was a reassuring thing.

He grimaced a bit as he saw Sgt. Julius fist bump one of Driscoll's men as he passed.

He opted to ignore it. Driscoll and the other Muck Marchers were well outside of his control. In fact, he doubted whether they'd even answer to the Major.

Speaking of the Major, he still needed to go give her an update.

As he walked to the new command tent, he looked around and noted the changes to the camp.

The original Petravian style tents, what few were left after the battle, were still around. Many of them were patched and resewn where they'd been damaged, but they were still in use. Only, unlike before, now they were mostly being used as storage for the gear from the dead soldiers and dwarves, or else as simple shade tents.

The tents they were using for actual operational purposes were all Earth Military standard InflatCrete tents with hydration seals. Though, most of those seals weren't being used at the moment. What need was there when they had a magical source of (seemingly) infinite water?

The Command tent had its seal engaged though, he noticed.

The tents weren't the only change though. An area in the center of the camp had been cleared and sprayed with layers of foam hardener. Over the course of a day, it had been transformed from a blank patch of sand to a fully functioning helipad. While it currently sat empty, save a few crates, it told Nguyen what the Major and the people on Earth had planned for them.

He also didn't like that the Muck Marchers had had a small armory sent over, complete with two people who claimed to be their armorers, while also looking like mad scientists from some cheesy b-grade film.

He opened the flap to the command tent, making sure he disengaged and reengaged the hydration seal as quickly as he could as he stepped in.

"First Sergeant." The Major greeted without looking at him.

"Ma'am." He returned. "The M.F.F.V.s are stationed according to the plan Chief Driscoll's plan, with a slight change on one position due to some unexpectedly loose sand."

"And their ammo?" She asked.

"Evenly distributed." He confirmed.

"Good." She gestured to the table at the back. "Casualties have finished being processed."

He nodded. He'd actually been surprised when the Major had taken that duty upon herself. He couldn't see an ulterior motive for why, but he suspected there was one.

"Glad to hear." He said. "Looks like that landing pad is done."

"Yes." She said. "We'll be getting the first parts of the new recon helicopter in a few days. It should help us get an eye on the region around us."

"Ah. Very good." Nguyen said, unsure of where to go with the conversation. He didn't know why he always felt so awkward talking to the Major. He knew that at least part of it was his lack of trust in her.

As if reading his thoughts, she spoke up.

"You don't trust me, do you?" She asked. Nguyen flinched from the unexpectedly insightful words. He couldn't help but notice the sudden stillness and silence of the other people in the tent. "Or Driscoll and his people?" She added.

Nguyen thought for a moment, biting his lip as he did.

Then he turned back to her.

"No." He said, standing up straighter as he did. "No, I don't."

She looked at him and he got the sense that it was the first time she'd really LOOKED at him. This despite the fact that she'd given him a rather rough inspection almost as soon as they'd met.

"May I ask why?"

He looked around at the other people. They made a point of not meeting his gaze when he did.

"Because this was originally meant to be a recon mission." He said. "We were supposed to stay low, quiet, and unseen. Make contact with home. Help them figure out a way back while also gathering intel on this world and how it works." He gestured toward the door to the tent. "And now we've got M.F.F.V.'s, Artillery, a helipad, and some goddam Muck Marchers. You've got this camp set up like we're about to wage war on these people."

He looked around again. He saw a couple people who looked like they might have been in agreement with him, but none of them spoke up or anything. He hadn't expected them to.

"What are we doing here ma'am?" He asked finally.

She stared at him for a few moments before speaking.

"We're following our orders." She said simply. "YOU.... had the mission of recon, and staying low, quiet, and unseen... as you called it." She shook her head. "You fucked it up. It's over. Now we do things the other way. We've already dispatched an entire platoon of local soldiers and some kind of Miner.... clan... thing." She tilted her head for a moment. "Low and quiet is off the table now. Odds are that there are already Petravian reinforcements coming. When they arrive, we'll greet them with an olive branch. And if that olive branch isn't accepted then we'll greet them with iron and lead."

"And what will that accomplish?" He asked, becoming aggravated. "That'll just make them give us their FULL attention."

"Probably." She admitted before sipping from a cup of tea.

"Pro-... Probably?" He wondered, a look of disbelief on his face. "Probably? You say that as if it's okay. Like you WANT to get in a fight."

She scoffed as she put the tea back down. "Of course not." She said. "What SANE soldier has ever WANTED a fight with a bunch of random people they don't know?" She said as if having a simple conversation. "But I AM an infantry commander." She said, pointing at the rifle on the shoulder of her uniform. "They sent ME here for a reason. And it wasn't to show the locals how to make friendship bracelets."

He didn't have an answer to that. He knew she was infantry. Had known since he'd first met her. And he knew better than to think that the General's or anyone at that level would send her over WITHOUT taking that into account. Once again, she spoke up as if reading his mind.

"Disagreeing with me is fine First Sergeant Nguyen." She said, interrupting his thoughts. "If anything, it's a good thing. That's simplified checks and balances in a military unit."

He waited for her to continue. But before she did, she turned and glared at him.

"But from now on." She said, much more sternly now. She glanced at the other people around the room. "I expect it to occur BEHIND.... closed.... doors." He was about to answer when she continued. "And when I give orders. I expect them to be obeyed. Any disagreements can be brought up in the same manner. Understood?"

He took a deep breath.

"Yes ma'am." He said simply.

"Good." She said, lightening her tone and facial expressions. "Now tell me how our people's morale is doing. I know they lost a lot of good people."

\------------------------

"Are you lost Madame Choi?" The King's voice boomed softly as Margaret walked hesitantly through the castle grounds, causing her to jump slightly.

"Oh. King Farrick." She said with a slight laugh as she recovered from the surprise. "I suppose I am. I'm trying to find where um... Arch Mage Veliry's... lab?... is." She said uncertainly. "He's been taking lessons from her for the past week or so. With James gone on his um... recon thing... I don't really have anyone else to talk to."

The king looked at her curiously and with a touch of sympathy. Then he held out his arm, brushing off the aide who had been attempting to hand him a sheet of paper of some kind as he did.

"Allow me." He said. "I can understand the notion feeling alone despite being in a castle full of people." He admitted. "Besides, I can show you some of the castle's history AND get an update on the Arch Mage's progress on certain.... projects."

She looked at the arm uncertainly for a moment before accepting it. She didn't know whether or not it was considered rude to decline a King's invitation.

"For the record." He said, after they'd walked in awkward silence for a few moments. "I have instructed all the staff here to treat you with all the respect and grace that they would show to any allied foreign dignitary. If you are ever in need of information, or even just wish to speak to someone, they are all available to you."

"That's.... very kind of you, your majesty." She said with a smile. "And they have been very kind to both myself, and my youngest son."

"I am glad to hear it." He said with a warm smile. "And please, call me Farrick. We're to be in-laws soon enough. We might as well be on even terms."

"I'll... try." She admitted. "Though I must admit that speaking with royalty is still... new... to me. I might slip."

"Trying is all I ever ask." He said, then he gestured at a statue of two people holding hands awkwardly, one significantly taller than the other to the point of absurdity. "One of my wife's ancestors." He said as they continued. "A giant Chieftan who won her ancient matron's hand in marriage after a brutal round of single combat with their husband." He smiled. "It is also why my children are so much taller than I am."

"That poor woman." Margaret said in a whisper. "Your daughter Amina isn't so tall." She said to him. "I mean, she is tall. But not anything I would consider abnormal."

"No." He agreed. "She's fairly human in stature. But you haven't met her youngest sister yet, and likely won't any time soon. Nor have you met the crown prince yet. Though, you will at the wedding." He held his other hand well above his head to indicate height. "Close to eight feet, that one."

"Really?" She said in surprise.

"Oh yes. And not lean either. Built as proportionally as any human soldier you'll ever meet. Just giant sized... or rather... half giant sized."

"Is your wife the same way?" She asked curiously. "I haven't met her either."

The King's face flashed a look of weariness for just a moment.

"And sadly, you never shall." He said with a weak smile. "She passed some fifteen years ago. But no. She was of an average height. Amina's height even."

"I'm sorry." Margaret apologized. "I didn't know."

"No need to apologize Mrs. Choi. It's not as if it's your fault." He pointed out a stained-glass window showing a dark-haired man emerging from a circle of flames with a sword in one hand and a book in the other. "That one is my ancestor. He was also a summoned hero, much like your son James."

"Really? So you're not... fully... native to this world?" She asked.

"Well. It was several thousand years ago. So I might as well be. But technically no." He said wistfully.

"I wonder what kind of world they were from." She wondered. "Maybe it was Earth."

"The possibility has been raised by the mages." He admitted. He pointed to a door that looked odd to her. "We're here."

"Thank you." She said as she detached from his arm. She was about to take a step forward, but his arm clamped onto her shoulder while her foot was still in the air.

"Wait." He said sternly.

She was about to turn and ask what was wrong, then she felt something sharp prick her neck just below her chin. She froze in surprise.

"Door." He said in a commanding voice. "Stand down. This is Captain Choi's mother. She is to remain unharmed.

"Apologies King Farrick." Said an odd voice that Margaret thought might have been coming from the door itself.

She looked back at it and that was when she saw what had pricked her neck. It was a long needle, so thin that she hadn't even noticed it until she'd felt its sting. It quickly retreated back into the door's wooden frame. As soon as it did it seemed to disappear, as though it was simply a part of the door.

"What the hell?" She asked.

He placed a hand on her shoulder. "My apologies Mrs. Choi. I should have warned you. This is a magical door designed to protect the room it guards. It requires its owner's permission." He pointed an angry glare at the door. "OR THAT OF THE KING OF THE CASTLE IT IS A PART OF." He said scoldingly. "Before it will open."

His hand moved forward to her neck, two fingers extended like they were pointing, and she saw a soft amber glow. The slight sting that she'd begun to feel faded to nothing. She touched it again and her hand came away with no blood.

She looked at the door and saw that it had now sprouted several eyes and mouths all over its dark wooden frame. She resisted the urge to recoil in disgust.

"Open." He commanded. The door made a movement that she thought might have been its equivalent of wincing, though it was hard to tell.

"Yes your majesty." It said before seeming to melt into the edges of its frame.

The sight behind it caused her face to flush with rage.

"JOSEPH CHOI!" She yelled. "WHAT THE HELL DO YOU THINK YOU'RE DOING!?!?"

Joey jumped at the sound of her voice.

"Mom?!?" He yelled as he spun to face her. "It's not what it looks like!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xs8u8v/wait_is_this_just_gate_232/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (230/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look. Progress. Love that stuff.

Also the last section will not be expanded on in any way shape or form. If you want more info on that story, feel free to write it yourself in r/GATEhouse look at the notes again, though he kept her in his peripheral vision. "In a controlled setting, with a knowledgeable mage, it can be used to add space to the external bag." She thought for a moment. "Kind of like.... adding a set of walls to the inside of a large house to make a room inside of it. Only you can remove the room as needed to get what's within it." She scrunched her face a bit as she tried to think of a better way to say it.

*\~\~\~

"Or like adding a folder INTO another folder on your tablet." He said, pointing at the tablet propped up on the table beside him.

She thought about it, then smiled. "That's a much better analogy." She agreed.

Joey thought for a moment. "And if it's not done correctly?"

She grimaced. "Well. In that situation the two sub-dimensions end up merging. Often violently. The contents end up overlapping and fusing on an alchemical level. And with wildly unpredictable results. If the bags are empty it tends to just destroy the two bags. But if they're full... Even a little bit." She grimaced again. "And it usually results in an explosion."

"Huh." He said. "I thought it was going to be D&D style and open a planar vortex."

"What?" She asked, in confusion.

"Nothing." He said. "Just... Earth stuff." He held up a pouch from the table. "How big can they get?"

"Bottomless bags?" She asked. Joey nodded. Veliry shrugged. "As big as the bag you make them of, I suppose. It's a simple conversion process once you know how to do it, if a bit energy intensive."

"So.... no real size limit?" He asked. "Does increased size also mean increased capacity?"

"To an extent." She answered. "The level of magical energy focused on the creation is the real limitation on capacity."

"So a more powerful mage, or someone with lots of energy available could make a deeper bottomless bag?" He asked.

"Yes." She replied with a nod. "Where are you going with this?"

Joey picked up sheet of paper from her file on the blighted zone.

"The smallest recorded patches of blight- at least according to estimates, I know they're difficult to measure- is.... roughly a foot and a half across." He said.

Suddenly, she knew where this was going.

Joey stood up and attempted to grab a sack that she knew was full of inert rune stones that still needed to be imbued. It was heavier than he'd realized and he grunted as he lifted it off the ground. He opened it and examined it's contents and opening. Then he gestured at it, implying what she'd already realized he meant.

"Has anyone tried putting the blights into a bottomless bag?" He asked. "And if they did, could they move them?" His eyebrows raised a bit. "Or.... merge some bags of blight afterward?"

Veliry's mind raced as she considered the idea.

"That...." She began as she began trying to think of what that would cause. "Is a fascinatingly terrifying question."

\------------------------------

"Are you sure you don't want me to go with you?" Amina asked as she and James walked out to the castle's courtyard. "Or at least Vickers?"

"I'm sure." James said as he adjusted the pack on his back. "This needs to be as stealth as it can be. Plus you guys can't keep up with me in the air." He grinned at her. "Unless you've changed your mind about me teaching you how to fly like I do."

She glared at him before smiling. "One of us has to be responsible and stay on the ground. You keep crashing too often."

"Oh please." James countered. "I didn't crash yesterday. Hell, Vel came closer to crashing than I did. I haven't crashed since...." He trailed off as he realized WHEN his last crash had been. He didn't miss the flash of sorrow on his fiance's face at the memory.

"I don't like you going on your own." She said, changing the subject. "What if something happens?"

"Something almost definitely will." James admitted. "But it won't be anything we can account for ahead of time. I'm not going to confront them, or even get within shooting distance. This is strictly recon only." He said as they exited the doorway leading outside.

"That's supposed to be MY specialty." The gruff, Boston-accented, voice of Chief Vickers cut in as he pushed off of the wall he'd been leaning against and joined them.

James startled a little at the unexpected presence, before tapping a knuckle on the large SEAL's shoulder.

"Well. Learn to fly and you can take my place." He said.

Vickers grunted. "Workin' on it." He countered.

James cocked an eyebrow. "Got em?" He asked.

Vickers undid the pouch on his vest and handed it over. James took it and looked inside, happy to see the high tech glasses inside. "Eight hours of battery." He said simply. He pointed at pieces of tape over the microphones. "And they're still linked to the other side. Hence the tape to keep people from listening in without a bit more effort. Don't turn em on until you're eyes on. You got the mesh?"

James reached into the side of his pack and produced a roll of fine mesh made of copper, lead, and a few other metals. It also had several small rune sheets on one end that would be used to tie it in place. He and Veliry had worked together to make the rudimentary, and magically enhanced, Faraday cage.

"Sweet." Vickers said. "Make sure not to turn those on until you've got that stuff on it."

"I know." James said. Amina cinched one of his armor pieces in place.

"Got your winter gear?" She asked. "Depending on how high you go and where you land to spot them, it might be cold."

James's left hand reached back and grabbed hers, stilling it.

"Guys." He said. "I got this."

Vickers stared at him blankly. "I don't think I've ever heard you say something like that without you ending up six different kinds of fucked up after." He said flatly.

James ignored the barb as he planted a kiss on Amina's cheek. "Southeast right?" He asked her softly. She nodded. James nodded too. "Big ass desert in the middle of a bunch of mountains. Easy."

"We'll be a few days behind you." She said.

"And I'll have the L.R. set up and running. Even if I've gotta hand crank it to keep the battery up." Vickers added.

"Should only take me three or so to get there." He said, brushing off their concern. "Which means I should be on my way back before you guys even get to Ryiddmar village."

"You'd better be." She said. "Don't make me sit next to you while you're covered in bandages again." She hugged him.

"That all depends on whatever tries to fuck with me this time." He said with a smirk before wrapping his arms around her and pulling her into a kiss.

Vickers turned away with a sigh. "It's a damn weekend recon op." He said under his breath. "Not fucking China Sea two point O."

James broke the kiss."Is that Atrafar?" He asked, faking surprise.

"What?" Vickers asked as he turned to look around, a look of shock on his face.

"Gotcha." James said with a smirk.

Vickers turned back with a look of anger as James quickly leapt back and away from Amina, who was stifling laughter. Then he jumped into the air.

Then he was flying in his bombastic style.

"Motherfucker." Vickers said through gritted teeth.

James flew for a moment, then seemed to pause in the air, hovering.

"THAT WAY YOU DUMB SHIT!" Vickers yelled while pointing southeast.

James wavered before taking off in the indicated direction.

Amina chuckled at the interaction.

"You're laughing?" He asked incredulously.

She calmed herself for a moment before responding. "He knew which way it was." She said. "He was just messing with you.... again."

Vickers ground his teeth again as he looked up at the rapidly moving shape of the departing captain.

"I fucking hate that guy." He said to himself.

"He knows." She said as she began walking toward the stables. "Now come on. We've got to get moving too."

Suddenly the door that she and James had used only minutes before burst open.

"Joey?" She asked in surprise.

"Amina!" He said with a smile. Then he turned and saw Vickers "And Chief Vickers. You're taking off to follow James right? That's what that noise was? Him taking off?"

"Yeah." Vickers answered, his former anger dissolved by the unexpected arrival of the young man.

"Okay." Joey said. "Me and Arch Mage Veliry came up with something about the blight." He said excitedly. The both looked shocked at the announcement. "But that can wait. That idea also gave me ANOTHER idea about how you can help James." He looked over at the stables with a look of unease.

"What is it?" Amina asked curiously.

Joey kept peering at the stables uncertainly.

"Ummmm...." He said. "It's..... probably gonna be difficult."

They both looked at the stables themselves and wondered the same thing.

What the hell(s) is he trying to do?

\------------------------

It was eight in the morning when it happened.

Mike was walking his dog Link, named after the hero from his favorite game of course, when it happened.

Link was a great dog. Mike had had him for almost seven years now.

In fact, Link was such a good dog that Mike rarely, if ever, used a leash for him. He always kept the leash with him, in case another dog came around. But he rarely needed it. The little Terrier-Beagle mix was well behaved and always listened.

Unless a squirrel showed up. Like it had today.

Link could never resist the little bastards.

Normally Mike would be fine letting the dog chase and bark at the rodents futilely. After all, Link had never caught one before. He was too short, too slow, and couldn't get up the trees that were all around the area. He was pretty sure the squirrels taunted the dog on purpose.

But this one had caught the dog's eye from across the street.

He'd called out to Link. After all, he'd seen the pickup truck coming.

But the dog had been blinded by his squirrel hating instincts.

Mike watched as the world seemed to slow down, as it did when adrenaline brought clarity.

He rushed toward the dog, knowing it was too late. His hands reached out instinctively, even though he knew he'd never reach his best friend in time.

He heard the brakes cause the tires to screech as the driver tried to avoid what was coming.

Then.... something unexpected happened.

Mike felt his clothes rustle, as though a strong wind was blowing.

He felt something that felt like electricity course through him, though it didn't hurt.

Time seemed to almost skip. Or at least his perception of it did.

Link froze where he was, startled by the sudden noise and violence that had occurred around him.

Mike did much the same.

The tree that the squirrel had been in, little more than a sapling, was flattened in a heartbeat, the squirrel along with it.

The truck, an old late 20's model Toyota, was wrapped around the much larger tree behind it.

Link unfroze before Mike did, whining in confusion before retreating back to Mike's side.

Mike quickly scooped the small dog into his arms, looking at the wrecked truck in confusion.

That didn't just happen. He thought to himself. It couldn't have. The driver swerved. That's all.

Then, after a moment of hugging Link, he ran forward to see if the driver was okay.

He wasn't.

The investigators and coroner would come to the same conclusion, though they didn't understand it. Some kind of impact had slammed the pickup truck sideways, akin to it being T-boned by a significantly larger vehicle, before it had slammed into the tree.

Unbeknownst to anyone involved in the incident or the subsequent investigation, a goddess smiled at the birth of Magic on Earth. And what it meant for the furthering of her plans.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xrp6dh/wait_is_this_just_gate_231/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (230/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look. Progress. Love that stuff.

Also the last section will not be expanded on in any way shape or form. If you want more info on that story, feel free to write it yourself in r/GATEhouse

*\~\~\~

"Hey.... Miss Veliry?" Joey asked as he sat reading the various notes and documents on the cluttered desk in the Arch Mage's lab. She was tinkering with the feed mechanism on one of her rifle prototypes, a pair of magnifying glasses slotted over her face and so didn't notice the call. "Miss Veliry?" Joey repeated louder.

"Hmmm?" She asked as she finally got the lever she'd been fiddling with loose enough to move.

"Are you busy?" He asked. "I had a question about the bottomless bags."

"Yes and no." She answered as she finally pried the piece of metal out with a smile. "Why? And why bottomless bags?"

"It's just.... how do they work?" He asked. "And also, I've seen warnings never to use one that's damaged, and to NEVER put one inside another. I think I understand why. But would you mind clarifying?"

"Well..." She began as she replaced the lever with a smaller, differently shaped one. "Damaged bags, if they fail, can violently expel their contents. That's not so-Ow!" She winced as the mechanism in the rifle pinched her finger. "That's not so bad if its just full of normal items. Coins, food, clothes, things like that. Just an inconvenience if THAT happens. But if you have delicate items. Or if you're a mage or something, like me, and carry things that are slightly more.... volatile... than it can actually be dangerous." She paused as she thought for a second. "Or if you're a traveling armorer with a bag full of sharp things." She added with a tilt of her head.

"That makes sense." Joey responded. "And it's pretty much what I expected. But what about putting a bag inside another bag?"

Veliry smiled a little as the lever finally slotted into its place correctly, she quickly set the restraining pin in place to keep it from moving and then grabbed the small gear rod that would go on top of it.

"That's..... more complicated." She said as she set the rifle down and turned to look at him. Joey smiled for a moment before turning away to look at the notes again, though he kept her in his peripheral vision. "In a controlled setting, with a knowledgeable mage, it can be used to add space to the external bag." She thought for a moment. "Kind of like.... adding a set of walls to the inside of a large house to make a room inside of it. Only you can remove the room as needed to get what's within it." She scrunched her face a bit as she tried to think of a better way to say it.

"Or like adding a folder INTO another folder on your tablet." He said, pointing at the tablet propped up on the table beside him.

She thought about it, then smiled. "That's a much better analogy." She agreed.

Joey thought for a moment. "And if it's not done correctly?"

She grimaced. "Well. In that situation the two sub-dimensions end up merging. Often violently. The contents end up overlapping and fusing on an alchemical level. And with wildly unpredictable results. If the bags are empty it tends to just destroy the two bags. But if they're full... Even a little bit." She grimaced again. "And it usually results in an explosion."

"Huh." He said. "I thought it was going to be D&D style and open a planar vortex."

"What?" She asked, in confusion.

"Nothing." He said. "Just... Earth stuff." He held up a pouch from the table. "How big can they get?"

"Bottomless bags?" She asked. Joey nodded. Veliry shrugged. "As big as the bag you make them of, I suppose. It's a simple conversion process once you know how to do it, if a bit energy intensive."

"So.... no real size limit?" He asked. "Does increased size also mean increased capacity?"

"To an extent." She answered. "The level of magical energy focused on the creation is the real limitation on capacity."

"So a more powerful mage, or someone with lots of energy available could make a deeper bottomless bag?" He asked.

"Yes." She replied with a nod. "Where are you going with this?"

Joey picked up sheet of paper from her file on the blighted zone.

"The smallest recorded patches of blight- at least according to estimates, I know they're difficult to measure- is.... roughly a foot and a half across." He said.

Suddenly, she knew where this was going.

Joey stood up and attempted to grab a sack that she knew was full of inert rune stones that still needed to be imbued. It was heavier than he'd realized and he grunted as he lifted it off the ground. He opened it and examined it's contents and opening. Then he gestured at it, implying what she'd already realized he meant.

"Has anyone tried putting the blights into a bottomless bag?" He asked. "And if they did, could they move them?" His eyebrows raised a bit. "Or.... merge some bags of blight afterward?"

Veliry's mind raced as she considered the idea.

"That...." She began as she began trying to think of what that would cause. "Is a fascinatingly terrifying question."

\---

"Are you sure you don't want me to go with you?" Amina asked as she and James walked out to the castle's courtyard. "Or at least Vickers?"

"I'm sure." James said as he adjusted the pack on his back. "This needs to be as stealth as it can be. Plus you guys can't keep up with me in the air." He grinned at her. "Unless you've changed your mind about me teaching you how to fly like I do."

She glared at him before smiling. "One of us has to be responsible and stay on the ground. You keep crashing too often."

"Oh please." James countered. "I didn't crash yesterday. Hell, Vel came closer to crashing than I did. I haven't crashed since...." He trailed off as he realized WHEN his last crash had been. He didn't miss the flash of sorrow on his fiance's face at the memory.

"I don't like you going on your own." She said, changing the subject. "What if something happens?"

"Something almost definitely will." James admitted. "But it won't be anything we can account for ahead of time. I'm not going to confront them, or even get within shooting distance. This is strictly recon only." He said as they exited the doorway leading outside.

"That's supposed to be MY specialty." The gruff, Boston-accented, voice of Chief Vickers cut in as he pushed off of the wall he'd been leaning against and joined them.

James startled a little at the unexpected presence, before tapping a knuckle on the large SEAL's shoulder.

"Well. Learn to fly and you can take my place." He said.

Vickers grunted. "Workin' on it." He countered.

James cocked an eyebrow. "Got em?" He asked.

Vickers undid the pouch on his vest and handed it over. James took it and looked inside, happy to see the high tech glasses inside. "Eight hours of battery." He said simply. He pointed at pieces of tape over the microphones. "And they're still linked to the other side. Hence the tape to keep people from listening in without a bit more effort. Don't turn em on until you're eyes on. You got the mesh?"

James reached into the side of his pack and produced a roll of fine mesh made of copper, lead, and a few other metals. It also had several small rune sheets on one end that would be used to tie it in place. He and Veliry had worked together to make the rudimentary, and magically enhanced, Faraday cage.

"Sweet." Vickers said. "Make sure not to turn those on until you've got that stuff on it."

"I know." James said. Amina cinched one of his armor pieces in place.

"Got your winter gear?" She asked. "Depending on how high you go and where you land to spot them, it might be cold."

James's left hand reached back and grabbed hers, stilling it.

"Guys." He said. "I got this."

Vickers stared at him blankly. "I don't think I've ever heard you say something like that without you ending up six different kinds of fucked up after." He said flatly.

James ignored the barb as he planted a kiss on Amina's cheek. "Southeast right?" He asked her softly. She nodded. James nodded too. "Big ass desert in the middle of a bunch of mountains. Easy."

"We'll be a few days behind you." She said.

"And I'll have the L.R. set up and running. Even if I've gotta hand crank it to keep the battery up." Vickers added.

"Should only take me three or so to get there." He said, brushing off their concern. "Which means I should be on my way back before you guys even get to Ryiddmar village."

"You'd better be." She said. "Don't make me sit next to you while you're covered in bandages again." She hugged him.

"That all depends on whatever tries to fuck with me this time." He said with a smirk before wrapping his arms around her and pulling her into a kiss.

Vickers turned away with a sigh. "It's a damn weekend recon op." He said under his breath. "Not fucking China Sea two point O."

James broke the kiss."Is that Atrafar?" He asked, faking surprise.

"What?" Vickers asked as he turned to look around, a look of shock on his face.

"Gotcha." James said with a smirk.

Vickers turned back with a look of anger as James quickly leapt back and away from Amina, who was stifling laughter. Then he jumped into the air.

Then he was flying in his bombastic style.

"Motherfucker." Vickers said through gritted teeth.

James flew for a moment, then seemed to pause in the air, hovering.

"THAT WAY YOU DUMB SHIT!" Vickers yelled while pointing southeast.

James wavered before taking off in the indicated direction.

Amina chuckled at the interaction.

"You're laughing?" He asked incredulously.

She calmed herself for a moment before responding. "He knew which way it was." She said. "He was just messing with you.... again."

Vickers ground his teeth again as he looked up at the rapidly moving shape of the departing captain.

"I fucking hate that guy." He said to himself.

"He knows." She said as she began walking toward the stables. "Now come on. We've got to get moving too."

Suddenly the door that she and James had used only minutes before burst open.

"Joey?" She asked in surprise.

"Amina!" He said with a smile. Then he turned and saw Vickers "And Chief Vickers. You're taking off to follow James right? That's what that noise was? Him taking off?"

"Yeah." Vickers answered, his former anger dissolved by the unexpected arrival of the young man.

"Okay." Joey said. "Me and Arch Mage Veliry came up with something about the blight." He said excitedly. The both looked shocked at the announcement. "But that can wait. That idea also gave me ANOTHER idea about how you can help James." He looked over at the stables with a look of unease.

"What is it?" Amina asked curiously.

Joey kept peering at the stables uncertainly.

"Ummmm...." He said. "It's..... probably gonna be difficult."

They both looked at the stables themselves and wondered the same thing.

What the hell(s) is he trying to do?

\------------------------

It was eight in the morning when it happened.

Mike was walking his dog Link, named after the hero from his favorite game of course, when it happened.

Link was a great dog. Mike had had him for almost seven years now.

In fact, Link was such a good dog that Mike rarely, if ever, used a leash for him. He always kept the leash with him, in case another dog came around. But he rarely needed it. The little Terrier-Beagle mix was well behaved and always listened.

Unless a squirrel showed up. Like it had today.

Link could never resist the little bastards.

Normally Mike would be fine letting the dog chase and bark at the rodents futilely. After all, Link had never caught one before. He was too short, too slow, and couldn't get up the trees that were all around the area. He was pretty sure the squirrels taunted the dog on purpose.

But this one had caught the dog's eye from across the street.

He'd called out to Link. After all, he'd seen the pickup truck coming.

But the dog had been blinded by his squirrel hating instincts.

Mike watched as the world seemed to slow down, as it did when adrenaline brought clarity.

He rushed toward the dog, knowing it was too late. His hands reached out instinctively, even though he knew he'd never reach his best friend in time.

He heard the brakes cause the tires to screech as the driver tried to avoid what was coming.

Then.... something unexpected happened.

Mike felt his clothes rustle, as though a strong wind was blowing.

He felt something that felt like electricity course through him, though it didn't hurt.

Time seemed to almost skip. Or at least his perception of it did.

Link froze where he was, startled by the sudden noise and violence that had occurred around him.

Mike did much the same.

The tree that the squirrel had been in, little more than a sapling, was flattened in a heartbeat, the squirrel along with it.

The truck, an old late 20's model Toyota, was wrapped around the much larger tree behind it.

Link unfroze before Mike did, whining in confusion before retreating back to Mike's side.

Mike quickly scooped the small dog into his arms, looking at the wrecked truck in confusion.

That didn't just happen. He thought to himself. It couldn't have. The driver swerved. That's all.

Then, after a moment of hugging Link, he ran forward to see if the driver was okay.

He wasn't.

The investigators and coroner would come to the same conclusion, though they didn't understand it. Some kind of impact had slammed the pickup truck sideways, akin to it being T-boned by a significantly larger vehicle, before it had slammed into the tree.

Unbeknownst to anyone involved in the incident or the subsequent investigation, a goddess smiled at the birth of Magic on Earth. And what it meant for the furthering of her plans.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xrp46o/wait_is_this_just_gate_231/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (229/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah I'm still alive. I told y'all I was gonna be on vacation for a week. Bit of a short and sweet one. Still a bit jet lagged.

EEEEENNNNNNNJJJJJOOOOOOYYYYYYY!!!!!!

\~

BOOM!

"Okay." James said as he peered through the little orange-ish brown monocle Veliry had given him. "Good height..... Oh. I see what you mean about the energy flow. God that's weird."

Boom! BoomBoomboom....

"This is much harder than you make it look!" Veliry yelled back as she stabilized herself in mid air.

pop-po-po-pop! fsssssSSSSSSSHHHHHH!!!

"Ohhhhh yeah! That's it!" James exclaimed. "Hold that. That's the jet." He instructed as he watched the magical energy flowing through the mage's legs harmonize and eventually become a smaller, but steadier tempo.

Instead of a series of small stabilizing explosion, the magical emanations from Veliry's feet had become nearly identical to the thrusters of a fighter jet. Though much smaller.

"Ramp it up!" Joey yelled excitedly from beside him as he watched the experiment.

"Gre-" Veliry began before wavering in the air.

"Use your hands to stabilize!" James directed.

Boom! An explosion emanated from the hand closest to the ground, sending her back up straight.

"Oh gods!" She said as she straightened back up. "HOW DO YOU DO THIS IN A FIGHT?!?!"

"Well!" James began sarcastically. "I do spend a lot of time at the healers! Remember?"

A few moments, and a few more explosions, later and Veliry was flying with fairly good stability.

James handed the monocle to Joey.

"Here bud. Watch the energy. See if you can notice anything." He said as Joey eagerly accepted the small piece of colored, magical, glass and pressed it into his eye. "Back up." James added. "Might be a touch dangerous until I get up there." Joey obeyed, quickly back-stepping several yards.

Alright. Jet engine. Like a cross between the fire spell, the explosion spell, and the oxygen wind spell. All happening thousands of times a second..... At a constant rate. He thought as he began drawing in magical energy. Easy. I came up with it. Joey, Veliry, and google figured out the HOW... more or less. And she's using it even now. I got this.

He focused on the soles of his feet.

"Woaaaaaah!" Joey said from where he was standing. "James.... Your energy is way different from Veliry's."

James wanted to ask what he meant. But he knew better from previous "experiments" that he needed to focus.

FFFFFFWWWWWOOOOOOOOOO-

James felt himself lift of the ground. He also HEARD the sound of the ground scorching and rocks being scattered beneath his feet.

OOOOOOOOOOOOOSSSSSSSSSSSHHHHHHHHHH!!!!

James gradually picked up speed until he'd neared where Veliry was still hovering and trying to stabilize herself.

"Seriously." She said as he pulled back on the flow. "This is.... difficult. Focused levitation is much more efficient."

James emitted a blast of high pressure air from his palm to lock his position as his slow climb became a similar hover.

"Yeah. But this is faster." He countered.

"Is it?" She asked. "Did you see me on the wall of Jadesport? I can move faster than you think while flying my way."

"First;" He began. "You know I didn't. Second; you needed like.... six other mages to help you channel energy for that. I can fly faster by myself."

"And as you already pointed out. You end up at the healers a lot." She shot back.

"Yeah. Fair." He admitted. "But seriously." He said with a grin. "Watch my energy real quick."

"Wha-" She began to ask, before being cut off by James accelerating.

"KEEP UP THIS TIME!" He yelled over his shoulder as he began rocketing up and away.

"Gods dammit! JAMES!" She yelled as she began accelerating to match him.

"I...AM... IRON... MAN!!!" James yelled out in an attempt at a robotic voice as he continued accelerating.

Below them, watching with silent awe was Joey.

He saw the energy flow into their bodies and focus on their legs and arms before flowing out of their feet, and occasionally their hands.

He also watched the maelstrom of different energies flowing around them in a vortex of multicolored, vaporous forms. From the air, the ground, even from each other. Though the latter was always halted after a moment.

His unadorned eye saw them fly off in a trail of heat and vapor as their jet-like feet scorched the air as they passed.

He longed to join them.

Once they'd flown far enough away, Joey did what came naturally to him. In fact, it was one of the few things that DID come naturally to him.

He looked around with the monocle, marveling at the different, latent, magical energies that he saw flowing and ebbing, and occasionally bursting, around him. It was like looking into a tide with an oil sheen on its surface. But he could see that there was life there. Or maybe not... LIFE.... life. But something similar.

Allowing his curiosity to get the better of him, he held his hand up in front of the monocle.

"Wooooooaaaahhhh." He said softly as he saw the light orange energy pulsing there. It looked like James's did, albeit much weaker. But it was different in a way that he suspected was unique to him. He began to wonder if everyone's energy was different, and resolved to continue using the monocle as he made his way back into the castle.

But he'd also ask Veliry. Her mind worked very similarly to his, even if she was better at the social interactions that he worked so hard to understand.

Plus, he just liked asking her things.

\--------------------

Dranek looked into the room with an expression that he hoped these "Doctors" would read as pride. Though he didn't FEEL any pride. Especially not while wearing the silver laced, upgraded, restraints they'd placed him in.

He could walk, albeit slowly, and he could move his head. But the rest of his body was in a web of chains, cables, and plates that only avoided burning his skin because of the layer of cloth in the way.

If he tried to break out, not that he could in this form, they would cut through his clothes in the process and eventually kill him.

How his body knew what phase the moon was in in a different world, and in a facility with no view of the sky, he didn't know. In fact, he didn't even know if this world's moon held any sway over him. Maybe the goddess was the cause.

"Anyways, what do you think?" Asked the so called doctor. "I know that the.... turning... fights... have been rough on you. But they're all alive.... Minus one."

"I would expect no less from werewolves." Dranek said. "I imagine that... ONE.... died at the hands of your experiments?" It was a rhetorical question. He knew the answer from the smell of the man's fear at the question.

"We.... needed to know what it takes to uh.... put a werewolf down." The man admitted.

And so you killed a member of MY pack? Dranek wondered.

Instead he said. "Understandable. At least they weren't citizens of my world. I would have to kill you if they had been."

I'm going to kill you all the same... in time.

On the other side of the thick, silver barred, glass the six werewolves looked back at him from their restrained positions.

Goddess. Do they know? He asked.

They know enough. She answered.

Good. He thought back. He looked at the "Doctor" without turning his head. The annoying little man was blabbering about something and didn't notice. But he saw the other wolves follow his gaze.

Dranek bared his teeth in a way that, on his human form, simply looked like a smile.

But it was all the message THEY needed to understand his intent.

They "Smiled" back.

"Ah." Said the doctor. "They seem happy to see their primogenitor."

"Their what?" Dranek asked with a cocked eyebrow.

"Their.... creator?" The man said.

"Oh." Dranek said.

"Anyways. Like I asked, what do you think?" The man asked again.

"They'll do." Dranek said. He turned back to the man. "Would you like me to make more?"

The man's eyes widened, surprised at the unexpected eagerness of his prisoner.

"Well... of course." The man answered eagerly. "I didn't think you'd be up for it now that you're um... human?"

Dranek suppressed a grin. "You will find that even like this." He said with a look down at his body. "I am MORE than human."

And oooooh won't he learn that soon enough.

Dranek watched the man turn to the guards nearby and signal for the door while saying something to them in his own language. He used the distraction to wink at the wolves in the room before him.

Navarro, his first new pack member, nodded at him. Then he watched as Navarro began to howl softly. The others listened intently.

Whatever world they're on. Wolves will always be wolves. He thought, not needing to fake a grin as the "Doctor" led him out of the room with a smile.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xqllen/wait_is_this_just_gate_230/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (229/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah I'm still alive. I told y'all I was gonna be on vacation for a week. Bit of a short and sweet one. Still a bit jet lagged.

EEEEENNNNNNNJJJJJOOOOOOYYYYYYY!!!!!!

\~

BOOM!

"Okay." James said as he peered through the little orange-ish brown monocle Veliry had given him. "Good height..... Oh. I see what you mean about the energy flow. God that's weird."

Boom! BoomBoomboom....

"This is much harder than you make it look!" Veliry yelled back as she stabilized herself in mid air.

pop-po-po-pop! fsssssSSSSSSSHHHHHH!!!

"Ohhhhh yeah! That's it!" James exclaimed. "Hold that. That's the jet." He instructed as he watched the magical energy flowing through the mage's legs harmonize and eventually become a smaller, but steadier tempo.

Instead of a series of small stabilizing explosion, the magical emanations from Veliry's feet had become nearly identical to the thrusters of a fighter jet. Though much smaller.

"Ramp it up!" Joey yelled excitedly from beside him as he watched the experiment.

"Gre-" Veliry began before wavering in the air.

"Use your hands to stabilize!" James directed.

Boom! An explosion emanated from the hand closest to the ground, sending her back up straight.

"Oh gods!" She said as she straightened back up. "HOW DO YOU DO THIS IN A FIGHT?!?!"

"Well!" James began sarcastically. "I do spend a lot of time at the healers! Remember?"

A few moments, and a few more explosions, later and Veliry was flying with fairly good stability.

James handed the monocle to Joey.

"Here bud. Watch the energy. See if you can notice anything." He said as Joey eagerly accepted the small piece of colored, magical, glass and pressed it into his eye. "Back up." James added. "Might be a touch dangerous until I get up there." Joey obeyed, quickly back-stepping several yards.

Alright. Jet engine. Like a cross between the fire spell, the explosion spell, and the oxygen wind spell. All happening thousands of times a second..... At a constant rate. He thought as he began drawing in magical energy. Easy. I came up with it. Joey, Veliry, and google figured out the HOW... more or less. And she's using it even now. I got this.

He focused on the soles of his feet.

"Woaaaaaah!" Joey said from where he was standing. "James.... Your energy is way different from Veliry's."

James wanted to ask what he meant. But he knew better from previous "experiments" that he needed to focus.

FFFFFFWWWWWWOOOOOOOOOO-

James felt himself lift of the ground. He also HEARD the sound of the ground scorching and rocks being scattered beneath his feet.

OOOOOOOOOOOOOSSSSSSSSSSSHHHHHHHHHH!!!!

James gradually picked up speed until he'd neared where Veliry was still hovering and trying to stabilize herself.

"Seriously." She said as he pulled back on the flow. "This is.... difficult. Focused levitation is much more efficient."

James emitted a blast of high pressure air from his palm to lock his position as his slow climb became a similar hover.

"Yeah. But this is faster." He countered.

"Is it?" She asked. "Did you see me on the wall of Jadesport? I can move faster than you think while flying my way."

"First;" He began. "You know I didn't. Second; you needed like.... six other mages to help you channel energy for that. I can fly faster by myself."

"And as you already pointed out. You end up at the healers a lot." She shot back.

"Yeah. Fair." He admitted. "But seriously." He said with a grin. "Watch my energy real quick."

"Wha-" She began to ask, before being cut off by James accelerating.

"KEEP UP THIS TIME!" He yelled over his shoulder as he began rocketing up and away.

"Gods dammit! JAMES!" She yelled as she began accelerating to match him.

"I...AM... IRON... MAN!!!" James yelled out in an attempt at a robotic voice as he continued accelerating.

Below them, watching with silent awe was Joey.

He saw the energy flow into their bodies and focus on their legs and arms before flowing out of their feet, and occasionally their hands.

He also watched the maelstrom of different energies flowing around them in a vortex of multicolored, vaporous forms. From the air, the ground, even from each other. Though the latter was always halted after a moment.

His unadorned eye saw them fly off in a trail of heat and vapor as their jet-like feet scorched the air as they passed.

He longed to join them.

Once they'd flown far enough away, Joey did what came naturally to him. In fact, it was one of the few things that DID come naturally to him.

He looked around with the monocle, marveling at the different, latent, magical energies that he saw flowing and ebbing, and occasionally bursting, around him. It was like looking into a tide with an oil sheen on its surface. But he could see that there was life there. Or maybe not... LIFE.... life. But something similar.

Allowing his curiosity to get the better of him, he held his hand up in front of the monocle.

"Wooooooaaaahhhh." He said softly as he saw the light orange energy pulsing there. It looked like James's did, albeit much weaker. But it was different in a way that he suspected was unique to him. He began to wonder if everyone's energy was different, and resolved to continue using the monocle as he made his way back into the castle.

But he'd also ask Veliry. Her mind worked very similarly to his, even if she was better at the social interactions that he worked so hard to understand.

Plus, he just liked asking her things.

\--------------------

Dranek looked into the room with an expression that he hoped these "Doctors" would read as pride. Though he didn't FEEL any pride. Especially not while wearing the silver laced, upgraded, restraints they'd placed him in.

He could walk, albeit slowly, and he could move his head. But the rest of his body was in a web of chains, cables, and plates that only avoided burning his skin because of the layer of cloth in the way.

If he tried to break out, not that he could in this form, they would cut through his clothes in the process and eventually kill him.

How his body knew what phase the moon was in in a different world, and in a facility with no view of the sky, he didn't know. In fact, he didn't even know if this world's moon held any sway over him. Maybe the goddess was the cause.

"Anyways, what do you think?" Asked the so called doctor. "I know that the.... turning... fights... have been rough on you. But they're all alive.... Minus one."

"I would expect no less from werewolves." Dranek said. "I imagine that... ONE.... died at the hands of your experiments?" It was a rhetorical question. He knew the answer from the smell of the man's fear at the question.

"We.... needed to know what it takes to uh.... put a werewolf down." The man admitted.

And so you killed a member of MY pack? Dranek wondered.

Instead he said. "Understandable. At least they weren't citizens of my world. I would have to kill you if they had been."

I'm going to kill you all the same... in time.

On the other side of the thick, silver barred, glass the six werewolves looked back at him from their restrained positions.

Goddess. Do they know? He asked.

They know enough. She answered.

Good. He thought back. He looked at the "Doctor" without turning his head. The annoying little man was blabbering about something and didn't notice. But he saw the other wolves follow his gaze.

Dranek bared his teeth in a way that, on his human form, simply looked like a smile.

But it was all the message THEY needed to understand his intent.

They "Smiled" back.

"Ah." Said the doctor. "They seem happy to see their primogenitor."

"Their what?" Dranek asked with a cocked eyebrow.

"Their.... creator?" The man said.

"Oh." Dranek said.

"Anyways. Like I asked, what do you think?" The man asked again.

"They'll do." Dranek said. He turned back to the man. "Would you like me to make more?"

The man's eyes widened, surprised at the unexpected eagerness of his prisoner.

"Well... of course." The man answered eagerly. "I didn't think you'd be up for it now that you're um... human?"

Dranek suppressed a grin. "You will find that even like this." He said with a look down at his body. "I am MORE than human."

And oooooh won't he learn that soon enough.

Dranek watched the man turn to the guards nearby and signal for the door while saying something to them in his own language. He used the distraction to wink at the wolves in the room before him.

Navarro, his first new pack member, nodded at him. Then he watched as Navarro began to howl softly. The others listened intently.

Whatever world they're on. Wolves will always be wolves. He thought, not needing to fake a grin as the "Doctor" led him out of the room with a smile.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xqljwo/wait_is_this_just_gate_230/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (228/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Love and Marriage, Love and Marriage. It's an institute you can't disparage.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"I think Joey has a crush." James said as he plopped down into the bed for the night. "He did definitely miss dinner. I had to stop mom from tracking him down. I assured her that he was just caught up with the new information and would be fine." James didn't mention that he questioned whether or not a magic door could stop an angry mother, or would for that matter.

"On who?" Amina asked, setting aside the report she was reading. "On Veliry?" She asked with a look of confusion. She winced. "Poor kid." She said.

"That's what I said." James agreed as he rolled over and placed his left hand on her stomach gently. "What's that one about?" He asked with a nod at the sheets of paper in her hand.

She placed a hand over his as the other moved the papers in front of him.

"Looking over recent reports around that desert." She said. "These are from about six months ago. Talking about how Clan...." she looked back at them for a moment. "Dunebasher, is going on an incursion into the deep dark using the desert as its entry point."

James's eyebrows furrowed as he quickly glanced at the paper.

"Isn't the desert elevated? You know, a high desert?" He asked. "How do they access the deep dark from there?"

She nodded. "It is. But the deep dark has entry points all over the place. Remember the hot springs? After you'd officially bonded with Steve?"

James smiled as he caressed the lines of her abs absentmindedly. "Hmm. That was the first time we slept together." He said with a grin.

She bopped him on the head with the papers. "Yes." She agreed. "Though... NOTHING.... happened."

"That's not what my legs were saying the day after." He said as he rolled over again and rested his head on her lap. "I was walking funny for days."

She placed the papers directly on his face and laid her hand on top of them, smothering him a little. "That's because you'd ridden Steve for the first time ever, and for nearly a whole day." She said with a huff. "I had nothing to do with it."

James pushed the papers aside, revealing a grin.

"Gixelle ended up being right about us." He said. "She was shipping us from day one."

"She was smarter than her crass, old lady, pit fighter looks would have most people think." Amina agreed as she leaned forward and planted a kiss on his forehead.

James was about to pull her into a proper kiss, and he hoped a little more, when she continued.

"Your mother reminds me of her a bit." She said.

James fought back a grimace. "Oh, babe." He said.

"What?" Amina asked. "She's got the same 'I'll kick anyone's ass if they mess with my boys' kind of aura around her."

"Well... yeah...." James agreed. "But why bring her up now?"

"What?" Amina asked again. "We were talking about your brother, and the desert, and Gixelle, I thought it was a talk about family."

"I mean... yeah..." James admitted. Then his hand reached up and planted on the small of her back, gentle but firm. "But I thought we could uh.... do some.... hot springs.... stuff... too."

She stared at him with flat eyes as she dropped the papers over the side of the bed.

"You mean get drunk enough that we fall asleep with nothing happening?" She deadpanned.

"Can we skip the 'nothing happening' part?" He asked with his eyes squinted and eyebrows raised. "Or at least the sleep part?"

She tried to keep her composure, but James's hand caressing her back, and his goofy expression prevented her from holding out.

She broke out in a grin.

"Fine." She said. "But you have to do that thing again."

James jumped up eagerly. "Still feels odd that you only want that from the wolf hand." He said. She glanced at him reproachfully. "But I have a wolf hand, so it's all good." He assured her before diving at her.

\---

The next day James walked happily through the town with his little brother, sleep deprived as he was, in tow.

"James. Can't I go back to the castle?" Joey asked in a drone. "I'm so tired."

"And whose fault is that little bro?" He shot back with a grin. "Told you dinner was at seven. You're the one that stayed up all night with Veliry talking about how steam engines worked."

"It wasn't just steam engines." Joey said with a hint of upset. "That was just the part you walked in on. You missed the whole seminar on how magic suffuses the body of a non-local like me or mom. Or you, back when you first got here." He held up his hands as if he was casting a spell. "Plus she explained how her deathbolts are actually how she stays so young looking. Did you know she's almost in her forties? I thought she was our age."

"Yeah?" James wondered as he peered around, a wistful smile permanently plastered to his face. Then he realized what Joey had just said. "Wait.... What?"

Joey hung his head a bit. "Also I probably won't be able to use magic for at least a few months."

James shook his little brother lightly by the shoulders. "Cheer up bud. It took me almost half a year before I could. And I had to almost die to figure it out." He shook his head. "Also, what was that about Veliry's age?"

"That was your catalyst event right?" Joey asked, ignoring the question. "With the grabber clan?"

"She told you about that?"

Joey chuckled a bit. "She also told me that Prince Alixan had to throw a density altering magical spear at you in order to unlock your reflex vision power."

"Of course she told you about that too." James grumbled. Then he pulled Joey to a stop. "We're here." He said with a smile.

Joey looked up at the sign. "What's it say?"Is this a tailor?" He asked as he pointed at the painted image of a sewing needle and a dress.

"Yep." James said. "Best in town too. Come on. I wanted to show you my surprise for the wedding." He added as he guided Joey inside.

"I was wondering why we were shopping again when we did that yesterday." Joey said before yawning. "Makes sense if its a surprise though."

Twenty minutes later, after having it pulled from the backroom where it was sitting in its box, and after having the tailor help him don it, James emerged from the dressing room.

"Woah!" Joey said as he suddenly woke up at the sight of his older brother. "Is that?"

"Just like dad's right?" James asked. "You know, the one handed down from great grandfather. Just, you know, threw a bit of purple and black in the design." He said as he pointed at some of the design. "You know, kinda my thing since I've gotten here."

Joey pinched some of the fabric. "It looks just like the real ones from home." Joey said. "Is it silk too?"

"Dark Elf spider silk." The tailor said. "Best the deep dark has to offer in the off season. It'll also stop most slashing attacks. Though, don't let anyone stab you or shoot you with a bow. Anything that specializes in piercing or stabbing is its big weakness." The older orc said as he inspected the fit of the garment.

"Huh. Cool." James said. "Big bonus."

"Dark elf spider silk?" Joey said in amazement as he absently stared at the tailor. "Like Drizzt and Lolth and them?"

"Who?" The tailor asked.

James shook his head. "I've been assured that the dark elves are actually really friendly." He assured his little brother. "Bit rigid. But decent."

"That's just elves in general." The tailor added. "Dark elves live a hard life in the deep dark. That rigidity keeps them alive."

Joey listened with rapt attention.

"What do you think?" James asked, snapping him out of his daze."

Joey beheld the blue cloth with dark purple and black details.

Then he grinned.

"I think mom AND Amina will both love it." He said as he ran his fingers across some of the embroidery while mouthing the words 'dark elf spider silk' to himself. Then he looked back up at James for a moment. "Did you get a hat?"

James rolled his eyes. "Yeeeesss." He said sarcastically. "Not a fan of them." He said as he looked back at the fitting mirror. "But. I gotta admit. This thing doesn't look quite complete without one." He smiled at the tailor. "No offense. It looks fantastic." Then he looked back at Joey. "That's a few shops over."

The tailor shrugged his massive shoulders. "A hat would look nice with it." He agreed, one hand rubbing his wispy grey beard. "Dreymoor's hattery?" He asked. James nodded in response. "A fine store." The orc said simply.

"Can...." Joey began, looking around at the tailor's offerings. "Can I get one?"

James looked at his brother with a smile. "Why do you think I brought you Jojo?" He asked rhetorically. "You are gonna be my best man. Aren't you?"

Joey smiled and wrapped his brother in a hug.

"Easy bud. New clothes." James said before returning the hug. Then as Joey released it James turned him around to face the orc.

"Mr. Brimjaw, you have a new client." He said with a smile.

"I'd picked up on that." The orc said. "Same budget restraint?"

"You mean lack thereof?" James asked. "Of course."

"I love working for the overly wealthy." The tailor said with a grin. Then he pointed Joey at the mirrors behind James and pulled a stool out. "Step on up short tooth."

"Are you THAT rich?" Joey asked absently as he stepped on the stool. Then his eyes snapped to the side of the mirror as Brimjaw pressed a small symbol on the side of the frame that lit up. After a few seconds of the tailor concentrating, an image appeared on the mirror over Joey's body. It showed him wearing a similar men's hanbok to his brother's, as well as symbols that he assumed were some kind of measurements, though he didn't understand them.

"Wooooah." He exclaimed with a grin as he moved his arm and watched the reflected image match it perfectly.

"Stand still young one." The old orc said as he began jotting down measurements.

James chuckled as he stepped into one of the other fitting booths to change back into his normal clothes.

\---

Dranek grunted as the people in the oddly textured white clothes, who he thought might be healers under other circumstances, poked and prodded his still sore body.

"How are you feeling today Dranek?" The young woman, that he assumed was in charge, asked. "I understand you took a bit of a beating after you um... affected... subject Navarro."

"As you can see." Dranek said, gesturing at his body and the handful of still present wounds. "I am still healing."

"I do see that." She said with a smile that he knew was fake. "Tell me; do you know HOW your body heals?"

Dranek nodded smugly. "Of course I do." He said simply. The other two people stopped what they were doing for just a moment to look at him curiously. They returned to their inspection at a glance from the woman.

"The magic of my goddess protects all her children, even outcasts, and grants us durability and longevity. So we may carry her blessing across the lands." He gestured at the room around them. "And now, to other worlds. It is this blessing that allows me to weather almost any injury."

The woman maintained the smile, though Dranek did see it falter ever so slightly. Clearly his answer hadn't been the one she was looking for. Still, she lifted her clipboard and clicked her writing utensil.

"Longevity you say? How long does the average werewolf live?" She asked.

"For wolves the average is an extension of life of roughly half." Dranek said. "A human may end up living to be nearly.... mmmmm... one hundred and fifty years old. Give or take a decade. While an elf may see their life extended from one millenia, to nearly two."

The woman wrote down those numbers eagerly. Dranek continued.

"For other Werefolk however, the numbers are different." He said. "I once met one of the feline types who was nearly three centuries old, and he was of human stock. And not born one of the folk either."

"Interesting." She said as she wrote. "So, there are other types of.... were...folk?" She asked.

"Very many." He answered, watching as she wrote frantically. "Wolves are simply the most numerous due to certain.... proclivities... and hard fought instincts."

"And how many.... werefolk.... are there?"

"I will not give you a precise answer to that." Dranek said firmly. "Not only because that would tell more about my world than I am comfortable letting you know. But also because I do not actually know." He paused. "It is a large number though."

"That is fair." She said as she finished writing her notes. "Tell me. Do your injuries hurt? The damage to your ear looks dreadful."

Dranek reached up and touched the still healing stub of an ear. It would grow back just fine, though it would likely take several days.

"All injuries hurt." He said with a hint of sarcasm. "Though I have been told by several of the turned that pain is significantly lessened once you are turned. " He looked down at a long gash in his thigh that was raw and pink, and not yet re-furred. "But according to them it is akin to being.... numbed."

"So you're not in any significant pain right now?" She asked.

"Significant? No." He said. "And I have had significantly worse injuries before."

Goddess? Why do you want me to tell them these things? Should we not HIDE this information from my world's enemies?

Tactically? Maybe. She answered. But there is value in giving your enemies something to fear..... and covet.

Covet?

Think about it dear Dranek. They did not ask you to turn that dreadful Navarro for nothing. They're testing it for themselves. They crave power more than anyone you have ever met. And to them, that is what you represent. A chance at power.

And we are giving it to them?

You know better than any; the double edged nature of being a werewolf.

I..... Think... I understand.

You will. She assured him.

"Mr. Dranek?" The woman asked, snapping him out of his....conversation.

"Yes?" He asked in return.

"I asked if you needed anything for your new lodgings. The exam is over for today."

"You mean my cell?" He asked.

She nodded awkwardly. "Yes." She admitted.

"I would prefer to have grass underfoot." He answered truthfully. "Though I doubt that's an option."

She nodded again. "You're probably right." She agreed. "But I can maybe ask about some turf."

Dranek raised an eyebrow at that.

\----------

"MOON WHAT ARE YOU DOING?"

"War." She said with annoyance. "Always with the yelling. We're both gods. You don't need to intimidate me." She reminded him. Though war had always had this issue.

"Sorry." He said, having adjusted his volume. "Last time I spoke to anyone directly it was on Anchuria. You know how that place is."

She sighed as she turned her attention toward him properly. "Your favorite world." She said.

"Not even top five." War answered. "Their warfare is so repetitive and simple. A good meal. But bland."

She felt his attention turn to her more acutely. "Seriously. What are you doing?"

"The exact same thing you WOULD be doing if this world weren't already so rich with your favorite energy." She sent him a wave of judgmental energy. "Besides. My motives will only add more of it for you."

"I know that." He said. "My real question is why?"

She gestured at the world below them, and at the moon floating over it. She couldn't believe that it had allowed the pathetic mortals here to touch it without even sacrificing anyone to do so in a ritual. War could feel her anger at it.

"Look at it." She said. "One of our strangest, and yet... most rewarding... experimental worlds." She paused. "MAAAAGIC!!!!" She yelled though their shared incorporeal realm of this universe.

"Do you have to call them?" War asked. "I know they're here now. But do we really need to involve them?"

"About."

"Time."

"You."

"Others."

"Remembered."

"To."

"Include."

"Us."

Magic said in their jilting, back and forth, way of communicating. A product of their ever waning presence. One that was made all the worse because of how little magic there actually was in this existence.

"Hello Magic." War said without hiding his displeasure.

"Hello."

"War."

"And.

"Moon."

>!\---------Writer's note: Okay, y'all get the idea. Magic is meant to be annoying and even more unknowable than most Gods. I'm not keeping that format for magic from here on out. Imagine that shit on your own. ---------!<

"Magic." Moon replied. "I know how hungry this world must have you right now."

"Starving." Magic replied.

"Well." Moon said, pulling War in close. If they'd had tangible bodies she would have had an arm around his shoulder. "I have a solution for it."

"We. Are. Listening." Magic said. "Though. We. Can. Already. Figure. It. Out."

"Good." Moon said. "And if it goes the way I think. It should be the birth of a new sibling for us. War. I think you know what they might end up being."

War thought for a moment, using his universal omniscience to examine everything he knew of Moon's current manipulations.

"Hmmm. I don't think Stability or Life will like them." He said.

Moon let out radiant happiness. "That's their problem. We all know they could both use a challenge for a change. Especially Life."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xps7wo/wait_is_this_just_gate_229/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (228/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Love and Marriage, Love and Marriage. It's an institute you can't disparage.

Enjoy.

\~

"I think Joey has a crush." James said as he plopped down into the bed for the night. "He did definitely miss dinner. I had to stop mom from tracking him down. I assured her that he was just caught up with the new information and would be fine." James didn't mention that he questioned whether or not a magic door could stop an angry mother, or would for that matter.

"On who?" Amina asked, setting aside the report she was reading. "On Veliry?" She asked with a look of confusion. She winced. "Poor kid." She said.

"That's what I said." James agreed as he rolled over and placed his left hand on her stomach gently. "What's that one about?" He asked with a nod at the sheets of paper in her hand.

She placed a hand over his as the other moved the papers in front of him.

"Looking over recent reports around that desert." She said. "These are from about six months ago. Talking about how Clan...." she looked back at them for a moment. "Dunebasher, is going on an incursion into the deep dark using the desert as its entry point."

James's eyebrows furrowed as he quickly glanced at the paper.

"Isn't the desert elevated? You know, a high desert?" He asked. "How do they access the deep dark from there?"

She nodded. "It is. But the deep dark has entry points all over the place. Remember the hot springs? After you'd officially bonded with Steve?"

James smiled as he caressed the lines of her abs absentmindedly. "Hmm. That was the first time we slept together." He said with a grin.

She bopped him on the head with the papers. "Yes." She agreed. "Though... NOTHING.... happened."

"That's not what my legs were saying the day after." He said as he rolled over again and rested his head on her lap. "I was walking funny for days."

She placed the papers directly on his face and laid her hand on top of them, smothering him a little. "That's because you'd ridden Steve for the first time ever, and for nearly a whole day." She said with a huff. "I had nothing to do with it."

James pushed the papers aside, revealing a grin.

"Gixelle ended up being right about us." He said. "She was shipping us from day one."

"She was smarter than her crass, old lady, pit fighter looks would have most people think." Amina agreed as she leaned forward and planted a kiss on his forehead.

James was about to pull her into a proper kiss, and he hoped a little more, when she continued.

"Your mother reminds me of her a bit." She said.

James fought back a grimace. "Oh, babe." He said.

"What?" Amina asked. "She's got the same 'I'll kick anyone's ass if they mess with my boys' kind of aura around her."

"Well... yeah...." James agreed. "But why bring her up now?"

"What?" Amina asked again. "We were talking about your brother, and the desert, and Gixelle, I thought it was a talk about family."

"I mean... yeah..." James admitted. Then his hand reached up and planted on the small of her back, gentle but firm. "But I thought we could uh.... do some.... hot springs.... stuff... too."

She stared at him with flat eyes as she dropped the papers over the side of the bed.

"You mean get drunk enough that we fall asleep with nothing happening?" She deadpanned.

"Can we skip the 'nothing happening' part?" He asked with his eyes squinted and eyebrows raised. "Or at least the sleep part?"

She tried to keep her composure, but James's hand caressing her back, and his goofy expression prevented her from holding out.

She broke out in a grin.

"Fine." She said. "But you have to do that thing again."

James jumped up eagerly. "Still feels odd that you only want that from the wolf hand." He said. She glanced at him reproachfully. "But I have a wolf hand, so it's all good." He assured her before diving at her.

\---------------------------

The next day James walked happily through the town with his little brother, sleep deprived as he was, in tow.

"James. Can't I go back to the castle?" Joey asked in a drone. "I'm so tired."

"And whose fault is that little bro?" He shot back with a grin. "Told you dinner was at seven. You're the one that stayed up all night with Veliry talking about how steam engines worked."

"It wasn't just steam engines." Joey said with a hint of upset. "That was just the part you walked in on. You missed the whole seminar on how magic suffuses the body of a non-local like me or mom. Or you, back when you first got here." He held up his hands as if he was casting a spell. "Plus she explained how her deathbolts are actually how she stays so young looking. Did you know she's almost in her forties? I thought she was our age."

"Yeah?" James wondered as he peered around, a wistful smile permanently plastered to his face. Then he realized what Joey had just said. "Wait.... What?"

Joey hung his head a bit. "Also I probably won't be able to use magic for at least a few months."

James shook his little brother lightly by the shoulders. "Cheer up bud. It took me almost half a year before I could. And I had to almost die to figure it out." He shook his head. "Also, what was that about Veliry's age?"

"That was your catalyst event right?" Joey asked, ignoring the question. "With the grabber clan?"

"She told you about that?"

Joey chuckled a bit. "She also told me that Prince Alixan had to throw a density altering magical spear at you in order to unlock your reflex vision power."

"Of course she told you about that too." James grumbled. Then he pulled Joey to a stop. "We're here." He said with a smile.

Joey looked up at the sign. "What's it say?"Is this a tailor?" He asked as he pointed at the painted image of a sewing needle and a dress.

"Yep." James said. "Best in town too. Come on. I wanted to show you my surprise for the wedding." He added as he guided Joey inside.

"I was wondering why we were shopping again when we did that yesterday." Joey said before yawning. "Makes sense if its a surprise though."

Twenty minutes later, after having it pulled from the backroom where it was sitting in its box, and after having the tailor help him don it, James emerged from the dressing room.

"Woah!" Joey said as he suddenly woke up at the sight of his older brother. "Is that?"

"Just like dad's right?" James asked. "You know, the one handed down from great grandfather. Just, you know, threw a bit of purple and black in the design." He said as he pointed at some of the design. "You know, kinda my thing since I've gotten here."

Joey pinched some of the fabric. "It looks just like the real ones from home." Joey said. "Is it silk too?"

"Dark Elf spider silk." The tailor said. "Best the deep dark has to offer in the off season. It'll also stop most slashing attacks. Though, don't let anyone stab you or shoot you with a bow. Anything that specializes in piercing or stabbing is its big weakness." The older orc said as he inspected the fit of the garment.

"Huh. Cool." James said. "Big bonus."

"Dark elf spider silk?" Joey said in amazement as he absently stared at the tailor. "Like Drizzt and Lolth and them?"

"Who?" The tailor asked.

James shook his head. "I've been assured that the dark elves are actually really friendly." He assured his little brother. "Bit rigid. But decent."

"That's just elves in general." The tailor added. "Dark elves live a hard life in the deep dark. That rigidity keeps them alive."

Joey listened with rapt attention.

"What do you think?" James asked, snapping him out of his daze."

Joey beheld the blue cloth with dark purple and black details.

Then he grinned.

"I think mom AND Amina will both love it." He said as he ran his fingers across some of the embroidery while mouthing the words 'dark elf spider silk' to himself. Then he looked back up at James for a moment. "Did you get a hat?"

James rolled his eyes. "Yeeeessss." He said sarcastically. "Not a fan of them." He said as he looked back at the fitting mirror. "But. I gotta admit. This thing doesn't look quite complete without one." He smiled at the tailor. "No offense. It looks fantastic." Then he looked back at Joey. "That's a few shops over."

The tailor shrugged his massive shoulders. "A hat would look nice with it." He agreed, one hand rubbing his wispy grey beard. "Dreymoor's hattery?" He asked. James nodded in response. "A fine store." The orc said simply.

"Can...." Joey began, looking around at the tailor's offerings. "Can I get one?"

James looked at his brother with a smile. "Why do you think I brought you Jojo?" He asked rhetorically. "You are gonna be my best man. Aren't you?"

Joey smiled and wrapped his brother in a hug.

"Easy bud. New clothes." James said before returning the hug. Then as Joey released it James turned him around to face the orc.

"Mr. Brimjaw, you have a new client." He said with a smile.

"I'd picked up on that." The orc said. "Same budget restraint?"

"You mean lack thereof?" James asked. "Of course."

"I love working for the overly wealthy." The tailor said with a grin. Then he pointed Joey at the mirrors behind James and pulled a stool out. "Step on up short tooth."

"Are you THAT rich?" Joey asked absently as he stepped on the stool. Then his eyes snapped to the side of the mirror as Brimjaw pressed a small symbol on the side of the frame that lit up. After a few seconds of the tailor concentrating, an image appeared on the mirror over Joey's body. It showed him wearing a similar men's hanbok to his brother's, as well as symbols that he assumed were some kind of measurements, though he didn't understand them.

"Wooooah." He exclaimed with a grin as he moved his arm and watched the reflected image match it perfectly.

"Stand still young one." The old orc said as he began jotting down measurements.

James chuckled as he stepped into one of the other fitting booths to change back into his normal clothes.

\----------

Dranek grunted as the people in the oddly textured white clothes, who he thought might be healers under other circumstances, poked and prodded his still sore body.

"How are you feeling today Dranek?" The young woman, that he assumed was in charge, asked. "I understand you took a bit of a beating after you um... affected... subject Navarro."

"As you can see." Dranek said, gesturing at his body and the handful of still present wounds. "I am still healing."

"I do see that." She said with a smile that he knew was fake. "Tell me; do you know HOW your body heals?"

Dranek nodded smugly. "Of course I do." He said simply. The other two people stopped what they were doing for just a moment to look at him curiously. They returned to their inspection at a glance from the woman. "The magic of my goddess protects all her children, even outcasts, and grants us durability and longevity. So we may carry her blessing across the lands." He gestured at the room around them. "And now, to other worlds. It is this blessing that allows me to weather almost any injury."

The woman maintained the smile, though Dranek did see it falter ever so slightly. Clearly his answer hadn't been the one she was looking for. Still, she lifted her clipboard and clicked her writing utensil.

"Longevity you say? How long does the average werewolf live?" She asked.

"For wolves the average is an extension of life of roughly half." Dranek said. "A human may end up living to be nearly.... mmmmm... one hundred and fifty years old. Give or take a decade. While an elf may see their life extended from one millenia, to nearly two."

The woman wrote down those numbers eagerly. Dranek continued.

"For other Werefolk however, the numbers are different." He said. "I once met one of the feline types who was nearly three centuries old, and he was of human stock. And not born one of the folk either."

"Interesting." She said as she wrote. "So, there are other types of.... were...folk?" She asked.

"Very many." He answered, watching as she wrote frantically. "Wolves are simply the most numerous due to certain.... proclivities... and hard fought instincts."

"And how many.... werefolk.... are there?"

"I will not give you a precise answer to that." Dranek said firmly. "Not only because that would tell more about my world than I am comfortable letting you know. But also because I do not actually know." He paused. "It is a large number though."

"That is fair." She said as she finished writing her notes. "Tell me. Do your injuries hurt? The damage to your ear looks dreadful."

Dranek reached up and touched the still healing stub of an ear. It would grow back just fine, though it would likely take several days.

"All injuries hurt." He said with a hint of sarcasm. "Though I have been told by several of the turned that pain is significantly lessened once you are turned. " He looked down at a long gash in his thigh that was raw and pink, and not yet re-furred. "But according to them it is akin to being.... numbed."

"So you're not in any significant pain right now?" She asked.

"Significant? No." He said. "And I have had significantly worse injuries before."

Goddess? Why do you want me to tell them these things? Should we not HIDE this information from my world's enemies?

Tactically? Maybe. She answered. But there is value in giving your enemies something to fear..... and covet.

Covet?

Think about it dear Dranek. They did not ask you to turn that dreadful Navarro for nothing. They're testing it for themselves. They crave power more than anyone you have ever met. And to them, that is what you represent. A chance at power.

And we are giving it to them?

You know better than any; the double edged nature of being a werewolf.

I..... Think... I understand.

You will. She assured him.

"Mr. Dranek?" The woman asked, snapping him out of his....conversation.

"Yes?" He asked in return.

"I asked if you needed anything for your new lodgings. The exam is over for today."

"You mean my cell?" He asked.

She nodded awkwardly. "Yes." She admitted.

"I would prefer to have grass underfoot." He answered truthfully. "Though I doubt that's an option."

She nodded again. "You're probably right." She agreed. "But I can maybe ask about some turf."

Dranek raised an eyebrow at that.

\----------

"MOON WHAT ARE YOU DOING?"

"War." She said with annoyance. "Always with the yelling. We're both gods. You don't need to intimidate me." She reminded him. Though war had always had this issue.

"Sorry." He said, having adjusted his volume. "Last time I spoke to anyone directly it was on Anchuria. You know how that place is."

She sighed as she turned her attention toward him properly. "Your favorite world." She said.

"Not even top five." War answered. "Their warfare is so repetitive and simple. A good meal. But bland."

She felt his attention turn to her more acutely. "Seriously. What are you doing?"

"The exact same thing you WOULD be doing if this world weren't already so rich with your favorite energy." She sent him a wave of judgmental energy. "Besides. My motives will only add more of it for you."

"I know that." He said. "My real question is why?"

She gestured at the world below them, and at the moon floating over it. She couldn't believe that it had allowed the pathetic mortals here to touch it without even sacrificing anyone to do so in a ritual. War could feel her anger at it.

"Look at it." She said. "One of our strangest, and yet... most rewarding... experimental worlds." She paused. "MAAAAGIC!!!!" She yelled though their shared incorporeal realm of this universe.

"Do you have to call them?" War asked. "I know they're here now. But do we really need to involve them?"

"About."

"Time."

"You."

"Others."

"Remembered."

"To."

"Include."

"Us."

Magic said in their jilting, back and forth, way of communicating. A product of their ever waning presence. One that was made all the worse because of how little magic there actually was in this existence.

"Hello Magic." War said without hiding his displeasure.

"Hello."

"War."

"And.

"Moon."

>!\---------Writer's note: Okay, y'all get the idea. Magic is meant to be annoying and even more unknowable than most Gods. I'm not keeping that format for magic from here on out. Imagine that shit on your own. ---------!<

"Magic." Moon replied. "I know how hungry this world must have you right now."

"Starving." Magic replied.

"Well." Moon said, pulling War in close. If they'd had tangible bodies she would have had an arm around his shoulder. "I have a solution for it."

"We. Are. Listening." Magic said. "Though. We. Can. Already. Figure. It. Out."

"Good." Moon said. "And if it goes the way I think. It should be the birth of a new sibling for us. War. I think you know what they might end up being."

War thought for a moment, using his universal omniscience to examine everything he knew of Moon's current manipulations.

"Hmmm. I don't think Stability or Life will like them." He said.

Moon let out radiant happiness. "That's their problem. We all know they could both use a challenge for a change. Especially Life."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xps67e/wait_is_this_just_gate_229/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (227/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeaaaaaaah Joey's finally in magic class.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Vickers shrugged. "Meh. Being sneaky is the specialty. I wish I could say I never had to do so UNDER the eyes of my own command. But I'd be lying." He tilted his head back toward the castle. "How's the fam?"

James nodded a bit. "Mom's alright I guess. I think she's probably still a liiiiiiittle in denial. But she's happy to have me back." He used his wolf hand to point at the scars on his head. "Damaged goods or not. Joey's another matter entirely."

"I saw him earlier, talking to one of the castle staff. Poor elf girl looked uncomfortable." Vickers said.

James groaned as they began walking to the castle. "I told him to slow down a bit." He said. "I'll rein him in."

They walked in silence for a moment, Vickers easily carrying the box that stored all the small drones in it.

"So what's the game plan?" The older SEAL asked, breaking the silence.

James took a deep breath. "For now not much of one. Drones were step one. Well..." He shook his hands in the direction of the castle. "Technically getting my mom and brother here was step one. But that was before we knew what was going on." He stopped and turned, looking to the nearby mountain range on the horizon. He didn't know if it was the right direction. "I think OUR next step is to find this desert FOB that the General told us about."

Vickers looked the same direction. Then thought for a moment. "On Tom I can probably get there in a few weeks." He said. "Slower if you come along. And easier to spot."

James raised his hand and emitted a few small popping explosions from his palm. After a few seconds they sped up, and eventually formed a familiar looking, triangular, flame. It reminded both of them of a welding torch.

James looked down at his feet.

"I had a slightly different idea." James said. "And it should get me there in a day. Maybe two."

Vickers picked up what he was implying.

"Can you handle that kinda exertion now?" He asked. "That fight with the golem had your legs all black veined." Then he looked toward the castle. "And you really down to leave your family here while you take that kinda risk?"

James winced. He'd been asking himself the same question. He still didn't have a solid answer.

"Meh. We'll figure that out later. I think we still have some prep to do." He answered.

Vickers shrugged again. "Fair. I don't exactly wanna meet those guys half assed."

"Same." James agreed. "Now come on. Let's get that box back before anyone on the other side hits the wrong button, or spills some coffee and gives up the game."

\----------

"Okay Joey. Now, what's the new rule?" James said a few hours later after he'd tracked down his little brother.

"Ask people if they're willing to discuss their species before you ACTUALLY ask them about their species." Joey responded rapidly. "And give them chances to speak in between my questions."

"And?" James prompted as they neared the curious door.

"What's with that door?" Joey asked.

"Nah nah nah Jojo." James replied. "AAAAaaaand?"

Joey clapped his hands together, almost as if praying, and then interlaced his fingers between his palms. "Every few minutes ask them if they're still okay talking."

"Good." James said as he gripped Joey's shoulders and stopped him squarely in front of the strange looking door.

"Hello Captain Choi!" Said an odd, somewhat feminine voice. "Hello Mr. Choi."

"Hello again." James said. Then he patted Joey's shoulder. "Say hello Jojo."

"To who?" Joey asked as he looked around.

A set of mouths and eyes formed on the door and peered at Joey. Joey tensed as he was suddenly confronted with a face that wasn't really a face. He struggled to find something to look at. Wanting to study the door, but still uncomfortable looking people in the eyes for too long, the door had suddenly become stressful.

"No need to fear me Mr. Choi." The mouths said. All but one of the eyes dissipated back into the door. The one remaining eye became so small it could have belonged to a mouse, making it very hard to see.

"It's right Joey." James whispered. Then he looked back at the door. "I told Veliry I wanted her to meet my brother."

"One moment please." The door said.

"James why can the door talk?" Joey whispered again.

"I am a mage's door." It answered. "Designed to keep unwanted intruders from entering an area that could have untold secrets.... and dangers."

James rustled Joey's hair. "This one's a lot nicer than the one on the royal treasury." He said.

"The Arch Mage has bid you enter." The door said as it retracted into the wall.

"Thank you." James said. Then he pushed Joey forward.

"I don't like that." Joey said, still whispering. He peered at the edges of the doorway as they passed, though he couldn't see any sign of the door in the stonework. "Where did it go?"

"I..... do not ask questions like that anymore." James said. "Buddy." He said, turning Joey's head back forward. "Behold...."

Joey looked forward and his mouth gaped at the sight.

"A mage's-"

James trailed off as a blast of greenish black smoke burst from one of the doorways at the back of the room with a loud wooshing noise.

"workshop....." He finished.

The windows on the walls opened as if on their own, and James felt the wind rush past him with the familiar feeling of wind magic energy.

As the greenish smoke cleared, Veliry was revealed lying on the floor underneath where the cloud of, James assumed, poisonous smoke had been. She was wearing a heavy black cloak and something that James thought might have been a gas mask.

"Uhhhhh.... Vel?" James asked.

The masked form turned its head to hold them.

"James?" Joey asked.

>!"James?"!< The masked Veliry asked, though neither of the two brothers could understand her as her voice was muffled by the mask. Then she saw Joey.

Suddenly, and almost faster than James could even track, the small mage was hovering in the air directly in front of them and ripping her mask off of her face.

"You must be Joey!" She exclaimed as she quickly began looking him over. She pulled at the dark grey, bordering on black, robes that Joey had bought with James's money the day before. She peered over Joey's shoulder at James. "These aren't Earth clothes." She said accusingly.

"Uhhh.... no?" James said. "Was that a requirement?"

Veliry thought for a moment, still holding Joey's shirt in her hands, oblivious to how awkward Joey was feeling with someone new so close to him. Though he WAS incredibly distracted by the fact that the small redhead was floating nearly two feet off of the ground to do so.

Joey's hand shot out straight in front of him, brushing past Veliry's midsection, and positioned itself as if waiting for a handshake. Both James and Veliry stared at it confused.

"I'm Joseph Choi." He said loudly, though not quite yelling. "Pleased to meet you. Please call me Joey."

Then Joey looked at his own hand in shock. He drew it back in and offered it to Veliry more properly while looking at her face for a moment.

She shrugged and took the hand. "Nice to meet you Joey." She said with a smile. "Your brother says you are incredibly interested in magic."

Joey looked at her again with a beaming smile.

"Yes please." He said.

James looked on with a smile as he saw Joey peer around the room, completely forgetting the hand shake as he took in all the magical things around him.

He slowly crept out of the room. "Don't get him killed Vel." He said as he neared the door. "And don't turn him into a Bogaroe or Whoopy Frog or something." He pointed a stern finger at his brother. "Don't get yourself blown up. Mom'll kill you."

That snapped both of them out of their distracted examinations/greeting.

"What's a Bogaroe?" Joey asked curiously.

"What's a Whoopy Frog?" Veliry asked at the same moment, her face scrunched in confusion.

"What?" They both asked each other simultaneously.

"You heard me." He said as the animated door sealed behind him. "JOEY! DINNER'S AT SEVEN!" He yelled over his shoulder.

He walked away happy to know that both of the two super nerds were going to have their fill of questions and answers for the next few hours. Though he did kind of doubt that Joey would remember dinner.

Then he thought of the awkward, even by Joey's standards, greeting he'd offered Veliry.

He couldn't remember Joey ever acting like that with anybody before. Sure he'd had awkward greetings before. But never THAT awkward.

He looked back for a moment, his face scrunched in thought.

"Oh buddy." He said to himself as he turned back to continue walking. "I hope not. That's the wrong tree to bark up. And she's older than you think."

He really hoped, for his brother's sake, that his suspicion was wrong.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xg3e69/wait_is_this_just_gate_228/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (227/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeaaaaaaah Joey's finally in magic class.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"I saw him earlier, talking to one of the castle staff. Poor elf girl looked uncomfortable." Vickers said.

James groaned as they began walking to the castle. "I told him to slow down a bit." He said. "I'll rein him in."

They walked in silence for a moment, Vickers easily carrying the box that stored all the small drones in it.

"So what's the game plan?" The older SEAL asked, breaking the silence.

James took a deep breath. "For now not much of one. Drones were step one. Well..." He shook his hands in the direction of the castle. "Technically getting my mom and brother here was step one. But that was before we knew what was going on." He stopped and turned, looking to the nearby mountain range on the horizon. He didn't know if it was the right direction. "I think OUR next step is to find this desert FOB that the General told us about."

Vickers looked the same direction. Then thought for a moment. "On Tom I can probably get there in a few weeks." He said. "Slower if you come along. And easier to spot."

James raised his hand and emitted a few small popping explosions from his palm. After a few seconds they sped up, and eventually formed a familiar looking, triangular, flame. It reminded both of them of a welding torch.

James looked down at his feet.

"I had a slightly different idea." James said. "And it should get me there in a day. Maybe two."

Vickers picked up what he was implying.

"Can you handle that kinda exertion now?" He asked. "That fight with the golem had your legs all black veined." Then he looked toward the castle. "And you really down to leave your family here while you take that kinda risk?"

James winced. He'd been asking himself the same question. He still didn't have a solid answer.

"Meh. We'll figure that out later. I think we still have some prep to do." He answered.

Vickers shrugged again. "Fair. I don't exactly wanna meet those guys half assed."

"Same." James agreed. "Now come on. Let's get that box back before anyone on the other side hits the wrong button, or spills some coffee and gives up the game."

\----------

"Okay Joey. Now, what's the new rule?" James said a few hours later after he'd tracked down his little brother.

"Ask people if they're willing to discuss their species before you ACTUALLY ask them about their species." Joey responded rapidly. "And give them chances to speak in between my questions."

"And?" James prompted as they neared the curious door.

"What's with that door?" Joey asked.

"Nah nah nah Jojo." James replied. "AAAAaaaand?"

Joey clapped his hands together, almost as if praying, and then interlaced his fingers between his palms. "Every few minutes ask them if they're still okay talking."

"Good." James said as he gripped Joey's shoulders and stopped him squarely in front of the strange looking door.

"Hello Captain Choi!" Said an odd, somewhat feminine voice. "Hello Mr. Choi."

"Hello again." James said. Then he patted Joey's shoulder. "Say hello Jojo."

"To who?" Joey asked as he looked around.

A set of mouths and eyes formed on the door and peered at Joey. Joey tensed as he was suddenly confronted with a face that wasn't really a face. He struggled to find something to look at. Wanting to study the door, but still uncomfortable looking people in the eyes for too long, the door had suddenly become stressful.

"No need to fear me Mr. Choi." The mouths said. All but one of the eyes dissipated back into the door. The one remaining eye became so small it could have belonged to a mouse, making it very hard to see.

"It's right Joey." James whispered. Then he looked back at the door. "I told Veliry I wanted her to meet my brother."

"One moment please." The door said.

"James why can the door talk?" Joey whispered again.

"I am a mage's door." It answered. "Designed to keep unwanted intruders from entering an area that could have untold secrets.... and dangers."

James rustled Joey's hair. "This one's a lot nicer than the one on the royal treasury." He said.

"The Arch Mage has bid you enter." The door said as it retracted into the wall.

"Thank you." James said. Then he pushed Joey forward.

"I don't like that." Joey said, still whispering. He peered at the edges of the doorway as they passed, though he couldn't see any sign of the door in the stonework. "Where did it go?"

"I..... do not ask questions like that anymore." James said. "Buddy." He said, turning Joey's head back forward. "Behold...."

Joey looked forward and his mouth gaped at the sight.

"A mage's-"

James trailed off as a blast of greenish black smoke burst from one of the doorways at the back of the room with a loud wooshing noise.

"workshop....." He finished.

The windows on the walls opened as if on their own, and James felt the wind rush past him with the familiar feeling of wind magic energy.

As the greenish smoke cleared, Veliry was revealed lying on the floor underneath where the cloud of, James assumed, poisonous smoke had been. She was wearing a heavy black cloak and something that James thought might have been a gas mask.

"Uhhhhh.... Vel?" James asked.

The masked form turned its head to behold them.

"James?" Joey asked.

>!"James?"!< The masked Veliry asked, though neither of the two brothers could understand her as her voice was muffled by the mask. Then she saw Joey.

Suddenly, and almost faster than James could even track, the small mage was hovering in the air directly in front of them and ripping her mask off of her face.

"You must be Joey!" She exclaimed as she quickly began looking him over. She pulled at the dark grey, bordering on black, robes that Joey had bought with James's money the day before. She peered over Joey's shoulder at James. "These aren't Earth clothes." She said accusingly.

"Uhhh.... no?" James said. "Was that a requirement?"

Veliry thought for a moment, still holding Joey's shirt in her hands, oblivious to how awkward Joey was feeling with someone new so close to him. Though he WAS incredibly distracted by the fact that the small redhead was floating nearly two feet off of the ground to do so.

Joey's hand shot out straight in front of him, brushing past Veliry's midsection, and positioned itself as if waiting for a handshake. Both James and Veliry stared at it confused.

"I'm Joseph Choi." He said loudly, though not quite yelling. "Pleased to meet you. Please call me Joey."

Then Joey looked at his own hand in shock. He drew it back in and offered it to Veliry more properly while looking at her face for a moment.

She shrugged and took the hand. "Nice to meet you Joey." She said with a smile. "Your brother says you are incredibly interested in magic."

Joey looked at her again with a beaming smile.

"Yes please." He said.

James looked on with a smile as he saw Joey peer around the room, completely forgetting the hand shake as he took in all the magical things around him.

He slowly crept out of the room. "Don't get him killed Vel." He said as he neared the door. "And don't turn him into a Bogaroe or Whoopy Frog or something." He pointed a stern finger at his brother. "Don't get yourself blown up. Mom'll kill you."

That snapped both of them out of their distracted examinations/greeting.

"What's a Bogaroe?" Joey asked curiously.

"What's a Whoopy Frog?" Veliry asked at the same moment, her face scrunched in confusion.

"What?" They both asked each other simultaneously.

"You heard me." He said as the animated door sealed behind him. "JOEY! DINNER'S AT SEVEN!" He yelled over his shoulder.

He walked away happy to know that both of the two super nerds were going to have their fill of questions and answers for the next few hours. Though he did kind of doubt that Joey would remember dinner.

Then he thought of the awkward, even by Joey's standards, greeting he'd offered Veliry.

He couldn't remember Joey ever acting like that with anybody before. Sure he'd had awkward greetings before. But never THAT awkward.

He looked back for a moment, his face scrunched in thought.

"Oh buddy." He said to himself as he turned back to continue walking. "I hope not. That's the wrong tree to bark up. And she's older than you think."

He really hoped, for his brother's sake, that his suspicion was wrong.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xg3cg0/wait_is_this_just_gate_228/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (226/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I'mma beat y'all's speculation to the chase. MIFFY GOES BRRRRRRRRTx2

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

By the time James and his family returned to the castle that evening they were all stuffed from local foods, dressed in local clothes, and were all thoroughly learned on the new setting that they were in. Minus Joey who was devouring all the new information like a black hole. It had been all James and his mother could do to keep the young man from accosting every new person he came across for information about what they were.

James's mom was still wearing the Earth clothes she'd brought with her when she'd come through the door. But Joey on the other hand was now wearing a pair of pants, shoes, and a cloak that made him look like something out of Mortal Kombat. And none of the other three were blind to how closely the colors of the clothes matched James's armor. Their mother also had a bottomless bag of her own, and James had been surprised to see how similar it was to one of the purses she'd had years before.

James had even broken down and bought his little brother a set of armor, though it was simple, generically sized, and unadorned. He had however refused to buy Joey any weapons until he was properly trained. Something his mother had glared at him about.

"Relax mom." James had said with a grin. "If I know Jojo as well as I like to think; odds are he's less interested in swords and shields than he is in....MAGIC." He'd said while peering at his brother, who was pretending not to listen while he'd been looking at helmets.

Joey's head snapping in James's direction had proven otherwise, and the nineteen year old had quickly made a beeline to them.

"Can I really learn magic?" Joey asked eagerly.

James intentionally didn't look at his mom. "Of course dude. It'll be a while before you've got enough built up in you. But I'm sure Veliry will be glad to show you the basics..... as soon as she's done with her current project.....ssss" He'd said uncertainly.

His brother had practically been vibrating with excitement as he'd spoken.

Now they were back at the castle and James's mom was clearly tired.

"Mom." James said as they neared the door. "Why don't you go with Amina and lie down for a bit, it's late."

"Sounds good to me mijo." She said. Amina smiled as Mrs. Choi looked at her with weary excitement. "I'm tired. This is a lot to take in."

"James was much the same when he first got here." Amina said. "A new world is a lot to adjust to."

"Where are you two going?" His mom asked as she saw James grab his little brothers shoulder and turn him toward a large building on the other side of the clearing.

"Nowhere far." James said. "Just gonna introduce him to my best friend in the world."

Amina furrowed her eyebrows at that, then looked at the window and relaxed with a nod.

"They won't be long." She said. "Come on. I'll show you where the GOOD bathes are in the castle."

James watched them go for a moment before turning back to Joey.

"Ready to see a real life drake?" He asked.

Joey's eyes widened and his hands clenched and flexed rapidly in excitement.

"Steve?!?!" He asked.

They walked the few hundred yards to the stable and James had to practically push Joey past the pens full of griffins, wolf steeds, barrow burrowers, the wyrm that James wondered about himself, and Alixan's personal griffin, which was vastly different from the standard royal mounts. That was to say nothing of the numerous creatures James still didn't know the names to. The workers greeted him as they always did, and one asked if he needed any feed for Steve, which James agreed to.

Finally they got to Steve's pen.

"Where is he?" Joey asked as James calmly opened the door and stepped in. Joey didn't so much as hesitate to follow.

"Probably sleeping." James said, pointing at the hole to the den Steve had made for himself. "He sleeps a lot. And only has to eat," He gestured at the half of a goat carcass he had in his wolf hand. "once every few days. Unless we're on the road."

"Can he..." Joey began. "Can you get him out?" His eyes were locked on the opening to the den.

"Of course." James said with a smile. He lifted his pant leg, revealing a long thing scar with a large black and purple tattoo next to it. "See this?" He asked. Joey nodded. James pointed at the scar. "First place he ever tagged me. Happened while I was breaking him. And this." He pointed at the tattoo. "Is a mark of our souls being bonded. Also lets people know that I'm a member of Clan Drakrid."

"That's the rider clan right? The one that you said is like a motorcycle gang?" Joey asked in amazement.

James paused for a moment as he thought of Gixelle, and how he'd last seen her.

"Something like that." He said with a weak smile. "But either way, one of the things this mark does is allow Steve and I to feel each other's pain. Let's us know when our partner is in trouble so we can go help them."

"Like in Dragonheart?" Joey asked.

James paused again. How had he never made that connection? Probably because he'd only watched that cheesy old movie once or twice when he was a kid. Still, the parallel was obvious now that it had been pointed out.

"Huh." He said. "Guess so." He shook his head. "Either way. I have a signal I use for when it's food time with Steve." He said.

Before Joey could ask, James lifted his shirt and gave his stomach a good hard slap. It wasn't enough to leave a mark, but it definitely stung.

It also definitely had the effect it always had.

There was a low, rumbling, roar from the den's entrance. Then the ground began to tremor ever so slightly as Steve moved within.

"Stay behind me and stay calm." James said to his brother, whose eyes were once again locked on the den.

A moment later a large, almost black, reptilian head with a shock of black and brown fur around it emerged from the hole.

Steve stared at James in the half asleep, half angry, half excited to be fed, look that he always had when James woke him like this.

Then he also did the other thing he always did in return, which had always served to remind James of just how devilishly smart the creature was.

He slammed his head down on the ground with a earth shaking impact.

James had been on the verge of saying 'Hey boy!' When Steve had done it, and the shock of the pain practically made him bite his own tongue.

"OOoooh that's..... always shocking.... even in while being incredibly fair." James said as he reached up and rubbed at the jaw that wasn't as bruised as it believed.

"Wooooooaaaaaaahhh!" Joey gasped as Steve emerged and stood to his full height, looking down at the new arrival.

"Jojo." James said as Steve brought his head down to inspect the young man who bore a striking resemblance, both in looks and smell, to his rider. "This is my best bud Steve."

Steve brought his face only inches away from Joey's as he sniffed him.

"Can I..." Joey began. Then James grabbed his hand and placed it on Steve's snout.

"Wooooooaaaaah." Joey repeated as he rubbed the scales under his hand.

Steve licked his shirt once with his massive forked tongue, drawing laughter from him.

"He's so warm." Joey said in amazement.

"He breathes fire." James said as he tossed the goat carcass into the opening of the den past Steve's tail. "They maintain some of that fire within themselves. How? I don't know. But it keeps them warm." He gave Steve a few light slaps on his actual belly this time, inspecting the fading scar there as he did. "Also makes him a great pillow when you're traveling. No need for blankets or anything."

Steve let Joey continue petting him as James walked around him brushing off dirty spots and de-tangling some of the drake's fur. Joey eventually moved to the side of Steve's head and began giving his furred neck some attention.

"His fur's so soft. Even though the hairs are huge." Joey said.

"Yeah. My saddle actually uses it as cushioning when I'm riding. It's basically just rubber-like, thin, leather. Way more comfortable than you'd expect." He pointed at Steve's neck. The drake was leaning toward Joey a bit. "Dig deep and give him some good scratches." He said as he pulled a massive pick comb out of his bottomless bag. "He loves that. It's actually how I first bonded with him."

Joey looked back and then dug his hands deep into the fur, agitating the skin underneath with his entire fingertips.

Steve began to let out a low, constant rumble.

He's.... purring? Joey wondered.

"Yeeeeaaaahh." James said from where he was digging the comb into Steve's fur. "That's a good spot." He staggered a bit. "Oh, watch out. He's rolling. Keep scratching Jojo."

Sure enough, Joey had to quickly scramble out of the way as the massive lizard rolled over TOWARD him. He quickly dug his hands back into the fur and began scratching again, watching with fascination as the drake's long neck turned to let him get to more.

Steve's inner eyelids shut as he relaxed, enjoying the comfort of two people scratching his itches at once.

Joey sat down crosslegged next to Steve's head as he continued pampering the massive dragon-kin as it rumbled warmth into the air around him.

James watched his brother for a moment, glad to be able to share some of the magic of this world with his little brother for the first time.

Then Steve's back leg kicked at him and knocked him on his back as the drake tried to scratch the spot he'd just been working on.

Asshole. James thought as he dusted himself off.

\----------

Nguyen watched in silent anticipation as the sparking circle, that marked the formation of a door, formed above the ground in front of him.

He looked over at Driscoll, who was standing some ten yards away. The leader of the..... Deep Water Strike Team had his visor shut, letting Nguyen only see the faintly chromatic sheen of its rigid exterior instead of the man's pale face and light eyes.

He wasn't sure if he preferred the insect-like visage of the helmet, or the man's predatory face more.

The door stabilized, drawing his attention back to it, and a moment later there was a light rumbling as a vehicle rolled through. It pulled off to the side after moving about thirty yards then stopped.

Then another came through.

And then a woman in an Army uniform stepped through behind the last of the eight vehicles, and the door shut.

Nguyen nodded instead of saluting. "Major Patinson." He said with his hand extended. "Master Sergeant Nguyen. Nice to meet you."

"That's First Sergeant now Nguyen." She said as she took the offered hand and shook. She looked around as she released the grip. "So this is a different world huh?" Looks like Nevada to me." She said in an unimpressed tone.

"Admittedly, this site isn't much to look at." Nguyen agreed. "But that's part of what makes it work. It's out of sight out of mind."

"Apparently not." She said, nodding at Driscoll, who simply nodded back. "If they had to send them along."

"A fluke of bad timing and an overly observative bunch of dwarves." Nguyen assured her. "I'd say that it shouldn't be an issue again. But you've already read our reports. You know that some of those dwarves were unaccounted for after the fight. So we have to assume that the locals know what's going on by now."

"Yeah." She agreed. "You guys definitely shit the bed a bit." She slapped the armored side of the vehicle they'd stopped next to. "That's why we brought these."

"Big Miffy's." Nguyen said with a slight grin as he looked at the massive, high caliber, rotary cannons on each side of their top turret. "Aint seen one since the wars. Glad to have em."

"Multi Force Fighting Vehicles." She said, matching his grin. "Big, small, fast, or slow-" She started. Then Nguyen finished it for her.

"Nothing escapes Miffy when he starts to go." He said.

She looked at him with what he thought was just a tiny bit of irritation. He made a mental note not to interrupt her again.

"These are the first step to making this a proper FOB." She said, releasing the tension as she spoke. "Command will send through additional ammo tomorrow. For now they have nearly three full loads of pop before they're dry." She turned and gestured back at the camp. "Driscoll and his people have already got locations picked to get them their widest arcs. You... First Sergeant," She said as she looked back at him. "Are gonna get this camp up to standard. First things first." She gestured at his cartographer's robes. "Uniforms from here on out."

Nguyen nodded awkwardly. "Um. Slight problem there... Ma'am."

"I know." She said. "You trashed em all when you were told to go deep cover." She pointed at the M.F.F.V's behind them. "Truck three has a box of uniforms for everyone who's military. Might not be perfect fits, and we can work on name patches later, but they're uniforms."

"Yes ma'am." He said. He got the feeling that she wasn't going to add any more, but he had to ask. "Anything else?"

"No. Get to work." She said. Then she began walking toward Driscoll and the other Muck...No. He reminded himself, toward the Deep Water Strike Team Members.

Nguyen jogged over to the Miffy she'd indicated.

"Yes ma'am." He said quietly and with only mild disdain in his tone.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xf81m5/wait_is_this_just_gate_227/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (226/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I'mma beat y'all's speculation to the chase. MIFFY GOES BRRRRRRRRTx2

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

By the time James and his family returned to the castle that evening they were all stuffed from local foods, dressed in local clothes, and were all thoroughly learned on the new setting that they were in. Minus Joey who was devouring all the new information like a black hole. It had been all James and his mother could do to keep the young man from accosting every new person he came across for information about what they were.

James's mom was still wearing the Earth clothes she'd brought with her when she'd come through the door. But Joey on the other hand was now wearing a pair of pants, shoes, and a cloak that made him look like something out of Mortal Kombat. And none of the other three were blind to how closely the colors of the clothes matched James's armor. Their mother also had a bottomless bag of her own, and James had been surprised to see how similar it was to one of the purses she'd had years before.

James had even broken down and bought his little brother a set of armor, though it was simple, generically sized, and unadorned. He had however refused to buy Joey any weapons until he was properly trained. Something his mother had glared at him about.

"Relax mom." James had said with a grin. "If I know Jojo as well as I like to think; odds are he's less interested in swords and shields than he is in....MAGIC." He'd said while peering at his brother, who was pretending not to listen while he'd been looking at helmets.

Joey's head snapping in James's direction had proven otherwise, and the nineteen year old had quickly made a beeline to them.

"Can I really learn magic?" Joey asked eagerly.

James intentionally didn't look at his mom. "Of course dude. It'll be a while before you've got enough built up in you. But I'm sure Veliry will be glad to show you the basics..... as soon as she's done with her current project.....ssss" He'd said uncertainly.

His brother had practically been vibrating with excitement as he'd spoken.

Now they were back at the castle and James's mom was clearly tired.

"Mom." James said as they neared the door. "Why don't you go with Amina and lie down for a bit, it's late."

"Sounds good to me mijo." She said. Amina smiled as Mrs. Choi looked at her with weary excitement. "I'm tired. This is a lot to take in."

"James was much the same when he first got here." Amina said. "A new world is a lot to adjust to."

"Where are you two going?" His mom asked as she saw James grab his little brothers shoulder and turn him toward a large building on the other side of the clearing.

"Nowhere far." James said. "Just gonna introduce him to my best friend in the world."

Amina furrowed her eyebrows at that, then looked at the window and relaxed with a nod.

"They won't be long." She said. "Come on. I'll show you where the GOOD bathes are in the castle."

James watched them go for a moment before turning back to Joey.

"Ready to see a real life drake?" He asked.

Joey's eyes widened and his hands clenched and flexed rapidly in excitement.

"Steve?!?!" He asked.

They walked the few hundred yards to the stable and James had to practically push Joey past the pens full of griffins, wolf steeds, barrow burrowers, the wyrm that James wondered about himself, and Alixan's personal griffin, which was vastly different from the standard royal mounts. That was to say nothing of the numerous creatures James still didn't know the names to. The workers greeted him as they always did, and one asked if he needed any feed for Steve, which James agreed to.

Finally they got to Steve's pen.

"Where is he?" Joey asked as James calmly opened the door and stepped in. Joey didn't so much as hesitate to follow.

"Probably sleeping." James said, pointing at the hole to the den Steve had made for himself. "He sleeps a lot. And only has to eat," He gestured at the half of a goat carcass he had in his wolf hand. "once every few days. Unless we're on the road."

"Can he..." Joey began. "Can you get him out?" His eyes were locked on the opening to the den.

"Of course." James said with a smile. He lifted his pant leg, revealing a long thing scar with a large black and purple tattoo next to it. "See this?" He asked. Joey nodded. James pointed at the scar. "First place he ever tagged me. Happened while I was breaking him. And this." He pointed at the tattoo. "Is a mark of our souls being bonded. Also lets people know that I'm a member of Clan Drakrid."

"That's the rider clan right? The one that you said is like a motorcycle gang?" Joey asked in amazement.

James paused for a moment as he thought of Gixelle, and how he'd last seen her.

"Something like that." He said with a weak smile. "But either way, one of the things this mark does is allow Steve and I to feel each other's pain. Let's us know when our partner is in trouble so we can go help them."

"Like in Dragonheart?" Joey asked.

James paused again. How had he never made that connection? Probably because he'd only watched that cheesy old movie once or twice when he was a kid. Still, the parallel was obvious now that it had been pointed out.

"Huh." He said. "Guess so." He shook his head. "Either way. I have a signal I use for when it's food time with Steve." He said.

Before Joey could ask, James lifted his shirt and gave his stomach a good hard slap. It wasn't enough to leave a mark, but it definitely stung.

It also definitely had the effect it always had.

There was a low, rumbling, roar from the den's entrance. Then the ground began to tremor ever so slightly as Steve moved within.

"Stay behind me and stay calm." James said to his brother, whose eyes were once again locked on the den.

A moment later a large, almost black, reptilian head with a shock of black and brown fur around it emerged from the hole.

Steve stared at James in the half asleep, half angry, half excited to be fed, look that he always had when James woke him like this.

Then he also did the other thing he always did in return, which had always served to remind James of just how devilishly smart the creature was.

He slammed his head down on the ground with a earth shaking impact.

James had been on the verge of saying 'Hey boy!' When Steve had done it, and the shock of the pain practically made him bite his own tongue.

"OOoooh that's..... always shocking.... even while being incredibly fair." James said as he reached up and rubbed at the jaw that wasn't as bruised as it believed.

"Wooooooaaaaaaahhh!" Joey gasped as Steve emerged and stood to his full height, looking down at the new arrival.

"Jojo." James said as Steve brought his head down to inspect the young man who bore a striking resemblance, both in looks and smell, to his rider. "This is my best bud Steve."

Steve brought his face only inches away from Joey's as he sniffed him.

"Can I..." Joey began. Then James grabbed his hand and placed it on Steve's snout.

"Wooooooaaaaah." Joey repeated as he rubbed the scales under his hand.

Steve licked his shirt once with his massive forked tongue, drawing laughter from him.

"He's so warm." Joey said in amazement.

"He breathes fire." James said as he tossed the goat carcass into the opening of the den past Steve's tail. "They maintain some of that fire within themselves. How? I don't know. But it keeps them warm." He gave Steve a few light slaps on his actual belly this time, inspecting the fading scar there as he did. "Also makes him a great pillow when you're traveling. No need for blankets or anything."

Steve let Joey continue petting him as James walked around him brushing off dirty spots and de-tangling some of the drake's fur. Joey eventually moved to the side of Steve's head and began giving his furred neck some attention.

"His fur's so soft. Even though the hairs are huge." Joey said.

"Yeah. My saddle actually uses it as cushioning when I'm riding. It's basically just rubber-like, thin, leather. Way more comfortable than you'd expect." He pointed at Steve's neck. The drake was leaning toward Joey a bit. "Dig deep and give him some good scratches." He said as he pulled a massive pick comb out of his bottomless bag. "He loves that. It's actually how I first bonded with him."

Joey looked back and then dug his hands deep into the fur, agitating the skin underneath with his entire fingertips.

Steve began to let out a low, constant rumble.

He's.... purring? Joey wondered.

"Yeeeeaaaahh." James said from where he was digging the comb into Steve's fur. "That's a good spot." He staggered a bit. "Oh, watch out. He's rolling. Keep scratching Jojo."

Sure enough, Joey had to quickly scramble out of the way as the massive lizard rolled over TOWARD him. He quickly dug his hands back into the fur and began scratching again, watching with fascination as the drake's long neck turned to let him get to more.

Steve's inner eyelids shut as he relaxed, enjoying the comfort of two people scratching his itches at once.

Joey sat down crosslegged next to Steve's head as he continued pampering the massive dragon-kin as it rumbled warmth into the air around him.

James watched his brother for a moment, glad to be able to share some of the magic of this world with his little brother for the first time.

Then Steve's back leg kicked at him and knocked him on his back as the drake tried to scratch the spot he'd just been working on.

Asshole. James thought as he dusted himself off.

\----------

Nguyen watched in silent anticipation as the sparking circle, that marked the formation of a door, formed above the ground in front of him.

He looked over at Driscoll, who was standing some ten yards away. The leader of the..... Deep Water Strike Team had his visor shut, letting Nguyen only see the faintly chromatic sheen of its rigid exterior instead of the man's pale face and light eyes.

He wasn't sure if he preferred the insect-like visage of the helmet, or the man's predatory face more.

The door stabilized, drawing his attention back to it, and a moment later there was a light rumbling as a vehicle rolled through. It pulled off to the side after moving about thirty yards then stopped.

Then another came through.

And then a woman in an Army uniform stepped through behind the last of the eight vehicles, and the door shut.

Nguyen nodded instead of saluting. "Major Patinson." He said with his hand extended. "Master Sergeant Nguyen. Nice to meet you."

"That's First Sergeant now Nguyen." She said as she took the offered hand and shook. She looked around as she released the grip. "So this is a different world huh? Looks like Nevada to me." She said in an unimpressed tone.

"Admittedly, this site isn't much to look at." Nguyen agreed. "But that's part of what makes it work. It's out of sight out of mind."

"Apparently not." She said, nodding at Driscoll, who simply nodded back. "If they had to send them along."

"A fluke of bad timing and an overly observative bunch of dwarves." Nguyen assured her. "I'd say that it shouldn't be an issue again. But you've already read our reports. You know that some of those dwarves were unaccounted for after the fight. So we have to assume that the locals know what's going on by now."

"Yeah." She agreed. "You guys definitely shit the bed a bit." She slapped the armored side of the vehicle they'd stopped next to. "That's why we brought these."

"Big Miffy's." Nguyen said with a slight grin as he looked at the massive, high caliber, rotary cannons on each side of their top turret. "Aint seen one since the wars. Glad to have em."

"Multi Force Fighting Vehicles." She said, matching his grin. "Big, small, fast, or slow-" She started. Then Nguyen finished it for her.

"Nothing escapes Miffy when he starts to go." He said.

She looked at him with what he thought was just a tiny bit of irritation. He made a mental note not to interrupt her again.

"These are the first step to making this a proper FOB." She said, releasing the tension as she spoke. "Command will send through additional ammo tomorrow. For now they have nearly three full loads of pop before they're dry." She turned and gestured back at the camp. "Driscoll and his people have already got locations picked to get them their widest arcs. You... First Sergeant," She said as she looked back at him. "Are gonna get this camp up to standard. First things first." She gestured at his cartographer's robes. "Uniforms from here on out."

Nguyen nodded awkwardly. "Um. Slight problem there... Ma'am."

"I know." She said. "You trashed em all when you were told to go deep cover." She pointed at the M.F.F.V's behind them. "Truck three has a box of uniforms for everyone who's military. Might not be perfect fits, and we can work on name patches later, but they're uniforms."

"Yes ma'am." He said. He got the feeling that she wasn't going to add any more, but he had to ask. "Anything else?"

"No. Get to work." She said. Then she began walking toward Driscoll and the other Muck...No. He reminded himself, toward the Deep Water Strike Team Members.

Nguyen jogged over to the Miffy she'd indicated.

"Yes ma'am." He said quietly and with only mild disdain in his tone.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xf7zzp/wait_is_this_just_gate_227/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (225/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Aaaaw, brotherly love. AND MOTHERLY DISDAIN!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So yeah." James said as he and Amina approached the door to his family's temporary room. "Vickers is on our side. At least for now."

"How'd he take the rest of it?" She asked as he neared the door.

"Well. I wish I'd saved the recording a bit longer. I coulda shown him. But he understood. He's working with that Royal Guardian or whatever she's called. The massive elf woman?" James said, gesturing with his hand to indicate someone taller than him.

"Ira'Nyl?" Amina said.

"That's the one. He's helping her play test some of Veliry's new rifles." James said before stepping up to the door and rapping on it with his knuckles. "I think he wants her to build a custom one for him."

A moment later the door opened and Joey greeted them with wide eyed wonder.

"\[Wooooooaaaaahhh\]!" He said in one long breath.

James looked at Amina. "Told you he'd love the armor." He said with a grin.

Both of them were, per James's insistance, wearing their full battle gear and weapons. James in the dark colored combination of light plate armor and riding leathers that matched his drake Steve, and Amina in her full, red themed, General's uniform.

"\[Oh my god!\]" James's mother said as she emerged beside her younger son to see the arrivals. "\[I thought we were going shopping. Not fighting the dark lord of Mordor or something!\]"

James laughed and lifted his arm as Joey circled around him, inspecting his gear. "\[Relax mom. I just figured I'd show of for Jojo-OW!\]" He yelped. "\[Don't pull that strap Joey!\]" He scolded his younger brother.

"\[Sorry.\]" Joey said with a hint of mischief.

"\[James, you almost forgot the thing.\]" Amina said, gesturing at his bag.

James looked, confused for a moment, then remembered. "\[Oh. Right.\]"

He rummaged in his bottomless bag, sinking his longer left arm almost up to the shoulder in it, much to his little brother's delite, and retrieved to small green medallions. They were like miniature versions of the one he'd been given when he first arrived, though they had a small red shield painted around the central symbols. He held one out to his mother, and one to Joey.

"\[What are these?\]" His mother asked. Joey practically ignored the medallion in favor of sticking his hands into James's bag while peering inside.

"\[Put it on and you'll see.\]" He said. Then in Petravian he said to Amina. "Go ahead and explain the importance of something... important." He said with a grin. His mother looked at him in confusion at the foreign language.

Amina looked at him with a cocked eyebrow. "You mean like how you should simply explain things to people instead of being all mysterious?" She asked.

His mother, not understanding the conversation, quickly put the necklace on over her head.

"Perfect." James said. "Exactly what I needed." He turned back to his mom as Amina sighed in exasperation. "Understand us now?" He asked.

"Of course I do mijo, you're speaking English." She said.

"\[No he wasn't.\]" Joey interjected as he put his medallion necklace on too. "He was speaking Petravian." He said. "It is called Petravian right?"

"It is." Amina said before James could. "And now that you're wearing those. To any Petravian who hears you, you are as well. Though, unlike James's medallion, you have to actually wear them, and not just be in contact with them."

"That made my head hurt a little." Joey said with a look of confusion. "Putting that on mid-sentence like that."

"Weird." James said. "Maybe try not to do that."

"So I'm speaking a different language right now?" His mother asked.

"No." Said the two brothers simultaneously. "Jinx." They said immediately, causing their mother to roll her eyes even as Amina looked at them in confusion. "Jinx again..... Jinx times three!"

Joey beat James to the next part, not letting surprise slow him down.

"JINXFOURBYFOURHITTHEDOOR!" He yelled rapidly with a smile.

"Ji-Agh!..... DAMMIT!" James yelled before he quickly ran through the bedroom door, which was still right beside them, closed it, and then knocked on the other side.

"YOU MAY ENTER!" Joey said in a mocking posh English accent. Something that startled Amina in it's similarity to James's similar mocking voice.

James sullenly stepped back through the door as the two women looked at each other.

"Brothers?" Amina asked reluctantly.

"Since the day Joey was born." Their mother said with exasperation. "They got that one from their uncle and father."

"Want to do that shopping now?" Amina asked.

"Please." His mother said. "CALM DOWN!" She yelled at the two brothers. James had gotten Joey in a headlock and was giving him a playful noogie as Joey dug his knuckles into James's ribs between some of his armor plates. They immediately stood up straight at the exclamation. Then she looked at Amina. "How did that translate to you?" She asked with a worried expression.

"You just said 'Calm down' mom." Joey answered.

Mrs. Choi calmly removed the necklace and stared at her two sons. "\[CAL-MA-TE!\]" She said slowly and deliberately. "\[There. That better?\]"

"Yes ma'am." They both answered simultaneously. They quickly glanced at each other, but remained silent as their mother held up a finger at what she knew they were tempted to do.

Amina looked at her fiance with a barely concealed smirk from above and behind his mother.

Mrs. Choi turned back with a smile as she put the necklace back on. "Shopping?" She asked.

Amina smiled wide. "Shopping. And I need to hear ALL the embarrassing stories about our James." She said as she began leading her soon to be mother in law toward the nearest castle exit.

"Oh. That's not good." James said as he and his brother watched them leave.

"Nope." Joey agreed. "Also, Jinx big bro." Joey said as he jogged to catch up.

James scrunched his face up in amused anger as he watched his little brother move. But he stayed silent. He was Jinxed after all.

So he got back at his little brother by using a bit of wind magic to rustle his hair from a distance.

\----------

Dranek sat down on what was left of his bunk. He was breathing heavily, and with a slight rattle that he knew wouldn't leave until he'd fully healed.

The room was covered in blood, gore, and tufts of fur.

Lying on the ground, glaring up at him with only one eye, and breathing even more raggedly than Dranek, was Navarro.

Dranek picked up an ear that he thought was his, though it was hard to tell under all the mess, and waggled it at the half dead werewolf in front of him.

They didn't speak. Not in any human language anyways. To the doctor it simply sounded like a series of grunts, growls, and the occasionally whimper from Navarro.

But to the two werewolves, it was practically a full conversation, albeit one mainly consisting of emotions and feral instincts.

It ended with a long drawn out howl by Dranek, that was joined only a moment later by a weaker, occasionally stuttering howl from Navarro.

When it was done, Dranek stood up on wobbly legs, lifted the new wolf from under his arms, and placed him leaning against the wall near the door. Then he knocked on the door, looking directly at the "Doctor" who had never left his position looking through the window. Though he did wear a significantly more wary expression now, much to Dranek's pleasure.

"It." Dranek said before pausing for a deep breath. "It is done. You may take him."

The "Doctor" nodded rapidly, his slight double chin making Dranek think of a pig.

Then Dranek went back and sat on his cot and looked at Navarro.

"It was...." He began. "A good fight.... When you recover, and once you understand what you can do now, you will be a most excellent pack member."

Navarro looked at him with a hint of scorn. One Dranek knew all too well.

The door clanked with the sound of its locks being disengaged, though one of them had to be rattled back and forth a bit due to the damage they'd done to the door.

"Behave. Survive. Return. Understood?" He asked.

Navarro nodded slowly.

"Do you hear her?"

He does.

Navarro hesitated, then nodded again.

"Good." Dranek said just as the door finally opened. "Follow her guidance." He said too softly for any of the humans to hear. But he knew that Navarro could now.

Two humans in black clothes and some kind of odd armor chest pieces quickly entered the room pointing long metal tubes at him that he knew were some kind of weapon.

He could smell the silver inside them.

Dranek laid back in the ruin of his cot with a small smile on his lips as another of the black clad figures placed a heavy duty strap under Navarro's arms and across his chest and quickly used it to pull him from the room. Once the guard and the badly mauled wolf were out, the other two quickly retreated as well, their weapons aimed on Dranek the whole time.

How was that Goddess?

Perfect. She replied. And the first of many.

Dranek's smile widened.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xefmfx/wait_is_this_just_gate_226/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (225/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Aaaaw, brotherly love. AND MOTHERLY DISDAIN!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So yeah." James said as he and Amina approached the door to his family's temporary room. "Vickers is on our side. At least for now."

"How'd he take the rest of it?" She asked as he neared the door.

"Well. I wish I'd saved the recording a bit longer. I coulda shown him. But he understood. He's working with that Royal Guardian or whatever she's called. The massive elf woman?" James said, gesturing with his hand to indicate someone taller than him.

"Ira'Nyl?" Amina said.

"That's the one. He's helping her play test some of Veliry's new rifles." James said before stepping up to the door and rapping on it with his knuckles. "I think he wants her to build a custom one for him."

A moment later the door opened and Joey greeted them with wide eyed wonder.

"\[Wooooooaaaaahhh\]!" He said in one long breath.

James looked at Amina. "Told you he'd love the armor." He said with a grin.

Both of them were, per James's insistance, wearing their full battle gear and weapons. James in the dark colored combination of light plate armor and riding leathers that matched his drake Steve, and Amina in her full, red themed, General's uniform.

"\[Oh my god!\]" James's mother said as she emerged beside her younger son to see the arrivals. "\[I thought we were going shopping. Not fighting the dark lord of Mordor or something!\]"

James laughed and lifted his arm as Joey circled around him, inspecting his gear. "\[Relax mom. I just figured I'd show off for Jojo-OW!\]" He yelped. "\[Don't pull that strap Joey!\]" He scolded his younger brother.

"\[Sorry.\]" Joey said with a hint of mischief.

"\[James, you almost forgot the thing.\]" Amina said, gesturing at his bag.

James looked, confused for a moment, then remembered. "\[Oh. Right.\]"

He rummaged in his bottomless bag, sinking his longer left arm almost up to the shoulder in it, much to his little brother's delite, and retrieved two small green medallions. They were like miniature versions of the one he'd been given when he first arrived, though they had a small red shield painted around the central symbols. He held one out to his mother, and one to Joey.

"\[What are these?\]" His mother asked. Joey practically ignored the medallion in favor of sticking his hands into James's bag while peering inside.

"\[Put it on and you'll see.\]" He said. Then in Petravian he said to Amina. "Go ahead and explain the importance of something... important." He said with a grin. His mother looked at him in confusion at the foreign language.

Amina looked at him with a cocked eyebrow. "You mean like how you should simply explain things to people instead of being all mysterious?" She asked.

His mother, not understanding the conversation, quickly put the necklace on over her head.

"Perfect." James said. "Exactly what I needed." He turned back to his mom as Amina sighed in exasperation. "Understand us now?" He asked.

"Of course I do mijo, you're speaking English." She said.

"\[No he wasn't.\]" Joey interjected as he put his medallion necklace on too. "He was speaking Petravian." He said. "It is called Petravian right?"

"It is." Amina said before James could. "And now that you're wearing those. To any Petravian who hears you, you are as well. Though, unlike James's medallion, you have to actually wear them, and not just be in contact with them."

"That made my head hurt a little." Joey said with a look of confusion. "Putting that on mid-sentence like that."

"Weird." James said. "Maybe try not to do that."

"So I'm speaking a different language right now?" His mother asked.

"No." Said the two brothers simultaneously. "Jinx." They said immediately, causing their mother to roll her eyes even as Amina looked at them in confusion. "Jinx again..... Jinx times three!"

Joey beat James to the next part, not letting surprise slow him down.

"JINXFOURBYFOURHITTHEDOOR!" He yelled rapidly with a smile.

"Ji-Agh!..... DAMMIT!" James yelled before he quickly ran through the bedroom door, which was still right beside them, closed it, and then knocked on the other side.

"YOU MAY ENTER!" Joey said in a mocking posh English accent. Something that startled Amina in it's similarity to James's similar mocking voice.

James sullenly stepped back through the door as the two women looked at each other.

"Brothers." Amina reminded herself reluctantly.

"Since the day Joey was born." Their mother said with exasperation. "They got that one from their uncle and father."

"Want to do that shopping now?" Amina asked.

"Please." His mother said. "CALM DOWN!" She yelled at the two brothers. James had gotten Joey in a headlock and was giving him a playful noogie as Joey dug his knuckles into James's ribs between some of his armor plates. They immediately stood up straight at the exclamation. Then she looked at Amina. "How did that translate to you?" She asked with a worried expression.

"You just said 'Calm down' mom." Joey answered.

Mrs. Choi calmly removed the necklace and stared at her two sons. "\[CAL-MA-TE!\]" She said slowly and deliberately. "\[There. That better?\]"

"Yes ma'am." They both answered simultaneously. They quickly glanced at each other, but remained silent as their mother held up a finger at what she knew they were tempted to do.

Amina looked at her fiance with a barely concealed smirk from above and behind his mother.

Mrs. Choi turned back with a smile as she put the necklace back on. "Shopping?" She asked.

Amina smiled wide. "Shopping. And I need to hear ALL the embarrassing stories about our James." She said as she began leading her soon to be mother in law toward the nearest castle exit.

"Oh. That's not good." James said as he and his brother watched them leave.

"Nope." Joey agreed. "Also, Jinx big bro." Joey said as he jogged to catch up.

James scrunched his face up in amused anger as he watched his little brother move. But he stayed silent. He was Jinxed after all.

So he got back at his little brother by using a bit of wind magic to rustle his hair from a distance.

\----------

Dranek sat down on what was left of his bunk. He was breathing heavily, and with a slight rattle that he knew wouldn't leave until he'd fully healed.

The room was covered in blood, gore, and tufts of fur.

Lying on the ground, glaring up at him with only one eye, and breathing even more raggedly than Dranek, was Navarro.

Dranek picked up an ear that he thought was his, though it was hard to tell under all the mess, and waggled it at the half dead werewolf in front of him.

They didn't speak. Not in any human language anyways. To the doctor it simply sounded like a series of grunts, growls, and the occasionally whimper from Navarro.

But to the two werewolves, it was practically a full conversation, albeit one mainly consisting of emotions and feral instincts.

It ended with a long drawn out howl by Dranek, that was joined only a moment later by a weaker, occasionally stuttering howl from Navarro.

When it was done, Dranek stood up on wobbly legs, lifted the new wolf from under his arms, and placed him leaning against the wall near the door. Then he knocked on the door, looking directly at the "Doctor" who had never left his position looking through the window. Though he did wear a significantly more wary expression now, much to Dranek's pleasure.

"It." Dranek said before pausing for a deep breath. "It is done. You may take him."

The "Doctor" nodded rapidly, his slight double chin making Dranek think of a pig.

Then Dranek went back and sat on his cot and looked at Navarro.

"It was...." He began. "A good fight.... When you recover, and once you understand what you can do now, you will be a most excellent pack member."

Navarro looked at him with a hint of scorn. One Dranek knew all too well.

The door clanked with the sound of its locks being disengaged, though one of them had to be rattled back and forth a bit due to the damage they'd done to the door.

"Behave. Survive. Return. Understood?" He asked.

Navarro nodded slowly.

"Do you hear her?"

He does.

Navarro hesitated, then nodded again.

"Good." Dranek said just as the door finally opened. "Follow her guidance." He said too softly for any of the humans to hear. But he knew that Navarro could now.

Two humans in black clothes and some kind of odd armor chest pieces quickly entered the room pointing long metal tubes at him that he knew were some kind of weapon.

He could smell the silver inside them.

Dranek laid back in the ruin of his cot with a small smile on his lips as another of the black clad figures placed a heavy duty strap under Navarro's arms and across his chest and quickly used it to pull him from the room. Once the guard and the badly mauled wolf were out, the other two quickly retreated as well, their weapons aimed on Dranek the whole time.

How was that Goddess?

Perfect. She replied. And the first of many.

Dranek's smile widened.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xefl85/wait_is_this_just_gate_226/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (224/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Just a heads up, after this week is over I'm gonna be MIA (intentionally) for about a week. Got family stuff to do. BUT I SHALL RETURN!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"What'd they say?" James asked.

Vickers slowly set the cup of coffee down, looking James up and down as he did, eyes not betraying anything.

"Ask what you're gonna ask.... captain." Vickers said in a deliberately slow cadence.

James stared at him.

"You with the Secretary... or the General?" James asked directly.

"Last time I checked; chain of command had one falling UNDER the other." Vickers replied coolly.

"And last time I checked; one wore a suit and tie and the other wore the same kinda uniform you and I do." James shot back just as coolly.

"DO YOU?" Vickers replied icily as he gestured at James's casual wear. James noticed the fog of ice forming around the chief's knuckles. "Cause I aint seen you wear a FULL uniform in months... CAPTAIN."

The two of them stared at each other for several long seconds. James was almost surprised when he noticed that his clothes and hair were fluttering from the wind magic waiting in his hand.

"Wanna do this?" Vickers asked softly. "It aint gonna go like the last time."

James wasn't surprised to see the eagerness in the chief's face.

But he WAS surprised to feel it in his own. He felt energy coursing into his eyes and saw the chief's movements slow down.

He tensed as he saw Vickers' hand move toward his waist. He felt his clothes begin to flutter even more violently.

"Don't do it Vickers." He said slowly.

Then Vickers' hand went into his pocket instead of his holster.

And came out with his phone.

He unlocked it and tossed it across the room at James, who caught it easily with his reflex enhancing vision. He looked at the screen curiously, though he kept glancing back at Vickers.

Vickers picked his cup of coffee back up and began sipping at it again.

James saw a message from the General.

>Secretary Grant has committed and act of war against the Petravians.I intend to confront and, if possible, arrest him.This will likely take me off the board for the foreseeable future.Colonel Muhammed shall act as superior to both of you until further notice. Trust her.She may seem to regress to her old ways. But this will likely be a cover to avoid scrutiny from "The powers that be"Choi is our best chance at salvaging relations with the locals as well as rebuffing any further attempted crimes.Follow his lead.

James looked up at Vickers, who was taking another sip of coffee.

"You were really gonna throw down weren't you?" Vickers asked as he set the cup down again.

James tossed the phone back. Vickers caught it as easily as he had, despite the lack of enhanced vision.

"Didn't know how you were gonna react if I told you that we might have to fight our own people." James admitted.

"You really don't know the kinda shit SEALS have to deal with. Do you?" Vickers asked.

"Have you... fought Americans before?" James asked.

"That's classified." Vickers said before taking another sip. Then he smirked.

James just stared at him.

"Seriously man." He said as he looked at the SEAL. "We might have to fight our own."

Vickers drained the last few sips with a grimace, set the cup down, then looked back at James.

"Last lawful orders were to follow the local superior officer and the attached chain of command." He said with a shrug. "You or the Colonel order me to fight? I'll fight. Pretty cut and dry."

"And if some new General or Secretary type steps in and says otherwise?" James asked.

Vickers nodded. "Fair." He said after a second's thought. "But the crazy thing about being on this side is that information is at a premium." He held his phone up for emphasis. "Really hard to confirm new Org Charts when you can't reliably get updates or new info."

James smiled a little as he nodded. "I actually got something for that." He said. "No more info leashes."

Vickers' raised an eyebrow curiously.

\------------------

Dranek had known starvation before.

He'd grown up in the streets as an orphan, fighting for every scrap he could find. Then he'd become an outcast of his own people and life had become difficult again. And being a Ranger occasionally meant living off the land in lands that didn't care for the living.

But this starvation was different.

His body was physically nourished. In fact the food here, though bland and mushy, was significantly more healthy for his body than the food back home. In fact if he weren't so obviously a prisoner he might just as to stay.

And yet, as healthy as his body felt, his soul felt on the brink of death. He lay on his undersized cot staring at the ceiling of the steel barred cell.

Goddess? What is happening to me? I feel as though I have no energy.

No answer arose for many minutes. He asked again.

Goddess? Please! Help me!

Finally, the lovely, soothing voice answered in his mind.

It is the magic of this world faithful Dranek. It is so weak. Your body is not used to having such a deficit.

Will I die of this? He asked.

There was another long pause. He was about to ask again when she answered.

Not on my watch. She replied. Not until it serves the purpose you have come here for. Worry not. Even as you speak myself and the other gods present are gifting this world what it lacks. Stay strong Dranek. You shall be delivered.

He struggled through the headache that had become so ever present over the past few days.

Yes goddess. He thought back. I shall.... serve.

I know my child. Now perk up if you can manage. They are coming. And they bring the beginning of your salvation.

Sure enough the door opened. One of the "Doctors" walked in. Next to them was a heavily tattooed young human wearing a grey jump suit.

The young man was chained, much like Dranek was.

"Good afternoon Mr. Godsnose." The doctor said. "Are you feeling better today?"

Dranek turned his head slowly toward them, then achily lifted up until he was seated.

"Are you up for a little exercise today?" The doctor asked. He turned and gestured at the man in the jump suit. The man rolled his left sleeve up and held the exposed arm in front of Dranek.

Dranek looked at the arm, then at the "Doctor".

"What is this?" Dranek asked.

"Bite please." The doctor said with a smile.

All of Dranek's instincts and mental taboos kicked back into place.

He wanted to say no.

But then the goddesses assurances came to mind.

Slowly, and with his eyes still locked onto the "Doctor", Dranek opened his mouth. His silver teeth glinted in the uncomfortable white light of the room.

He bit down on the man's arms hard enough to sink the silver teeth in up to his gums.

"Fuck!" The man yelled in pain. "Not so hard ese."

"Silence Mr. Navarro." The doctor said sternly. "That's enough Mr. Godsnose." He paused. "Unless you know better of course."

Dranek quickly released his bite, savoring the taste of fresh blood as he did.

"It is enough for what you seek." He said solemnly.

He looked at the chained man, who was already doubling over in pain.

"Though. If you wish to live, you may wish to leave the room." He added.

The "Doctor" looked down at Navarro, whose veins were blackening and making popping noises.

"FUCK!" Navarro yelled as the flesh near his wrist tore from the formation of new muscles, drenching the floor in blood even as skin rapidly formed over the damage and sprouted dark black fur. "WHAT THE FUCK?!?!"

The "Doctor" ran from the room, slamming it shut before appearing in the small window there.

With as little magic as there is here. The goddess chimed in. This may get.... messy.

Dranek grabbed his pillow from the bed and tore a sheet of cloth off of it. He wrapped the cloth around the silver lined chains holding his ankles together, and broke the chains easily.

He was going to need mobility for what was coming.

He repeated the process for the chains between his hands as Navarro continued his initial transformation. Then tore another piece of cloth from the pillowcase. He took the length of chain that had been holding his ankles and, using the cloth pieces as a barrier, wrapped them around his knuckles.

"Watch closely." He said as he stood up, watching the continued bloodshed in front of him, and braced himself in the corner. "As a new pack forms."

Yes Dranek. Show them our ways.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xdif92/wait_is_this_just_gate_225/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (224/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Just a heads up, after this week is over I'm gonna be MIA (intentionally) for about a week. Got family stuff to do. BUT I SHALL RETURN!!!

Enjoy.

\~

Vickers was relaxing with a cup of coffee, sitting on a stool and leaning against the food counter, when James arrived.

He was both unsurprised and yet concerned by the fact that the SEAL was wearing his full battle rattle. It wasn't uncommon for Vickers to be dressed that way. But it was odd to think that he did so even this late at night.

James had to wonder if it was intentional.

"What's goin' on Choi?" Vickers asked as he turned to face him, planting one foot on the ground while the other stayed resting on the stool's cross bar.

"Get any news from Earth?" James asked, staying where he was even as he tried to stay relaxed.

Vickers looked at him curiously. Then nodded slowly. "Lil bit." He said. "Sounds like its getting a bit hectic over there."

"What'd they say?" James asked.

Vickers slowly set the cup of coffee down, looking James up and down as he did, eyes not betraying anything.

"Ask what you're gonna ask.... captain." Vickers said in a deliberately slow cadence.

James stared at him.

"You with the Secretary... or the General?" James asked directly.

"Last time I checked; chain of command had one falling UNDER the other." Vickers replied coolly.

"And last time I checked; one wore a suit and tie and the other wore the same kinda uniform you and I do." James shot back just as coolly.

"DO YOU?" Vickers replied icily as he gestured at James's casual wear. James noticed the fog of ice forming around the chief's knuckles. "Cause I aint seen you wear a FULL uniform in months... CAPTAIN."

The two of them stared at each other for several long seconds. James was almost surprised when he noticed that his clothes and hair were fluttering from the wind magic waiting in his hand.

"Wanna do this?" Vickers asked softly. "It aint gonna go like the last time."

James wasn't surprised to see the eagerness in the chief's face.

But he WAS surprised to feel it in his own. He felt energy coursing into his eyes and saw the chief's movements slow down.

He tensed as he saw Vickers' hand move toward his waist. He felt his clothes begin to flutter even more violently.

"Don't do it Vickers." He said slowly.

Then Vickers' hand went into his pocket instead of his holster.

And came out with his phone.

He unlocked it and tossed it across the room at James, who caught it easily with his reflex enhancing vision. He looked at the screen curiously, though he kept glancing back at Vickers.

Vickers picked his cup of coffee back up and began sipping at it again.

James saw a message from the General.

>Secretary Grant has committed an act of war against the Petravians.
>
>I intend to confront and, if possible, arrest him.
>
>This will likely take me off the board for the foreseeable future.
>
>Colonel Muhammed shall act as superior to both of you until further notice. Trust her.
>
>She may seem to regress to her old ways. But this will likely be a cover to avoid scrutiny from "The powers that be"
>
>Choi is our best chance at salvaging relations with the locals as well as rebuffing any further attempted crimes.
>
>Follow his lead.

James looked up at Vickers, who was taking another sip of coffee.

"You were really gonna throw down weren't you?" Vickers asked as he set the cup down again.

James tossed the phone back. Vickers caught it as easily as he had, despite the lack of enhanced vision.

"Didn't know how you were gonna react if I told you that we might have to fight our own people." James admitted.

"You really don't know the kinda shit SEALS have to deal with. Do you?" Vickers asked.

"Have you... fought Americans before?" James asked.

"That's classified." Vickers said before taking another sip. Then he smirked.

James just stared at him.

"Seriously man." He said as he looked at the SEAL. "We might have to fight our own."

Vickers drained the last few sips with a grimace, set the cup down, then looked back at James.

"Last lawful orders were to follow the local superior officer and the attached chain of command." He said with a shrug. "You or the Colonel order me to fight? I'll fight. Pretty cut and dry."

"And if some new General or Secretary type steps in and says otherwise?" James asked.

Vickers nodded. "Fair." He said after a second's thought. "But the crazy thing about being on this side is that information is at a premium." He held his phone up for emphasis. "Really hard to confirm new Org Charts when you can't reliably get updates or new info."

James smiled a little as he nodded. "I actually got something for that." He said. "No more info leashes."

Vickers' raised an eyebrow curiously.

\-------------------

Dranek had known starvation before.

He'd grown up in the streets as an orphan, fighting for every scrap he could find. Then he'd become an outcast of his own people and life had become difficult again. And being a Ranger occasionally meant living off the land in lands that didn't care for the living.

But this starvation was different.

His body was physically nourished. In fact the food here, though bland and mushy, was significantly more healthy for his body than the food back home. In fact if he weren't so obviously a prisoner he might just as to stay.

And yet, as healthy as his body felt, his soul felt on the brink of death. He lay on his undersized cot staring at the ceiling of the steel barred cell.

Goddess? What is happening to me? I feel as though I have no energy.

No answer arose for many minutes. He asked again.

Goddess? Please! Help me!

Finally, the lovely, soothing voice answered in his mind.

It is the magic of this world faithful Dranek. It is so weak. Your body is not used to having such a deficit.

Will I die of this? He asked.

There was another long pause. He was about to ask again when she answered.

Not on my watch. She replied. Not until it serves the purpose you have come here for. Worry not. Even as you speak myself and the other gods present are gifting this world what it lacks. Stay strong Dranek. You shall be delivered.

He struggled through the headache that had become so ever present over the past few days.

Yes goddess. He thought back. I shall.... serve.

I know my child. Now perk up if you can manage. They are coming. And they bring the beginning of your salvation.

Sure enough the door opened. One of the "Doctors" walked in. Next to them was a heavily tattooed young human wearing a grey jump suit.

The young man was chained, much like Dranek was.

"Good afternoon Mr. Godsnose." The doctor said. "Are you feeling better today?"

Dranek turned his head slowly toward them, then achily lifted up until he was seated.

"Are you up for a little exercise today?" The doctor asked. He turned and gestured at the man in the jump suit. The man rolled his left sleeve up and held the exposed arm in front of Dranek.

Dranek looked at the arm, then at the "Doctor".

"What is this?" Dranek asked.

"Bite please." The doctor said with a smile.

All of Dranek's instincts and mental taboos kicked back into place.

He wanted to say no.

But then the goddesses assurances came to mind.

Slowly, and with his eyes still locked onto the "Doctor", Dranek opened his mouth. His silver teeth glinted in the uncomfortable white light of the room.

He bit down on the man's arms hard enough to sink the silver teeth in up to his gums.

"Fuck!" The man yelled in pain. "Not so hard ese."

"Silence Mr. Navarro." The doctor said sternly. "That's enough Mr. Godsnose." He paused. "Unless you know better of course."

Dranek quickly released his bite, savoring the taste of fresh blood as he did.

"It is enough for what you seek." He said solemnly.

He looked at the chained man, who was already doubling over in pain.

"Though. If you wish to live, you may wish to leave the room." He added.

The "Doctor" looked down at Navarro, whose veins were blackening and making popping noises.

"FUCK!" Navarro yelled as the flesh near his wrist tore from the formation of new muscles, drenching the floor in blood even as skin rapidly formed over the damage and sprouted dark black fur. "WHAT THE FUCK?!?!"

The "Doctor" ran from the room, slamming it shut before appearing in the small window there.

With as little magic as there is here. The goddess chimed in. This may get.... messy.

Dranek grabbed his pillow from the bed and tore a sheet of cloth off of it. He wrapped the cloth around the silver lined chains holding his ankles together, and broke the chains easily.

He was going to need mobility for what was coming.

He repeated the process for the chains between his hands as Navarro continued his initial transformation. Then tore another piece of cloth from the pillowcase. He took the length of chain that had been holding his ankles and, using the cloth pieces as a barrier, wrapped them around his knuckles.

"Watch closely." He said as he stood up, watching the continued bloodshed in front of him, and braced himself in the corner. "As a new pack forms."

Yes Dranek. Show them our ways.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xdidoy/wait_is_this_just_gate_225/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (223/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Woohoo! Family reunions rule. Also, tune in next time for a clash of ideologies.

Enjoy

\~

"Okay James." The King said with an exhausted look upon his face as he sat back in his chair. James couldn't remember the first time King Farrick had used his first name to address him. "Oooooo.....kay...."

"I know." James said. "We.... need to move fast."

"Have you done this.... update thing.... on your phone?" The King asked as he shuffled through some of the papers on his desk, looking for something.

"I'm doing it right now." James replied. "I also just deleted the General's message."

"Desert in the mountains." The King muttered as he continued rifling through the papers. "Desert in the moun....tain... AH!" He exclaimed as he held up a paper in his hand and began rereading it. "Here it is. Clan Dunebasher's expedition..... Cartographer's guild.... heavily suspicious.... All human?"

He stood abruptly and moved over to the map on a nearby wall. James finished the last of the instructions for the phone upgrade then headed over to follow. When he got there the King was pointing at a mountain range that James guessed was nearly eighteen hundred miles southeast of them, well beyond the Clan's hatchery.

Nestled right in a small valley between some of the mountains, was a desert.

James looked at the area around it. There was a small village just east of the desert valley, but nothing else for hundreds of miles.

"That must be it." The King said. "Based on the General's description."

James thought of the different vehicles and weapon systems the Army had.

"That'd be the perfect spot for our people to invade." He said. "Isolated. Surrounded by mountains. Inhospitable. And it'd take days for even the fastest messengers to get word to anywhere important." He nodded a little. "And with our water conservation technology, even a few hundred gallons would be enough to let an entire battalion be more or less self sufficient there. Anything else they needed could be sent through from Earth for the initial setup."

"You've thought of this before?" The King asked. "You've considered where to invade places before?"

James looked at him, confused. "Not... really?" He said uncertainly. "More of a thought exercise. But even new soldiers are trained on how to set up at least a basic camp almost anywhere they go. And how to scope out a site for it based on the landscape. And.... after the wars... water conservation became a large factor in that." He shook his head a bit. "But with a doorway coming from a fully stocked base it'd be a lot easier."

King Farrick considered his words for a moment. "I have a lot of work to do with my people regarding this." he said. "Can you trust Vickers?" He asked. "I'm pretty sure I already know your stance on Werner."

"I..." James replied as he considered the question. "I guess... I'll have to find out."

"How are your family? Your friend? I heard he was hurt very badly."

James's jaw clenched at the mention of Batty's condition.

"He's.... alive... for now." James answered. "And I haven't checked with my mom or brother yet. I got this message and rushed here."

"I'm glad you did." King Farrick said absently as he began scrutinizing the map and the area around the desert. "Go see your family James. Make sure they're okay." He looked back at James. "Then we've all got a lot of work to do."

"Yes sir." James said as he turned to leave.

"And James." The King added, stopping him mid step.

"Sir?"

"Bring Amina and your family to my dining suite for dinner tonight. I'd like to meet them myself."

James nodded, and walked out the door.

\---------------

Thirty two people dead. Nguyen thought as he looked at the pile of bodies being processed for dehydration and cremation. Eight of them our people. With another twelve injured. He looked to his right, over the small dune the kept the pile from being visible from camp, at the seven Muck Marchers. And now I have them to deal with. I never should have come here.

They were centralized around the command tent, and several of them were making trips in and out with supply crates that were being sent from Earth. Driscoll was overseeing all of them and chatting with two that were doing some kind of maintenance, or maybe even repair, on their suits. Though, the way one of them had their left leg sitting on a crate in front of them while they worked on its mechanisms made him think that maybe they were a bit more than just "suits". After all, when they'd removed the leg there hadn't been pale, veiny, flesh underneath.

In fact, there hadn't been anything underneath. As far as he could tell that was their entire leg.

And they were tooling away inside of it the way he or any of his people might clean a rifle. Hell, they were chatting with the other Marchers.

He looked around and noticed the wide amount of space that his people were giving the new arrivals. Even the few people, like Isaacs, who needed to get into the command tent, seemed to do so as quickly and unintrusively as possible.

So he wasn't the only one uncomfortable around them.

He'd heard stories about the Muck Marchers. And everyone had seen them. In parades, or on the news acting as bodyguards for politicians. Sometimes in documentaries that were mostly conjecture.

But the stories from the wars, and from small actions after "peace" had been obtained? They made the boogeyman look like a kids fairytale.

Attacks on ships in ports. Attacks on ports themselves. Subs missing check ins and never being found. Underwater desalinization plants being destroyed with no radar or sonar warning. Armored warriors walking through fire fights unharmed by anything short of anti armor fire.

Things that shouldn't be possible. All attributed to Muck Marchers.

How many were true? How many were just propaganda.

He didn't know. What he did know was that concrete information about them was hard to differentiate from the smoke and mirrors of what the government WANTED to be known about them.

What he did know was that seven of them had emerged from the doorway with guns blazing. Thirty two people had died. And the worst damage he'd seen a muck marcher take was a magical spear that pierced a shin that was already amputated anyways, and another had gotten their armor scorched by some weird looking lightning.

But none of them were hurt, much less dead.

Nguyen took a deep breath as he thought of what he was now dealing with. Then, with a wince, he lowered himself down next to the sealed body bag at his feet and opened it for a moment. On Earth he'd get in trouble for breaking the moisture seal. But he was, ostensibly, in charge here. And they had a goddam infinite water jug. So they could hang if they got mad about it.

Inside was the familiar face that had almost constantly annoyed him over the past year of their operation. Despite his gruesome death Sticky was still smiling.

Nguyen smiled, but it was a small, half, smile. Then he pulled the zipper back up and pressed the adhesive seal back in place.

Then he stood up and walked over to the pile of armor and weapons that had been salvaged from the Petravian soldiers. They'd sort through them and determine if any of them were worth keeping and studying. The rest would be repurposed as needed.

He ran his fingers along the small crests that marked the helmet as belonging to a Petravian Sergeant. Vhiner'ys' helmet. His finger stopped as it hit the small, circular, indentation that marked a bullet hole right over the left eye slit. A little bit of drying blood stuck to the tip of his finger.

Then he gripped the massive warhammer that had also belonged to the now dead sergeant.

He lifted it and was shocked to find that it couldn't have weighed more then a pound or two. He rotated it, gave it a quick shake. As he did the latter, the head of the hammer flared with a soft purple light for a moment and he felt the weight change. Curious, he lifted it up properly, marveling as it lightened again. He swung it slowly, as if pretending to bring it down on someone. On its downward swing the head flared and the hammer seemed to increase in weight. By the time it was finished with its arc it felt close to thirty pounds.

The reason for the enchantment was easy to understand.

He looked over at the bodies, one of which was the hammer's former owner. Then he looked back over at the Muck Marchers, laughing and carrying on even as his own people mourned and tried to process what had just happened.

Then he looked down at the hammer.

"I'm keeping this." he said softly to himself.

I might need it. He didn't say.

\----------

James rubbed his belly as he and Amina walked his mother and Joey back to their room.

"Mijo. This place is amazing." His mother said. "And the King is so nice. And all these strange looking people." She placed a hand reassuringly on Amina's arm. "No offense dear." She said with a smile. "But what was that big greenish brown man that served our soup."

"Mom." Joey interjected in an odd reversal of their normal conversational roles. "That was obviously an orc."

"What's an orc?" She asked with a look of confusion.

"His name." Amina interrupted. "Is Sverry. He's actually a very skilled cook here in the castle." She turned and looked at James. "He loves cooking pizza by the way."

"That was him?" James asked. "Good. I'm glad the cooks are liking the pizza."

"James how do those bathtubs work?" Joey asked, completely changing the conversation on the spot. It was an old habit that He'd grown used to, even as Amina looked at him curiously. "Is that magic?"

"You mean the way they change shape and temperature perfectly EVERY TIME?" James asked with a grin.

"Yeah. That's just like those rich people jacuzzis that save settings. Also how does this place have running water? How is it so pure?"

"Answer is magic for both." James said. "Don't know how. Though, Veliry is supposed to be showing me how to enchant soon. Don't know when."

"That's so cool." Joey said. "Are you going to make a weapon, or some cool glowing armor?" Joey was getting so excited that he was actually walking faster than them now.

"It's.... a surprise." James said. "You'll see. Also... JoJo?"

Joey turned around, surprised to find himself almost ten feet ahead of them.

"Sorry." He said softly as he rushed back.

"All good bud." James said as he ruffled his little brothers head. "But we're back at the room."

"Come on Mijo." Their mother said. "Get changed for bed. I'm going to talk to your brother for a minute."

Joey quickly wrapped his arms around Amina before releasing just as quickly.

"Happy to meet you Amina." He looked away and around. "Officially."

"Likewise." She said in return.

Then Joey wrapped James in a similar, though slightly more lingering, hug.

"Love you Jamesy." He said. "So cool that you have magic."

"Love you too bud." James returned.

James's mom also hugged Amina. "I'm so excited to know that you two are getting married." She gave Amina's hair a light pinch with her fingers. Then looked at James. "Way prettier than you are mijo." She said with a light smack on the scarred side of his head.

"Thanks mom." He said.

"It's so nice to finally meet you in person Mrs. Choi." Amina added. "James I'll wait for you in our room." She said with a kiss on his cheek. as she turned to leave.

"I'll be there soon." He said. "Gotta talk to Vickers real quick first."

Then he and his mother were alone.

"You and your father both had a knack for landing women who are out of your league." She said with a smirk.

"Subtle mom." He said with a laugh as he hugged her tight. "Real subtle."

"I'm so glad to finally see you again mijo." She said. "I'm sorry about Batty. I only got to know him for about two hours. But he seemed nice."

"Yeah." He agreed. "He's a good guy."

"How's he doing?"

"He's in a rough spot." James admitted as he and his mom continued hugging. "But he's not gonna bleed out or anything. Just a matter of whether he wakes up or not."

She leaned back and looked him in the eyes. "Faith mijo. Always faith."

"Mooom." He said in the tone saved for children talking to their parents. "You know I'm not into that stuff."

"I'm not talking about that James. I mean, have faith in your friend. I think he's tougher than he looks."

He nodded. But as his mother she could see the doubt still lingering there. The concern.

"How are you dear?" She asked.

James put on a smile, though even he didn't believe it.

"Stressed." He said. He looked past her at the door to her and Joey's room. "Confused. And more than a little scared."

"Of what?"

"Of the reason WHY you two were sent here." He said. "Plus some stuff that you probably DON'T want to know about."

"And why not?" She asked.

"Because if you knew what was going on here, you'd book the first tickets back home." He answered. "And there aint none of those available just now."

She slapped her hands onto his cheeks and pulled him down low enough that she could kiss his forehead, which she did. Then she wrapped her arm around him in a headlock.

"What did I tell you when we moved in with your uncle Junior and Aunt Linda?" She asked, giving his head a playful squeeze.

"That as long as we stayed together in our hearts we'd all be okay." He answered, muffled by her shirt.

"That's right. And now we're together."

He lifted her up, earning a squeek of surprise from his mother. She gripped his hand and flinched a little as she felt the claws and fur.

"Not used to that yet." She said as he set her back down.

James chuckled. "Me either." He said truthfully. "But it grows on you. Or me at least."

His mom sighed and threw her hands up as she opened the door to the room.

"Another thing you got from your father." She said. He looked at her curiously. "Terrible puns."

James smiled again, and this time it felt more real to him.

"Get some sleep mom. Tomorrow we'll work on getting you two set up somewhere a bit better. And I'll have Amina take you shopping for some clothes."

She turned and held his face in her hands again.

"You need rest to dear." She said. "Get some for a change."

"I will mom." He said, though he doubted it.

Then she walked into the room and shut the door behind her.

James pulled his phone out and pulled up his messages, clicking on Vickers' unread message once it was up.

>I'm in the chow hall. Where you at? What's going on?

James gulped as he typed a quick response.

"I really hope this doesn't become a fight." He said to himself.

But he had doubts about that too.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xckihr/wait_is_this_just_gate_224/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (223/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Woohoo! Family reunions rule. Also, tune in next time for a clash of ideologies.

Enjoy

Edit: Just realized that some people might not notice. But the last section is, in fact, all in English. Remember, Amina is effectively fluent by now.

\~

"Okay James." The King said with an exhausted look upon his face as he sat back in his chair. James couldn't remember the last time King Farrick had used his first name to address him. "Oooooo.....kay...."

"I know." James said. "We.... need to move fast."

"Have you done this.... update thing.... on your phone?" The King asked as he shuffled through some of the papers on his desk, looking for something.

"I'm doing it right now." James replied. "I also just deleted the General's message."

"Desert in the mountains." The King muttered as he continued rifling through the papers. "Desert in the moun....tain... AH!" He exclaimed as he held up a paper in his hand and began rereading it. "Here it is. Clan Dunebasher's expedition..... Cartographer's guild.... heavily suspicious.... All human?"

He stood abruptly and moved over to the map on a nearby wall. James finished the last of the instructions for the phone upgrade then headed over to follow. When he got there the King was pointing at a mountain range that James guessed was nearly eighteen hundred miles southeast of them, well beyond the Clan's hatchery.

Nestled right in a small valley between some of the mountains, was a desert.

James looked at the area around it. There was a small village just east of the desert valley, but nothing else for hundreds of miles.

"That must be it." The King said. "Based on the General's description."

James thought of the different vehicles and weapon systems the Army had.

"That'd be the perfect spot for our people to invade." He said. "Isolated. Surrounded by mountains. Inhospitable. And it'd take days for even the fastest messengers to get word to anywhere important." He nodded a little. "And with our water conservation technology, even a few hundred gallons would be enough to let an entire battalion be more or less self sufficient there. Anything else they needed could be sent through from Earth for the initial setup."

"You've thought of this before?" The King asked. "You've considered where to invade places before?"

James looked at him, confused. "Not... really?" He said uncertainly. "More of a thought exercise. But even new soldiers are trained on how to set up at least a basic camp almost anywhere they go. And how to scope out a site for it based on the landscape. And.... after the wars... water conservation became a large factor in that." He shook his head a bit.

"But with a doorway coming from a fully stocked base it'd be a lot easier."

King Farrick considered his words for a moment. "I have a lot of work to do with my people regarding this." he said. "Can you trust Vickers?" He asked. "I'm pretty sure I already know your stance on Werner."

"I..." James replied as he considered the question. "I guess... I'll have to find out."

"How are your family? Your friend? I heard he was hurt very badly."

James's jaw clenched at the mention of Batty's condition.

"He's.... alive... for now." James answered. "And I haven't checked with my mom or brother yet. I got this message and rushed here."

"I'm glad you did." King Farrick said absently as he began scrutinizing the map and the area around the desert. "Go see your family James. Make sure they're okay." He looked back at James. "Then we've all got a lot of work to do."

"Yes sir." James said as he turned to leave.

"And James." The King added, stopping him mid step.

"Sir?"

"Bring Amina and your family to my dining suite for dinner tonight. I'd like to meet them myself."

James nodded, and walked out the door.

\---------------

Thirty two people dead. Nguyen thought as he looked at the pile of bodies being processed for dehydration and cremation. Eight of them our people. With another twelve injured. He looked to his right, over the small dune the kept the pile from being visible from camp, at the seven Muck Marchers. And now I have them to deal with. I never should have come here.

They were centralized around the command tent, and several of them were making trips in and out with supply crates that were being sent from Earth. Driscoll was overseeing all of them and chatting with two that were doing some kind of maintenance, or maybe even repair, on their suits. Though, the way one of them had their left leg sitting on a crate in front of them while they worked on its mechanisms made him think that maybe they were a bit more than just "suits". After all, when they'd removed the leg there hadn't been pale, veiny, flesh underneath.

In fact, there hadn't been anything underneath. As far as he could tell that was their entire leg.

And they were tooling away inside of it the way he or any of his people might clean a rifle. Hell, they were chatting with the other Marchers.

He looked around and noticed the wide amount of space that his people were giving the new arrivals. Even the few people, like Isaacs, who needed to get into the command tent, seemed to do so as quickly and unintrusively as possible.

So he wasn't the only one uncomfortable around them.

He'd heard stories about the Muck Marchers. And everyone had seen them. In parades, or on the news acting as bodyguards for politicians. Sometimes in documentaries that were mostly conjecture.

But the stories from the wars, and from small actions after "peace" had been obtained? They made the boogeyman look like a kids fairytale.

Attacks on ships in ports. Attacks on ports themselves. Subs missing check ins and never being found. Underwater desalinization plants being destroyed with no radar or sonar warning. Armored warriors walking through fire fights unharmed by anything short of anti armor fire.

Things that shouldn't be possible. All attributed to Muck Marchers.

How many were true? How many were just propaganda.

He didn't know. What he did know was that concrete information about them was hard to differentiate from the smoke and mirrors of what the government WANTED to be known about them.

What he did know was that seven of them had emerged from the doorway with guns blazing. Thirty two people had died. And the worst damage he'd seen a muck marcher take was a magical spear that pierced a shin that was already amputated anyways, and another had gotten their armor scorched by some weird looking lightning.

But none of them were hurt, much less dead.

Nguyen took a deep breath as he thought of what he was now dealing with. Then, with a wince, he lowered himself down next to the sealed body bag at his feet and opened it for a moment. On Earth he'd get in trouble for breaking the moisture seal. But he was, ostensibly, in charge here. And they had a goddam infinite water jug. So they could hang if they got mad about it.

Inside was the familiar face that had almost constantly annoyed him over the past year of their operation. Despite his gruesome death Sticky was still smiling.

Nguyen smiled, but it was a small, half, smile. Then he pulled the zipper back up and pressed the adhesive seal back in place.

Then he stood up and walked over to the pile of armor and weapons that had been salvaged from the Petravian soldiers. They'd sort through them and determine if any of them were worth keeping and studying. The rest would be repurposed as needed.

He ran his fingers along the small crests that marked the helmet as belonging to a Petravian Sergeant. Vhiner'ys' helmet. His finger stopped as it hit the small, circular, indentation that marked a bullet hole right over the left eye slit. A little bit of drying blood stuck to the tip of his finger.

Then he gripped the massive warhammer that had also belonged to the now dead sergeant.

He lifted it and was shocked to find that it couldn't have weighed more then a pound or two. He rotated it, gave it a quick shake. As he did the latter, the head of the hammer flared with a soft purple light for a moment and he felt the weight change. Curious, he lifted it up properly, marveling as it lightened again. He swung it slowly, as if pretending to bring it down on someone. On its downward swing the head flared and the hammer seemed to increase in weight. By the time it was finished with its arc it felt close to thirty pounds.

The reason for the enchantment was easy to understand.

He looked over at the bodies, one of which was the hammer's former owner. Then he looked back over at the Muck Marchers, laughing and carrying on even as his own people mourned and tried to process what had just happened.

Then he looked down at the hammer.

"I'm keeping this." he said softly to himself.

I might need it. He didn't say.

\--------------------

James rubbed his belly as he and Amina walked his mother and Joey back to their room.

"Mijo. This place is amazing." His mother said. "And the King is so nice. And all these strange looking people." She placed a hand reassuringly on Amina's arm. "No offense dear." She said with a smile. "But what was that big greenish brown man that served our soup."

"Mom." Joey interjected in an odd reversal of their normal conversational roles. "That was obviously an orc."

"What's an orc?" She asked with a look of confusion.

"His name." Amina interrupted. "Is Sverry. He's actually a very skilled cook here in the castle." She turned and looked at James. "He loves cooking pizza by the way."

"That was him?" James asked. "Good. I'm glad the cooks are liking the pizza."

"James how do those bathtubs work?" Joey asked, completely changing the conversation on the spot. It was an old habit that James had grown used to, even as Amina looked at him curiously. "Is that magic?"

"You mean the way they change shape and temperature perfectly EVERY TIME?" James asked with a grin.

"Yeah. That's just like those rich people jacuzzis that save settings. Also how does this place have running water? How is it so pure?"

"Answer is magic for both." James said. "Don't know how. Though, Veliry is supposed to be showing me how to enchant soon. Don't know when."

"That's so cool." Joey said. "Are you going to make a weapon, or some cool glowing armor?" Joey was getting so excited that he was actually walking faster than them now.

"It's.... a surprise." James said. "You'll see. Also... JoJo?"

Joey turned around, surprised to find himself almost ten feet ahead of them.

"Sorry." He said softly as he rushed back.

"All good bud." James said as he ruffled his little brothers head. "But we're back at the room."

"Come on Mijo." Their mother said. "Get changed for bed. I'm going to talk to your brother for a minute."

Joey quickly wrapped his arms around Amina before releasing just as quickly.

"Happy to meet you Amina." He looked away and around. "Officially."

"Likewise." She said in return.

Then Joey wrapped James in a similar, though slightly more lingering, hug.

"Love you Jamesy." He said. "So cool that you have magic."

"Love you too bud." James returned.

James's mom also hugged Amina. "I'm so excited to know that you two are getting married." She gave Amina's hair a light pinch with her fingers. Then looked at James. "Way prettier than you are mijo." She said with a light smack on the scarred side of his head.

"Thanks mom." He said.

"It's so nice to finally meet you in person Mrs. Choi." Amina added. "James I'll wait for you in our room." She said with a kiss on his cheek. as she turned to leave.

"I'll be there soon." He said. "Gotta talk to Vickers real quick first."

Then he and his mother were alone.

"You and your father both had a knack for landing women who are out of your league." She said with a smirk.

"Subtle mom." He said with a laugh as he hugged her tight. "Real subtle."

"I'm so glad to finally see you again mijo." She said. "I'm sorry about Batty. I only got to know him for about two hours. But he seemed nice."

"Yeah." He agreed. "He's a good guy."

"How's he doing?"

"He's in a rough spot." James admitted as he and his mom continued hugging. "But he's not gonna bleed out or anything. Just a matter of whether he wakes up or not."

She leaned back and looked him in the eyes. "Faith mijo. Always faith."

"Mooom." He said in the tone saved for children talking to their parents. "You know I'm not into that stuff."

"I'm not talking about that James. I mean, have faith in your friend. I think he's tougher than he looks."

He nodded. But as his mother she could see the doubt still lingering there. The concern.

"How are you dear?" She asked.

James put on a smile, though even he didn't believe it.

"Stressed." He said. He looked past her at the door to her and Joey's room. "Confused. And more than a little scared."

"Of what?"

"Of the reason WHY you two were sent here." He said. "Plus some stuff that you probably DON'T want to know about."

"And why not?" She asked.

"Because if you knew what was going on here, you'd book the first tickets back home." He answered. "And there aint none of those available just now."

She slapped her hands onto his cheeks and pulled him down low enough that she could kiss his forehead, which she did. Then she wrapped her arm around him in a headlock.

"What did I tell you when we moved in with your uncle Junior and Aunt Linda?" She asked, giving his head a playful squeeze.

"That as long as we stayed together in our hearts we'd all be okay." He answered, muffled by her shirt.

"That's right. And now we're together."

He lifted her up, earning a squeek of surprise from his mother. She gripped his hand and flinched a little as she felt the claws and fur.

"Not used to that yet." She said as he set her back down.

James chuckled. "Me either." He said truthfully. "But it grows on you. Or me at least."

His mom sighed and threw her hands up as she opened the door to the room.

"Another thing you got from your father." She said. He looked at her curiously. "Terrible puns."

James smiled again, and this time it felt more real to him.

"Get some sleep mom. Tomorrow we'll work on getting you two set up somewhere a bit better. And I'll have Amina take you shopping for some clothes."

She turned and held his face in her hands again.

"You need rest to dear." She said. "Get some for a change."

"I will mom." He said, though he doubted it.

Then she walked into the room and shut the door behind her.

James pulled his phone out and pulled up his messages, clicking on Vickers' unread message once it was up.

>I'm in the chow hall. Where you at? What's going on?

James gulped as he typed a quick response.

"I really hope this doesn't become a fight." He said to himself.

But he had doubts about that too.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xckgcn/wait_is_this_just_gate_224/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (222/?)

Previous

Writer's note: See you space cowboy

\~

Colonel Muhammed sat patiently, sipping at the now cold cup of coffee that had likely come from the DFAC down the hall.

She'd been here for six hours now.

Her rank as a Colonel and the acting site commander had earned her freedom from hand cuffs and likely the coffee itself, cold and bitter as both were. But they hadn't earned her any other leniency.

So it was that when General Bertmeister stepped into the room she knew what the questions were going to be. More or less.

"How are you Shayna?" He asked warmly and with smile.

"Could use a bathroom break." She admitted. Then she held up the half empty cup. "And something a touch stronger than this."

"Well, I should be able to do something about at least one of those things." He said back. "Do you know why you're here?"

"Because somehow Captain Choi's mother and brother managed to infiltrate my facility, activate the door device, and transit themselves to the other side. Along with some other operative." She leaned in. "That wasn't Corporal Batista was it? If so, he's put on some weight since he was medically discharged." She tilted her head a bit. "Or at least he had. I don't imagine that whoever that was survived that injury. Not even if the Petravians used their magic to help them."

Bertmeister looked at her sternly for several long seconds.

"Right. So you don't know HOW they got into your facility? The fake ID badges? The cheesy disguises, that I'm... honestly amazed nobody noticed? The way they got into the main DOOR ROOM almost unhindered? Or how the Door was opened for them?"

"It appears to be a failure on multiple levels by our security department. Especially since I know for a fact that Mrs. DeLaRosa has become.... acquaintances?... with several of the entry desk guards." She said with a roll of her eyes. "Also, they got into a decontamination room, and it DIDN'T lock it's inner doors during a security lock down? Absolutely garbage."

"And the fact that your own staff reported that you insisted on sending the supply shipment DURING the lock down DESPITE the fact that that's against security protocols?" He asked with a raised eyebrow.

She nodded as she hung her head.

"I... didn't realize just how close to the door room they actually were. Much less that the doors WOULDN'T stop them sir." She said solemnly. "That was me getting too eager and making a mistake. For that I have no good answer."

He stared at her for several more long, silent, seconds. Then he sighed.

"Under ordinary circumstances Colonel I'd have you in the brigg waiting for court martial." He said as he stood up. "As it is, know that you are going to be under INTENSE scrutiny for the foreseeable future. At least until we can find a replacement for Krick. The bastard."

"What's wrong the General Krick?" She asked, legitimately curious.

He grumbled as he adjusted his seating position. "You.... haven't been told?" He asked. He thought for a moment. "It was right around the time that you were umm.... detained." He took a long breath before looking her in the eyes. "General Krick was killed this morning after he murdered Secretary of Defense Grant." He said as flatly as he could. "MP's literally caught him with a smoking gun. Though, how he got one is a matter of investigation."

Colonel Muhammed fought to control the emotions hiding just under the surface.

"What?" She asked in her confusion. "He... He said he was going to confront Grant over the Petravian Prisoner." She said. "I expected some heated words. But... murder?" She shook her head. "I find that hard to believe."

"Agreed." General Bertmeister said. "As I've said it's a matter warranting further, and EXTENSIVE, investigation."

He stood up and stepped to the door.

"You're free to go Colonel.... For now." He looked out and nodded at the guard posted near the door. "But don't go traveling anywhere until we've gotten to the bottom of all this nonsense. We may have.... further questions... that need answering."

She nodded hastily. "Yes sir." She said. She stopped him with one last question. "Sir?" She asked.

"Yes?" He said, turning around just a bit.

"What is the status of the prisoner?"

He sighed. Then answered gruffly. "That's not your problem Colonel. Keep the facility running. FIX the holes in your security. Do not let ANYTHING like this happen again. Those are your only concerns until further notice."

"Yes sir." She repeated, understanding the thinly veiled threats to her career should she step out of line.

He nodded, then walked away, taking the guard with him as he did.

Leaving her alone with the news.

\---

James woke up several hours after Amina had helped him back to their room. He was still tired, but something inside him wouldn't let him stay asleep.

He was glad that she'd helped him clean up though. There were still bits of dried blood around the edges of his nails that he knew wouldn't come out without a good scrub. And he didn't even want to think of how much was still hiding in the claws and fur of his left arm. That was a problem for later.

He looked around and saw that Amina wasn't in the room. He wasn't worried though, her armor was on its stand in the corner, along with her partially sentient shield. So she was probably just grabbing a meal, or more likely helping his mother and brother get settled a bit.

Then he remembered that they were here.

How had they gotten here? Why? What was going on on Earth that they would be sent over with a critically wounded Batista?

He had so many questions and his struggle to keep his friend alive had given him no chance to have any of them answered.

He walked over to his bag and pulled out his phone, eager to get in touch with someone, anyone really, who might have answers.

Then he saw that he had a series of messages, two of which were from General Krick.

He sat on the bed, rubbing at his still red eyes, and clicked on one that appeared to be a voice message.

>Captain Choi. This is General Krick.If you are receiving this message than it is because I confronted Secretary Grant over what was going on with the prisoner they took, and I am either currently being detained.Or I am dead.

James's eyes had widened at the concept of the General being arrested, but his blood ran cold at the idea of him being dead.

>Whatever the case may be. I will likely not be capable of holding the Secretary and his allies at bay any longer. Which is what I have been trying to do this whole time.Regardless of all other circumstances, allow this to be my parting message before anything else happens to me.King Farrick needs to know that despite all other appearances, The United States Government IS NOT his friend. They have every intention, and are already currently attempting, to invade your world and claim it for themselves.But Choi, you and I have more in common than just being mustangs.We've both seen how dark our world can be. And neither of us wants that to happen to your new world too. I'm sure it has its evil side too. And you've even been victim to that side. But you know that it can't hold a candle to the horrors our people can unleash upon something they view as an.... other.And you're in a unique position to prevent that from happening there.

James waited as the General paused.

>I can't.... help you with this vanishing blight. Our techs have tried to understand the data that's been gathered but it's..... it's on a different level than what we can understand. After all, we're still figuring out magic, and not even really doing a good job there.But what I can do... is show you how the door works, and cut some of your restraints off.I've sent you a few files along with this message. One of them is a program that you need to install on your phone immediately. As well as the communication hub, any tablets you can get your hands on, AND the drone network.It'll give you full control of how much signal access you have on your side of the door. It won't stop them from taking that signal away if they decide to go dark on the Earth side of things. But that would be the only way to stop you from getting info. Additionally it'll let them THINK they have the ability to block you out, it'll mask your access if the try to do so.They can still get around it if they find out, so don't reveal that ability unless absolutely necessary.The other file is. Well... It's the schematics for our current, and most effective Door Knocking device. A dumb name, I know. But I didn't name it.It's... complicated. But if that little redhead is as smart as she's made us think she is, than she should be able to figure it out. I can't help you with the power aspect. But you people can shoot goddam lightning out of your fingertips. I have no doubt that you can figure out a few thousand kilojoules, or megawatts, or whatever of power that the requirement is.

James's mouth was hanging open at this point. He was still trying to comprehend the scale of what the General was doing.

This was Treason for god's sake. The General was giving national secrets on a level unheard of to him and the King.

But if the General was dead.... then what? What would that even imply?

James felt, not for the first time since coming to this world, that he was significantly out of his depth.

>I've already told you that there's a tertiary entry site and that we have a FOB there. They are there to set up a permanent beachhead that will allow the Secretary and anyone in the military loyal to him to send troops, supplies, weapons, and armor through basically at will.

This revelation caused James to inhale sharply.

>It's in a desert, far away from you, that's not near any major cities, and is nestled inside a mountain range. It was chosen specifically for how secluded it is, AND how difficult a ground assault would be.

The General paused again.

>We also have the ability to open temporary doorways with a portable device. It's difficult. It takes so much energy that it's basically a one shot use item with a massive downtime before its ready again. But it can be used damn near anywhere. Be aware of that if hostility becomes the only option.You, Choi, have seen what our bombs can do to that world. The King has seen. All of Jadesport saw. And YOU know that those weren't even the worst things we can send over.

By now, James was practically breathless, his mind all but in shut down as it attempted to think of all the ways this could go wrong.

>Choi..... Don't let them do to that world what we did to our own.Let the King hear this. Then delete it. ASAP.Well... I'm going to go try to snip Grant's wings a bit.I hope some day we can meet in person. Though, I doubt it.Good luck.... Captain.

The phone beeped before a robotic voice indicated that the message was over.

James dropped the phone on the bed as if it had scalded his hand. His hands shot to the side of his face, causing one of his claws to nick his forehead a bit, though he didn't notice. He ran his fingers through his hair as he thought of everything he'd just heard.

Then he grabbed the phone and bolted out of the door, wearing only his underwear and lounging robe.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/xa84di/wait_is_this_just_gate_223/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (222/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: See you space cowboy

\~

Colonel Muhammed sat patiently, sipping at the now cold cup of coffee that had likely come from the DFAC down the hall.

She'd been here for six hours now.

Her rank as a Colonel and the acting site commander had earned her freedom from hand cuffs and likely the coffee itself, cold and bitter as both were. But they hadn't earned her any other leniency.

So it was that when General Bertmeister stepped into the room she knew what the questions were going to be. More or less.

"How are you Shayna?" He asked warmly and with smile.

"Could use a bathroom break." She admitted. Then she held up the half empty cup. "And something a touch stronger than this."

"Well, I should be able to do something about at least one of those things." He said back. "Do you know why you're here?"

"Because somehow Captain Choi's mother and brother managed to infiltrate my facility, activate the door device, and transit themselves to the other side. Along with some other operative." She leaned in. "That wasn't Corporal Batista was it? If so, he's put on some weight since he was medically discharged." She tilted her head a bit. "Or at least he had. I don't imagine that whoever that was survived that injury. Not even if the Petravians used their magic to help them."

Bertmeister looked at her sternly for several long seconds.

"Right. So you don't know HOW they got into your facility? The fake ID badges? The cheesy disguises, that I'm... honestly amazed nobody noticed? The way they got into the main DOOR ROOM almost unhindered? Or how the Door was opened for them?"

"It appears to be a failure on multiple levels by our security department. Especially since I know for a fact that Mrs. DeLaRosa has become.... acquaintances?... with several of the entry desk guards." She said with a roll of her eyes. "Also, they got into a decontamination room, and it DIDN'T lock it's inner doors during a security lock down? Absolutely garbage."

"And the fact that your own staff reported that you insisted on sending the supply shipment DURING the lock down DESPITE the fact that that's against security protocols?" He asked with a raised eyebrow.

She nodded as she hung her head.

"I... didn't realize just how close to the door room they actually were. Much less that the doors WOULDN'T stop them sir." She said solemnly. "That was me getting too eager and making a mistake. For that I have no good answer."

He stared at her for several more long, silent, seconds. Then he sighed.

"Under ordinary circumstances Colonel I'd have you in the brig waiting for court martial." He said as he stood up. "As it is, know that you are going to be under INTENSE scrutiny for the foreseeable future. At least until we can find a replacement for Krick. The bastard."

"What's wrong with General Krick?" She asked, legitimately curious.

He grumbled as he adjusted his seating position. "You.... haven't been told?" He asked. He thought for a moment. "It was right around the time that you were umm.... detained." He took a long breath before looking her in the eyes. "General Krick was killed this morning after he murdered Secretary of Defense Grant." He said as flatly as he could. "MP's literally caught him with a smoking gun. Though, how he got one is a matter of investigation."

Colonel Muhammed fought to control the emotions hiding just under the surface.

"What?" She asked in her confusion. "He... He said he was going to confront Grant over the Petravian Prisoner." She said. "I expected some heated words. But... murder?" She shook her head. "I find that hard to believe."

"Agreed." General Bertmeister said. "As I've said it's a matter warranting further, and EXTENSIVE, investigation."

He stood up and stepped to the door.

"You're free to go Colonel.... For now." He looked out and nodded at the guard posted near the door. "But don't go traveling anywhere until we've gotten to the bottom of all this nonsense. We may have.... further questions... that need answering."

She nodded hastily. "Yes sir." She said. She stopped him with one last question. "Sir?" She asked.

"Yes?" He said, turning around just a bit.

"What is the status of the prisoner?"

He sighed. Then answered gruffly. "That's not your problem Colonel. Keep the facility running. FIX the holes in your security. Do not let ANYTHING like this happen again. Those are your only concerns until further notice."

"Yes sir." She repeated, understanding the thinly veiled threats to her career should she step out of line.

He nodded, then walked away, taking the guard with him as he did.

Leaving her alone with the news.

\---------

James woke up several hours after Amina had helped him back to their room. He was still tired, but something inside him wouldn't let him stay asleep.

He was glad that she'd helped him clean up though. There were still bits of dried blood around the edges of his nails that he knew wouldn't come out without a good scrub. And he didn't even want to think of how much was still hiding in the claws and fur of his left arm. That was a problem for later.

He looked around and saw that Amina wasn't in the room. He wasn't worried though, her armor was on its stand in the corner, along with her partially sentient shield. So she was probably just grabbing a meal, or more likely helping his mother and brother get settled a bit.

Then he remembered that they were here.

How had they gotten here? Why? What was going on on Earth that they would be sent over with a critically wounded Batista?

He had so many questions and his struggle to keep his friend alive had given him no chance to have any of them answered.

He walked over to his bag and pulled out his phone, eager to get in touch with someone, anyone really, who might have answers.

Then he saw that he had a series of messages, two of which were from General Krick.

He sat on the bed, rubbing at his still red eyes, and clicked on one that appeared to be a voice message.

>Captain Choi. This is General Krick.
>
>If you are receiving this message than it is because I confronted Secretary Grant over what was going on with the prisoner they took, and I am either currently being detained.
>
>Or I am dead.

James's eyes had widened at the concept of the General being arrested, but his blood ran cold at the idea of him being dead.

>Whatever the case may be. I will likely not be capable of holding the Secretary and his allies at bay any longer. Which is what I have been trying to do this whole time.
>
>Regardless of all other circumstances, allow this to be my parting message before anything else happens to me.
>
>King Farrick needs to know that despite all other appearances, The United States Government IS NOT his friend. They have every intention, and are already currently attempting, to invade your world and claim it for themselves.
>
>But Choi, you and I have more in common than just being mustangs.
>

>We've both seen how dark our world can be. And neither of us wants that to happen to your new world too. I'm sure it has its evil side too. And you've even been victim to that side. But you know that it can't hold a candle to the horrors our people can unleash upon something they view as an.... other.
>
>And you're in a unique position to prevent that from happening there.

James waited as the General paused.

>I can't.... help you with this vanishing blight. Our techs have tried to understand the data that's been gathered but it's..... it's on a different level than what we can understand. After all, we're still figuring out magic, and not even really doing a good job there.
>
>But what I can do... is show you how the door works, and cut some of your restraints off.
>
>I've sent you a few files along with this message. One of them is a program that you need to install on your phone immediately. As well as the communication hub, any tablets you can get your hands on, AND the drone network.
>
>It'll give you full control of how much signal access you have on your side of the door. It won't stop them from taking that signal away if they decide to go dark on the Earth side of things. But that would be the only way to stop you from getting info. Additionally it'll let them THINK they have the ability to block you out, it'll mask your access if the try to do so.
>
>They can still get around it if they find out, so don't reveal that ability unless absolutely necessary.
>
>The other file is. Well... It's the schematics for our current, and most effective Door Knocking device. A dumb name, I know. But I didn't name it.
>
>It's... complicated. But if that little redhead is as smart as she's made us think she is, than she should be able to figure it out. I can't help you with the power aspect. But you people can shoot goddam lightning out of your fingertips. I have no doubt that you can figure out a few thousand kilojoules, or megawatts, or whatever of power that the requirement is.

James's mouth was hanging open at this point. He was still trying to comprehend the scale of what the General was doing.

This was Treason for god's sake. The General was giving national secrets on a level unheard of to him and the King.

But if the General was dead.... then what? What would that even imply?

James felt, not for the first time since coming to this world, that he was significantly out of his depth.

>I've already told you that there's a tertiary entry site and that we have a FOB there. They are there to set up a permanent beachhead that will allow the Secretary and anyone in the military loyal to him to send troops, supplies, weapons, and armor through basically at will.

This revelation caused James to inhale sharply.

>It's in a desert, far away from you, that's not near any major cities, and is nestled inside a mountain range. It was chosen specifically for how secluded it is, AND how difficult a ground assault would be.

The General paused again.

>We also have the ability to open temporary doorways with a portable device. It's difficult. It takes so much energy that it's basically a one shot use item with a massive downtime before its ready again. But it can be used damn near anywhere. Be aware of that if hostility becomes the only option.
>
>You, Choi, have seen what our bombs can do to that world. The King has seen. All of Jadesport saw. And YOU know that those weren't even the worst things we can send over.

By now, James was practically breathless, his mind all but in shut down as it attempted to think of all the ways this could go wrong.

>Choi..... Don't let them do to that world what we did to our own.
>
>Let the King hear this. Then delete it. ASAP.
>
>Well... I'm going to go try to snip Grant's wings a bit.
>
>I hope some day we can meet in person. Though, I doubt it.
>
>Good luck.... Captain.

The phone beeped before a robotic voice indicated that the message was over.

James dropped the phone on the bed as if it had scalded his hand. His hands shot to the side of his face, causing one of his claws to nick his forehead a bit, though he didn't notice. He ran his fingers through his hair as he thought of everything he'd just heard.

Then he grabbed the phone and bolted out of the door, wearing only his underwear and lounging robe.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/xa8314/wait_is_this_just_gate_223/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (221/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yes I am still alive. I had a three day weekend because of Labor Day. Then I had a sick day because of a stomach bug.

Anyways, things progress. And no...>! Batty is not dead just yet.!< So don't worry too much. (Maybe worry a little bit though)

Enjoy.

\~

Nguyen watched, sore and bloody and sitting on top of a now dead horse, as the armored figure approached him.

He hadn't seen one of the near mythical special forces operators since he'd been a young Corporal in the Third back during the wars. Even then he hadn't truly believed what they were or what they were capable of.

Muck Marchers.

So named because their advanced, borderline indestructible, armor, as well as a few extreme surgical procedures, allowed them to walk on the bottom of the ocean to depths lower than most Submarines could go. Or at least most submarines back then. The suits had built in re-breathers, and advanced electrolysis devices that allowed them to get more oxygen on the fly while also supplying hydrogen to their built in fuel cells. A well maintained suit could allow its operator to walk from the continental United States to Europe so long as they were capable of stomaching the intake-based food pellets that the suit provided once its initial on board supplies were exhausted.

These suits had allowed the U.S. to turn the tide of the war in its favor during several of the lengthier engagements. Once the unfathomably expensive tech had been refined enough to be field ready it had allowed them to defend or attack virtually any site they'd wanted to. On the Ocean. On lakes. In rivers and tidal bays. Anywhere that the water covered was subject to a Muck Marcher action.

The fact that the suits being crush proof also made them resistant to anything short of anti armor weapons? Well, that just made the job even easier for the Muck Marchers.

These men... if they even were men anymore... were as close as the military had ever gotten to creating actual super soldiers in power armor. Though, he'd heard rumors about incredibly shortened lifespans.

The one approaching him now was also the first one he'd seen emerge from the door.

It removed its helmet, and Nguyen was surprised to find that the "man" inside was actually closer to a high school teenager. Or at least he looked like one.

He was also so pale that Nguyen couldn't help but wonder if the kid was sick with something. His veins showed through his skin, and his hair looked fried and almost limp.

"Master Sergeant Nguyen." The marcher said in a voice that was much deeper than Nguyen had expected. It reverberated oddly too. "Chief Marcus Driscoll." He said as he extended an armored hand. Nguyen accepted it hesitantly. "Fourth Salt Assault squad."

The chief pulled Nguyen to his feet as if he weighed nothing. Nguyen felt his already tired hand crackle a little bit from the chief's grip, but said nothing.

"Bit of a mess you guys made here." Driscoll said. "But it was bound to happen sooner or later."

Nguyen looked around at the massive amounts of bloodshed and carnage. He winced as he saw Sticky's legless body, with a spear still sticking out of his chest. The Orc who'd killed him was lying on on top of the young soldier, with several bullet holes in its chest and face. Sticky's last act of defiance before he'd died.

"Could say the same for you." Nguyen replied. "Why'd they send a bunch of Muck Marchers?"

Driscoll's face scowled for just the briefest of moments at the name. It was all Nguyen needed to see to know that he probably shouldn't call them that to their faces.

"There's been.... a slight change of hands on the other side." The youthful operator said, his mask of calm firmly reasserted. "Things are gonna be operating... a bit differently from here on out."

"Well I'd figured that last part." Nguyen replied. He looked around. "I suppose you can tell me the rest once we've recovered a bit and cleaned all this mess up."

Chief Driscoll smiled, and Nguyen was surprised to find that his teeth were eerily perfect. He suspected that they were fake.

"My thoughts exactly." He said. "Me and my boys will mop up any stragglers. You get your folks patched up and we'll go from there."

\-------------------------

James sat on the chair in the healing ward, numb to everything around him.

The healers had arrived only moments after Amina had placed her hand on his shoulder early this morning.

They'd quickly went to work doing what they could for Batty, but James and Amina both knew that his odds were all but non-existant. He'd been hit in the stomach by a shotgun round. At least that was what his mother's story had suggested, and the damage James had seen had pretty much confirmed it. James knew what one of those did, especially at close range.

Still. Somehow... Batty was alive. They were still working on him even as James watched.

He'd even run to the room where Vickers and Werner had ensured all their Earth-side supplies were being stored and gotten some medical gear from it. Once he'd returned he'd gone to work with his medical knowledge even as the healers had continued restoring the young Sergeant's damaged flesh.

He'd given batty a full two pints of his own O+ blood, making him light headed in the process, in the hopes that it might offset some of Batty's own blood loss. Batty was A+ so he knew that the compatibility would be fine, though he had worried about the magical content of his blood. He'd also worried about whether he might accidentally turn him to a werewolf by accident, as he had yet to test that concept. But batty had stayed the same.

Then he'd hooked up a set of IV's and pushed a bag of Hextend and a shot of general antibiotics just to be safe.

He'd also hooked up a field vitals monitor to Batty's hand and bicep. It beeped softly every few minutes as it printed out a small receipt roll of readouts that only James understood.

The healers had looked at him curiously as he'd added these new devices to Batty's bedside. But they knew that James was trained in Earth's way of medicine, and had allowed him to do so without any hassle. One of them had even commented on how their healing was proving more effective after he'd gotten some of James's blood. James had simply nodded.

Now he was sitting here, still covered in his friend's blood, watching as they continued to do their work.

Batty hadn't woken up yet.

James was doubtful that he would, though he still hoped.

The whole situation reminded him too much of how he'd arrived here with Sergeant Odie.

It was as the dawn faded into full daylight that Amina kneeled next to him, placing a hand on his shoulder softly.

He looked at her with red rimmed eyes as he placed a blood crusted hand on top of hers.

"How is he?" She asked.

James looked back. "Alive." He said. "Barely." He looked down, suddenly feeling the weight of all the stress and emotion. "I think... he's probably in a coma. Or at least something close."

"Is there anything else you can do for him?" She asked. "I see that you've done some of you work here."

James shook his head softly.

"Then come." She said as she placed her head against his. "I've got your mother and brother set up in a room down the hall from ours for now. But come clean up and get some rest. They're excited to see you again."

In the whirlwind of chaos that had occurred over the past few hours James hadn't forgotten that his family was here now. He still didn't know how or why. But he'd been so focused on not losing another friend that he'd completely blocked those concerns from his mind.

He nodded, still not saying anything.

She grabbed his head suddenly and turned him to look at her in the eyes.

"He's alive." She said. "That's better than EITHER of us expected before the healers got to him." She shook her head and saw the concern there. For Batty and, he knew, for him. "You've done what you can. Does any of that stuff you put up need upkeep or anything?"

He nodded. "The bags will have to be swapped every couple hours." He said softly.

"Can Vickers do that? Would he know how?" She asked.

He nodded again.

"Anything else?"

He shook his head.

"Then your job here is done." She said sternly. "Come. Clean yourself up. Get at least a few hours sleep. And then show your mother, and that adorable little brother of yours this great new world they're in. We can figure the rest out latter."

"Okay." He said weakly.

She drew him into a hug, and James felt the dam burst once again as he wrapped his arms around her.

In the bag he'd set aside nearby, his phone went off.

He'd find out later that it was one final message from General Krick.

\----------

Braius was almost done tending the goats when it happened.

Deera had gotten her horns stuck in the trough feed door again and had held the others up from eating, causing them to bleat with anger. But that was normal and he'd had the old, bearded, bitch out of the mess in a heartbeat. The goat's tails had flicked back and forth happily as they'd munched on the mixture of greens and garbage that they loved so much.

Then he'd heard the birds in the nearby woods take flight, singing songs of warning, before suddenly silencing.

He'd looked that direction and seen that the sky was actually empty.

In fact, after a moment of looking curiously to figure out what was wrong, he'd noticed that it was too empty.

The woods there were all but gone. Only stumps remained.

Then he'd seen one of the old goats, likely old Romper, disappear, along with all the grass and dirt around him, as a massive oblong ditch appeared where they'd just been.

Then more, similar, wounds opened in the ground around the area.

They were getting closer.

"What in the hells?" He'd exclaimed as he quickly turned back to the other goats. "Go on you bunch of bastards!" He'd yelled at them foolishly. "Run!"

He had to warn someone. Anyone really. He had to warn them about what was happening.

But what was happening?

And who would he warn?

He was the only one out here. He wasn't even due back at the main farm until the goats had cleared this bit out. And that wasn't gonna happen for at least another week or so.

He made to run. But his bum leg just wasn't up to the task as he began a limping shuffle in the direction of the farm.

Then something.... well.... it didn't impact him exactly.

It was hard to explain the sensation as it engulfed him.

Then he wasn't there to explain it anyways.

Neither were any of the goats, who suddenly quieted as they all ceased existing.

The tendrils of the cleanser grew minutely larger from their continuing feast.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x9acn5/wait_is_this_just_gate_222/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (221/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yes I am still alive. I had a three day weekend because of Labor Day. Then I had a sick day because of a stomach bug.

Anyways, things progress. And no... >!Batty is not dead just yet.!< So don't worry too much. (Maybe worry a little bit though)

Enjoy.

\~

Nguyen watched, sore and bloody and sitting on top of a now dead horse, as the armored figure approached him.

He hadn't seen one of the near mythical special forces operators since he'd been a young Corporal in the Third back during the wars. Even then he hadn't truly believed what they were or what they were capable of.

Muck Marchers.

So named because their advanced, borderline indestructible, armor, as well as a few extreme surgical procedures, allowed them to walk on the bottom of the ocean to depths lower than most Submarines could go. Or at least most submarines back then. The suits had built in re-breathers, and advanced electrolysis devices that allowed them to get more oxygen on the fly while also supplying hydrogen to their built in fuel cells. A well maintained suit could allow its operator to walk from the continental United States to Europe so long as they were capable of stomaching the intake-based food pellets that the suit provided once its initial on board supplies were exhausted.

These suits had allowed the U.S. to turn the tide of the war in its favor during several of the lengthier engagements. Once the unfathomably expensive tech had been refined enough to be field ready it had allowed them to defend or attack virtually any site they'd wanted to. On the Ocean. On lakes. In rivers and tidal bays. Anywhere that the water covered was subject to a Muck Marcher action.

The fact that the suits being crush proof also made them resistant to anything short of anti armor weapons? Well, that just made the job even easier for the Muck Marchers.

These men... if they even were men anymore... were as close as the military had ever gotten to creating actual super soldiers in power armor. Though, he'd heard rumors about incredibly shortened lifespans.

The one approaching him now was also the first one he'd seen emerge from the door.

It removed its helmet, and Nguyen was surprised to find that the "man" inside was actually closer to a high school teenager. Or at least he looked like one.

He was also so pale that Nguyen couldn't help but wonder if the kid was sick with something. His veins showed through his skin, and his hair looked fried and almost limp.

"Master Sergeant Nguyen." The marcher said in a voice that was much deeper than Nguyen had expected. It reverberated oddly too. "Chief Marcus Driscoll." He said as he extended an armored hand. Nguyen accepted it hesitantly. "Fourth Salt Assault squad."

The chief pulled Nguyen to his feet as if he weighed nothing. Nguyen felt his already tired hand crackle a little bit from the chief's grip, but said nothing.

"Bit of a mess you guys made here." Driscoll said. "But it was bound to happen sooner or later."

Nguyen looked around at the massive amounts of bloodshed and carnage. He winced as he saw Sticky's legless body, with a spear still sticking out of his chest. The Orc who'd killed him was lying on on top of the young soldier, with several bullet holes in its chest and face. Sticky's last act of defiance before he'd died.

"Could say the same for you." Nguyen replied. "Why'd they send a bunch of Muck Marchers?"

Driscoll's face scowled for just the briefest of moments at the name. It was all Nguyen needed to see to know that he probably shouldn't call them that to their faces.

"There's been.... a slight change of hands on the other side." The youthful operator said, his mask of calm firmly reasserted. "Things are gonna be operating... a bit differently from here on out."

"Well I'd figured that last part." Nguyen replied. He looked around. "I suppose you can tell me the rest once we've recovered a bit and cleaned all this mess up."

Chief Driscoll smiled, and Nguyen was surprised to find that his teeth were eerily perfect. He suspected that they were fake.

"My thoughts exactly." He said. "Me and my boys will mop up any stragglers. You get your folks patched up and we'll go from there."

\-------------------------

James sat on the chair in the healing ward, numb to everything around him.

The healers had arrived only moments after Amina had placed her hand on his shoulder early this morning.

They'd quickly went to work doing what they could for Batty, but James and Amina both knew that his odds were all but non-existant. He'd been hit in the stomach by a shotgun round. At least that was what his mother's story had suggested, and the damage James had seen had pretty much confirmed it. James knew what one of those did, especially at close range.

Still. Somehow... Batty was alive. They were still working on him even as James watched.

He'd even run to the room where Vickers and Werner had ensured all their Earth-side supplies were being stored and gotten some medical gear from it. Once he'd returned he'd gone to work with his medical knowledge even as the healers had continued restoring the young Sergeant's damaged flesh.

He'd given batty a full two pints of his own O+ blood, making him light headed in the process, in the hopes that it might offset some of Batty's own blood loss. Batty was A+ so he knew that the compatibility would be fine, though he had worried about the magical content of his blood. He'd also worried about whether he might accidentally turn him to a werewolf by accident, as he had yet to test that concept. But batty had stayed the same.

Then he'd hooked up a set of IV's and pushed a bag of Hextend and a shot of general antibiotics just to be safe.

He'd also hooked up a field vitals monitor to Batty's hand and bicep. It beeped softly every few minutes as it printed out a small receipt roll of readouts that only James understood.

The healers had looked at him curiously as he'd added these new devices to Batty's bedside. But they knew that James was trained in Earth's way of medicine, and had allowed him to do so without any hassle. One of them had even commented on how their healing was proving more effective after he'd gotten some of James's blood. James had simply nodded.

Now he was sitting here, still covered in his friend's blood, watching as they continued to do their work.

Batty hadn't woken up yet.

James was doubtful that he would, though he still hoped.

The whole situation reminded him too much of how he'd arrived here with Sergeant Odie.

It was as the dawn faded into full daylight that Amina kneeled next to him, placing a hand on his shoulder softly.

He looked at her with red rimmed eyes as he placed a blood crusted hand on top of hers.

"How is he?" She asked.

James looked back. "Alive." He said. "Barely." He looked down, suddenly feeling the weight of all the stress and emotion. "I think... he's probably in a coma. Or at least something close."

"Is there anything else you can do for him?" She asked. "I see that you've done some of your work here."

James shook his head softly.

"Then come." She said as she placed her head against his. "I've got your mother and brother set up in a room down the hall from ours for now. But come clean up and get some rest. They're excited to see you again."

In the whirlwind of chaos that had occurred over the past few hours James hadn't forgotten that his family was here now. He still didn't know how or why. But he'd been so focused on not losing another friend that he'd completely blocked those concerns from his mind.

He nodded, still not saying anything.

She grabbed his head suddenly and turned him to look at her in the eyes.

"He's alive." She said. "That's better than EITHER of us expected before the healers got to him." She shook her head and saw the concern there. For Batty and, he knew, for him. "You've done what you can. Does any of that stuff you put up need upkeep or anything?"

He nodded. "The bags will have to be swapped every couple hours." He said softly.

"Can Vickers do that? Would he know how?" She asked.

He nodded again.

"Anything else?"

He shook his head.

"Then your job here is done." She said sternly. "Come. Clean yourself up. Get at least a few hours sleep. And then show your mother, and that adorable little brother of yours this great new world they're in. We can figure the rest out later."

"Okay." He said weakly.

She drew him into a hug, and James felt the dam burst once again as he wrapped his arms around her.

In the bag he'd set aside nearby, his phone went off.

He'd find out later that it was one final message from General Krick.

\----------

Braius was almost done tending the goats when it happened.

Deera had gotten her horns stuck in the trough feed door again and had held the others up from eating, causing them to bleat with anger. But that was normal and he'd had the old, bearded, bitch out of the mess in a heartbeat. The goat's tails had flicked back and forth happily as they'd munched on the mixture of greens and garbage that they loved so much.

Then he'd heard the birds in the nearby woods take flight, singing songs of warning, before suddenly silencing.

He'd looked that direction and seen that the sky was actually empty.

In fact, after a moment of looking curiously to figure out what was wrong, he'd noticed that it was too empty.

The woods there were all but gone. Only stumps remained.

Then he'd seen one of the old goats, likely old Romper, disappear, along with all the grass and dirt around him, as a massive oblong ditch appeared where they'd just been.

Then more, similar, wounds opened in the ground around the area.

They were getting closer.

"What in the hells?" He'd exclaimed as he quickly turned back to the other goats. "Go on you bunch of bastards!" He'd yelled at them foolishly. "Run!"

He had to warn someone. Anyone really. He had to warn them about what was happening.

But what was happening?

And who would he warn?

He was the only one out here. He wasn't even due back at the main farm until the goats had cleared this bit out. And that wasn't gonna happen for at least another week or so.

He made to run. But his bum leg just wasn't up to the task as he began a limping shuffle in the direction of the farm.

Then something.... well.... it didn't impact him exactly.

It was hard to explain the sensation as it engulfed him.

Then he wasn't there to explain it anyways.

Neither were any of the goats, who suddenly quieted as they all ceased existing.

The tendrils of the cleanser grew minutely larger from their continuing feast.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x9aa37/wait_is_this_just_gate_222/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (220/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Oh. Did y'all have expectations for how this would go? Well guess what! SO DID THE PEOPLE IN THE STORY!

Enjoy.

\~

Nguyen sat on his knees, hands tied behind his back, as the Petravian soldiers tore through the camp.

He'd watched in horror as the dwarves and a few of the soldier mages had worked together, using some kind of sand manipulation magic, to lift the underground boxes out from beneath their tents.

The doctor and the other civilian staff had opted to stay, not wanting to risk the return trip. At Nguyen's and Sergeant Vhiner'ys instruction, they'd opened the hatches and climbed out of the top of the boxes they were in. He'd assured Vhiner'ys that they were actual civilians and not military like he and the other defenders.

But the Sergeant hadn't been willing to risk any further subterfuge, so he'd ordered them restrained and separated just like everyone else.

Nguyen couldn't blame him for that.

If there was one upside it was that all the drives had been uploaded through the door and then wiped and fried. No data would be recovered from them on this side. Additionally the weapon storage crates had had their self destruct devices activated. Small thermite charges went off inside the crates, melting the weapons to slag without getting through the ceramic coating of the crates themselves. All the Petravians would get was the ammo, and the weapons that he and his crew had on the surface.

It wasn't a win. But any amount of difficulty he could cause them at this point was good in his book.

He overheard the werewolf that Vhiner'ys had dispatched talk to him after she'd come back. They'd found the spot where Isaacs had killed the other wolf, Dranek. Apparently they'd underestimated just how refined a werewolf's sense of smell could get.

They'd been well and thoroughly caught with their pants around their ankles out here.

And almost entirely at the orders of the Secretary of Defense back on Earth.

But he still had to admit that he was at fault too. He should have turned down those orders. They should have just gone about being actual Cartographers for the next few months to sell it. They should have never had more people or gear sent over.

So many things the should and should not have done.

Hind sight is a bitch. He thought as he sat there pitying himself.

"What in the hells is that?" Vhiner'ys asked suddenly, causing him to look up at the armored elf. The Sergeant looked over at a pair of nearby mages who were looking around in confusion. "You sense that?" He asked them. They both nodded.

A small, sparking, circle of light began to form in the command tent.

Right where the original door had opened before they'd set up the boxes.

One of the soldiers in the tent approached it curiously, weapon drawn, though he wasn't foolish enough to touch it.

Eventually the circle stabilized.

Nguyen watched as a pair of familiar, armored, rifle wielding, forms stepped out of the circle.

Muck marchers? Nguyen wondered.

Then he watched in mute surprise as the camp exploded into motion and violence.

\----------

Krick looked back at the MP's as they made a show of inspecting the front, driver side, tire on the rig he'd just stepped out of.

He walked quickly over to the rear vehicle and steeled himself as he prepared for a conversation that he secretly hoped required him to get violent.

He took a deep breath and rubbed at his bruised rib before he gripped the door handle.

Alright you fuck. He thought as he pulled the door open. Let's chat.

His train of thought was interrupted by something clattering to the ground as the door opened. Reflexively he caught it and held it up where he could look at it.

Is that my pistol? He wondered, recognizing the white paint on the sights. He'd put it there himself after all.

There was blood on it. He noticed this just as he noticed the smell coming from the back of the armored vehicle.

"Ah." He said softly as he saw the bloodshed inside. The bullet riddled, dead, remains of former Secretary of Defense Grant. "Fuck."

He spun as fast as he could, instinctively flipping off the safety on the pistol as he did.

BANG!.... BA-BANG!

Krick felt the three rounds impact him in the chest and stomach. His armor was only rated to defend up to .45 caliber rounds. A trade off in exchange for it being light enough to be concealed.

But it had already been shot once, and was compromised as a result.

And these were much larger than .45's.

He looked down at the three holes in his abdomen as he fell to a knee. Blood was already soaking through his shirt.

He looked up at his attacker and saw the MP's from his truck aiming rifles at him. SSG Jones had smoke pouring out of his rifle's barrel.

He aimed the pistol at him. He saw the unworried expression on Jones and knew what was going to happen.

Click-Snap!

His weapon was empty.

"Fucking... bullshit." He said to himself as he fell over backwards.

Jones walked up to him and kicked kicked the General's leg. Then, just to make sure, put one more round in his neck.

He turned back to the other MP's. "Let the Colonel and Sergeant Major know that it's done." He said.

\----------

"Ah shit." Batty said quietly as they rounded the corner. "Their hand scanners won't pass us. Follow my lead. Mrs. Choi, act tired."

"Not a problem." She replied as she saw the two guards walking toward them. She yawned, and it wasn't a fake.

"Hey guys!" Batty said with a smile as they continued walking. "Patrol rounds?"

The larger of the two guards looked at them curiously. "Yeah." He looked at Margaret and Joey. "What are you doing here? Those are new arrival badges and we're prepped for transit. You're not supposed to be in this area."

"Ah shit." Batty said with a hand on his neck. "Are they doin that supply run right now?" He tssked and put on a look of upset. "My bad guys. I just picked them up down in Ontario. I figured I'd give em the world's quickest tour before we turn em in for the night. That's on me."

"Honestly I could skip." Joey said, surprising his mother. "I'm exhausted."

The two guards looked at them with pity. The smaller one sighed. "Fair enough. But we gotta log it. Badges please."

Batty pulled his off of his chest and signaled for them to follow suit. The two guards took them and held up scanners to read them.

Batty's badge went off just fine. But when the smaller guard read Joey's badge the scanner pinged red.

"Huh." Batty said. "Well. Jones at the front desk said that might happen for the first few days." He said with a thumb over his shoulder. "Need us to go back and get em redone?"

"Lemme try again." The guard said.

Then Margaret's badge pinged red too.

The larger of the guards began reaching for the radio handset on his shoulder.

"Sorry guys." Batty said, causing them both to pause as they looked at him

His hand flashed out with a taser, pressing it to the larger guard's neck. There was a quick crackled noise before it made contact. Then the guard was spasming as he fell back.

Batty's prosthetic leg swept up and kicked the smaller guard in the chest, causing a noise that reminded Margaret of the sound of wood being split as it impacted the guard's vest. The smaller guard went flying back into the wall hard enough to break one of the pipes running along it. Steam began pouring out of it.

"Shit. Too hard." Batty said. "Still getting used to this thing." He turned to them as he bent down and picked up the larger guard's badge. "Time to run." He said.

So that was what they did.

\---------------

"Is Sergeant Batista single?" Colonel Muhammed heard in her ear as she continued watching the control room get ready for a door opening. "If he is I might need to hit him up. He's a cool customer under pressure. Either way, the guards are ummm.... not an issue anymore. But things did just get complicated ma'am. You might want to open up that door soon."

"What happened?" She asked, moving her hand up to rub at her temple for a cover.

"He uh.... He took them out. They're making a dash for the finish line." The young sergeant on the other end responded. "Ah.... Shit. Looks like one of them was still conscious."

As if taking the line as a cue the lights in the room began strobing red.

"Intruder! Intruder! All personnel secure locations!" The automated voice said. Then a human voice cut on over the comms. "Three unidentified people seen in eastern conduit corridor. All available security respond."

"Get that shipment sent now!" She said to the control room staff. "Damn the last box. Get it gone!"

"But ma'am." One of the soldiers said from their station. "Security protocol demands that we cease all function until the security threat is eliminated."

"I said now soldier." She said with a glare. She looked around at the other staff, almost all of whom were looking at her curiously. "That's an order."

They hesitantly turned back to their stations. Though she could hear the murmuring.

"Status?" She said softly as she sat back down. Then she turned back. "Someone turn that damn announcement down!"

"Guards have rushed the gate room." A pause. "Wait. Where'd they go?"

Too many people were looking at her for her to respond. So she picked up her phone and pretended to call the security room.

"Security this is Colonel Muhammed." She said into the phone, ignoring the dial tone. "What's going on?" She said, angling her voice into the comm device.

"All good." She heard from the ear piece. "Somehow Batista knew about the decon rooms. Or he stumbled on one. They're in there getting into hazmat suits." She paused again. "Wow. The decon rooms don't lock their inner doors when a security warning is up. Thaaaat's a hole in the defenses." The colonel heard a frustrated sigh. "If it wasn't saving our asses right now I'd be mad about that."

On her computer the Colonel pulled up the command override screen.

\--------------------

"Alright." Batty said in a muffled voice as he flipped the on switch on his suit's air re-breather/inflation tank. He quickly turned on both Margaret's and Joey's too. "That should keep people from realizing we're the problem."

He gestured and they followed him. He got to the inner door and gripped the large red handle. He pulled and her heart skipped a bit as it didn't move. Then he grunted with a bit of exertion and the handle began moving noisily to its open position.

As they stepped in they saw the room on the other side. It was almost empty save for a few crates on dollies and the soldiers pushing them. Plus the guards posted around the room, looking at the doors on either side of the room. All of them were wearing similar suits to the three intruders.

"Halt!" One of them said as they saw the three of them emerge from the decontamination room. He had a shotgun aimed at Batty, who quickly put his hands in the air. "What are you doing here? We're in lockdown." He looked back behind them. "Do those not lock during a lockdown?" He asked with a look of disgust.

Batty pointed at the door they'd just come from. "We were already in there when it started. We figured it'd be safer in here with you guys."

The soldier raised their shotgun back up a bit to aim at Batty again. "Still. Who are you and why are you here. That's not a loading door so you aren't with the last shipment."

Batty pointed at Margaret and Joey. "New scientists. I was told to escort them here by Colonel M." He said.

The soldier considered this, clearly afraid to contradict the Colonel's orders if they were true.

Then one of the other room guards came over and tapped them on the shoulder. "That decon room is attached to the conduit corridor from the alert." She said to the first guard.

Suddenly two weapons were trained on them.

Margaret instinctively got in front of the one that was aimed at Joey's chest.

"On your knees!" The first soldier said as they gestured with the shotgun. "Now!"

Behind them a sparking circle began to form in the air.

"What the hell?" The second guard said, looking back at the opening doorway. "That's not due until the last crate gets here."

The first guard glanced over their shoulder for just a brief second.

But that was all batty needed.

\------------------------

James and Amina arrived in the summoning room just as an incredibly familiar face, inside of some kind of rubber suit, emerge from the sparking, swirling circle of energy that was hovering above the ground.

James rushed to embrace him.

"JOEY!" He yelled just as the two of them collided in a hug.

Then his mom stepped out of the circle.

"Mom!?!" He asked. "What's happening!?!?"

Then he saw the blood on her suit.

The two brothers rushed to make sure she was okay.

"It's not me." She said with a frantic look. "I'm okay. It's your friend Batista."

"What?" James asked as a third form fell from the circle and landed face down.

Blood quickly began to pool on the floor beneath it. The person began to claw at the rubber suit they were wearing, which wasn't inflated like his mom and brother's.

As the hood was removed James rushed over and cradlde the man in his arms as he turned him over.

He recognized the small capital H tattooed on the side of his neck.

"Batty?" He asked as he saw his old friend for the first time in almost two years. "Batty what the hell man?"

"Hey man." Batty said softly. "I tried telling them fools I wasn't crazy." He took a shuddering breath and James heard a gurgling noise.

"HEALERS!" He yelled at the people around him. Forgetting to speak in Petravian. "GET SOME HEALERS IN HERE!"

"I did think it was aliens though." Batty said weakly as James ripped open the rubbery suit he was wearing. "I was wrong about that part."

James pulled open the uniform shirt underneath, ignoring the blood that was pooled inside of the hazmat suit.

"GET ME A FUCKING HEALER!" He yelled again. "NOW!"

He tried to get his own healing magic going as he pressed his hand to the ruined mess that was his friend's stomach. But the amber light flickered dimly.

He couldn't focus.

"Amina help!" He begged, fear in his voice. She rushed over, snapped out of her confusion, and her hands both began glowing with the familiar light.

"I got your family for you homie." Batty said. His eyes were drooping. "Your lil bro's gotten tall as hell."

"Come on man." James begged as he held his friend's head in his lap. "Come on man. Don't do this. Not you too."

"Ah man Jimmy." Batty said. "You look cool as hell dude. All scarred and shit. What's up with your fuckin hand man?" He looked down at where Amina was frantically trying to heal him. "Is that fuckin' magic?"

Then James felt Batty's neck go limp, as the last little bit of strength left it.

"Aaaaay... Who's the smokesh-" Batty tried to say. But his voice trailed off.

"Batty?" James asked as he slapped at his friend's cheeks. Tears were flowing down his cheeks. "BATTY!"

But there was no answer. He saw Amina's hands go dark.

"Oh James." She said.

"BATTY!" He yelled before falling over his friend.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x8c9y2/wait_is_this_just_gate_221/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (220/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Oh. Did y'all have expectations for how this would go? Well guess what! SO DID THE PEOPLE IN THE STORY!

Enjoy.

\~

Nguyen sat on his knees, hands tied behind his back, as the Petravian soldiers tore through the camp.

He'd watched in horror as the dwarves and a few of the soldier mages had worked together, using some kind of sand manipulation magic, to lift the underground boxes out from beneath their tents.

The doctor and the other civilian staff had opted to stay, not wanting to risk the return trip. At Nguyen's and Sergeant Vhiner'ys instruction, they'd opened the hatches and climbed out of the top of the boxes they were in. He'd assured Vhiner'ys that they were actual civilians and not military like he and the other defenders.

But the Sergeant hadn't been willing to risk any further subterfuge, so he'd ordered them restrained and separated just like everyone else.

Nguyen couldn't blame him for that.

If there was one upside it was that all the drives had been uploaded through the door and then wiped and fried. No data would be recovered from them on this side. Additionally the weapon storage crates had had their self destruct devices activated. Small thermite charges went off inside the crates, melting the weapons to slag without getting through the ceramic coating of the crates themselves. All the Petravians would get was the ammo, and the weapons that he and his crew had on the surface.

It wasn't a win. But any amount of difficulty he could cause them at this point was good in his book.

He overheard the werewolf that Vhiner'ys had dispatched talk to him after she'd come back. They'd found the spot where Isaacs had killed the other wolf, Dranek. Apparently they'd underestimated just how refined a werewolf's sense of smell could get.

They'd been well and thoroughly caught with their pants around their ankles out here.

And almost entirely at the orders of the Secretary of Defense back on Earth.

But he still had to admit that he was at fault too. He should have turned down those orders. They should have just gone about being actual Cartographers for the next few months to sell it. They should have never had more people or gear sent over.

So many things the should and should not have done.

Hind sight is a bitch. He thought as he sat there pitying himself.

"What in the hells is that?" Vhiner'ys asked suddenly, causing him to look up at the armored elf. The Sergeant looked over at a pair of nearby mages who were looking around in confusion. "You sense that?" He asked them. They both nodded.

A small, sparking, circle of light began to form in the command tent.

Right where the original door had opened before they'd set up the boxes.

One of the soldiers in the tent approached it curiously, weapon drawn, though he wasn't foolish enough to touch it.

Eventually the circle stabilized.

Nguyen watched as a pair of familiar, armored, rifle wielding, forms stepped out of the circle.

Muck marchers? Nguyen wondered.

Then he watched in mute surprise as the camp exploded into motion and violence.

\----------

Krick looked back at the MP's as they made a show of inspecting the front, driver side, tire on the rig he'd just stepped out of.

He walked quickly over to the rear vehicle and steeled himself as he prepared for a conversation that he secretly hoped required him to get violent.

He took a deep breath and rubbed at his bruised rib before he gripped the door handle.

Alright you fuck. He thought as he pulled the door open. Let's chat.

His train of thought was interrupted by something clattering to the ground as the door opened. Reflexively he caught it and held it up where he could look at it.

Is that my pistol? He wondered, recognizing the white paint on the sights. He'd put it there himself after all.

There was blood on it. He noticed this just as he noticed the smell coming from the back of the armored vehicle.

"Ah." He said softly as he saw the bloodshed inside. The bullet riddled, dead, remains of former Secretary of Defense Grant. "Fuck."

He spun as fast as he could, instinctively flipping off the safety on the pistol as he did.

BANG!.... BA-BANG!

Krick felt the three rounds impact him in the chest and stomach. His armor was only rated to defend up to .45 caliber rounds. A trade off in exchange for it being light enough to be concealed.

But it had already been shot once, and was compromised as a result.

And these were much larger than .45's.

He looked down at the three holes in his abdomen as he fell to a knee. Blood was already soaking through his shirt.

He looked up at his attacker and saw the MP's from his truck aiming rifles at him. SSG Jones had smoke pouring out of his rifle's barrel.

He aimed the pistol at him. He saw the unworried expression on Jones and knew what was going to happen.

Click-Snap!

His weapon was empty.

"Fucking... bullshit." He said to himself as he fell over backwards.

Jones walked up to him and kicked the General's leg. Then, just to make sure, put one more round in his neck.

He turned back to the other MP's. "Let the Colonel and Sergeant Major know that it's done." He said.

\----------

"Ah shit." Batty said quietly as they rounded the corner. "Their hand scanners won't pass us. Follow my lead. Mrs. Choi, act tired."

"Not a problem." She replied as she saw the two guards walking toward them. She yawned, and it wasn't a fake.

"Hey guys!" Batty said with a smile as they continued walking. "Patrol rounds?"

The larger of the two guards looked at them curiously. "Yeah." He looked at Margaret and Joey. "What are you doing here? Those are new arrival badges and we're prepped for transit. You're not supposed to be in this area."

"Ah shit." Batty said with a hand on his neck. "Are they doin that supply run right now?" He tssked and put on a look of upset. "My bad guys. I just picked them up down in Ontario. I figured I'd give em the world's quickest tour before we turn em in for the night. That's on me."

"Honestly I could skip." Joey said, surprising his mother. "I'm exhausted."

The two guards looked at them with pity. The smaller one sighed. "Fair enough. But we gotta log it. Badges please."

Batty pulled his off of his chest and signaled for them to follow suit. The two guards took them and held up scanners to read them.

Batty's badge went off just fine. But when the smaller guard read Joey's badge the scanner pinged red.

"Huh." Batty said. "Well. Jones at the front desk said that might happen for the first few days." He said with a thumb over his shoulder. "Need us to go back and get em redone?"

"Lemme try again." The guard said.

Then Margaret's badge pinged red too.

The larger of the guards began reaching for the radio handset on his shoulder.

"Sorry guys." Batty said, causing them both to pause as they looked at him

His hand flashed out with a taser, pressing it to the larger guard's neck. There was a quick crackled noise before it made contact. Then the guard was spasming as he fell back.

Batty's prosthetic leg swept up and kicked the smaller guard in the chest, causing a noise that reminded Margaret of the sound of wood being split as it impacted the guard's vest. The smaller guard went flying back into the wall hard enough to break one of the pipes running along it. Steam began pouring out of it.

"Shit. Too hard." Batty said. "Still getting used to this thing." He turned to them as he bent down and picked up the larger guard's badge. "Time to run." He said.

So that was what they did.

\---------------

"Is Sergeant Batista single?" Colonel Muhammed heard in her ear as she continued watching the control room get ready for a door opening. "If he is I might need to hit him up. He's a cool customer under pressure. Either way, the guards are ummm.... not an issue anymore. But things did just get complicated ma'am. You might want to open up that door soon."

"What happened?" She asked, moving her hand up to rub at her temple for a cover.

"He uh.... He took them out. They're making a dash for the finish line." The young sergeant on the other end responded. "Ah.... Shit. Looks like one of them was still conscious."

As if taking the line as a cue the lights in the room began strobing red.

"Intruder! Intruder! All personnel secure locations!" The automated voice said. Then a human voice cut on over the comms. "Three unidentified people seen in eastern conduit corridor. All available security respond."

"Get that shipment sent now!" She said to the control room staff. "Damn the last box. Get it gone!"

"But ma'am." One of the soldiers said from their station. "Security protocol demands that we cease all function until the security threat is eliminated."

"I said now soldier." She said with a glare. She looked around at the other staff, almost all of whom were looking at her curiously. "That's an order."

They hesitantly turned back to their stations. Though she could hear the murmuring.

"Status?" She said softly as she sat back down. Then she turned back. "Someone turn that damn announcement down!"

"Guards have rushed the gate room." A pause. "Wait. Where'd they go?"

Too many people were looking at her for her to respond. So she picked up her phone and pretended to call the security room.

"Security this is Colonel Muhammed." She said into the phone, ignoring the dial tone. "What's going on?" She said, angling her voice into the comm device.

"All good." She heard from the ear piece. "Somehow Batista knew about the decon rooms. Or he stumbled on one. They're in there getting into hazmat suits." She paused again. "Wow. The decon rooms don't lock their inner doors when a security warning is up. Thaaaat's a hole in the defenses." The colonel heard a frustrated sigh. "If it wasn't saving our asses right now I'd be mad about that."

On her computer the Colonel pulled up the command override screen.

\-------------------

"Alright." Batty said in a muffled voice as he flipped the on switch on his suit's air re-breather/inflation tank. He quickly turned on both Margaret's and Joey's too. "That should keep people from realizing we're the problem."

He gestured and they followed him. He got to the inner door and gripped the large red handle. He pulled and her heart skipped a bit as it didn't move. Then he grunted with a bit of exertion and the handle began moving noisily to its open position.

As they stepped in they saw the room on the other side. It was almost empty save for a few crates on dollies and the soldiers pushing them. Plus the guards posted around the room, looking at the doors on either side of the room. All of them were wearing similar suits to the three intruders.

"Halt!" One of them said as they saw the three of them emerge from the decontamination room. He had a shotgun aimed at Batty, who quickly put his hands in the air. "What are you doing here? We're in lockdown." He looked back behind them. "Do those not lock during a lockdown?" He asked with a look of disgust.

Batty pointed at the door they'd just come from. "We were already in there when it started. We figured it'd be safer in here with you guys."

The soldier raised their shotgun back up a bit to aim at Batty again. "Still. Who are you and why are you here. That's not a loading door so you aren't with the last shipment."

Batty pointed at Margaret and Joey. "New scientists. I was told to escort them here by Colonel M." He said.

The soldier considered this, clearly afraid to contradict the Colonel's orders if they were true.

Then one of the other room guards came over and tapped them on the shoulder. "That decon room is attached to the conduit corridor from the alert." She said to the first guard.

Suddenly two weapons were trained on them.

Margaret instinctively got in front of the one that was aimed at Joey's chest.

"On your knees!" The first soldier said as they gestured with the shotgun. "Now!"

Behind them a sparking circle began to form in the air.

"What the hell?" The second guard said, looking back at the opening doorway. "That's not due until the last crate gets here."

The first guard glanced over their shoulder for just a brief second.

But that was all Batty needed.

\------------------------

James and Amina arrived in the summoning room just as an incredibly familiar face, inside of some kind of rubber suit, emerge from the sparking, swirling circle of energy that was hovering above the ground.

James rushed to embrace him.

"JOEY!" He yelled just as the two of them collided in a hug.

Then his mom stepped out of the circle.

"Mom!?!" He asked. "What's happening!?!?"

Then he saw the blood on her suit.

The two brothers rushed to make sure she was okay.

"It's not me." She said with a frantic look. "I'm okay. It's your friend Batista."

"What?" James asked as a third form fell from the circle and landed face down.

Blood quickly began to pool on the floor beneath it. The person began to claw at the rubber suit they were wearing, which wasn't inflated like his mom and brother's.

As the hood was removed James rushed over and cradled the man in his arms as he turned him over.

He recognized the small capital H tattooed on the side of his neck.

"Batty?" He asked as he saw his old friend for the first time in almost two years. "Batty what the hell man?"

"Hey man." Batty said softly. "I tried telling them fools I wasn't crazy." He took a shuddering breath and James heard a gurgling noise.

"HEALERS!" He yelled at the people around him. Forgetting to speak in Petravian. "GET SOME HEALERS IN HERE!"

"I did think it was aliens though." Batty said weakly as James ripped open the rubbery suit he was wearing. "I was wrong about that part."

James pulled open the uniform shirt underneath, ignoring the blood that was pooled inside of the hazmat suit.

"GET ME A FUCKING HEALER!" He yelled again. "NOW!"

He tried to get his own healing magic going as he pressed his hand to the ruined mess that was his friend's stomach. But the amber light flickered dimly.

He couldn't focus.

"Amina help!" He begged, fear in his voice. She rushed over, snapped out of her confusion, and her hands both began glowing with the familiar light.

"I got your family for you homie." Batty said. His eyes were drooping. "Your lil bro's gotten tall as hell."

"Come on man." James begged as he held his friend's head in his lap. "Come on man. Don't do this. Not you too."

"Ah man Jimmy." Batty said. "You look cool as hell dude. All scarred and shit. What's up with your fuckin hand man?" He looked down at where Amina was frantically trying to heal him. "Is that fuckin' magic?"

Then James felt Batty's neck go limp, as the last little bit of strength left it.

"Aaaaay... Who's the smokesh-" Batty tried to say. But his voice trailed off.

"Batty?" James asked as he slapped at his friend's cheeks. Tears were flowing down his cheeks. "BATTY!"

But there was no answer. He saw Amina's hands go dark.

"Oh James." She said.

"BATTY!" He yelled before falling over his friend.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x8c8dn/wait_is_this_just_gate_221/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (219/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hmmm.... maybe certain people are smarter than they seem sometimes.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

Margaret and Joey both followed Batty as he escorted them through the security checkpoint. Margaret was doing everything she could to avoid sweating, not wanting to give up the ruse. Joey on the other hand was practically beaming. She'd told him that he needed to pretend like he was in one of the old Mission Impossible movies that he and his father both loved for some reason. He'd taken to it like it was a game.

She was wearing the lab scientist getup that had been sent to her, completed by a set of rimmed glasses and a fake mole on her cheek that matched the fake ID they'd given her. Joey on the other hand was wearing a set of clothes that she thought of as Geek Wear, and had a whispy fake mustache. She'd also had him put his retainer on just in case.

Batty on the other hand was wearing his military uniform, having switched from the black hoodie and cargo pants he'd worn to pick them up. He was filling paperwork out with the receptionist, who Margaret was happy to see wasn't one of the ones she'd gotten to know. A bit of luck, that was all.

"So yeah. The drive from Ontario out here?" Batty was saying with a look of exhaustion that was a bit too convincing to be fake. "At three in the morning? Can't wait to go hit my bunk man."

"Yeah, I hear you there." The young soldier behind the desk said. "I hated the first few weeks on nights. But at least its quiet." He waved to Margaret and Joey, motioning them over. "Come on over guys. Just got a few things to sign before we green light your passes."

She walked over, with Joey close behind. Joey was smiling so she kept her face as stern as she could.

"Alright doc. Lemme see your badge, we'll get it authorized. It'll be limited for the first two weeks while we wait for all your checks and certs to clear. But you'll have standard access and access to the labs you need." She handed over her badge and motioned for Joey to do the same. "And while I scan these just go ahead and sign and date these for me." He gave them both clipboards. "You'll see where."

The two of them quickly scanned through the documents and signed the various lines before handing them back. The badges cleared easily enough, though she did feel her heart jump when Joeys had to be pulled and reinserted. But after that it dinged a green light too, and she resumed breathing.

The soldier took the forms and gave them a quick once over. He made one note next to one of the signatures she'd place. "Wrong spot. But that's alright." He said as he initialed and dated next to it in small print. Then he went to the last page and signed his own initial before grabbing a stamp and pressing it to the space underneath. Then the two clipboards went into a locked drawer and he handed them back their badges.

"Alright docs. Welcome to Fort Irwin's new research site. Sergeant Batista here has your room numbers and will guide you to them. Get some rest now." He said with a smile.

"Thanksh." Joey said, lisping a bit from his retainer. "Have a good night."

Batty motioned for them to follow him, scanning his own badge on the main door to unlock it.

"Here." He said pointing at their badges. "Test em out real quick." They did, and sure enough the door chimed and unlocked for each of their badges. He gave a thumbs up to the soldier who smiled and nodded in return.

"Alright." He said once they were a few yards past the doors, and the guards posted on the other side. "Easy enough right?"

"I thought you were jusht a mechanic." Joey said in a whisper. "When the hell did you become a shecret agent too?"

"Shit foo." He replied testily. "I grew up in the Houston Port favelas. I've always been shady. Now come on." He said as he began walking a bit faster. "We gotta get to the door."

"What?" Margaret asked. "What door?"

Batty looked back at her with an expression of concern. "Don't worry about it." He said. "You'll see."

\----------

"Ma'am. They're here." Said the MP she'd picked for the duty in her ear piece. "I'm green-lighting all the doors as they approach."

She turned from her computer, angling her head just enough that the cameras in the control room wouldn't see the corner of her mouth.

"Tracking." She said out of that side. "Everyone in place?" She asked. "I've got the control room set."

"We've got the door room staffed almost entirely by our people. Minimal civilians." The young woman said in return. "Are we sure about this ma'am. I like Mrs. Choi. We'd be sending her into-"

Colonel Muhammed cut her off. "It's the only way to keep the two of them out of the hands of Grant's people. He's not going to go down or stay down easily. This takes them OFF our board." She paused as she sipped at the cup of coffee on that side of her station. Using it as a cover as one of the staff members nodded at her. "And that's what Choi needs to move freely."

There was a silence on the other side. Then after a few seconds. "I know ma'am. It's just a big gamble."

"It all is." She replied as she set the coffee down. "Just make it happen."

"Yes ma'am. They're nearing the power conduit hall." Another pause. "Ah shit. Guard sweep. They're ahead of schedule, what the hell? I'll try to-"

The feed cut off as the young soldier went about whatever solution that she could. The Colonel waited patiently for something to come back over the line as she made a play of going through some notes on her screen.

"How's that supply shipment looking?" She asked one of the techs in front of her.

The grey haired Air Force member looked back and nodded eagerly. "On schedule ma'am." He said. "Should be spinning up in a few minutes. Just waiting on the last box to come from the science division."

She smiled and nodded, hiding the concern that she was actually feeling. "Good. Keep me updated."

\----------

General Krick leaned his head against the side of the MP vehicle as it bounced and rolled along the unpaved roads leading away from the secret compound. They'd already been driving for nearly an hour now and still hadn't hit the main part of the base.

He'd likely be kept there for a night, maybe even two, as the higher ups (few as they were at his level) figured out what to do with both him and Grant.

He wondered what the hell Grant had been thinking. Shooting a General? In front of a bunch of Military personnel? The nerve of the grey haired, suit wearing, civilian astounded him.

It was as these thoughts were running through his sleep deprived mind that the sat phone in the vehicles driver section went of.

"Staff Sargeant Jones. Truck N seventy four." The co-driver said as they answered. "What?..... Roger.... Understood Ma'am."

Then they turned back and unlocked the sliding section of the partition before reaching back with the phone.

"It's the Colonel sir. It's for you." He said uncertainly.

Krick reached forward with both hands still tied together and cautiously took the phone.

"General Krick." He said into the receiver.

"General. It's Colonel Gene back here at the site." The familiar voice said back. "We've got a problem."

Krick took a deep breath. "Please tell me the Petravian is still alive." He said in a sigh.

"That's the problem sir." She said, a hint of worry evident in her typically calm voice. "We're scrambling all over this facility." She paused, and Krick knew what she was going to say before even hearing it. "We can't find him."

Krick held the phone out in both hands as if it had turned into a venomous snake. To himself he simply mouthed "FUCK!" silently.

He peeked over his shoulder at the vehicle behind him.

The one that Grant was in.

"Find him Colonel." He said as he pressed the phone back to his ear. "Find him. Don't let him or any of his werewolf.... stuff... get out in the wild. I'm gonna give this phone back to the guy in the front of the car. I'm gonna need you to convince him to give me a minute with the Secretary."

"I'll.... do what I can sir." She said back. He tapped the phone on the partition and SSG Jones reached back to take it.

A few moments later both of the vehicles slowed to a halt.

Staff Sergeant Jones got out of the vehicle and opened the rear doors, letting Krick out before undoing his restraints.

"Me and the boys are going to uh... check out this flat tire we seem to have gotten unexpectedly sir." He said. "Take a minute to stretch your legs, take a piss, do... whatever."

"Thank you sergeant." He said as he stretched his arms, wincing as his ribs reminded him of the bruise there. "I won't go far."

He began walking to the rear vehicle.

\----------

James waited hesitantly as Amina came back to their room. She stopped when she saw him, sitting there with a tea set that already gone cold hours ago while he'd waited for her.

She awkwardly rushed past to her changing room.

He waited patiently. He had been doing so all day it felt like.

He hadn't even gone to see Vickers or Werner. He.... didn't really care for whatever spin they would try to put on this situation. He had more important issues to deal with.

After roughly ten minutes or so Amina emerged from the room and sat down on the edge of the bed.

"Amina." He tried to start.

"I'm not..." She cut him off. "I'm not mad James. I'm sorry if I came off that way earlier. My father isn't either, for the record."

He nodded, biting his lip a bit as he did.

"It's just-" She began again.

"It feels like a betrayal." He said before she could. "And, even more so, it's disappointing."

She nodded slowly. "That's more or less what I was going to say." She agreed.

"Especially since I've been so good about everything else." He added. "It's worse because of all the OTHER stuff I've done here."

"Yes." She said softly.

"I know." He said, just as softly. "I'm sorry."

They sat like that for a while.

"I understand why." She said finally. "Like them or not. They're your people. You've given us fair warning in the past. But... I can't imagine what it's like to be in your position. You're in the middle of two nations.... two worlds."

James simply gave a small nod.

"I don't know how I'd act in that setting." She admitted. "It's a lot of pressure."

"Yeah." He agreed, head hanging a little.

There was another long silence that hung over them both.

James broke it first.

"I..." He began. "I forget sometimes... that this isn't my world." He looked down at his left hand. "Sometimes I say something... some reference from home... and you guys look at me like a weirdo and it reminds me that I'm not there anymore. Or I get a message from mom and Joey. Or see some new kind of person out and about." He looked at her and held up his hand. "And then you hold my hand. And it reminds me that this IS my home now. And.... I have to remember that too."

She was about to go over to him when the door banged three times.

"Choi!" The familiar voice of Vickers yelled. "Something's up in the summoning room! Come on!"

"What the fuck?" He asked as the two of them looked over, the seriousness of their conversation temporarily set aside.

\----------

Despite his assurance that he would be fine from the Goddess, Dranek could not help but be more than a little concerned at his current situation.

For one thing, it was noisy in the metal contraption they'd moved him into. There was a loud whirring noise that he assumed came from the massive metal blades up above the thing as they'd moved him into it. The jostling up and down as it moved told him that he had to be in some kind of flying contraption. Though how it worked he couldn't fathom.

He was also strapped to the table again. Only this time they'd put a cover over it made of metal bars.

And he could smell the silver in both it, and the metal weapons that the two soldiers in the "room" of the vehicle with him. Plus a million chemicals and odors beside, including the piece of heavily salted meat that he assumed one of the people he'd scented in the front of the craft was eating.

They'd prepared this time.

He had to worry a little bit as the craft moved toward the sunrise that he could see outside of the small windows on the side, through the bars of his container.

Patience my child. The goddess whispered into his mind.

I know goddess. But these odds seem somewhat... stacked against me.

They have been since the moment you died dear Dranek. Have faith.

In a silver lined container, surrounded by silver armed guards, in some kind of flying death machine heading to who knew where, all he could do, was have faith.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x49rz6/wait_is_this_just_gate_220/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (219/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hmmm.... maybe certain people are smarter than they seem sometimes.

Enjoy.

\~

Margaret and Joey both followed Batty as he escorted them through the security checkpoint. Margaret was doing everything she could to avoid sweating, not wanting to give up the ruse. Joey on the other hand was practically beaming. She'd told him that he needed to pretend like he was in one of the old Mission Impossible movies that he and his father both loved for some reason. He'd taken to it like it was a game.

She was wearing the lab scientist getup that had been sent to her, completed by a set of rimmed glasses and a fake mole on her cheek that matched the fake ID they'd given her. Joey on the other hand was wearing a set of clothes that she thought of as Geek Wear, and had a whispy fake mustache. She'd also had him put his retainer on just in case.

Batty on the other hand was wearing his military uniform, having switched from the black hoodie and cargo pants he'd worn to pick them up. He was filling paperwork out with the receptionist, who Margaret was happy to see wasn't one of the ones she'd gotten to know. A bit of luck, that was all.

"So yeah. The drive from Ontario out here?" Batty was saying with a look of exhaustion that was a bit too convincing to be fake. "At three in the morning? Can't wait to go hit my bunk man."

"Yeah, I hear you there." The young soldier behind the desk said. "I hated the first few weeks on nights. But at least its quiet." He waved to Margaret and Joey, motioning them over. "Come on over guys. Just got a few things to sign before we green light your passes."

She walked over, with Joey close behind. Joey was smiling so she kept her face as stern as she could.

"Alright doc. Lemme see your badge, we'll get it authorized. It'll be limited for the first two weeks while we wait for all your checks and certs to clear. But you'll have standard access and access to the labs you need." She handed over her badge and motioned for Joey to do the same. "And while I scan these just go ahead and sign and date these for me." He gave them both clipboards. "You'll see where."

The two of them quickly scanned through the documents and signed the various lines before handing them back. The badges cleared easily enough, though she did feel her heart jump when Joeys had to be pulled and reinserted. But after that it dinged a green light too, and she resumed breathing.

The soldier took the forms and gave them a quick once over. He made one note next to one of the signatures she'd place. "Wrong spot. But that's alright." He said as he initialed and dated next to it in small print. Then he went to the last page and signed his own initial before grabbing a stamp and pressing it to the space underneath. Then the two clipboards went into a locked drawer and he handed them back their badges.

"Alright docs. Welcome to Fort Irwin's new research site. Sergeant Batista here has your room numbers and will guide you to them. Get some rest now." He said with a smile.

"Thanksh." Joey said, lisping a bit from his retainer. "Have a good night."

Batty motioned for them to follow him, scanning his own badge on the main door to unlock it.

"Here." He said pointing at their badges. "Test em out real quick." They did, and sure enough the door chimed and unlocked for each of their badges. He gave a thumbs up to the soldier who smiled and nodded in return.

"Alright." He said once they were a few yards past the doors, and the guards posted on the other side. "Easy enough right?"

"I thought you were jusht a mechanic." Joey said in a whisper. "When the hell did you become a shecret agent too?"

"Shit foo." He replied testily. "I grew up in the Houston Port favelas. I've always been shady. Now come on." He said as he began walking a bit faster. "We gotta get to the door."

"What?" Margaret asked. "What door?"

Batty looked back at her with an expression of concern. "Don't worry about it." He said. "You'll see."

\----------

"Ma'am. They're here." Said the MP she'd picked for the duty in her ear piece. "I'm green-lighting all the doors as they approach."

She turned from her computer, angling her head just enough that the cameras in the control room wouldn't see the corner of her mouth.

"Tracking." She said out of that side. "Everyone in place?" She asked. "I've got the control room set."

"We've got the door room staffed almost entirely by our people. Minimal civilians." The young woman said in return. "Are we sure about this ma'am. I like Mrs. Choi. We'd be sending her into-"

Colonel Muhammed cut her off. "It's the only way to keep the two of them out of the hands of Grant's people. He's not going to go down or stay down easily. This takes them OFF our board." She paused as she sipped at the cup of coffee on that side of her station. Using it as a cover as one of the staff members nodded at her. "And that's what Choi needs to move freely."

There was a silence on the other side. Then after a few seconds. "I know ma'am. It's just a big gamble."

"It all is." She replied as she set the coffee down. "Just make it happen."

"Yes ma'am. They're nearing the power conduit hall." Another pause. "Ah shit. Guard sweep. They're ahead of schedule, what the hell? I'll try to-
"

The feed cut off as the young soldier went about whatever solution that she could. The Colonel waited patiently for something to come back over the line as she made a play of going through some notes on her screen.

"How's that supply shipment looking?" She asked one of the techs in front of her.

The grey haired Air Force member looked back and nodded eagerly. "On schedule ma'am." He said. "Should be spinning up in a few minutes. Just waiting on the last box to come from the science division."

She smiled and nodded, hiding the concern that she was actually feeling. "Good. Keep me updated."

\----------

General Krick leaned his head against the side of the MP vehicle as it bounced and rolled along the unpaved roads leading away from the secret compound. They'd already been driving for nearly an hour now and still hadn't hit the main part of the base.

He'd likely be kept there for a night, maybe even two, as the higher ups (few as they were at his level) figured out what to do with both him and Grant.

He wondered what the hell Grant had been thinking. Shooting a General? In front of a bunch of Military personnel? The nerve of the grey haired, suit wearing, civilian astounded him.

It was as these thoughts were running through his sleep deprived mind that the sat phone in the vehicles driver section went of.

"Staff Sargeant Jones. Truck N seventy four." The co-driver said as they answered. "What?..... Roger.... Understood Ma'am."

Then they turned back and unlocked the sliding section of the partition before reaching back with the phone.

"It's the Colonel sir. It's for you." He said uncertainly.

Krick reached forward with both hands still tied together and cautiously took the phone.

"General Krick." He said into the receiver.

"General. It's Colonel Gene back here at the site." The familiar voice said back. "We've got a problem."

Krick took a deep breath. "Please tell me the Petravian is still alive." He said in a sigh.

"That's the problem sir." She said, a hint of worry evident in her typically calm voice. "We're scrambling all over this facility." She paused, and Krick knew what she was going to say before even hearing it. "We can't find him."

Krick held the phone out in both hands as if it had turned into a venomous snake. To himself he simply mouthed "FUCK!" silently.

He peeked over his shoulder at the vehicle behind him.

The one that Grant was in.

"Find him Colonel." He said as he pressed the phone back to his ear. "Find him. Don't let him or any of his werewolf.... stuff... get out in the wild. I'm gonna give this phone back to the guy in the front of the car. I'm gonna need you to convince him to give me a minute with the Secretary."

"I'll.... do what I can sir." She said back. He tapped the phone on the partition and SSG Jones reached back to take it.

A few moments later both of the vehicles slowed to a halt.

Staff Sergeant Jones got out of the vehicle and opened the rear doors, letting Krick out before undoing his restraints.

"Me and the boys are going to uh... check out this flat tire we seem to have gotten unexpectedly sir." He said. "Take a minute to stretch your legs, take a piss, do... whatever."

"Thank you sergeant." He said as he stretched his arms, wincing as his ribs reminded him of the bruise there. "I won't go far."

He began walking to the rear vehicle.

\------------------

James waited hesitantly as Amina came back to their room. She stopped when she saw him, sitting there with a tea set that already gone cold hours ago while he'd waited for her.

She awkwardly rushed past to her changing room.

He waited patiently. He had been doing so all day it felt like.

He hadn't even gone to see Vickers or Werner. He.... didn't really care for whatever spin they would try to put on this situation. He had more important issues to deal with.

After roughly ten minutes or so Amina emerged from the room and sat down on the edge of the bed.

"Amina." He tried to start.

"I'm not..." She cut him off. "I'm not mad James. I'm sorry if I came off that way earlier. My father isn't either, for the record."

He nodded, biting his lip a bit as he did.

"It's just-" She began again.

"It feels like a betrayal." He said before she could. "And, even more so, it's disappointing."

She nodded slowly. "That's more or less what I was going to say." She agreed.

"Especially since I've been so good about everything else." He added. "It's worse because of all the OTHER stuff I've done here."

"Yes." She said softly.

"I know." He said, just as softly. "I'm sorry."

They sat like that for a while.

"I understand why." She said finally. "Like them or not. They're your people. You've given us fair warning in the past. But... I can't imagine what it's like to be in your position. You're in the middle of two nations.... two worlds."

James simply gave a small nod.

"I don't know how I'd act in that setting." She admitted. "It's a lot of pressure."

"Yeah." He agreed, head hanging a little.

There was another long silence that hung over them both.

James broke it first.

"I..." He began. "I forget sometimes... that this isn't my world." He looked down at his left hand. "Sometimes I say something... some reference from home... and you guys look at me like a weirdo and it reminds me that I'm not there anymore. Or I get a message from mom and Joey. Or see some new kind of person out and about." He looked at her and held up his hand. "And then you hold my hand. And it reminds me that this IS my home now. And.... I have to remember that too."

She was about to go over to him when the door banged three times.

"Choi!" The familiar voice of Vickers yelled. "Something's up in the summoning room! Come on!"

"What the fuck?" He asked as the two of them looked over, the seriousness of their conversation temporarily set aside.

\----------

Despite his assurance that he would be fine from the Goddess, Dranek could not help but be more than a little concerned at his current situation.

For one thing, it was noisy in the metal contraption they'd moved him into. There was a loud whirring noise that he assumed came from the massive metal blades up above the thing as they'd moved him into it. The jostling up and down as it moved told him that he had to be in some kind of flying contraption. Though how it worked he couldn't fathom.

He was also strapped to the table again. Only this time they'd put a cover over it made of metal bars.

And he could smell the silver in both it, and the metal weapons that the two soldiers in the "room" of the vehicle with him. Plus a million chemicals and odors beside, including the piece of heavily salted meat that he assumed one of the people he'd scented in the front of the craft was eating.

They'd prepared this time.

He had to worry a little bit as the craft moved toward the sunrise that he could see outside of the small windows on the side, through the bars of his container.

Patience my child. The goddess whispered into his mind.

I know goddess. But these odds seem somewhat... stacked against me.

They have been since the moment you died dear Dranek. Have faith.

In a silver lined container, surrounded by silver armed guards, in some kind of flying death machine heading to who knew where, all he could do, was have faith.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x49q5g/wait_is_this_just_gate_220/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (218/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Things don't go the way people expect them to. Also I've come to a decision. Secretary Grant is Matthew McConaughey (specifically wolf of wallstreet version).

ALSO... chill yall, James has stuff handled. But emotions gonna emotion. There aint gotta be logic to em. Be patient. That story will progress.Just not this chapter.

ENJOY!!!

\~

General Krick walked into the compound calmly, swiftly, and with his head up and eyes locked dead ahead.

Behind him walked Comand Sergeant Major Herbert Vendermeyer and Colonel Patricia Gene. Behind them walked four of the base MP's, each carrying a rifle or shotgun. General Krick himself had a pistol on his hip.

He signaled to them as they neared the door and they stopped. He pulled out his phone and pulled up the message he'd already prepared for Colonel Muhammed.

>Everything must go.

Then he hit send.

He stepped into the room to see Secretary Grant standing in the middle of the control room. The room was filled with technicians, soldiers, airmen, sailors, and even a few marines. There were also the two guards that were standard for the room to have, each of them posted up behind the Secretary with their weapons already in hand.

"General." Grant said with a smile. "Didn't expect you so soon."

"Where is he?" Krick asked, ignoring the games.

"Where's who?" Grant shot back.

"Don't fuck around Grant." The General replied through a clenched jaw. He longed for one of his smokes. "Where is the Petravian prisoner."

"That's SECRETARY Grant... General."

"Not for long." Krick retorted. "I've spoken with the other Generals, and the Secretary of State." He turned to look at the other people in the room. "And... the President himself."

Grant's otherwise happy facade slipped a bit.

"Did you now?" He asked.

"Oh yes." Krick replied. "We had a little virtual meeting this morning while I was flying. And it would SEEM!" He yelled so everyone would hear. "That they were unaware.... of the abduction and abuse of a man.... more or less... who is a citizen of what is functionally an allied nation."

The staff of the room began to murmur and whisper at the news.

"It seems that SECRETARY Grant... overstepped a bit. And has put our nation.... NO!... OUR WORLD... at risk of conflict with a people who SHOULD be our friends and allies." He looked "And in doing so. He has put at risk EVERY SINGLE PERSON we have over there right now!"

BANG!

General Krick staggered back against the wall as everyone else in the room instinctively ducked. The General looked shocked as he clamped his hand to his chest.

In Grant's hand was a pistol with a smoking barrel.

"Stand down soldiers!" Grant said over his shoulder to the two guards, who'd quickly moved to cover and had their rifles aimed at the secretary.

"You fucking shot me?" Krick asked incredulously.

"PUT THE WEAPON DOWN SIR!" One of the guards demanded.

Grant slowly turned, pistol hanging by its trigger guard.

"RELAX!" He exclaimed as he turned. The doors next to Krick opened quickly as the MP's he'd brought with him rushed in, weapons aimed at the Secretary. The two room guards aimed at them momentarily before seeing the MP sleeves on their uniforms. Behind them the CSM and Colonel both peered cautiously around the door edge.

"DROP IT MISTER SECRETARY!" One of the MP's yelled.

Grant slowly lowered the pistol to the ground, keeping his other hand up as he did. "Everyone just be cool." He said calmly. "I'm your superior here. Remember that. Secretary of Defense outranks any General. Especially ones trying to mutiny."

"Well than it's a lucky thing that none of those are here." Krick said as he stood back up to his full height. Grant turned to look at him, eyes wide. "And that you're not actually Secretary of Defense any more."

He opened his uniform shirt a bit and pressed his hand underneath. He grunted, then after rummaging about under his shirt for a moment, pulled out a metal box. There was a small hole just off center of it. His expression soured. He tapped it to his chest just above the bullet hole. It made a metallic ringing noise as it impacted.

"I wasn't dumb enough not to wear a set of ballistic under armor to this. You fucking asshole." He said angrily to Grant. "But did you have to shoot my smokes too?" He gestured to the MP's. "Former Secretary of Defense Grant. You are hereby placed under arrest for violation of a standing political treaty with an allied nation, and the crimes involved. As well as inhumane treatment of a prisoner, gross misuse of military funds and material, and breaking of international quarantine procedures relating to undetermined lifeforms from foreign nations." He sighed, wincing as his now bruised ribs moved. "And fuck it. Might as well toss a charge of attempted murder on their."

"Oh." Grant began as the MP sergeant kicked the pistol away and grabbed Grant's arms. "Breaking quarantine? Really? Throwing that on the pile too?"

Krick ignored him as he turned to the other people in the room. "The rest of you are on base arrest until an investigation can determine culpability in these actions. Sorry guys." He said with genuine upset. "Can't bring down someone that high up without some collateral."

Then he turned to the remaining three MP's and held his hands out.

One of them stepped forward and positioned a set of zip-tie restraints around his wrists before tightening them.

I played my part in this bullshit too. He thought as he and Grant were lead out of the room. And here I was hoping to get somewhere with these stars.

He nodded to Colonel Gene as he passed her. "Take good care of our guest." He said simply. "We'll need him on our side if we're going to salvage our relationship with the Petravians."

"We've got this sir." She said. "Good luck."

\----------

Nguyen tilted his head down a little and pretended to scratch his nose. "We set?" He asked into his jacket collar.

"All set here." Isaacs responded, the voice playing in the piercing he had in his upper ear.

"Tent squads set." Another voice chimed in.

"Boxes five and seven set. Evac ready." The doctor said just as Nguyen began moving forward.

He had to at least play like he was greeting them.

"Sergeant!" He exclaimed. "How are you? Back so fast? The Dunebashers must have things buttoned up nicely."

Sergeant Vhiner'ys stared at him dispassionately from behind his helmet's faceguard.

"Camp leader." He said coldly. "How have things been since we left?" He asked. "Had any visitors?"

Nguyen thought for a moment. Then he shrugged. "One of your men stopped by a few days back. Said he was heading back to town. Wouldn't say why though."

"Did he now?" He shot back. "Go by the name of Dranek? Have a bunch of shiny metal teeth."

"Yes he did." Nguyen replied. "Seemed a touch cold to me. Distant. But that's to be expected from a branded wolf. Nice enough with all that aside."

"And he left here did he?" Vhiner'ys asked, his head tilting just a touch as he did. "On his own... two... feet?"

"Gonna be a slight problem boss." Isaacs said into his ear.

He nodded, with a slightly confused look on his face. "Yeah? Why?"

"Because I have reason to believe otherwise." The Sergeant said simply.

Nguyen just stared at him. "Yeah?" He asked. With the hand resting on his waist he pointed his last three fingers at the ground. "Like?"

"Uuuuh... Boss?" He heard in his ear again.

Vhiner'ys walked up close enough that Nguyen could smell his sweat. It had a faint hint of something sweet, almost like vanilla.

"Eye... witness... account." He said slowly.

"What the hell is going on out there?" The doctor said. "What is that noise."

"Witness to what exactly?" Nguyen asked, sweating a little now. He wondered what the hell was going on as Vhiner'ys slowly stepped back a few steps, hand already on the haft of his warhammer, ready to pull it from his back.

"I think you know." He said as he slowly pulled the hammer off his back and rested it on the ground.

"You don't want to do that." Nguyen said as his hand dug under his robe for the pistol hidden there.

Suddenly the sand beneath his feet shifted. Something sharp pressed into his back, just below the shoulder blade.

"I wouldn't do that if I was you lad." Said a familiar, dwarvish, voice from behind him. Nguyen looked back to see Sherk shaking sand off of his head. "Jina here has a very light trigger. Wouldn't want her to go off and give you a similar send off as old Dranek got. Though she aint quite as messy as that was."

Nguyen slowly pulled his hand away from his back and raised both of them.

"I don't know what you're talking about." He said icily.

Vhiner'ys smirked at that. "Maybe not." He said. "But according to the story we heard," He tilted his head, drawing Nguyen's attention to something nearby. "He might."

Nguyen looked, and his eyes went wide as he saw Isaacs' head sticking out of the ground. It reminded him of when he and his brothers had buried each other in the sand as kids.

"So bout them problems I was trying to tell you about." Isaacs said dryly.

Danil was standing over him, with a pair of small crossbows aimed at the security chief's head.

"He's the one." Danil said. "Seen it with my own eyes." He gestured with one of the crossbows. "Send your other wolf over that dune there. Bet you find a mess somewhere."

Vhiner'ys looked over his shoulder at the formation and nodded to the other werewolf among them. The wolf nodded back and began jogging off in the indicated direction.

Nguyen looked back and saw other members of his crew being moved out of the tents they'd been waiting in. The dwarves were walking behind them, holding their hands out, as the soldiers were moved through the sand. They were all buried up to their necks, just like Isaacs, and the dwarves were all cloudy with falling sand.

Well. Nguyen thought. Can't exactly account for that.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x3kgq2/wait_is_this_just_gate_219/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (218/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Things don't go the way people expect them to. Also I've come to a decision. Secretary Grant is Matthew McConaughey (specifically wolf of wallstreet version).

ALSO... chill yall, James has stuff handled. But emotions gonna emotion. There aint gotta be logic to em. Be patient. That story will progress.

^(Just not this chapter.)

ENJOY!!!

\~

General Krick walked into the compound calmly, swiftly, and with his head up and eyes locked dead ahead.

Behind him walked Command Sergeant Major Herbert Vendermeyer and Colonel Patricia Gene. Behind them walked four of the base MP's, each carrying a rifle or shotgun. General Krick himself had a pistol on his hip.

He signaled to them as they neared the door and they stopped. He pulled out his phone and pulled up the message he'd already prepared for Colonel Muhammed.

>Everything must go.

Then he hit send.

He stepped into the room to see Secretary Grant standing in the middle of the control room. The room was filled with technicians, soldiers, airmen, sailors, and even a few marines. There were also the two guards that were standard for the room to have, each of them posted up behind the Secretary with their weapons already in hand.

"General." Grant said with a smile. "Didn't expect you so soon."

"Where is he?" Krick asked, ignoring the games.

"Where's who?" Grant shot back.

"Don't fuck around Grant." The General replied through a clenched jaw. He longed for one of his smokes. "Where is the Petravian prisoner."

"That's SECRETARY Grant... General."

"Not for long." Krick retorted. "I've spoken with the other Generals, and the Secretary of State." He turned to look at the other people in the room. "And... the President himself."

Grant's otherwise happy facade slipped a bit.

"Did you now?" He asked.

"Oh yes." Krick replied. "We had a little virtual meeting this morning while I was flying. And it would SEEM!" He yelled so everyone would hear. "That they were unaware.... of the abduction and abuse of a man.... more or less... who is a citizen of what is functionally an allied nation."

The staff of the room began to murmur and whisper at the news.

"It seems that SECRETARY Grant... overstepped a bit. And has put our nation.... NO!... OUR WORLD... at risk of conflict with a people who SHOULD be our friends and allies." He looked "And in doing so. He has put at risk EVERY SINGLE PERSON we have over there right now!"

BANG!

General Krick staggered back against the wall as everyone else in the room instinctively ducked. The General looked shocked as he clamped his hand to his chest.

In Grant's hand was a pistol with a smoking barrel.

"Stand down soldiers!" Grant said over his shoulder to the two guards, who'd quickly moved to cover and had their rifles aimed at the secretary.

"You fucking shot me?" Krick asked incredulously.

"PUT THE WEAPON DOWN SIR!" One of the guards demanded.

Grant slowly turned, pistol hanging by its trigger guard.

"RELAX!" He exclaimed as he turned. The doors next to Krick opened quickly as the MP's he'd brought with him rushed in, weapons aimed at the Secretary. The two room guards aimed at them momentarily before seeing the MP sleeves on their uniforms. Behind them the CSM and Colonel both peered cautiously around the door edge.

"DROP IT MISTER SECRETARY!" One of the MP's yelled.

Grant slowly lowered the pistol to the ground, keeping his other hand up as he did. "Everyone just be cool." He said calmly. "I'm your superior here. Remember that. Secretary of Defense outranks any General. Especially ones trying to mutiny."

"Well than it's a lucky thing that none of those are here." Krick said as he stood back up to his full height. Grant turned to look at him, eyes wide. "And that you're not actually Secretary of Defense any more."

He opened his uniform shirt a bit and pressed his hand underneath. He grunted, then after rummaging about under his shirt for a moment, pulled out a metal box. There was a small hole just off center of it. His expression soured. He tapped it to his chest just above the bullet hole. It made a metallic ringing noise as it impacted.

"I wasn't dumb enough not to wear a set of ballistic under armor to this. You fucking asshole." He said angrily to Grant. "But did you have to shoot my smokes too?" He gestured to the MP's. "Former Secretary of Defense Grant. You are hereby placed under arrest for violation of a standing political treaty with an allied nation, and the crimes involved. As well as inhumane treatment of a prisoner, gross misuse of military funds and material, and breaking of international quarantine procedures relating to undetermined lifeforms from foreign nations." He sighed, wincing as his now bruised ribs moved. "And fuck it. Might as well toss a charge of attempted murder on there."

"Oh." Grant began as the MP sergeant kicked the pistol away and grabbed Grant's arms. "Breaking quarantine? Really? Throwing that on the pile too?"

Krick ignored him as he turned to the other people in the room. "The rest of you are on base arrest until an investigation can determine culpability in these actions. Sorry guys." He said with genuine upset. "Can't bring down someone that high up without some collateral."

Then he turned to the remaining three MP's and held his hands out.

One of them stepped forward and positioned a set of zip-tie restraints around his wrists before tightening them.

I played my part in this bullshit too. He thought as he and Grant were lead out of the room. And here I was hoping to get somewhere with these stars.

He nodded to Colonel Gene as he passed her. "Take good care of our guest." He said simply. "We'll need him on our side if we're going to salvage our relationship with the Petravians."

"We've got this sir." She said. "Good luck."

\----------

Nguyen tilted his head down a little and pretended to scratch his nose. "We set?" He asked into his jacket collar.

"All set here." Isaacs responded, the voice playing in the piercing he had in his upper ear.

"Tent squads set." Another voice chimed in.

"Boxes five and seven set. Evac ready." The doctor said just as Nguyen began moving forward.

He had to at least play like he was greeting them.

"Sergeant!" He exclaimed. "How are you? Back so fast? The Dunebashers must have things buttoned up nicely."

Sergeant Vhiner'ys stared at him dispassionately from behind his helmet's faceguard.

"Camp leader." He said coldly. "How have things been since we left?" He asked. "Had any visitors?"

Nguyen thought for a moment. Then he shrugged. "One of your men stopped by a few days back. Said he was heading back to town. Wouldn't say why though."

"Did he now?" He shot back. "Go by the name of Dranek? Have a bunch of shiny metal teeth."

"Yes he did." Nguyen replied. "Seemed a touch cold to me. Distant. But that's to be expected from a branded wolf. Nice enough with all that aside."

"And he left here did he?" Vhiner'ys asked, his head tilting just a touch as he did. "On his own... two... feet?"

"Gonna be a slight problem boss." Isaacs said into his ear.

He nodded, with a slightly confused look on his face. "Yeah? Why?"

"Because I have reason to believe otherwise." The Sergeant said simply.

Nguyen just stared at him. "Yeah?" He asked. With the hand resting on his waist he pointed his last three fingers at the ground. "Like?"

"Uuuuh... Boss?" He heard in his ear again.

Vhiner'ys walked up close enough that Nguyen could smell his sweat. It had a faint hint of something sweet, almost like vanilla.

"Eye... witness... account." He said slowly.

"What the hell is going on out there?" The doctor said. "What is that noise."

"Witness to what exactly?" Nguyen asked, sweating a little now. He wondered what the hell was going on as Vhiner'ys slowly stepped back a few steps, hand already on the haft of his warhammer, ready to pull it from his back.

"I think you know." He said as he slowly pulled the hammer off his back and rested it on the ground.

"You don't want to do that." Nguyen said as his hand dug under his robe for the pistol hidden there.

Suddenly the sand beneath his feet shifted. Something sharp pressed into his back, just below the shoulder blade.

"I wouldn't do that if I was you lad." Said a familiar, dwarvish, voice from behind him. Nguyen looked back to see Sherk shaking sand off of his head. "Jina here has a very light trigger. Wouldn't want her to go off and give you a similar send off as old Dranek got. Though she aint quite as messy as that was."

Nguyen slowly pulled his hand away from his back and raised both of them.

"I don't know what you're talking about." He said icily.

Vhiner'ys smirked at that. "Maybe not." He said. "But according to the story we heard," He tilted his head, drawing Nguyen's attention to something nearby. "He might."

Nguyen looked, and his eyes went wide as he saw Isaacs' head sticking out of the ground. It reminded him of when he and his brothers had buried each other in the sand as kids.

"So bout them problems I was trying to tell you about." Isaacs said dryly.

Danil was standing over him, with a pair of small crossbows aimed at the security chief's head.

"He's the one." Danil said. "Seen it with my own eyes." He gestured with one of the crossbows. "Send your other wolf over that dune there. Bet you find a mess somewhere."

Vhiner'ys looked over his shoulder at the formation and nodded to the other werewolf among them. The wolf nodded back and began jogging off in the indicated direction.

Nguyen looked back and saw other members of his crew being moved out of the tents they'd been waiting in. The dwarves were walking behind them, holding their hands out, as the soldiers were moved through the sand. They were all buried up to their necks, just like Isaacs, and the dwarves were all cloudy with falling sand.

Well. Nguyen thought. Can't exactly account for that.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x3jsd2/wait_is_this_just_gate_219/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (217/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look. Things get more complex. Haha. Awesome.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Slowly, Joey began to sit upright, rubbing the sleep from his eyes as he did. "What's going..... on?" He yawned.

"There's something going on with James." She said. From downstairs she heard the front door unlock. "We have to go."

"Mrs. DeLaRosa?" The deep voice called from downstairs.

"Who's that?" Joey asked.

"Mrs. Dela-RRRRGGHHH!" The person said before being cut off by some kind of popping noise.

"Who the fu-!" Another voice she hadn't heard asked before she heard what sounded like a punch, followed by a loud crashing noise.

"Mom? What's happening?" Joey asked, suddenly wide awake. "Who is that?"

"Something involving your brother and the other side." She said matter of factly. "Movie type spy stuff." She added, playing to Joey's way of thinking of things.

"What? Are they trying to mess with Jamesy?" He asked.

"I think so." She said. "Either way, I think the General was ready for something like this. Now get dressed we need to move. Three minutes okay Jojo?"

Joey nodded and immediately got up and grabbed his jeans from off the floor.

While he was dressing she went to the top of the stairs.

"Batty?" She whispered down. "Sergeant Batty?"

"Yeah. I'm good Mrs. Choi." He called up from below. He grunted. "Just moving these idiots into your bathroom."

"What happened?" She asked. "Everything okay?"

"Coupla MP's." He responded. "Tazed one, kicked the other through your broom closet. All good, gimme a few and I'll have em hogtied and out of the way."

"What did I get myself into?" She asked herself as she turned to check on her son.

Just as she did the door to Joey's room opened and he stepped out, wearing jeans, his dark blue hoodie, and carrying his backpack.

"What's that?" She asked. "We've got everything we need." She said, pointing to the duffel bag with the supplies and some clothes.

"It's just stuff for Jamesy." Joey said with a smile as he looked down the stares curiously. "Mostly ideas and things about his powers and Steve. Plus...." He whispered as he looked away. She thought that she might see him blushing if it weren't so dark. "I wrote a speech for his and Amina's wedding. I know we can't go there, but he said he'd put us on camera."

Margaret cradled her son's face in her hands and turned him to look at her. He looked her in the eye for just a second. But it was enough.

"He's going to love it mijo." She said with a smile. "No need to be ashamed of something that nice. Now let's go."

She led him downstairs just in time for Batty to emerge from the bathroom, sweat running down the side of his face.

"I am out of shape." He said to himself. Then he noticed them coming down the stairs. "Ah there's the Jo-Star!" He said, beaming with a smile.

"Batty?" Joey asked, recognizing him from a trip he'd taken to visit his brother during spring break years before. "Corporal Batista? What are you doing here?"

Batty smiled. "It's Sergeant now dude." He looked down, suddenly somber. "Well, former Sergeant anyways." He gestured for them to follow him. "Come on." He said as the smile returned. ""We got a long night ahead. I'll tell you what I can on the way."

\------------------------------

"I'm not speaking to you as a soldier right now. And definitely not a General." General Krick said on James's phone, which was propped up on the King's desk.

Amina stood with her back against the door, keeping it shut while also listening for any potential eavesdroppers. James sat opposite of the King with his head in his hands. On the screen the General was sitting in what James thought was probably his car, or at least a car. And he was wearing a simple dress shirt instead of his uniform. King Farrick was listening intently.

"In fact, telling you this might just get me shot for treason." The General continued. He took a deep breath, wiping his brow as he did. "Secretary Grant.... has abducted one of your people. He is one of your soldiers, and a werewolf." The General said as flatly as he could.

The King sat up straight, looming over the phone with a look that James had only ever seen on Drill Sergeants in training, and even then only when someone had fucked up with weapon safety.

"How has this happened?" He asked sternly. "How can he abduct someone when we have the summoning room guarded every second of every day?

General Krick winced and shook his head.

"He has.... a... tertiary site." The General said with great difficulty. "As in our THIRD site where we've managed to open doors to your world. The second one was how Vickers got through. Primarily as a test of our ability to do so independent of your summoning room and any lingering effects it may have."

King Farrick remained silent, simply cocking an eyebrow up in response.

"When Vickers gave up the goose we scrambled it." The General continued. "We had the team there go dark and relocate. But we already knew that we could open up doors of our own." He dipped his head. "They set up a camp and waited for the scheduled opening of a third door. Apparently it worked."

"You've known this the whole time? And you've kept it to yourself?" King Farrick asked.

General Krick nodded slowly. "We have." He admitted.

King Farrick looked up above the phone. "I was talking to Captain Choi." He said gravely.

James looked up at the King, only partly surprised at the statement.

He could feel Amina's eyes burning into his back from where she was standing at the door.

He hung his head. "I....." He began hesitantly. "I had my suspicions." He admitted. "I never said it out loud. But I let Vickers know that I didn't believe the story." He shook his head as he looked at the ground. "But I never asked for confirmation because... I don't think I wanted it."

He heard the small , sharp, inhalation behind him. It was quiet, and he suspected hidden behind a hand. But he couldn't turn to face her.

"Who is it?" King Farrick asked, already moving past the uncomfortable subject. "Do you have a name?"

"Not yet." The General answered. "All I know is that apparently he has a brand and metal teeth."

"An outcast?" The King mused, hand on his chin. "In the royal army?... That at least narrows it down."

There was a long silence as the two leaders pondered their next steps. Their next words.

"I..." The General began, breaking the silence. "DON'T... want a war between our people." He admitted. "I never have. I.... have seen my people.... my military... at its worst." He shook his head. "I fought my way to the rank I'm at because I wanted to change this Army. To prevent it from being the thing it was going forward. That's why I snagged this command from my compatriots when it came across my desk. I know that, given this new information, my word probably isn't worth much right now."

The King remained silent.

"But I am going to do what I can to prevent this from getting any worse than it already has." General Krick finished. He paused to rub his eyes for a moment. Then he looked up, past the camera on his own phone. "No guarantees I'll survive it though. My career definitely won't."

"I'll... keep all of that in mind." The King said slowly. "But if Grant is willing to go THAT far, then I fear things will have to get burned a little more before they forge proper steel."

The General considered the words. "We have a, somewhat, similar saying." His hand moved toward his camera. "Good luck sir... Captain Choi." He said before killing his connection.

The room remained awkwardly silent for several long seconds that seemed to drag on. The King simply stared at James for all of it before finally speaking.

"This is a most unfortunate reveal." He said at last. "If you have any hope of staying in," He looked past James toward the door, James glanced over his shoulder. "ANYONE'S good graces. I would suggest that you help us deal with the aftermath."

James nodded, knowing that there wasn't much he could say that would help the situation. "I will sir." He said quietly. "I'm sorry."

"In the future." The King said, also quietly. "Be a better man."

James just nodded again.

The King turned to look at Amina fully. "We have a lot of work ahead of us." He said. "Find out where this has occurred.

Amina nodded. Then she turned and stormed out of the door, leaving James where he was.

\----------

"Isaacs you cleaned the spot it happened at right?" Nguyen asked as the two of them looked through the binoculars.

"Yeah." Isaacs responded, lowering his. "Threw a bunch of old meat trimmings from the kitchen all over it then mixxed the sand up real well and covered it. If anyone went looking it'd just look like the guy had found a spot and had dinner."

"Well...." Nguyen replied. "Either they didn't fall for that brilliant bit of subterfuge." He lowered his binoculars too. "Or they take tea very seriously."

On a dune nearly half a mile away the cohort of Petravian soldiers was marching toward them in formation. Not the rag tag mess of soldiers walking at a free pace that they'd been in when they'd passed through the first time, but an actual rank and file formation.

They'd been able to see the shields and swords at the front. The spears in the middle. And the archers and, what he assumed were, casters in the back.

Sergeant Vhiner'ys was leading them from the front.

He was wearing his helmet with the visor down.

"Tell the civ staff to get in the boxes that have a door." He said without looking at Isaacs. "Military personnel get armed and armored and take up positions in the tents. Keep covered until shit goes pear shaped."

"Got it." Isaacs said.

He was about to move to follow the command but Nguyen stooped him with a hand.

"Glasses on and keep that fifty aimed at the other wolf." He said. "He's your first target. Anyone using magic is next. Their sarge is third."

"Eyes in the sky style?" Isaacs asked. Nguyen nodded. "Roger." He said in response.

Nguyen turned to follow him back to the camp.

\----------

"Why are you so calm?" Doctor Regina Melendez asked.

"Will panicking help my situation?" Dranek asked in return. "I don't see how it could."

"Hmmm. I suppose not." She admitted. "Still. You're... well, let's be honest, a prisoner on a different world than the one you're accustomed to. That's stressful."

"It is." He agreed. "But I am confident in my escape. My survival."

"Why is that?" She asked. "Even now you're strapped to a chair and wearing a muzzle. Inside a glass room surrounded by guards. How can you be so confident?"

Dranek looked around, glad to finally be able to move his head a bit. He looked at the guards, four of them, arrayed around the glass and metal box that he was in with the doctor, even if she was separated from him by another wall of glass herself.

She was something called a "\[Psychiatrist\]" though she'd explained that that simply meant that she was a doctor who specialized in healing the mind and emotions.

Dranek knew what she really was. She was the soft interrogator. And if he didn't work WITH her, then the next person they sent to ask questions wouldn't be so soft. They would be the one who dealt in pain.

And he doubted they would be a doctor too.

Dranek took a deep sniff of the air.

"For starters." He said as he looked back at her. "This glass won't stop me if these straps are ever loosed. Neither will the metal reinforcing it." He sniffed again for emphasis. "And none of your soldiers are properly equipped to stop me either."

"You're talking about silver?" She asked. "Your kind is what?.... Allergic to it?"

"That is the closest explanation to what it is for us." He admitted.

"Should we equip them with silver bullets than?" She asked.

"Are.... bullets.... the thing that your man on the other side used to kill me?" He countered. When she remained silent he simply nodded. "If so then I would be a fool to say anything other than 'Please don't'" He grinned. "For my sake."

"If silver is so bad for you than why is your mouth lined with it?" She asked, pointing at his grin with her pen.

The grin quickly disappeared. "I do not have this by my choice." He said coldly. "It is a mark of shame."\\

"For what?" She asked. "That seems a bit barbaric."

"In my case." He tilted his head so that the brand on his snout was more visible. "For accidentally turning someone."

"Is that a crime?" She asked.

"One of our worst." He said calmly. "In my case it was an accident. But it is still taboo. These mark me as a criminal and a danger to my kind." He shrugged. "As for it being barbaric. You are not wrong. It is a practice from our most ancient of traditions. But it was also set forth by our." He grinned a bit. "Goddess."

She wrote without looking as she considered this.

"Don't they hurt?" She asked after she was finished with the note.

"At first yes." He admitted. "And sometimes I catch my tongue or cheek in them. But... you get used to them. They do have their positives."

"They do?"

"Oh yes." He said. His grin spread again. "I don't lose fights to other werefolk anymore."

She thought about the implication. "You've... bitten other werewolves with them?"

"It is common for branded outcasts to be attacked. Especially by younger werefolk who are trying to prove themselves and earn a place in a pack." He said calmly. "Our goddess wanted us marked. But she also wanted us to LIVE with our guilt. The teeth help us defend ourselves from our own kind."

"That still seems a touch brutal to me." She said after a few moments of consideration.

"My world can be." He said. Then he looked down at the spot on his chest where he'd been shot. Then at the straps on his arms, waist, and legs. "But your world seems to match it. Albeit through more complicated means."

She nodded slowly. "That's fair." She said. "Your arrival here was quite rough. Tell me. I know you said you don't feel concerned about your captivity. But how do you feel about your situation?"

Dranek tried not to smile.

"Blessed." He said simply.

Wait, is this just GATE? (217/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look. Things get more complex. Haha. Awesome.

Enjoy.

\~

"Jojo wake up." Margaret Choi said as she gently jostled her younger son. "We have to go."

"Hmm?" He groaned as he stirred a bit. She shook him a bit harder, careful not to be too rough. "Whaaaaat?" He asked sleepily.

"Wake up mijo. We have to do something."

From downstairs she heard the repeated banging, followed by the people outside calling her name, muffled by the walls between the door and the second floor bedroom.

Slowly, Joey began to sit upright, rubbing the sleep from his eyes as he did. "What's going..... on?" He yawned.

"There's something going on with James." She said. From downstairs she heard the front door unlock. "We have to go."

"Mrs. DeLaRosa?" The deep voice called from downstairs.

"Who's that?" Joey asked.

"Mrs. Dela-RRRRGGHHH!" The person said before being cut off by some kind of popping noise.

"Who the fu-!" Another voice she hadn't heard asked before she heard what sounded like a punch, followed by a loud crashing noise.

"Mom? What's happening?" Joey asked, suddenly wide awake. "Who is that?"

"Something involving your brother and the other side." She said matter of factly. "Movie type spy stuff." She added, playing to Joey's way of thinking of things.

"What? Are they trying to mess with Jamesy?" He asked.

"I think so." She said. "Either way, I think the General was ready for something like this. Now get dressed we need to move. Three minutes okay Jojo?"

Joey nodded and immediately got up and grabbed his jeans from off the floor.

While he was dressing she went to the top of the stairs.

"Batty?" She whispered down. "Sergeant Batty?"

"Yeah. I'm good Mrs. Choi." He called up from below. He grunted. "Just moving these idiots into your bathroom."

"What happened?" She asked. "Everything okay?"

"Coupla MP's." He responded. "Tazed one, kicked the other through your broom closet. All good, gimme a few and I'll have em hogtied and out of the way."

"What did I get myself into?" She asked herself as she turned to check on her son.

Just as she did the door to Joey's room opened and he stepped out, wearing jeans, his dark blue hoodie, and carrying his backpack.

"What's that?" She asked. "We've got everything we need." She said, pointing to the duffel bag with the supplies and some clothes.

"It's just stuff for Jamesy." Joey said with a smile as he looked down the stares curiously. "Mostly ideas and things about his powers and Steve. Plus...." He whispered as he looked away. She thought that she might see him blushing if it weren't so dark. "I wrote a speech for his and Amina's wedding. I know we can't go there, but he said he'd put us on camera."

Margaret cradled her son's face in her hands and turned him to look at her. He looked her in the eye for just a second. But it was enough.

"He's going to love it mijo." She said with a smile. "No need to be ashamed of something that nice. Now let's go."

She led him downstairs just in time for Batty to emerge from the bathroom, sweat running down the side of his face.

"I am out of shape." He said to himself. Then he noticed them coming down the stairs. "Ah there's the Jo-Star!" He said, beaming with a smile.

"Batty?" Joey asked, recognizing him from a trip he'd taken to visit his brother during spring break years before. "Corporal Batista? What are you doing here?"

Batty smiled. "It's Sergeant now dude." He looked down, suddenly somber. "Well, former Sergeant anyways." He gestured for them to follow him. "Come on." He said as the smile returned. ""We got a long night ahead. I'll tell you what I can on the way."

\------------------------------

"I'm not speaking to you as a soldier right now. And definitely not a General." General Krick said on James's phone, which was propped up on the King's desk.

Amina stood with her back against the door, keeping it shut while also listening for any potential eavesdroppers. James sat opposite of the King with his head in his hands. On the screen the General was sitting in what James thought was probably his car, or at least a car. And he was wearing a simple dress shirt instead of his uniform. King Farrick was listening intently.

"In fact, telling you this might just get me shot for treason." The General continued. He took a deep breath, wiping his brow as he did. "Secretary Grant.... has abducted one of your people. He is one of your soldiers, and a werewolf." The General said as flatly as he could.

The King sat up straight, looming over the phone with a look that James had only ever seen on Drill Sergeants in training, and even then only when someone had fucked up with weapon safety.

"How has this happened?" He asked sternly. "How can he abduct someone when we have the summoning room guarded every second of every day?

General Krick winced and shook his head.

"He has.... a... tertiary site." The General said with great difficulty. "As in our THIRD site where we've managed to open doors to your world. The second one was how Vickers got through. Primarily as a test of our ability to do so independent of your summoning room and any lingering effects it may have."

King Farrick remained silent, simply cocking an eyebrow up in response.

"When Vickers gave up the goose we scrambled it." The General continued. "We had the team there go dark and relocate. But we already knew that we could open up doors of our own." He dipped his head. "They set up a camp and waited for the scheduled opening of a third door. Apparently it worked."

"You've known this the whole time? And you've kept it to yourself?" King Farrick asked.

General Krick nodded slowly. "We have." He admitted.

King Farrick looked up above the phone. "I was talking to Captain Choi." He said gravely.

James looked up at the King, only partly surprised at the statement.

He could feel Amina's eyes burning into his back from where she was standing at the door.

He hung his head. "I....." He began hesitantly. "I had my suspicions." He admitted. "I never said it out loud. But I let Vickers know that I didn't believe the story." He shook his head as he looked at the ground. "But I never asked for confirmation because... I don't think I wanted it."

He heard the small , sharp, inhalation behind him. It was quiet, and he suspected hidden behind a hand. But he couldn't turn to face her.

"Who is it?" King Farrick asked, already moving past the uncomfortable subject. "Do you have a name?"

"Not yet." The General answered. "All I know is that apparently he has a brand and metal teeth."

"An outcast?" The King mused, hand on his chin. "In the royal army?... That at least narrows it down."

There was a long silence as the two leaders pondered their next steps. Their next words.

"I..." The General began, breaking the silence. "DON'T... want a war between our people." He admitted. "I never have. I.... have seen my people.... my military... at its worst." He shook his head. "I fought my way to the rank I'm at because I wanted to change this Army. To prevent it from being the thing it was going forward. That's why I snagged this command from my compatriots when it came across my desk. I know that, given this new information, my word probably isn't worth much right now."

The King remained silent.

"But I am going to do what I can to prevent this from getting any worse than it already has." General Krick finished. He paused to rub his eyes for a moment. Then he looked up, past the camera on his own phone. "No guarantees I'll survive it though. My career definitely won't."

"I'll... keep all of that in mind." The King said slowly. "But if Grant is willing to go THAT far, then I fear things will have to get burned a little more before they forge proper steel."

The General considered the words. "We have a, somewhat, similar saying." His hand moved toward his camera. "Good luck sir... Captain Choi." He said before killing his connection.

The room remained awkwardly silent for several long seconds that seemed to drag on. The King simply stared at James for all of it before finally speaking.

"This is a most unfortunate reveal." He said at last. "If you have any hope of staying in," He looked past James toward the door, James glanced over his shoulder. "ANYONE'S good graces. I would suggest that you help us deal with the aftermath."

James nodded, knowing that there wasn't much he could say that would help the situation. "I will sir." He said quietly. "I'm sorry."

"In the future." The King said, also quietly. "Be a better man."

James just nodded again.

The King turned to look at Amina fully. "We have a lot of work ahead of us." He said. "Find out where this has occurred.

Amina nodded. Then she turned and stormed out of the door, leaving James where he was.

\----------

"Isaacs you cleaned the spot it happened at right?" Nguyen asked as the two of them looked through the binoculars.

"Yeah." Isaacs responded, lowering his. "Threw a bunch of old meat trimmings from the kitchen all over it then mixxed the sand up real well and covered it. If anyone went looking it'd just look like the guy had found a spot and had dinner."

"Well...." Nguyen replied. "Either they didn't fall for that brilliant bit of subterfuge." He lowered his binoculars too. "Or they take tea very seriously."

On a dune nearly half a mile away the cohort of Petravian soldiers was marching toward them in formation. Not the rag tag mess of soldiers walking at a free pace that they'd been in when they'd passed through the first time, but an actual rank and file formation.

They'd been able to see the shields and swords at the front. The spears in the middle. And the archers and, what he assumed were, casters in the back.

Sergeant Vhiner'ys was leading them from the front.

He was wearing his helmet with the visor down.

"Tell the civ staff to get in the boxes that have a door." He said without looking at Isaacs. "Military personnel get armed and armored and take up positions in the tents. Keep covered until shit goes pear shaped."

"Got it." Isaacs said.

He was about to move to follow the command but Nguyen stooped him with a hand.

"Glasses on and keep that fifty aimed at the other wolf." He said. "He's your first target. Anyone using magic is next. Their sarge is third."

"Eyes in the sky style?" Isaacs asked. Nguyen nodded. "Roger." He said in response.

Nguyen turned to follow him back to the camp.

\--------------------

"Why are you so calm?" Doctor Regina Melendez asked.

"Will panicking help my situation?" Dranek asked in return. "I don't see how it could."

"Hmmm. I suppose not." She admitted. "Still. You're... well, let's be honest, a prisoner on a different world than the one you're accustomed to. That's stressful."

"It is." He agreed. "But I am confident in my escape. My survival."

"Why is that?" She asked. "Even now you're strapped to a chair and wearing a muzzle. Inside a glass room surrounded by guards. How can you be so confident?"

Dranek looked around, glad to finally be able to move his head a bit. He looked at the guards, four of them, arrayed around the glass and metal box that he was in with the doctor, even if she was separated from him by another wall of glass herself.

She was something called a "\[Psychiatrist\]" though she'd explained that that simply meant that she was a doctor who specialized in healing the mind and emotions.

Dranek knew what she really was. She was the soft interrogator. And if he didn't work WITH her, then the next person they sent to ask questions wouldn't be so soft. They would be the one who dealt in pain.

And he doubted they would be a doctor too.

Dranek took a deep sniff of the air.

"For starters." He said as he looked back at her. "This glass won't stop me if these straps are ever loosed. Neither will the metal reinforcing it." He sniffed again for emphasis. "And none of your soldiers are properly equipped to stop me either."

"You're talking about silver?" She asked. "Your kind is what?.... Allergic to it?"

"That is the closest explanation to what it is for us." He admitted.

"Should we equip them with silver bullets than?" She asked.

"Are.... bullets.... the thing that your man on the other side used to kill me?" He countered. When she remained silent he simply nodded. "If so then I would be a fool to say anything other than 'Please don't'" He grinned. "For my sake."

"If silver is so bad for you than why is your mouth lined with it?" She asked, pointing at his grin with her pen.

The grin quickly disappeared. "I do not have this by my choice." He said coldly. "It is a mark of shame."\\

"For what?" She asked. "That seems a bit barbaric."

"In my case." He tilted his head so that the brand on his snout was more visible. "For accidentally turning someone."

"Is that a crime?" She asked.

"One of our worst." He said calmly. "In my case it was an accident. But it is still taboo. These mark me as a criminal and a danger to my kind." He shrugged. "As for it being barbaric. You are not wrong. It is a practice from our most ancient of traditions. But it was also set forth by our." He grinned a bit. "Goddess."

She wrote without looking as she considered this.

"Don't they hurt?" She asked after she was finished with the note.

"At first yes." He admitted. "And sometimes I catch my tongue or cheek in them. But... you get used to them. They do have their positives."

"They do?"

"Oh yes." He said. His grin spread again. "I don't lose fights to other werefolk anymore."

She thought about the implication. "You've... bitten other werewolves with them?"

"It is common for branded outcasts to be attacked. Especially by younger werefolk who are trying to prove themselves and earn a place in a pack." He said calmly. "Our goddess wanted us marked. But she also wanted us to LIVE with our guilt. The teeth help us defend ourselves from our own kind."

"That still seems a touch brutal to me." She said after a few moments of consideration.

"My world can be." He said. Then he looked down at the spot on his chest where he'd been shot. Then at the straps on his arms, waist, and legs. "But your world seems to match it. Albeit through more complicated means."

She nodded slowly. "That's fair." She said. "Your arrival here was quite rough. Tell me. I know you said you don't feel concerned about your captivity. But how do you feel about your situation?"

Dranek tried not to smile.

"Blessed." He said simply.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x2nkyv/wait_is_this_just_gate_218/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (216/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Stories and cars are startlingly similar. Old cars are easier to work on because they have less stuff to worry about. But they're super inefficient. New cars are super efficient, but they're also incredibly complicated.

This story has gotten significantly more difficult to keep up with even as the writer because, just like engine bays. THERE'S TOO MANY GODDAM MOVING PIECES AND THE ENGINEERS OF THE WHOLE THING (yes, I know that's me) DON'T KNOW WHAT THEY'RE FUCKING DOING!

WHY ARE THERE SO MANY GODDAM MOVING PA-

Catchy smooth jazz plays

Anyways. Yeah, a character from the first few chapters is back, and the plot continues to thicken.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James and Amina were out in the training yard with Veliry, testing her first iteration of a rifle, when James's phone went off. Amina and Veliry continued inspecting the new weapon as James stepped to the side to take a call.

The two woman didn't notice the agitated tone or gesturing as they continued the inspection. But they both turned when they heard James yell, "What the fuck sir?" into his phone. Then they noticed the look of concern on James's face.

A few minutes of watching him pace back and forth and James finally hung up. They'd set the rifle aside almost as soon as they'd realized what was happening.

James tossed the phone in his pocket and stood, eyes wide and hands up on his head as he stared off into the distance.

"What was that about?" Amina asked as she walked up to him.

James took a deep breath before answering. "We've got a big problem." He replied. He turned to look at her, his hands resting on her shoulder. "We need to go talk to your father. Somewhere private."

He looked over her shoulder at the concerned mage. "Vel, we'll have to continue this later."

"What's wrong?" Veliry asked in response.

James just shook his head as he and Amina practically ran from the clearing.

\-------------------------

Werner read the E-mail with mounting concern.

What the hell is he thinking? She wondered as she re-read it over and over. That's going to fuck our diplomacy mission to hell and back.

>First successful return trip has been accomplished.Subject was a Petravian werewolf.Subject's survival primarily due to regenerative capabilities.Tests taking place to determine feasibility long term.Tertiary site performing counter intelligence.Prepare for fallout should they fail.Delete this message once read.

She didn't really know what to think of the message. Covering for the tertiary site if they screwed up was NOT how a diplomat was supposed to work. They were basically warning her that she might become a prisoner if a bunch of grunts and scientists on the other side of the world didn't perform their job.

Why the fuck would Grant okay something like this? She thought as she hit the "Delete" button on her computer.

As if on cue Vickers opened her office door without knocking and quickly shut it behind him. When he turned around she could tell that he'd received a similar message.

"This is a problem." He said simply, confirming her suspicion.

"Yeah, no shit." She replied as she rubbed her temple.

"What are we gonna do?" He asked.

She looked at her computer, as if willing the message to come back, even though she hated it.

\--------------------------------

It was two in the morning when Margaret Choi was startled awake by someone shaking her in her bed.

"Wha?" She asked, half asleep. Then she jolted upright as she skidded back and away from the dark form that had been jostling her. "What the fuck!" She yelled into the darkness as she fell off the opposite side of the bed, bruising her butt in the process.

"SSSssshhh!" The dark figure said. "Mrs. Choi quiet."

She froze as she recognized that voice from somewhere. She peered over the bed at the intruder.

"Who the fuck are you?" She asked, gripping the side of the bed with one hand as she reached under the nightstand for her phone's charging cord.

Suddenly a flashlight lit up, illuminating the bed for a moment before angling up and at the intruder's face. With their other hand they pulled off the black cloth mask they were wearing.

"I'm Sergeant Batista. I'm a friend of Choi's." He reached across the bed with an extended hand. "But call me Batty." He said.

She knew this "Batty" though she'd never met him in person. Now that she realized who it was, the voice, and the face, matched some of the video messages James had sent back from times he'd been hanging out with his friends.

"Batty...." She said as the recognition clicked in. "You were one of the ones with James when the incident happened." She said.

Batty lifted his leg up, and used his off hand to pull up his pants a bit. Beneath was the latex and metal amalgamation common to military grade bio-prosthetics. The replacement that soldiers would get if they weren't comfortable with the portable regenerative pods that the military used for amputations.

"Got a souvenir for it too." He said. "Now, we have to hurry. Where's the supplies they gave you?" He asked.

As she walked, still deep in thought, over to the spot she'd hidden them in, a set of lights flashed through the windows.

Headlights.

Batty instinctively ducked down, and before Margaret knew what had happened, had a pistol in his hand.

"Shit." He said as she looked at him. He turned to her. "Get the stuff and get your son. Hurry up."

"What's happening?" She asked as she matched him in a crouch.

"Nothing good." He replied. "I was ordered to come get you and your son and make sure you had the supplies they'd given you. And I was told to expect interference."

"Interference from who?" She asked as she pulled the bag out of its cubby. "And who sent you?"

"Not allowed to say that stuff ma'am. Hell, I only KNOW the second part. G K. That's all I'm allowed to tell you." He said. "That everything?" She nodded. "Go get Joey. Be fast. Be quiet. I'll handle the rest."

KNOCK KNOCK KNOCK! Someone pounded on the door. "Mrs DeLaRosa?" A deep voice asked.

Batty nodded at her and she quietly moved to the stairs going up.

\----------

"Subject is a one, Dranek Godsnose." Dr. Donald Bringham said into his microphone. "Male Lycan slash werewolf. Of Human and Elven familial origin. Age approximately twenty nine when converted to Earth dating standards. Definitive features; seven foot two length, approximately three hundred twenty pounds, silver and black fur, brown bordering on gold eyes, heavily damaged left ear, some kind of brand on the skin around his snout. Last but not least, and counterintuitive to his species, steel capped teeth with silver points. Some kind of punishment for infecting someone."

Dranek stood/leaned where they had strapped him to a metal table that was being held at roughly forty five degrees. A series of tubes had been fed into both of his arms. His left arm was having blood drawn into bags that smelled of an odd material. The other arm was attached to similar bags, but they held a yellowish fluid in them that was slowly being fed INTO his right arm, making it feel cold.

Most infuriatingly, he had a metal muzzle around his snout.

He also had a series of wires and tubes leading to patches that had been placed on shaved parts of his chest and forehead, and some kind of odd plastic cover over one of his middle fingers. A machine nearby beeped every so often. To him it smelled like a blacksmiths scrap pile plus more of that odd scent that the bags gave off.

He was fully restrained, chest, waist, arms and legs bound by thick straps made of an odd cloth. His head was strapped down in a similar fashion into a small indent in the table, preventing him from even moving it side to side. This was made worse by the fact that the back of his left ear was itchy.

His eyes moved to track the short, pudgy man as he moved back and forth speaking that odd language into the small device in his hand. Dranek would've thought he was a dwarf if his beard had been fuller and less pathetic.

He could smell just the faintest hint of flesh rot coming from the mans breath. He wondered if the man even knew he was dying.

"BP is elevated compared to standard human. One ninety over one hundred. I would be concerned. But heart rate is slow. Only thirty to forty BPM. And pulse ox is reading close to one hundred percent. This last bit is odd since research points to our world having a LOWER oxygen content in its atmosphere than the other side. But we aren't exactly familiar with his physiology just yet. So it remains to be seen as to whether or not this is an issue, or just a quirk of being a werewolf."

Dr. Bringham lowered the device for a moment as he stopped pacing to stare at Dranek. Dranek watched him.

"Never thought you guys were real." He said softly. "Had to come from a whole other world."

Then he lifted the device back up. "But, barring some of the... seemingly... superficial damage that resulted from his trip here. The subject seems to be in good health. He has answered minimally invasive questions. Though, as a soldier, he refuses to betray anything about his world to us. This was to be expected..... We are already taking blood samples. He is capable of near constant donation. Some kind of trick due to his regenerative property I imagine. But five liters in and he doesn't even seem to be bothered yet."

He stopped once more as he came to stand in front of Dranek, who stared at him dispassionately.

"\[Mister Godsnose.\]" He said in rough Petravian, device resting near his pants pocket now. "\[Do you have any big important healers history?\]" He asked. Dranek attempted to tilt his head, confused at the wording of the question. "\[Any pack body problems that may dampen our learning of your body?\]"

He must have seen the confusion in Dranek's expression.

"\[Sorry. I not speak well yet. Still learning.\]" He said with an embarrassed look on his face.

"\[I am healthier than you are. If that's what you're asking.\]" Dranek replied.

The man looked down at the device, as if reading something. Then he looked back up with a smile.

"\[You knowing this how?\]" He asked.

Dranek took a long, exaggerated sniff from inside his muzzle.

"\[I can smell the death that your body longs for human.\]" He said. He didn't know if the pudgy little man could see his smile behind the metal on his face.

Once again he looked down at the device. His face scrunched up in confusion.

"\[I am dying?\]" He asked.

Dranek attempted a nod. \[Slowly.\]" He replied. "\[You should have your healers look at your lungs.\]"

The man read the device again. Absently, his hand moved to rest on his chest. There was something small and rectangular in the pocket there.

He looked back up at Dranek, and Dranek could see the hint of fear there.

"\[Get me back to my world.\]" Dranek said softly. \[And maybe our healers can help you survive it.\]" He lied. He shrugged, albeit only a little because of the restraints. "\[Or maybe your people have a cure. Who knows?\]" He added.

The man looked at him warily. Then he seemed to steel himself.

"\[No. You are attempting to....\]" He thought for a moment, looking for the word. "\[Turn me?.... Yes. Turn me to your friend.\]"

A fitting choice of words. Dranek thought as he licked the back of his teeth absently.

Once more he shrugged. "\[If you say so little man.\]"

He heard a small voice in the back of his head.

When the time is right. You shall release yourself.

Dranek fought back the urge to smile. After years of being alone even when around others, it was nice to have someone he could rely upon.

Especially when that someone was your deity.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x1v83e/wait_is_this_just_gate_217/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (216/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Stories and cars are startlingly similar. Old cars are easier to work on because they have less stuff to worry about. But they're super inefficient. New cars are super efficient, but they're also incredibly complicated.

This story has gotten significantly more difficult to keep up with even as the writer because, just like engine bays. THERE'S TOO MANY GODDAM MOVING PIECES AND THE ENGINEERS OF THE WHOLE THING (yes, I know that's me) DON'T KNOW WHAT THEY'RE FUCKING DOING!

WHY ARE THERE SO MANY GODDAM MOVING PA-

Catchy smooth jazz plays

Anyways. Yeah, a character from the first few chapters is back, and the plot continues to thicken.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were out in the training yard with Veliry, testing her first iteration of a rifle, when James's phone went off. Amina and Veliry continued inspecting the new weapon as James stepped to the side to take a call.

The two woman didn't notice the agitated tone or gesturing as they continued the inspection. But they both turned when they heard James yell, "What the fuck sir?" into his phone. Then they noticed the look of concern on James's face.

A few minutes of watching him pace back and forth and James finally hung up. They'd set the rifle aside almost as soon as they'd realized what was happening.

James tossed the phone in his pocket and stood, eyes wide and hands up on his head as he stared off into the distance.

"What was that about?" Amina asked as she walked up to him.

James took a deep breath before answering. "We've got a big problem." He replied. He turned to look at her, his hands resting on her shoulder. "We need to go talk to your father. Somewhere private."

He looked over her shoulder at the concerned mage. "Vel, we'll have to continue this later."

"What's wrong?" Veliry asked in response.

James just shook his head as he and Amina practically ran from the clearing.

\-------------------------

Werner read the E-mail with mounting concern.

What the hell is he thinking? She wondered as she re-read it over and over. That's going to fuck our diplomacy mission to hell and back.

>First successful return trip has been accomplished.
>
>Subject was a Petravian werewolf.
>
>Subject's survival primarily due to regenerative capabilities.
>
>Tests taking place to determine feasibility long term.
>
>Tertiary site performing counter intelligence.
>
>Prepare for fallout should they fail.
>
>Delete this message once read.

She didn't really know what to think of the message. Covering for the tertiary site if they screwed up was NOT how a diplomat was supposed to work. They were basically warning her that she might become a prisoner if a bunch of grunts and scientists on the other side of the world didn't perform their job.

Why the fuck would Grant okay something like this? She thought as she hit the "Delete" button on her computer.

As if on cue Vickers opened her office door without knocking and quickly shut it behind him. When he turned around she could tell that he'd received a similar message.

"This is a problem." He said simply, confirming her suspicion.

"Yeah, no shit." She replied as she rubbed her temple.

"What are we gonna do?" He asked.

She looked at her computer, as if willing the message to come back, even though she hated it.

\------------------------------

It was two in the morning when Margaret Choi was startled awake by someone shaking her in her bed.

"Wha?" She asked, half asleep. Then she jolted upright as she skidded back and away from the dark form that had been jostling her. "What the fuck!" She yelled into the darkness as she fell off the opposite side of the bed, bruising her butt in the process.

"SSSsssshhh!" The dark figure said. "Mrs. Choi quiet."

She froze as she recognized that voice from somewhere. She peered over the bed at the intruder.

"Who the fuck are you?" She asked, gripping the side of the bed with one hand as she reached under the nightstand for her phone's charging cord.

Suddenly a flashlight lit up, illuminating the bed for a moment before angling up and at the intruder's face. With their other hand they pulled off the black cloth mask they were wearing.

"I'm Sergeant Batista. I'm a friend of Choi's." He reached across the bed with an extended hand. "But call me Batty." He said.

She knew this "Batty" though she'd never met him in person. Now that she realized who it was, the voice, and the face, matched some of the video messages James had sent back from times he'd been hanging out with his friends.

"Batty...." She said as the recognition clicked in. "You were one of the ones with James when the incident happened." She said.

Batty lifted his leg up, and used his off hand to pull up his pants a bit. Beneath was the latex and metal amalgamation common to military grade bio-prosthetics. The replacement that soldiers would get if they weren't comfortable with the portable regenerative pods that the military used for amputations.

"Got a souvenir for it too." He said. "Now, we have to hurry. Where's the supplies they gave you?" He asked.

As she walked, still deep in thought, over to the spot she'd hidden them in, a set of lights flashed through the windows.

Headlights.

Batty instinctively ducked down, and before Margaret knew what had happened, had a pistol in his hand.

"Shit." He said as she looked at him. He turned to her. "Get the stuff and get your son. Hurry up."

"What's happening?" She asked as she matched him in a crouch.

"Nothing good." He replied. "I was ordered to come get you and your son and make sure you had the supplies they'd given you. And I was told to expect interference."

"Interference from who?" She asked as she pulled the bag out of its cubby. "And who sent you?"

"Not allowed to say that stuff ma'am. Hell, I only KNOW the second part. G K. That's all I'm allowed to tell you." He said. "That everything?" She nodded. "Go get Joey. Be fast. Be quiet. I'll handle the rest."

KNOCK KNOCK KNOCK! Someone pounded on the door. "Mrs DeLaRosa?" A deep voice asked.

Batty nodded at her and she quietly moved to the stairs going up.

\------------------------

"Subject is a one, Dranek Godsnose." Dr. Donald Bringham said into his microphone. "Male Lycan slash werewolf. Of Human and Elven familial origin. Age approximately twenty nine when converted to Earth dating standards. Definitive features; seven foot two length, approximately three hundred twenty pounds, silver and black fur, brown bordering on gold eyes, heavily damaged left ear, some kind of brand on the skin around his snout. Last but not least, and counterintuitive to his species, steel capped teeth with silver points. Some kind of punishment for infecting someone."

Dranek stood/leaned where they had strapped him to a metal table that was being held at roughly forty five degrees. A series of tubes had been fed into both of his arms. His left arm was having blood drawn into bags that smelled of an odd material. The other arm was attached to similar bags, but they held a yellowish fluid in them that was slowly being fed INTO his right arm, making it feel cold.

Most infuriatingly, he had a metal muzzle around his snout.

He also had a series of wires and tubes leading to patches that had been placed on shaved parts of his chest and forehead, and some kind of odd plastic cover over one of his middle fingers. A machine nearby beeped every so often. To him it smelled like a blacksmiths scrap pile plus more of that odd scent that the bags gave off.

He was fully restrained, chest, waist, arms and legs bound by thick straps made of an odd cloth. His head was strapped down in a similar fashion into a small indent in the table, preventing him from even moving it side to side. This was made worse by the fact that the back of his left ear was itchy.

His eyes moved to track the short, pudgy man as he moved back and forth speaking that odd language into the small device in his hand. Dranek would've thought he was a dwarf if his beard had been fuller and less pathetic.

He could smell just the faintest hint of flesh rot coming from the mans breath. He wondered if the man even knew he was dying.

"BP is elevated compared to standard human. One ninety over one hundred. I would be concerned. But heart rate is slow. Only thirty to forty BPM. And pulse ox is reading close to one hundred percent. This last bit is odd since research points to our world having a LOWER oxygen content in its atmosphere than the other side. But we aren't exactly familiar with his physiology just yet. So it remains to be seen as to whether or not this is an issue, or just a quirk of being a werewolf."

Dr. Bringham lowered the device for a moment as he stopped pacing to stare at Dranek. Dranek watched him.

"Never thought you guys were real." He said softly. "Had to come from a whole other world."

Then he lifted the device back up. "But, barring some of the... seemingly... superficial damage that resulted from his trip here. The subject seems to be in good health. He has answered minimally invasive questions. Though, as a soldier, he refuses to betray anything about his world to us. This was to be expected..... We are already taking blood samples. He is capable of near constant donation. Some kind of trick due to his regenerative property I imagine. But five liters in and he doesn't even seem to be bothered yet."

He stopped once more as he came to stand in front of Dranek, who stared at him dispassionately.

"\[Mister Godsnose.\]" He said in rough Petravian, device resting near his pants pocket now. "\[Do you have any big important healers history?\]" He asked. Dranek attempted to tilt his head, confused at the wording of the question. "\[Any pack body problems that may dampen our learning of your body?\]"

He must have seen the confusion in Dranek's expression.

"\[Sorry. I not speak well yet. Still learning.\]" He said with an embarrassed look on his face.

"\[I am healthier than you are. If that's what you're asking.\]" Dranek replied.

The man looked down at the device, as if reading something. Then he looked back up with a smile.

"\[You knowing this how?\]" He asked.

Dranek took a long, exaggerated sniff from inside his muzzle.

"\[I can smell the death that your body longs for human.\]" He said. He didn't know if the pudgy little man could see his smile behind the metal on his face.

Once again he looked down at the device. His face scrunched up in confusion.

"\[I am dying?\]" He asked.

Dranek attempted a nod. \[Slowly.\]" He replied. "\[You should have your healers look at your lungs.\]"

The man read the device again. Absently, his hand moved to rest on his chest. There was something small and rectangular in the pocket there.

He looked back up at Dranek, and Dranek could see the hint of fear there.

"\[Get me back to my world.\]" Dranek said softly. \[And maybe our healers can help you survive it.\]" He lied. He shrugged, albeit only a little because of the restraints. "\[Or maybe your people have a cure. Who knows?\]" He added.

The man looked at him warily. Then he seemed to steel himself.

"\[No. You are attempting to....\]" He thought for a moment, looking for the word. "\[Turn me?.... Yes. Turn me to your friend.\]"

A fitting choice of words. Dranek thought as he licked the back of his teeth absently.

Once more he shrugged. "\[If you say so little man.\]"

He heard a small voice in the back of his head.

When the time is right. You shall release yourself.

Dranek fought back the urge to smile. After years of being alone, even when around others, it was nice to have someone he could rely upon.

Especially when that someone was your deity.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x1v6fw/wait_is_this_just_gate_217/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (215/?)

Previous

Writer''s note: "Everything's coming up Milhouse." -A certain someone at the end.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"You did WHAT?" General Krick said into his phone.

Colonel Muhammed watched with curiosity, having never seen the General so livid. His face was red and had a vein pulsing on its forehead. He had one of his smokes clenched, unlit, in a death grip between two fingers. His lower lip was sucked in as he absently chewed it while listening to whatever Secretary Grant was saying on the other side.

"No no no." Krick said with a stab of his finger at the unseen Grant. "You abducted a foreign nationa,l FROM OUR ALLIES, after KILLING him?" He paused for a second, the colonel could hear grant saying something in self defense as she looked on with wide eyes. "No no. You were supposed to be the one in charge of POLITICAL relations with the Petravians. IIIIIII.... was supposed to be the one running the military ops." The general stabbed his finger downward into his desk hard enough to hyper-xtended his middle finger a few degrees. "But you're over their FUCKING THIS WHOLE OP UP!" He practically yelled into his phone as he stood a bit. "AND NOW WE HAVE A WEREWOLF ON OUR PLANET FOR THE FIRST TIME IN HISTORY! AND IF THE PETRAVIANS FIND OUT IT'LL BE AN ACT OF WAR!!"

He slammed the phone down onto its receiver hard enough to send his pen holder and several of his challenge coins scattering across his desk as he hung up. His eyes were pressed shut as he clenched his jaw, thinking.

The Colonel stayed silent as he did.

"You got all that?" He asked softly after a few moments.

"Yes sir." She replied.

"Good." He said, looking up at her. His hand clenched his smoke into its fist, crushing it. Then he tossed it into his mouth and swallowed it like an oversized pill before fishing his other smokes out of his pocket. She fought to hide her disgust at the act. "Call the original secondary site. Ensure all operations there are shut down." He said as his eyes darted around, a habit he had when he was thinking of everything at once, she'd noticed. "I have to call the other stars and big wigs." He said more to himself than to her.

She took a deep breath. "Black friday?" She asked.

He looked at her, seeing her for the first time since he'd taken the call. He looked away for a few seconds. Then sighed.

"I think so." He said after a while.

"On it." She said as she turned to walk away.

\---------------------

"Okay. So what is the purpose of this.... heated miniature fountain?" Veliry asked him curiously. "I'm supposed to be working on the rifle design right now.

"It's called a fondue fountain." James said in response as he pulled the.... hammer... on the unloaded rifle prototype back cautiously. "It's for the wedding feast. It'll blow peoples minds."

"And it melts and dispenses sauces?" She asked. "Why?"

"Just cheese and chocolate." James replied, glad that Petravus had chocolate of its own. "And then you dip stuff in the melted stuff and eat it. You know, finger foods and what not." He looked up with a look of awe on his face. "Or tacos." He said as if in awe.

"What's a taco?" She asked.

"I'll make some so the cooks know." He said. "ABSOLUTELY DELICIOUS!" He half yelled.

She looked at him curiously. "Ooookay?" She said as she looked back to her drawing board. "Well. This is a fairly easy thing to make." She stopped, tilting her head to the side for a moment. "And... actually... you have the magical skill necessary to make it. You just don't know how to enchant yet." She said as she turned around.

"Me?" He asked. "Nope."

She shrugged as she raised an eyebrow. "Wanna learn?" She asked curiously. "A warming spell based enchantment is an easy place to start."

James's head snapped to look at her with eyes wide. "You're finally gonna teach me to enchant things?" He said.

Veliry nodded.

"FUCK YEAH!" James said as both of his arms shot into the air in fists. He winced as the rifle he'd been holding clattered to the ground.

Veliry just stared at him, blinking rapidly. "I can't wait to see how this causes you to nearly die this time." She said sarcastically as he rushed to retrieve the dropped weapon. "Can't believe you're the one training our soldiers on how to use those." She said as she turned back to the design on the paper.

\------------------------

In the ocean of pain that was his existence, Dranek heard a voice.

He knew that voice, though he'd never heard it before. He never thought he would hear it, a belief he hadn't even known he had until he recognized it for who it was.

Dranek Godsnose. It whispered into his.... soul? It wasn't his ear. He didn't think he even had an ear right now. If he did, he doubted it was in working order. Not yet anyways.

The voice was somehow an equal to the pain he was in. And despite it's stern, and overpowering presence, it soothed him.

Such a prideful name. It continued. But than again, you didn't choose it for yourself. And it is a lovely nose.

Dranek felt himself smile, even if his body didn't actually do it.

Goddess? He thought. He felt.

Yes my child. It said. Despite the vast distance, and the weakness of this world's moon. I am here. One of my children became lost and scared and hurt. And though they are an outcast, they are still mine to guide.

This world? He wondered. So that is what they did to me? They sent me to their world?

Oh yes Dranek. They thought to use you as an experiment. They hoped your wolfen toughness might keep you alive and give them answers. The fact that it got rid of you was an added gift in their mind. And the fact that it might kill you never even presented as an issue to them.

Bunch of bastards. He thought. They'll learn otherwise.

He sensed the goddess laughing. And it is that very resilience that will prove so. You have died. She admitted. And under normal circumstances that would be permanent. This world has no gods of its own. No magic. And as I have already said, its moon is a joke. She paused. But they do not know that myself and several others of my kin have come here, via the very doorways they've been opening. And I need you. She said.

You need me Goddess? A branded, capped, outcast?

Just so. She said.

Dranek smiled again. Allow me to serve goddess. Unsanctioned turn or not. I am still your child.

He felt her smile, though he could not see it.

Dranek Godsnose. You WILL serve me. She said. Dranek felt something press into his soul. He thought that it may have been the life she had told him was over. Or maybe it was the sensation of whatever this consciousness he was in being shoved back into his body. And when the time is right, YOU shall become the first champion this world has ever seen.

On the metal table that Dranek's (now living) body was strapped to, his mouth broke into a massive grin, revealing the silver teeth hidden within.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/x0yshn/wait_is_this_just_gate_216/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (215/?)

Previous /
First

Writer''s note: "Everything's coming up Milhouse." -A certain someone at the end.

Enjoy.

\~

"You did WHAT?" General Krick said into his phone.

Colonel Muhammed watched with curiosity, having never seen the General so livid. His face was red and had a vein pulsing on its forehead. He had one of his smokes clenched, unlit, in a death grip between two fingers. His lower lip was sucked in as he absently chewed it while listening to whatever Secretary Grant was saying on the other side.

"No no no." Krick said with a stab of his finger at the unseen Grant. "You abducted a foreign national FROM OUR ALLIES, after KILLING him?" He paused for a second, the colonel could hear grant saying something in self defense as she looked on with wide eyes. "No no. You were supposed to be the one in charge of POLITICAL relations with the Petravians. IIIIIII.... was supposed to be the one running the military ops." The general stabbed his finger downward into his desk hard enough to hyper-xtended his middle finger a few degrees. "But you're over their FUCKING THIS WHOLE OP UP!" He practically yelled into his phone as he stood a bit. "AND NOW WE HAVE A WEREWOLF ON OUR PLANET FOR THE FIRST TIME IN HISTORY! AND IF THE PETRAVIANS FIND OUT IT'LL BE AN ACT OF WAR!!"

He slammed the phone down onto its receiver hard enough to send his pen holder and several of his challenge coins scattering across his desk as he hung up. His eyes were pressed shut as he clenched his jaw, thinking.

The Colonel stayed silent as he did.

"You got all that?" He asked softly after a few moments.

"Yes sir." She replied.

"Good." He said, looking up at her. His hand clenched his smoke into its fist, crushing it. Then he tossed it into his mouth and swallowed it like an oversized pill before fishing his other smokes out of his pocket. She fought to hide her disgust at the act. "Call the original secondary site. Ensure all operations there are shut down." He said as his eyes darted around, a habit he had when he was thinking of everything at once, she'd noticed. "I have to call the other stars and big wigs." He said more to himself than to her.

She took a deep breath. "Black friday?" She asked.

He looked at her, seeing her for the first time since he'd taken the call. He looked away for a few seconds. Then sighed.

"I think so." He said after a while.

"On it." She said as she turned to walk away.

\----------

"Okay. So what is the purpose of this.... heated miniature fountain?" Veliry asked him curiously. "I'm supposed to be working on the rifle design right now.

"It's called a fondue fountain." James said in response as he pulled the.... hammer... on the unloaded rifle prototype back cautiously. "It's for the wedding feast. It'll blow peoples minds."

"And it melts and dispenses sauces?" She asked. "Why?"

"Just cheese and chocolate." James replied, glad that Petravus had chocolate of its own. "And then you dip stuff in the melted stuff and eat it. You know, finger foods and what not." He looked up with a look of awe on his face. "Or tacos." He said as if in awe.

"What's a taco?" She asked.

"I'll make some so the cooks know." He said. "ABSOLUTELY DELICIOUS!" He half yelled.

She looked at him curiously. "Ooookay?" She said as she looked back to her drawing board. "Well. This is a fairly easy thing to make." She stopped, tilting her head to the side for a moment. "And... actually... you have the magical skill necessary to make it. You just don't know how to enchant yet." She said as she turned around.

"Me?" He asked. "Nope."

She shrugged as she raised an eyebrow. "Wanna learn?" She asked curiously. "A warming spell based enchantment is an easy place to start."

James's head snapped to look at her with eyes wide. "You're finally gonna teach me to enchant things?" He said.

Veliry nodded.

"FUCK YEAH!" James said as both of his arms shot into the air in fists. He winced as the rifle he'd been holding clattered to the ground.

Veliry just stared at him, blinking rapidly. "I can't wait to see how this causes you to nearly die this time." She said sarcastically as he rushed to retrieve the dropped weapon. "Can't believe you're the one training our soldiers on how to use those." She said as she turned back to the design on the paper.

\------------------------

In the ocean of pain that was his existence, Dranek heard a voice.

He knew that voice, though he'd never heard it before. He never thought he would hear it, a belief he hadn't even known he had until he recognized it for who it was.

Dranek Godsnose. It whispered into his.... soul? It wasn't his ear. He didn't think he even had an ear right now. If he did, he doubted it was in working order. Not yet anyways.

The voice was somehow an equal to the pain he was in. And despite it's stern, and overpowering presence, it soothed him.

Such a prideful name. It continued. But than again, you didn't choose it for yourself. And it is a lovely nose.

Dranek felt himself smile, even if his body didn't actually do it.

Goddess? He thought. He felt.

Yes my child. It said. Despite the vast distance, and the weakness of this world's moon. I am here. One of my children became lost and scared and hurt. And though they are an outcast, they are still mine to guide.

This world? He wondered. So that is what they did to me? They sent me to their world?

Oh yes Dranek. They thought to use you as an experiment. They hoped your wolfen toughness might keep you alive and give them answers. The fact that it got rid of you was an added gift in their mind. And the fact that it might kill you never even presented as an issue to them.

Bunch of bastards. He thought. They'll learn otherwise.

He sensed the goddess laughing. And it is that very resilience that will prove so. You have died. She admitted. And under normal circumstances that would be permanent. This world has no gods of its own. No magic. And as I have already said, its moon is a joke. She paused. But they do not know that myself and several others of my kin have come here, via the very doorways they've been opening. And I need you. She said.

You need me Goddess? A branded, capped, outcast?

Just so. She said.

Dranek smiled again. Allow me to serve goddess. Unsanctioned turn or not. I am still your child.

He felt her smile, though he could not see it.

Dranek Godsnose. You WILL serve me. She said. Dranek felt something press into his soul. He thought that it may have been the life she had told him was over. Or maybe it was the sensation of whatever this consciousness he was in being shoved back into his body. And when the time is right, YOU shall become the first champion this world has ever seen.

On the metal table that Dranek's (now living) body was strapped to, his mouth broke into a massive grin, revealing the silver teeth hidden within.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/x0yqex/wait_is_this_just_gate_216/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (214/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Well now. That's just a dick move.

Enjoy.

\~

"So anyways, that's how the whole, 'magic from other body parts' thing works. At least for me." James said as he took the last bite of his breakfast pastry. "It's harder to control. And I mostly figured out using my mouth for it on accident."

"Make your feet your hands in your mind?" Vickers repeated incredulously. "That's the secret? That's all it takes?"

"I never said it made sense." James replied. "And quick reminder, I did blow myself up the first time I got it to go off."

"That's so fuckin' dumb." Vickers said as he stopped walking. "This the place?"

James looked up at the sign, startled at the fact that they'd arrived without him noticing.

"Yeah." He nodded. "Brimjaw's Tailor Shop. This place is great."

"Got the pictures?" Vickers asked. "Also, why not just have the people back home get you one?"

"Eh... I want to get it made here." James replied. "Plus it's not like the original is still around. My mom lost it when we moved during the war.... You know, when our old place was caught up in the destruction." He whispered, though he didn't know why. "Plus I don't wanna risk my mom finding out. Want it to be a surprise."

Vickers nodded grimly. "Just curious." he said.

"Hey, maybe we can get you some blue and black ninja robes." James said with a grin.

Vickers just stared at him flatly.

"I'll shut up now." James said quietly.

"That'd be a nice change of pace." Vickers retorted. James nodded, then headed in.

\------------------------

Dranek revived with a shudder.

His lungs felt like they were filled with gravel, and when he coughed he thought the stuff that came out might have even had gravel in it.

Everything from his neck to his waist hurt. And his head was pounding.

What the hells had happened to him.

He tried to wipe his mouth of the wet mess he'd just coughed up.

That was when he realized that his hands were bound.

"\[Holy shit it's actually alive!\]" Someone said in an unfamiliar language near his.... bed? "\[Go get top.\]"

"\[How the fuck do you survive a fifty to the sternum?\]" Another voice said.

Dranek craned his neck to look at the source of this voice, as it sounded familiar. But the room or, he suspected, tent was dark except for a single lantern shining on him directly.

"Where am I?" He asked, fighting not to cough up any more of what he suspected might have been his original lungs. Or maybe ribs. "What did you do to me?"

Dranek sniffed deeply, trying to scent whoever was in the room with him.

A hand flashed into view for just a moment, a container in its hand. It squeezed it and foul ammonia scented mist sprayed into his face, making his nostrils burn.

The intensity of the smell, so directly attacking his nose, forced Dranek to whimper in pain.

"We'll ask the questions here." A new voice said as he heard the tent flap open and close.

He struggled against his bonds, trying to reach his nose. But the bindings, though narrow, were strong and tightly laced around his limbs and trunk.

"This is the so called... CARTOGRAPHY camp... isnt it?" Dranek asked, pain and anger evident in his tone.

The hand shot out again, and Dranek snapped at it. But the moment he did it pulled back and sprayed the foul chemical into his face, most of it landing in his open mouth.

"\[Jesus Christ. That's enough Isaacs. We only have so much of that stuff. Plus that's fucked up.\]" A woman's voice said from somewhere in the shadows.

"\[Doc. This is only happening here because you have the stuff necessary to monitor its vitals, such as they are. Plus your box is one of the few that can be used for the trip You don't need to stay if you don't want to.\]" The owner of the hand responded.

"\[We're not here to torture the locals.\]" The woman responded, sounding agitated now. "\[Either drop the bottle and do this in a humane manner OR GET THE HELL OUT OF MY MEDICAL TENT!\]"

"\[Isaacs. She's right. We're good here, go take five.\]" The new arrival said as it moved over near the lantern.

Dranek smelled the chemicals move away before hearing the container get set onto a table. Then the tent flap opened and someone left. His nose still burned.

Suddenly, the tent filled with light as the lantern's cover was removed and it was allowed to illuminate everything.

Standing next to it was the camp leader, Airix.

"So werewolves really can survive damn near anything." He said as he calmly pulled a chair in front of himself and sat on it backwards. "Hell of a trick."

For a moment, likely due to his recent return and abused nose, Dranek was confused by the statement. Then the implication of it sank in.

"You are.... from another world." Dranek said hesitantly. "From the hero's world?"

"I don't know what you're talking about." The man said in response. "We're just a cartography expedition."

"And I am a pretty little bird singing a song." Dranek countered sarcastically.

"Airix" stared at him with no hint of emotion.

"What were you doing sneaking around our camp?" He asked after a moment.

"I wanted some of that fancy, smeplie flavored tea." Dranek said with a chuckle.

The man took a deep, exasperated, breath. "Answering is easier on all of us than not answering." He said with a shake of his head. "We are not enemies."

"My regenerated organs would beg to differ." Dranek said as he peered down at his bare chest. "I think I have new lungs now."

"Speaking of weird, werewolf stuff." Not Airix said. "What's with the teeth? Why are yours silver. I thought that stuff could kill you?"

"You really are from another world than." Dranek said simply. "To not recognize the markings of a silver exile."

"So you're some kind of criminal then?"

"Since the day I was born. My mistake was simply not ensuring a kill." Dranek answered.

"Hmmm." The man said as he rested his hand on his chin. "I suddenly feel less bad about this."

"About what?" Dranek wondered with a silver grin. "Torturing me? I shall answer nothing. My comrades shall find me soon enough."

"Well." The man said with a grimace. "You will likely feel like you're being tortured. But its not going to happen here. And not with me." He tilted his head. "Assuming your regenerative abilities let you survive the trip."

Suddenly Dranek's bed was moving, as though under the effect of a levitation spell, though a few bumps made him realize that that was not the case.

"What?" He asked, suddenly confused. "What are you talking about? Where are you taking me?"

Before he knew what was happening, he was being lowered into some kind of hatch in the ground. It was lit by lights that looked odd even compared to the magical crystals that most mages and fancy homes used for light. After a moment his bed touched down on the ground of a lower level.

"Airix" descended a ladder in the same hatch a moment later.

"Intruder is ready for transit. Open the door whenever you're ready sir." He said into a button on his shirt.

"Door?" Dranek asked, beginning to panic now. "Where are you taking me!?!"

Suddenly there was a crackling, popping noise. Dranek felt a magical energy unlike any he'd ever been near before. A light began flickering nearby, slowly forming a widening sphere.

"WHAT IS THAT?" He asked, fear in his voice now. "WHAT ARE YOU DOING? I AM A MEMBER OF THE PETRAVIAN ARMY! A RANGER ON OFFICIAL DUTY! MY KIN WILL FIND ME! YOU WILL BE BROUGHT TO JUSTICE!"

Airix looked down at him curiously. "You're a ranger?" He asked.

Dranek nodded eagerly, hoping for any kind of thread of salvation to cling to.

"Me too." Airix replied. "Guessin' we didn't train at the same place though. Good luck on your trip." He lifted the button on his shirt up. "Transiting now." He said into it.

Then he grabbed the headboard of the bed and shoved Dranek into the glowing, crackling, sphere of alien energy.

For the split second before he entered it, Dranek wished that he wasn't such an outcast. That he'd come here with at least one other person. For the first time in years, the outcast werewolf felt true fear.

Then he was in it.

\------------------

Nguyen wasn't surprised by the look the doctor gave him as he emerged from the hatch. But he understood it. She was sworn to help people, and what they'd done to the wolf was anything but.

"You almost sounded like you enjoyed that." She said with a glare. "Good luck on your trip." She said mockingly. "You know damn well he's probably dead now."

Nguyen nodded. He wanted to tell her that he'd only made the joke because of how uncomfortable he himself was with the whole scenario. But something told him that she wouldn't believe him.

"Well. It's done." He said instead. "No undoing it now."

"You ever use my tent, my supplies, or ME for anything like that again." She said with a pointed finger. "I'll go to the local garrison and rat on this place myself. I didn't come here to torture or kill people. These people? This government? They're supposed to be our friends. Our allies."

Nguyen sighed. "I know." He said after a moment. "But I wasn't the one that gave the order."

"No." She agreed. "You just carried them out. Never heard that defense used before."

Then she stormed out of the tent.

Nguyen couldn't fault her for the criticism.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wyjzs9/wait_is_this_just_gate_215/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (214/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Well now. That's just a dick move.

Enjoy.

\~

"So anyways, that's how the whole, 'magic from other body parts' thing works. At least for me." James said as he took the last bite of his breakfast pastry. "It's harder to control. And I mostly figured out using my mouth for it on accident."

"Make your feet your hands in your mind?" Vickers repeated incredulously. "That's the secret? That's all it takes?"

"I never said it made sense." James replied. "And quick reminder, I did blow myself up the first time I got it to go off."

"That's so fuckin' dumb." Vickers said as he stopped walking. "This the place?"

James looked up at the sign, startled at the fact that they'd arrived without him noticing.

"Yeah." He nodded. "Brimjaw's Tailor Shop. This place is great."

"Got the pictures?" Vickers asked. "Also, why not just have the people back home get you one?"

"Eh... I want to get it made here." James replied. "Plus it's not like the original is still around. My mom lost it when we moved during the war.... You know, when our old place was caught up in the destruction." He whispered, though he didn't know why. "Plus I don't wanna risk my mom finding out. Want it to be a surprise."

Vickers nodded grimly. "Just curious." he said.

"Hey, maybe we can get you some blue and black ninja robes." James said with a grin.

Vickers just stared at him flatly.

"I'll shut up now." James said quietly.

"That'd be a nice change of pace." Vickers retorted. James nodded, then headed in.

\------------------------

Dranek revived with a shudder.

His lungs felt like they were filled with gravel, and when he coughed he thought the stuff that came out might have even had gravel in it.

Everything from his neck to his waist hurt. And his head was pounding.

What the hells had happened to him.

He tried to wipe his mouth of the wet mess he'd just coughed up.

That was when he realized that his hands were bound.

"\[Holy shit it's actually alive!\]" Someone said in an unfamiliar language near his.... bed? "\[Go get top.\]"

"\[How the fuck do you survive a fifty to the sternum?\]" Another voice said.

Dranek craned his neck to look at the source of this voice, as it sounded familiar. But the room or, he suspected, tent was dark except for a single lantern shining on him directly.

"Where am I?" He asked, fighting not to cough up any more of what he suspected might have been his original lungs. Or maybe ribs. "What did you do to me?"

Dranek sniffed deeply, trying to scent whoever was in the room with him.

A hand flashed into view for just a moment, a container in its hand. It squeezed it and foul ammonia scented mist sprayed into his face, making his nostrils burn.

The intensity of the smell, so directly attacking his nose, forced Dranek to whimper in pain.

"We'll ask the questions here." A new voice said as he heard the tent flap open and close.

He struggled against his bonds, trying to reach his nose. But the bindings, though narrow, were strong and tightly laced around his limbs and trunk.

"This is the so called... CARTOGRAPHY camp... isnt it?" Dranek asked, pain and anger evident in his tone.

The hand shot out again, and Dranek snapped at it. But the moment he did it pulled back and sprayed the foul chemical into his face, most of it landing in his open mouth.

"\[Jesus Christ. That's enough Isaacs. We only have so much of that stuff. Plus that's fucked up.\]" A woman's voice said from somewhere in the shadows.

"\[Doc. This is only happening here because you have the stuff necessary to monitor its vitals, such as they are. Plus your box is one of the few that can be used for the trip You don't need to stay if you don't want to.\]" The owner of the hand responded.

"\[We're not here to torture the locals.\]" The woman responded, sounding agitated now. "\[Either drop the bottle and do this in a humane manner OR GET THE HELL OUT OF MY MEDICAL TENT!\]"

"\[Isaacs. She's right. We're good here, go take five.\]" The new arrival said as it moved over near the lantern.

Dranek smelled the chemicals move away before hearing the container get set onto a table. Then the tent flap opened and someone left. His nose still burned.

Suddenly, the tent filled with light as the lantern's cover was removed and it was allowed to illuminate everything.

Standing next to it was the camp leader, Airix.

"So werewolves really can survive damn near anything." He said as he calmly pulled a chair in front of himself and sat on it backwards. "Hell of a trick."

For a moment, likely due to his recent return and abused nose, Dranek was confused by the statement. Then the implication of it sank in.

"You are.... from another world." Dranek said hesitantly. "From the hero's world?"

"I don't know what you're talking about." The man said in response. "We're just a cartography expedition."

"And I am a pretty little bird singing a song." Dranek countered sarcastically.

"Airix" stared at him with no hint of emotion.

"What were you doing sneaking around our camp?" He asked after a moment.

"I wanted some of that fancy, smeplie flavored tea." Dranek said with a chuckle.

The man took a deep, exasperated, breath. "Answering is easier on all of us than not answering." He said with a shake of his head. "We are not enemies."

"My regenerated organs would beg to differ." Dranek said as he peered down at his bare chest. "I think I have new lungs now."

"Speaking of weird, werewolf stuff." Not Airix said. "What's with the teeth? Why are yours silver. I thought that stuff could kill you?"

"You really are from another world than." Dranek said simply. "To not recognize the markings of a silver exile."

"So you're some kind of criminal then?"

"Since the day I was born. My mistake was simply not ensuring a kill." Dranek answered.

"Hmmm." The man said as he rested his hand on his chin. "I suddenly feel less bad about this."

"About what?" Dranek wondered with a silver grin. "Torturing me? I shall answer nothing. My comrades shall find me soon enough."

"Well." The man said with a grimace. "You will likely feel like you're being tortured. But its not going to happen here. And not with me." He tilted his head. "Assuming your regenerative abilities let you survive the trip."

Suddenly Dranek's bed was moving, as though under the effect of a levitation spell, though a few bumps made him realize that that was not the case.

"What?" He asked, suddenly confused. "What are you talking about? Where are you taking me?"

Before he knew what was happening, he was being lowered into some kind of hatch in the ground. It was lit by lights that looked odd even compared to the magical crystals that most mages and fancy homes used for light. After a moment his bed touched down on the ground of a lower level.

"Airix" descended a ladder in the same hatch a moment later.

"Intruder is ready for transit. Open the door whenever you're ready sir." He said into a button on his shirt.

"Door?" Dranek asked, beginning to panic now. "Where are you taking me!?!"

Suddenly there was a crackling, popping noise. Dranek felt a magical energy unlike any he'd ever been near before. A light began flickering nearby, slowly forming a widening sphere.

"WHAT IS THAT?" He asked, fear in his voice now. "WHAT ARE YOU DOING? I AM A MEMBER OF THE PETRAVIAN ARMY! A RANGER ON OFFICIAL DUTY! MY KIN WILL FIND ME! YOU WILL BE BROUGHT TO JUSTICE!"

Airix looked down at him curiously. "You're a ranger?" He asked.

Dranek nodded eagerly, hoping for any kind of thread of salvation to cling to.

"Me too." Airix replied. "Guessin' we didn't train at the same place though. Good luck on your trip." He lifted the button on his shirt up. "Transiting now." He said into it.

Then he grabbed the headboard of the bed and shoved Dranek into the glowing, crackling, sphere of alien energy.

For the split second before he entered it, Dranek wished that he wasn't such an outcast. That he'd come here with at least one other person. For the first time in years, the outcast werewolf felt true fear.

Then he was in it.

\------------------

Nguyen wasn't surprised by the look the doctor gave him as he emerged from the hatch. But he understood it. She was sworn to help people, and what they'd done to the wolf was anything but.

"You almost sounded like you enjoyed that." She said with a glare. "Good luck on your trip." She said mockingly. "You know damn well he's probably dead now."

Nguyen nodded. He wanted to tell her that he'd only made the joke because of how uncomfortable he himself was with the whole scenario. But something told him that she wouldn't believe him.

"Well. It's done." He said instead. "No undoing it now."

"You ever use my tent, my supplies, or ME for anything like that again." She said with a pointed finger. "I'll go to the local garrison and rat on this place myself. I didn't come here to torture or kill people. These people? This government? They're supposed to be our friends. Our allies."

Nguyen sighed. "I know." He said after a moment. "But I wasn't the one that gave the order."

"No." She agreed. "You just carried them out. Never heard that defense used before."

Then she stormed out of the tent.

Nguyen couldn't fault her for the criticism.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wyjxvn/wait_is_this_just_gate_215/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (213/?)

Previous

Writer's note: The thot plickens. Wonder what kinda implications this is gonna have.

FIND OUT ON THE NEXT EPISODE OF GATEBALL-Z!!!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"MIJO!" She exclaimed. "I thought you said they had magical healing in this world! Miss Amina what happened to him?"

This time it was James's turn to look at her as she blushed.

"I...." She stammered. "I'm not one of the healers." She said. "And it was James's fault in the first place." She added while gesturing to him. "He was the one that caused it."

"What?!?" He said, startled at the turnaround.

"James Michael Choi!" His mom yelled. "You used to have such a handsome face." She said, exasperated. James peered at Joey, who was trying to keep a neutral face. But James could see the grin in his eyes any time they looked at the camera. "Now it looks like your grandma's tripas!"

"Mom I'm fine." He assured her. "They're just scars." He gestured back to Amina. "It's not like I need to worry about it ruining my prospects for marriage or anything."

"Actually I've been rethinking that now that you're all.... hideous." Amina said with a barely veiled grin before taking a bite of her half of the breakfast sandwich.

"What?" James asked, too startled by yet another surprise statement.

The rest of the conversation was a series of blushes and being laughed at for James.

But he still enjoyed talking to his family. Even when they were joking at his expense.

\----------

Dranek slowly edged his way forward in the sand, keeping the edge of his camouflage cover pressed as low to the ground as he could while moving. It wasn't a perfect match for the sand, but night time was on his side, and he had dusted it and himself with the stuff just to be safe.

He paused every few yards to sniff at the air, careful to keep his noise level down as he did.

It had been nearly three days since he and the other soldiers had left the "Cartography" camp. Once the Sergeant had felt comfortable about the humans not thinking anything of them, he'd dispatched Dranek to do what he did best; sneak around and observe people that didn't want to be observed.

Dranek liked his job as a ranger.

It suited him well. He'd always been a tad sneaky. Perks of growing up in the Jadesport slums as the runt of his proverbial litter. The fact that he'd gotten branded and capped by the Lunar Council hadn't really affected him too much. He'd never been one for packs anyways, wolves or not.

Plus, as much as the teeth, steel with silver points and magical reinforcement, occasionally caused him pain. He kind of liked how they looked.

And while they marked him as an exile amongst his own kind, they also lent him an advantage if he ever had to fight other werewolves.

Some thought that this was an oversight by the council, making outcasts deadlier against their own. But he knew differently.

Yes it was an advantage in a fight. But winning fights with other wolves meant living alone longer, as opposed to dying, and as a result spiraling deeper into exile.

But.... He'd done the smart thing. He'd joined the army.

The royal army didn't care about your past, or affiliations. Long as you weren't a rapist, murderer, or foreign spy, you could join. Might never make it very high up the ranks without risking your life. But to Dranek, ranger was just fine. He liked the solitude. And being in the deep woods scouting was vastly superior to drinking himself to death, not that that was possible for a werewolf, in the gutters of some city, getting pissed on by every young moon changer who wanted to prove they were tough.

Plus, he got to help on missions like this one.

He looked down at the camp below, careful to keep the edge of his camouflage cover even with the top ridge of the dune he peered over. He watched eagerly with his wide, darkness piercing eyes as the "Cartographers" moved about below.

None of them were trekking out into the desert, which was fair given the time of night.

But also, as he thought of it, why were they even up at this time of night?

He peered up, angling ever so slightly to look up at the moon. It hadn't even hit the rings yet, but it was close. Why were any of them even awake? Save a guard or two they should have all been asleep.

Instead the camp was actually startlingly busy.

Yet Dranek smelled no ink and parchment, he sensed no impressive magical energies, none of the leather and glue of book bindings being stretched and pressed. He only smelled sweat and....

That was it. He smelled that OTHER smell. The odd, chemical scent that he couldn't comprehend.

And where before it had been faint, as if hidden. Now it seemed to come to him more strongly, and seemed to emanate from a good number of the people below, some more strongly than others.

Dranek wondered at the smell. While it was strange, and incredibly strong, he thought he could scent faint undertones that were at least familiar. Granted, most of them were smells that couldn't be found outside of a smithy or an alchemists shop. But there was still depth to the scent.

His hackles rose unexpectedly as the wind shifted suddenly, his lips curling back in a subconscious snarl before his mind had even processed the change.

That unknown smell was suddenly coming from behind him, and very close.

The ranger quickly rolled over onto his back as he tore the light tan cloak from off his back.

He launche to his feet, ready to engage when he saw a man in the cartographers guild colors standing some twenty yards away.

He had some kind of odd, insect-like, glasses over his eyes, and had a long metal device in his hands that Dranek knew would reek of the odd smell if he got closer, or if the wind shifted again. It had a long tube on top that reminded him of some of the looking glasses that he'd had over the years. But its lens was massive.

Dranek saw a small puff of sparks emerge from the end of the device closest to him.

Something punched him in the chest like a war hammer, completely ignoring his leather armor. He suddenly couldn't breath. The report from it arrived only a fraction of a second later.

POP!

That sound was the last thing he heard before dying. He had a moment to think. That's the smell. Before he was on the ground.

\------------------

Isaacs pulled the bolt back on the massive rifle as he slowly stepped forward. A small netted bag caught the nickel plated shell casing as it silently ejected. Then he silently slid the bolt back forward. He silently thanked himself for having the foresight to request the suppressed variant of his rifle's barrel a week before.

Isaacs didn't take the cross-hairs off of the downed werewolf. He knew from the intel gathered at the capital that it wasn't dead, and he hadn't intended to kill it either. It was just.... waiting to respawn.

At least that was the closest comparison the chief security officer could draw.

His off hand quickly pulled his jackets top button closer to his mouth for a second.

"Intruder down." He said as he walked forward. "Securing."

Isaacs had no doubt that under more even engagement conditions the wolf would have successfully snuck up on them. Maybe even infiltrated the camp to a limited extent.

It was dead silent in its movement. In fact, Isaacs had seen parallels between how it had been crawling and how he'd been trained to move in sniper school. Plus its cloak, while not perfect, was still damn good at keeping it hidden in the sand. But part of sniper school was also learning how to spot enemy snipers.

But Isaacs' glasses had made easy sport of the poor opponent, showing its thermal signature like a beacon in the cool sand. Plus they'd been warned by the motion sensors on top of the tents, hidden in the poles that held each of them up.

Everything after that had simply been keeping himself further downwind than the wolf, and keeping the rifle hidden in the bottomless bag that he'd picked up while in town with the doctor waiting on their sick comrade's recovery from pneumonia.

Luckily it had done the trick. He hadn't needed to get as close as he had, the rifle was accurate enough that he could have shot the wolf at any time he wanted. But he needed to see just how good the bag did at keeping it concealed. And it turned out that the answer was; quite.

As he got closer to the wolf he tilted the rifle at a forty five degree angle, using the reflex sights on the side. Not that he needed them at this range.

He kicked the downed wolf's leg, celebrating to himself at it's lack of reaction. He slung the rifle over his shoulder, but drew the short sword he'd taken to carrying in this world.

He wasn't sure how to check a pulse on a werewolf, so instead he pressed the cold blade to its snout, checking to see if its breath clouded the shined steel. After nearly a minute of waiting he was satisfied. He quickly pulled out a length of paracord and began rapidly tying up the, temporarily dead, werewolf.

Can this thing really come back from this kind of damage? He wondered as he turned it over to roll it onto its own cloak. The cloak quickly soaked with blood. Damn thing has a hole the size of a baseball in its back.

He scanned the dunes around him, cycling his glasses through their various modes as he did. Then began dragging the massive werewolf to camp, kicking fresh sand over the blood stained trail before he did. He'd have to come back later and really cover up.

But even his glasses couldn't pick up Danil's presence.

The old dwarf had used his sand control magic to tunnel his way under the dunes, following the ranger, more out of curiosity than anything else.

He hadn't expected murder. Much less one so brutally efficient.

Once he'd seen the man from the camp panning around he'd quickly retracted his observation tube back into the sand, collapsing it back into its carrying case rapidly once it was fully within his small sand burrow.

This had just gotten significantly more complicated.

He needed to tell the guard sergeant.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wxqnap/wait_is_this_just_gate_214/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (213/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: The thot plickens. Wonder what kinda implications this is gonna have.

FIND OUT ON THE NEXT EPISODE OF GATEBALL-Z!!!!!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Amina looked at him, barely containing a grin. James blushed as he ran a finger through his hair to show her.

"After the last big fight... with the uh... fire monster." He began. "Some of the damage wasn't really able to be fixed a hundred percent." He said softly, suddenly feeling like when he'd been caught covered in hot cocoa powder as a child.

"MIJO!" She exclaimed. "I thought you said they had magical healing in this world! Miss Amina what happened to him?"

This time it was James's turn to look at her as she blushed.

"I...." She stammered. "I'm not one of the healers." She said. "And it was James's fault in the first place." She added while gesturing to him. "He was the one that caused it."

"What?!?" He said, startled at the turnaround.

"James Michael Choi!" His mom yelled. "You used to have such a handsome face." She said, exasperated. James peered at Joey, who was trying to keep a neutral face. But James could see the grin in his eyes any time they looked at the camera. "Now it looks like your grandma's tripas!"

"Mom I'm fine." He assured her. "They're just scars." He gestured back to Amina. "It's not like I need to worry about it ruining my prospects for marriage or anything."

"Actually I've been rethinking that now that you're all.... hideous." Amina said with a barely veiled grin before taking a bite of her half of the breakfast sandwich.

"What?" James asked, too startled by yet another surprise statement.

The rest of the conversation was a series of blushes and being laughed at for James.

But he still enjoyed talking to his family. Even when they were joking at his expense.

\----------

Dranek slowly edged his way forward in the sand, keeping the edge of his camouflage cover pressed as low to the ground as he could while moving. It wasn't a perfect match for the sand, but night time was on his side, and he had dusted it and himself with the stuff just to be safe.

He paused every few yards to sniff at the air, careful to keep his noise level down as he did.

It had been nearly three days since he and the other soldiers had left the "Cartography" camp. Once the Sergeant had felt comfortable about the humans not thinking anything of them, he'd dispatched Dranek to do what he did best; sneak around and observe people that didn't want to be observed.

Dranek liked his job as a ranger.

It suited him well. He'd always been a tad sneaky. Perks of growing up in the Jadesport slums as the runt of his proverbial litter. The fact that he'd gotten branded and capped by the Lunar Council hadn't really affected him too much. He'd never been one for packs anyways, wolves or not.

Plus, as much as the teeth, steel with silver points and magical reinforcement, occasionally caused him pain. He kind of liked how they looked.

And while they marked him as an exile amongst his own kind, they also lent him an advantage if he ever had to fight other werewolves.

Some thought that this was an oversight by the council, making outcasts deadlier against their own. But he knew differently.

Yes it was an advantage in a fight. But winning fights with other wolves meant living alone longer, as opposed to dying, and as a result spiraling deeper into exile.

But.... He'd done the smart thing. He'd joined the army.

The royal army didn't care about your past, or affiliations. Long as you weren't a rapist, murderer, or foreign spy, you could join. Might never make it very high up the ranks without risking your life. But to Dranek, ranger was just fine. He liked the solitude. And being in the deep woods scouting was vastly superior to drinking himself to death, not that that was possible for a werewolf, in the gutters of some city, getting pissed on by every young moon changer who wanted to prove they were tough.

Plus, he got to help on missions like this one.

He looked down at the camp below, careful to keep the edge of his camouflage cover even with the top ridge of the dune he peered over. He watched eagerly with his wide, darkness piercing eyes as the "Cartographers" moved about below.

None of them were trekking out into the desert, which was fair given the time of night.

But also, as he thought of it, why were they even up at this time of night?

He peered up, angling ever so slightly to look up at the moon. It hadn't even hit the rings yet, but it was close. Why were any of them even awake? Save a guard or two they should have all been asleep.

Instead the camp was actually startlingly busy.

Yet Dranek smelled no ink and parchment, he sensed no impressive magical energies, none of the leather and glue of book bindings being stretched and pressed. He only smelled sweat and....

That was it. He smelled that OTHER smell. The odd, chemical scent that he couldn't comprehend.

And where before it had been faint, as if hidden. Now it seemed to come to him more strongly, and seemed to emanate from a good number of the people below, some more strongly than others.

Dranek wondered at the smell. While it was strange, and incredibly strong, he thought he could scent faint undertones that were at least familiar. Granted, most of them were smells that couldn't be found outside of a smithy or an alchemists shop. But there was still depth to the scent.

His hackles rose unexpectedly as the wind shifted suddenly, his lips curling back in a subconscious snarl before his mind had even processed the change.

That unknown smell was suddenly coming from behind him, and very close.

The ranger quickly rolled over onto his back as he tore the light tan cloak from off his back.

He launched to his feet, ready to engage when he saw a man in the cartographers guild colors standing some twenty yards away.

He had some kind of odd, insect-like, glasses over his eyes, and had a long metal device in his hands that Dranek knew would reek of the odd smell if he got closer, or if the wind shifted again. It had a long tube on top that reminded him of some of the looking glasses that he'd had over the years. But its lens was massive.

Dranek saw a small puff of sparks emerge from the end of the device closest to him.

Something punched him in the chest like a war hammer, completely ignoring his leather armor. He suddenly couldn't breath. The report from it arrived only a fraction of a second later.

POP!

That sound was the last thing he heard before dying. He had a moment to think. That's the smell. Before he was on the ground.

\----------

Isaacs pulled the bolt back on the massive rifle as he slowly stepped forward. A small netted bag caught the nickel plated shell casing as it silently ejected. Then he silently slid the bolt back forward. He quietly thanked himself for having the foresight to request the suppressed variant of his rifle's barrel a week before.

Isaacs didn't take the cross-hairs off of the downed werewolf. He knew from the intel gathered at the capital that it wasn't dead, and he hadn't intended to kill it either. It was just.... waiting to respawn.

At least that was the closest comparison the chief security officer could draw.

His off hand quickly pulled his jackets top button closer to his mouth for a second.

"Intruder down." He said as he walked forward. "Securing."

Isaacs had no doubt that under more even engagement conditions the wolf would have successfully snuck up on them. Maybe even infiltrated the camp to a limited extent.

It was dead silent in its movement. In fact, Isaacs had seen parallels between how it had been crawling and how he'd been trained to move in sniper school. Plus its cloak, while not perfect, was still damn good at keeping it hidden in the sand. But part of sniper school was also learning how to spot enemy snipers.

But Isaacs' glasses had made easy sport of the poor opponent, showing its thermal signature like a beacon in the cool sand. Plus they'd been warned by the motion sensors on top of the tents, hidden in the poles that held each of them up.

Everything after that had simply been keeping himself further downwind than the wolf, and keeping the rifle hidden in the bottomless bag that he'd picked up while in town with the doctor waiting on their sick comrade's recovery from pneumonia.

Luckily it had done the trick. He hadn't needed to get as close as he had, the rifle was accurate enough that he could have shot the wolf at any time he wanted. But he needed to see just how good the bag did at keeping it concealed. And it turned out that the answer was; quite.

As he got closer to the wolf he tilted the rifle at a forty five degree angle, using the reflex sights on the side. Not that he needed them at this range.

He kicked the downed wolf's leg, celebrating to himself at it's lack of reaction. He slung the rifle over his shoulder, but drew the short sword he'd taken to carrying in this world.

He wasn't sure how to check a pulse on a werewolf, so instead he pressed the cold blade to its snout, checking to see if its breath clouded the shined steel. After nearly a minute of waiting he was satisfied. He quickly pulled out a length of paracord and began rapidly tying up the, temporarily dead, werewolf.

Can this thing really come back from this kind of damage? He wondered as he turned it over to roll it onto its own cloak. The cloak quickly soaked with blood. Damn thing has a hole the size of a baseball in its back.

He scanned the dunes around him, cycling his glasses through their various modes as he did. Then began dragging the massive werewolf to camp, kicking fresh sand over the blood stained trail before he did. He'd have to come back later and really cover up.

But even his glasses couldn't pick up Danil's presence.

The old dwarf had used his sand control magic to tunnel his way under the dunes, following the ranger, more out of curiosity than anything else.

He hadn't expected murder. Much less one so brutally efficient.

Once he'd seen the man from the camp panning around he'd quickly retracted his observation tube back into the sand, collapsing it back into its carrying case rapidly once it was fully within his small sand burrow.

This had just gotten significantly more complicated.

He needed to tell the guard sergeant.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wxqkup/wait_is_this_just_gate_214/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (212/?)

Previous

Writer's note: MORE PROGRESS!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"They've.... got a few." The General replied. "But getting them to work will require extensive preparation and I'll have to get clearance from my superiors." He took a deep breath. "And..... you and Secretary Grant will have to come to some agreements... Officially, your majesty."

King Farrick nodded as he puffed out his cheeks a bit. "Hoped you wouldn't say that." He took a deep breath of his own. "I take it he's already drafting up....." He closed his eyes for a moment. "papers?"

General Krick just nodded in response.

"Fantastic." The King said sarcastically. "I look forward to reading them. In the mean time is there anything you will need us to look into?"

"Um actually there is." The General admitted. "Though it's... somewhat tangential. And might be.... socially.... delicate."

King Farrick perked up at that. "Oh?" He said.

"It's about magic." Krick added. "Namely... how does it work? Not like, how you use it. But the actual fundamentals."

The mages ceased their murmuring almost immediately to look at the screen, roused out of their conversation by the mention of their field of choice.

"What do you mean?" Marcos asked before the King could.

"Well." The General said hesitantly. "We can study.... almost anything, as long as we understand it's constituent pieces." He nodded toward James and Amina. "You read our medical books. You saw how deeply our scientific study can dive into something. We understand the very cells that makeup human biology. And those books didn't mention it, but we can go even smaller than that."

"Wait." Veliry interrupted. "You're talking umm..." She looked to James. "Atomics?" She asked him cautiously.

"Ah." He replied. "Particle physics. Subatomics." He looked back at the General. "Had to explain how I do my oxygen fire trick." He said. "I got approval for it sir." He reassured.

Krick nodded with a raised eyebrow. "That would be the gist of it yes. We need to understand how magic WORKS. What causes it. We know it plays a roll in the trip between worlds. But we need to know how its reacting on OUR side of the trip. Is it trying to help and failing? Or is it some kind of failsafe preventing return trips?" He looked off to the side of his screen for a moment. "On of our people believes that it being part of your bodies might have some theological relevance." He shrugged. "We need to know more so we can put it into our calculations."

Veliry looked to the King with a pleading look.

King Farrick sighed before turning back. "I have no issue with that General. But I would.... HIGHLY.... recommend that you let that conversation occur between our..." He nodded to Veliry. "Research staff."

General Krick nodded slowly. James could hear the muffled conversation off camera on his side.

"Message received sir. I had no intentions otherwise. And thank you, for being so understanding." Krick said as he stepped aside. The King simply nodded. "This is Doctor Oikonomou, or Doctor O. if you prefer. He is the one in charge of the team that came up with the theory."

A frazzle haired, tan skinned man stepped on screen with a smile and wave as King Farrick looked to James who then woke Amina up from her drooling half slumber.

Veliry and the other mages quickly crowded closer to the camera.

"Hi." The doctor said. "I've been dying to get to talk to you guys." He admitted.

"First things first." Veliry said eagerly. "We're all wondering. What is.... gravity? And what does the size of our world have to do with it?"

Dr. Oikonomou's head tilted forward as his eyebrows shot up at the unexpected question.

\-------------------------

"Well. That does all appear to be in order." Sergeant Vhiner'ys said with a sigh. "Still odd that someone wants to map this place out. But, like you said. That's above your head." He handed the scroll back to Nguyen, who took it eagerly.

"Just doing a job." Nguyen said. "How do you like the tea?"

As if to answer the Sergeant of the guard drained his glass in a gulp. He wiped his lips. "Delicious." He said simply. "What is that flavor? That sour fruity flavor?" He asked.

Nguyen smiled. "Ah, that's a single drop of Smeplie juice in the pitcher. A trick that one of our cooks learned while they were traveling on a ship." He lied easily. He didn't want to admit that it was lemon, since they were apparently not native to this world. An unexpected issue with the tea they'd brought with them. He was sure that someone on Earth was scrubbing toilets because of it.

"Hmm." Vhiner'ys hummed with a nod. "Makes sense. That'd help with the sea fever." He tilted the glass back, getting the last few drops. "I'll have to have my husband try that the next time we have someone over. Assuming I ever get out of this gods forsaken desert." He said with a smile.

"Glad you like it." Nguyen said, returning the smile.

"Well." The Sergeant said, ignoring the remark. "Everything looks good here." He gestured around at his people, most of whom were lounging or chatting with the other camp members.

But Nguyen noticed that some were actively inspecting the camp. Especially the werewolves.

"We'll get out of your hair." The Sergeant finished. "Head out and check the Dunebasher's setup. Make sure they have things locked down. They usually do."

"Glad my people could have everything lined up right for once in my life." Nguyen said with a chuckle. "First time for everything."

"You're telling me." The large elf said as he waved his arms at his men. "Come on you lot!" He yelled at them. "Let's go wrangle some dwarves before they accidentally wake up a darkwyrm!"

His men groaned and complained, reminding Nguyen of how his own people tended to act before shit duty. But they all complied.

Vhiner'ys turned back and held his arm out. Nguyen clasped it in the local style.

"Have fun out here Airix." He said as they shook. "Let the guards in Valleyend know whenever you lot head back home."

"Will do." Nguyen replied. "Stop by on your way out of the desert, we'll get you some more of that tea."

Vhiner'ys pointed a finger at him with a grin. "Deal." He said as he turned to leave.

Nguyen stopped for a moment as he was about to enter the main tent and watched them leave. He could only hope that they had sold the whole thing.

He nodded at Isaacs as he stepped in.

"I think we're good." He said to the head of security for the expedition.

Isaacs peeked out of the tent flap. "I'm still gonna keep a pistol under my pillow for a while." He said.

"Fair." Nguyen agreed. "Fuckin' tea almost fucked us."

\----------

As the soldiers slowly trudged over the nearby dune Sergeant Vhiner'ys caught up to Guard Ranger Dranek Godsnose.

"That place was faker than a diamond ring sold in a port's back alley to a young, smitten sailor." He said to the brand-scarred werewolf.

Dranek grinned, revealing the metal capped teeth that marked him as an outcast among his kind.

"Pretty sure that's the consensus among all the men." He replied to the Sergeant. "And there was some odd chemical smell. But it was incredibly faint. I think maybe hidden somewhere."

"The kind of smell that we were warned about?" Vhiner'ys asked.

"They said the smells were unlike anything we'd ever scented before." He thought for a moment. "I'd need to get a good long whiff to confirm. But I think so."

"Their paperwork? All of it?" Vhiner'ys said. "Perfect. Every single page."

Dranek stopped his trudging walk for a moment. "Perfect paperwork?" He asked. "In what world can the cartographers guild.... or any guild for that matter... get perfect paperwork?" He gestured at the desert around them, making Vhiner'ys glad that they were already on the other side of the mountain of sand. "Especially here."

"Exactly." The Elf said in response. "I hate to admit it. But I'm gonna owe that old dwarf a cask of ale for this." He said as they continued walking.

Dranek caught up and whispered.

"When we gonna make a move?" He asked.

Vhiner'ys looked back at the dune they'd moved over, then around. Dranek also looked, though he couldn't smell any of the humans around them.

"We'll send Hinden flying back to the garrison." The elf said a moment later. "Have him bring in some griffin riders. If these 'cartographers' are who the capital was looking for, then they may be more dangerous than they look."

Dranek grinned.

"Maybe to you lot." He said. Then he opened his fanged maw and tapped a finger to one of his capped teeth. His finger sizzling a little bit as it touched the point, which was made of silver. "But I didn't smell any silver there."

Vhiner'ys grinned back. "In time ranger. In time."

[\[next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wwxfgv/wait_is_this_just_gate_213/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (212/?)

Previous / First

Writer's note: MORE PROGRESS!

Enjoy.

\~

James leaned back in his chair, letting Amina lean into him a bit as they listened to General Krick on the communication station. She'd only arrived a few hours earlier from her trip, and was half asleep despite the importance of the meeting.

"So that's what our scientists have come up with." The General said. "A combination of increased gravity and pressure, mixed with magical mechanics that occur BETWEEN our worlds that we have yet to quantify."

Veliry, Marcos, and several other mages were busily discussing the information as the King spoke up.

"So what does this mean in terms of establishing a return trip?" He asked, ignoring the murmuring. "Have your people thought up any solutions?"

"They've.... got a few." The General replied. "But getting them to work will require extensive preparation and I'll have to get clearance from my superiors." He took a deep breath. "And..... you and Secretary Grant will have to come to some agreements... Officially, your majesty."

King Farrick nodded as he puffed out his cheeks a bit. "Hoped you wouldn't say that." He took a deep breath of his own. "I take it he's already drafting up......" He closed his eyes for a moment. "papers?"

General Krick just nodded in response.

"Fantastic." The King said sarcastically. "I look forward to reading them. In the mean time is there anything you will need us to look into?"

"Um actually there is." The General admitted. "Though it's... somewhat tangential. And might be.... socially.... delicate."

King Farrick perked up at that. "Oh?" He said.

"It's about magic." Krick added. "Namely... how does it work? Not like, how you use it. But the actual fundamentals."

The mages ceased their murmuring almost immediately to look at the screen, roused out of their conversation by the mention of their field of choice.

"What do you mean?" Marcos asked before the King could.

"Well." The General said hesitantly. "We can study.... almost anything, as long as we understand it's constituent pieces." He nodded toward James and Amina. "You read our medical books. You saw how deeply our scientific study can dive into something. We understand the very cells that makeup human biology. And those books didn't mention it, but we can go even smaller than that."

"Wait." Veliry interrupted. "You're talking umm..." She looked to James. "Atomics?" She asked him cautiously.

"Ah." He replied. "Particle physics. Subatomics." He looked back at the General. "Had to explain how I do my oxygen fire trick." He said. "I got approval for it sir." He reassured.

Krick nodded with a raised eyebrow. "That would be the gist of it yes. We need to understand how magic WORKS. What causes it. We know it plays a roll in the trip between worlds. But we need to know how its reacting on OUR side of the trip. Is it trying to help and failing? Or is it some kind of failsafe preventing return trips?" He looked off to the side of his screen for a moment. "On of our people believes that it being part of your bodies might have some theological relevance." He shrugged. "We need to know more so we can put it into our calculations."

Veliry looked to the King with a pleading look.

King Farrick sighed before turning back. "I have no issue with that General. But I would.... HIGHLY.... recommend that you let that conversation occur between our..." He nodded to Veliry. "Research staff."

General Krick nodded slowly. James could hear the muffled conversation off camera on his side.

"Message received sir. I had no intentions otherwise. And thank you, for being so understanding." Krick said as he stepped aside. The King simply nodded. "This is Doctor Oikonomou, or Doctor O. if you prefer. He is the one in charge of the team that came up with the theory."

A frazzle haired, tan skinned man stepped on screen with a smile and wave as King Farrick looked to James who then woke Amina up from her drooling half slumber.

Veliry and the other mages quickly crowded closer to the camera.

"Hi." The doctor said. "I've been dying to get to talk to you guys." He admitted.

"First things first." Veliry said eagerly. "We're all wondering. What is.... gravity? And what does the size of our world have to do with it?"

Dr. Oikonomou's head tilted forward as his eyebrows shot up at the unexpected question.

\-------------------------

"Well. That does all appear to be in order." Sergeant Vhiner'ys said with a sigh. "Still odd that someone wants to map this place out. But, like you said. That's above your head." He handed the scroll back to Nguyen, who took it eagerly.

"Just doing a job." Nguyen said. "How do you like the tea?"

As if to answer the Sergeant of the guard drained his glass in a gulp. He wiped his lips. "Delicious." He said simply. "What is that flavor? That sour fruity flavor?" He asked.

Nguyen smiled. "Ah, that's a single drop of Smeplie juice in the pitcher. A trick that one of our cooks learned while they were traveling on a ship." He lied easily. He didn't want to admit that it was lemon, since they were apparently not native to this world. An unexpected issue with the tea they'd brought with them. He was sure that someone on Earth was scrubbing toilets because of it.

"Hmm." Vhiner'ys hummed with a nod. "Makes sense. That'd help with the sea fever." He tilted the glass back, getting the last few drops. "I'll have to have my husband try that the next time we have someone over. Assuming I ever get out of this gods forsaken desert." He said with a smile.

"Glad you like it." Nguyen said, returning the smile.

"Well." The Sergeant said, ignoring the remark. "Everything looks good here." He gestured around at his people, most of whom were lounging or chatting with the other camp members.

But Nguyen noticed that some were actively inspecting the camp. Especially the werewolves.

"We'll get out of your hair." The Sergeant finished. "Head out and check the Dunebasher's setup. Make sure they have things locked down. They usually do."

"Glad my people could have everything lined up right for once in my life." Nguyen said with a chuckle. "First time for everything."

"You're telling me." The large elf said as he waved his arms at his men. "Come on you lot!" He yelled at them. "Let's go wrangle some dwarves before they accidentally wake up a darkwyrm!"

His men groaned and complained, reminding Nguyen of how his own people tended to act before shit duty. But they all complied.

Vhiner'ys turned back and held his arm out. Nguyen clasped it in the local style.

"Have fun out here Airix." He said as they shook. "Let the guards in Valleyend know whenever you lot head back home."

"Will do." Nguyen replied. "Stop by on your way out of the desert, we'll get you some more of that tea."

Vhiner'ys pointed a finger at him with a grin. "Deal." He said as he turned to leave.

Nguyen stopped for a moment as he was about to enter the main tent and watched them leave. He could only hope that they had sold the whole thing.

He nodded at Isaacs as he stepped in.

"I think we're good." He said to the head of security for the expedition.

Isaacs peeked out of the tent flap. "I'm still gonna keep a pistol under my pillow for a while." He said.

"Fair." Nguyen agreed. "Fuckin' tea almost fucked us."

\----------

As the soldiers slowly trudged over the nearby dune Sergeant Vhiner'ys caught up to Guard Ranger Dranek Godsnose.

"That place was faker than a diamond ring sold in a port's back alley to a young, smitten sailor." He said to the brand-scarred werewolf.

Dranek grinned, revealing the metal capped teeth that marked him as an outcast among his kind.

"Pretty sure that's the consensus among all the men." He replied to the Sergeant. "And there was some odd chemical smell. But it was incredibly faint. I think maybe hidden somewhere."

"The kind of smell that we were warned about?" Vhiner'ys asked.

"They said the smells were unlike anything we'd ever scented before." He thought for a moment. "I'd need to get a good long whiff to confirm. But I think so."

"Their paperwork? All of it?" Vhiner'ys said. "Perfect. Every single page."

Dranek stopped his trudging walk for a moment. "Perfect paperwork?" He asked. "In what world can the cartographers guild.... or any guild for that matter... get perfect paperwork?" He gestured at the desert around them, making Vhiner'ys glad that they were already on the other side of the mountain of sand. "Especially here."

"Exactly." The Elf said in response. "I hate to admit it. But I'm gonna owe that old dwarf a cask of ale for this." He said as they continued walking.

Dranek caught up and whispered.

"When we gonna make a move?" He asked.

Vhiner'ys looked back at the dune they'd moved over, then around. Dranek also looked, though he couldn't smell any of the humans around them.

"We'll send Hinden flying back to the garrison." The elf said a moment later. "Have him bring in some griffin riders. If these 'cartographers' are who the capital was looking for, then they may be more dangerous than they look."

Dranek grinned.

"Maybe to you lot." He said. Then he opened his fanged maw and tapped a finger to one of his capped teeth. His finger sizzling a little bit as it touched the point, which was made of silver. "But I didn't smell any silver there."

Vhiner'ys grinned back. "In time ranger. In time."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wwxcib/wait_is_this_just_gate_213/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (211/?)

Previous

Writer's note: As much as I love moving the story forward. It always complicates things.

Also I aint gotta explain shit. The answer is magic shenanigans interacting with a non magical world. Like the General and his staff you're just gonna have to deal with it.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

eyes. "No no. Project outward. Visualize the ice as a weapon of some kind. A spear or something."

"I'm trying. And yeah, no heads up what it was." Vickers replied as the icy spikes protruding from his knuckles extended a few inches before stopping. "This is harder than you make it look." He admitted.

"There's a reason I keep blowing myself up." James said with a chuckle. "Close your eyes. Think.... I don't know.... wolverine?" James wondered. "You seem to be taking this a wolverine kinda direction."

"I only got this far because I wanted my punches to be..." He sighed. ".... cooler." Vickers finished.

James just stared at him flatly.

"Yeah I know." Vickers said before James could make a joke.

"Okay." James said with a light shake of his head. "You're a boxer right?" He asked. "I mean. That's the vibe I get when we're sparring, and that's what your training sessions look like."

"Yeah." Vickers answered. "Golden gloves a year after high school."

"Nice." James said with a nod. "Well. Okay. You play Punch-Out X?"

"Yeah. Ships love that game for some reason." Vickers replied. Then he nodded with apprehension. "Kid Frost? Really?"

"Yeah." James said with a grin. "Visualize his stuff."

Vickers groaned. "Weakest character in the game." He said to himself as he closed his eyes.

"Unless he's being played by my little brother." James said under his breath. He jogged over to the side and moved a dummy in front of Vickers. "Alright. When you're ready there's a dummy a few yards in front of you."

James stepped back and made his eyes glow again. He was still getting used to the "Mana-Vision" as he called it. Veliry had only taught it to him a few days earlier. It made things look kind of Acid-Trippy for his taste.

"There you go." He said as he saw the familiar cold energy flowing into Vickers' hands, looking just like his wind magic did when he was readying a pneumatic blast. "Hit the dummy."

Vickers took a deep breath. Then he planted a foot behind him before stepping forward. To James he looked like a martial artist readying a strike, which he supposed was accurate.

"HAH!" Vickers exclaimed while exhaling as his right hand flashed forward, cold vapor trails following it as it formed a fist.

A wave of cold energy slammed into the dummy in a cloud.

James watched in surprise as the dummy almost immediately frosted over, forming small ice crystals on its torso.

Vickers was staring at it with wide eyes.

"Hell yeah dude!" James yelled as he ran over to inspect the dummy.

"Did I just do that?" Vickers asked in a shocked whisper.

James looked back with a huge smile. "Fuck yeah man!" He shouted back at him. He turned back and touched the frosty target. "I mean. It's just a light dusting. But still." He turned back again. "Success!" He said with a cheesy thumbs up.

Vickers grinned. "Hey Choi?" He called out.

"Yeah?" James wondered as he continued looking at the frost damage, which was quickly melting.

"Remember all them jokes you made about me being a furry?" Vickers asked.

"Ye-" James began before being blasted by icy cold magic that sent a literal shiver up his spine before he could react.

"We're even now." Vickers said as he blew the ice steam off of his fist like it was a smoking pistol.

"Not cool." James groaned from where he was writhing on the ground. "Or too cool..... Auuuugh!... The puns." He grunted as he tried to shoot flames over his back. "Cold blooded!"

Vickers worked on getting the trick to work with his left hand, hitting the dummy several more times as he ignored James's groans and squirms as he tried to thaw the back of his jacket.

\------------------------------

"So let me get this straight." General Krick said as he listened to the different scientists and technicians explain the issue. "It's just pressure? It's all what? Some kind of magic induced version of the bends?"

Dr. Oikonomou thought for a moment. "That's..... actually fairly accurate." He said. "Only instead of a diver coming up from... seventy or eighty feet. It's more like they're launching out of the water from a hundred fifty or so."

"All because their world is bigger than ours?" Krick asked.

"And most likely denser." Another person replied. "At least based on what we could see of its rings and the fact that it maintains two moons, even if one is small."

"So they have more gravity." Krick said to himself, not a question but an observation.

"Yes sir." Dr. O replied. "We estimate at least a full thirty seven percent. Give or take. That's just based on planet size. Obviously density would be harder to calculate. We'd have to get soil samples, and core samples from-"

Krick cut him off with a hand gesture. "How are they alive right now?" He asked. "Wouldn't they have been incredibly weakened when they first got there?" He looked around. "I mean, I'm not a doctor or biologist. But wouldn't they have struggled to even breath?"

"And we think that's actually why things don't survive the trip back." The doctor replied. "We've been sending things back using a technological recreation of something that was created with magic." He gestured around at the other people. "We think that MAGICAL aspect did something to them on the way over. Some kind of forced acclimatization."

"Have we confirmed the theory?" Krick asked. "How would we do that?"

"We.... kind of did." Dr O. said hesitantly. He continued at Krick's raised eyebrow. "We sent a metal container... basically a thermos... But one with a predefined capacity, specifically one liter, of plane old water." He turned his tablet around so the General could watch a video. "No shielding or any trickery. Just metal and water." He hit the play button. "They sent it back immediately. Before magical saturation should have had any real chance to affect it."

In the video the thermos landed on the ground almost at the same second that it exploded in a spray of vaporized water and shredded metal reminiscent of a pipe bomb.

"We measured the amount of water we were capable of scraping up." The doctor continued. " It was more than a liter." He looked around in the eager way that only a confused scientist could. "Somehow that water got..... condensed? Added to? We don't know. But there was nearly a third more after the return trip."

Krick shook his head. "We have former inmate Deangelo in sick bay." He said with disbelief. "He didn't explode."

Oikonomou nodded grimly. "He was as protected as we could get him." The doctor admitted. "But he's also brain dead in all but name sir." He gestured to a different person. Krick recognized her as one of the doctors on Deangelo's care roster.

"It's consistent with an embolic stroke sir." She said. "If the gasses and fluids in his body were... increased... like Doctor Oikonomou and his staff believe. It would explain it. AND it would explain some of the muscle and organ damage we've found in the rest of his body."

Krick ran his hand over his face, wishing for one of his smokes.

"So what does the magic have to do with it?" He asked. "I thought we were working on the assumption that IT was what was causing the damage."

"We don't know." Oikonomou said. "It could still be playing a part. But it could also be," He shrugged. "maybe, trying to HELP the things that come through." He said the last part almost like a question.

"What do you mean?" The General asked.

Another person spoke up. "Well. In their world they LIVE with magic. It even alters their cellular biology. And in doing so it makes them stronger, faster, tougher, and of course able to USE magic."

"Yeah. We know that." Krick responded.

"Maybe it protects them." They continued. "They have gods. And these gods grant favors to the people they like. Like the werewolf captain. And Captain Choi." They shrugged. "In our world the gods were said to have created people and different creatures. In their world that's probably LITERALLY the case. Maybe the magic is how the gods keep their people alive." She looked around at everyone staring at her. "Least. That's my theory."

General Krick pressed both of his hands to his temples. "Great." He said softly. "Now it's a theological issue." He lingered for a moment, trying to comprehend all of it. "Okay." He said after a while of awkward silence. "Who has an idea for a solution?"

Dr. O spoke up first. "We think that might actually be the easiest thing." He said. "If a bit.... logistically complicated."

Krick looked at him wearily before moving his hand in a rotating "Get on with it" gesture.

"We send over the materiel necessary to set up a doorway device on the other side." He tilted his head a bit. "And we tell it to send something home."

The general took a deep breath before lowering his head until his forehead was resting on the top of the table.

He sighed.

"Figure out what we'll need. Make a grocery list." He said at last. "I'll call the Secretary." He sagged. "And the King."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/ww1mu8/wait_is_this_just_gate_212/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (211/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: As much as I love moving the story forward. It always complicates things.

Also I aint gotta explain shit. The answer is magic shenanigans interacting with a non magical world. Like the General and his staff you're just gonna have to deal with it.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"Yeah." Vickers answered. "Golden gloves a year after high school."

"Nice." James said with a nod. "Well. Okay. You play Punch-Out X?"

"Yeah. Ships love that game for some reason." Vickers replied. Then he nodded with apprehension. "Kid Frost? Really?"

"Yeah." James said with a grin. "Visualize his stuff."

Vickers groaned. "Weakest character in the game." He said to himself as he closed his eyes.

"Unless he's being played by my little brother." James said under his breath. He jogged over to the side and moved a dummy in front of Vickers. "Alright. When you're ready there's a dummy a few yards in front of you."

James stepped back and made his eyes glow again. He was still getting used to the "Mana-Vision" as he called it. Veliry had only taught it to him a few days earlier. It made things look kind of Acid-Trippy for his taste.

"There you go." He said as he saw the familiar cold energy flowing into Vickers' hands, looking just like his wind magic did when he was readying a pneumatic blast. "Hit the dummy."

Vickers took a deep breath. Then he planted a foot behind him before stepping forward. To James he looked like a martial artist readying a strike, which he supposed was accurate.

"HAH!" Vickers exclaimed while exhaling as his right hand flashed forward, cold vapor trails following it as it formed a fist.

A wave of cold energy slammed into the dummy in a cloud.

James watched in surprise as the dummy almost immediately frosted over, forming small ice crystals on its torso.

Vickers was staring at it with wide eyes.

"Hell yeah dude!" James yelled as he ran over to inspect the dummy.

"Did I just do that?" Vickers asked in a shocked whisper.

James looked back with a huge smile. "Fuck yeah man!" He shouted back at him. He turned back and touched the frosty target. "I mean. It's just a light dusting. But still." He turned back again. "Success!" He said with a cheesy thumbs up.

Vickers grinned. "Hey Choi?" He called out.

"Yeah?" James wondered as he continued looking at the frost damage, which was quickly melting.

"Remember all them jokes you made about me being a furry?" Vickers asked.

"Ye-" James began before being blasted by icy cold magic that sent a literal shiver up his spine before he could react.

"We're even now." Vickers said as he blew the ice steam off of his fist like it was a smoking pistol.

"Not cool." James groaned from where he was writhing on the ground. "Or too cool..... Auuuugh!... The puns." He grunted as he tried to shoot flames over his back. "Cold blooded!"

Vickers worked on getting the trick to work with his left hand, hitting the dummy several more times as he ignored James's groans and squirms as he tried to thaw the back of his jacket.

\------------------------------

"So let me get this straight." General Krick said as he listened to the different scientists and technicians explain the issue. "It's just pressure? It's all what? Some kind of magic induced version of the bends?"

Dr. Oikonomou thought for a moment. "That's..... actually fairly accurate." He said. "Only instead of a diver coming up from... seventy or eighty feet. It's more like they're launching out of the water from a hundred fifty or so."

"All because their world is bigger than ours?" Krick asked.

"And most likely denser." Another person replied. "At least based on what we could see of its rings and the fact that it maintains two moons, even if one is small."

"So they have more gravity." Krick said to himself, not a question but an observation.

"Yes sir." Dr. O replied. "We estimate at least a full thirty seven percent. Give or take. That's just based on planet size. Obviously density would be harder to calculate. We'd have to get soil samples, and core samples from-"

Krick cut him off with a hand gesture. "How are they alive right now?" He asked. "Wouldn't they have been incredibly weakened when they first got there?" He looked around. "I mean, I'm not a doctor or biologist. But wouldn't they have struggled to even breath?"

"And we think that's actually why things don't survive the trip back." The doctor replied. "We've been sending things back using a technological recreation of something that was created with magic." He gestured around at the other people. "We think that MAGICAL aspect did something to them on the way over. Some kind of forced acclimatization."

"Have we confirmed the theory?" Krick asked. "How would we do that?"

"We.... kind of did." Dr O. said hesitantly. He continued at Krick's raised eyebrow. "We sent a metal container... basically a thermos... But one with a predefined capacity, specifically one liter, of plain old water." He turned his tablet around so the General could watch a video. "No shielding or any trickery. Just metal and water." He hit the play button. "They sent it back immediately. Before magical saturation should have had any real chance to affect it."

In the video the thermos landed on the ground almost at the same second that it exploded in a spray of vaporized water and shredded metal reminiscent of a pipe bomb.

"We measured the amount of water we were capable of scraping up." The doctor continued. " It was more than a liter." He looked around in the eager way that only a confused scientist could. "Somehow that water got..... condensed? Added to? We don't know. But there was nearly a third more after the return trip."

Krick shook his head. "We have former inmate Deangelo in sick bay." He said with disbelief. "He didn't explode."

Oikonomou nodded grimly. "He was as protected as we could get him." The doctor admitted. "But he's also brain dead in all but name sir." He gestured to a different person. Krick recognized her as one of the doctors on Deangelo's care roster.

"It's consistent with an embolic stroke sir." She said. "If the gasses and fluids in his body were... increased... like Doctor Oikonomou and his staff believe. It would explain it. AND it would explain some of the muscle and organ damage we've found in the rest of his body."

Krick ran his hand over his face, wishing for one of his smokes.

"So what does the magic have to do with it?" He asked. "I thought we were working on the assumption that IT was what was causing the damage."

"We don't know." Oikonomou said. "It could still be playing a part. But it could also be," He shrugged. "maybe, trying to HELP the things that come through." He said the last part almost like a question.

"What do you mean?" The General asked.

Another person spoke up. "Well. In their world they LIVE with magic. It even alters their cellular biology. And in doing so it makes them stronger, faster, tougher, and of course able to USE magic."

"Yeah. We know that." Krick responded.

"Maybe it protects them." They continued. "They have gods. And these gods grant favors to the people they like. Like the werewolf captain. And Captain Choi." They shrugged. "In our world the gods were said to have created people and different creatures. In their world that's probably LITERALLY the case. Maybe the magic is how the gods keep their people alive." She looked around at everyone staring at her. "Least. That's my theory."

General Krick pressed both of his hands to his temples. "Great." He said softly. "Now it's a theological issue." He lingered for a moment, trying to comprehend all of it. "Okay." He said after a while of awkward silence. "Who has an idea for a solution?"

Dr. O spoke up first. "We think that might actually be the easiest thing." He said. "If a bit.... logistically complicated."

Krick looked at him wearily before moving his hand in a rotating "Get on with it" gesture.

"We send over the materiel necessary to set up a doorway device on the other side." He tilted his head a bit. "And we tell it to send something home."

The general took a deep breath before lowering his head until his forehead was resting on the top of the table.

He sighed.

"Figure out what we'll need. Make a grocery list." He said at last. "I'll call the Secretary." He sagged. "And the King."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/ww1kor/wait_is_this_just_gate_212/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (210/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Dun! DUN! DUNNNNNN!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"-anyways that's how things are here. Eighty caliber pistols in the hands of rookies and... patching up lizards." James said into the new phone that Earth had sent over to replace the one the golem fight had broken. "How are things in Jadesport? You sure you don't want me to come over there?"

James waited the few moments that it took for his message to send through the drone network. Then Amina smiled a little.

"I'm sure." She said with an audible sigh. "We've got a new cordon set up around the blight zone. We've redistributed the arrows and rune stones." She shook her head. "There's been ZERO activity since the explosion. Nobody has gone missing in the area that couldn't be explained." She shrugged. "On the up side. Sig took the advice of your scientists and stuck his arm and hand into a blight. He has his hand back on now."

"That's-" James started. But he'd forgotten the lag and Amina continued.

"So they've managed to help a hand- sorry- Oh.- The connection-" She paused. "Anyways the healers have managed to heal a few of the people who were um... partially vanished. So.... some good news here." She said.

James waited to see if she said anymore. "Well, I'm glad to hear that." He said. "How much longer do you think you're gonna be there? It's getting warm here."

Another pause. Then a smile split Amina's face. "Eager to get married my love?" She yawned, covering her mouth as she did. "WWEee shOULD.... be leaving in three days." She said through the yawn.

"Eeehhhh maybe a little bit." He admitted. "Plus I think we could both use a vacation. Even if it does have ROYAL DUTIES attached to it."

Once her yawn was finished Amina nodded slowly. "I haven't had a real vacation since I joined the army." She said sleepily.

James smiled as he looked at the image of his fiance fighting off sleep. He moved his mouth closer to where the microphone on the phone was.

"Get some sleep." He whispered. "We can talk more tomorrow."

"Okay." She said as she laid back with her eyes close. "Love you. Glad you kicked that golem's ass."

James let out a small, quiet, laugh. "Love you too. Get back here fast. But be safe."

Amina was already snoring lightly, letting out small whistles every so often.

James looked around as if looking for observers, despite being alone in their room.

Then he recorded about thirty seconds of her snoring before disconnecting.

He set the sound on a loop as he went to bed. It was the perfect white noise to help him get to sleep.

\---------------

Werner held her hand over the injured soldier's leg, a simple laceration from a training incident, and listened to the healing instructor's guidance.

"Remember." The silver haired orc said from where she was walking past another trainee who was tending to a cook with a burned hand. "At these early stages of healing magic it's less about your medical knowledge, and more about your visualization process."

She stepped up near Werner who was focusing on the energy in her hand. Not that she'd managed to actually manifest any magical energy yet. At least not that she knew of.

"You know.... more or less.... what his leg SHOULD look like. How it SHOULD be put together." She said as she laid her hand over the leg as well. "Visualize that image, that movement, in your mind. Then push that image through the same thoughts that are focusing on your energy." Werner nodded eagerly.

But her hands still didn't glow with the amber light that other healers could.

"It's happening!" The other trainee said excitedly. Werner glanced over to see the boils on the chef's hand pulsating as the instructor quickly moved over to observe. "I've got it." The young man said as his hand glowed.

"Slow." The instructor said, causing the trainee to look back. "Focus, don't let your excitement break your concentr-"

She paused as Werner heard a distinctly wet -POP!- sound.

"AAAGH! Me Hand!" The cook bellowed before beginning to groan in pain.

"ation." Finished the instructor. "Back up please." She said as she calmly nudged the trainee, who looked terrified, out of the way. "It's okay Remus." She said to the injured cook. "It's still just a blown blister. Nothing we can't have fixed easily." Only her pointer finger glowed the amber light. But it was brighter than even the trainee's hand had been. Remus immediately began to look relieved as it moved over his affected hand.

"Focus." Said one of the other healers who had taken up a position next to Werner, who had gotten distracted. "A good healer must learn to maintain a cool head even in times of chaos. Or else they risk losing the patient in front of them." The healer placed a reassuring hand on the shoulder of the soldier. "Though I doubt that recruit Borsten needs to worry quite THAT much for a wee little cut on the shin."

Borsten smiled for a moment before wincing. "I think I'll live." He said. Then he nodded to the commotion in the other bed. "Long as none of that happens." He added with a laugh.

"Right. Sorry." Werner said as she channeled her focus back into visualizing the cut knitting itself shut and scarring over.

The new instructors eyes glowed with a red light as she watched, which Werner had to admit was a touch distracting. But she knew that it was just the magic user's way of inspecting another person's magical energy.

After a few minutes Werner sagged.

"I don't have it yet. Do I?" She asked.

The healer looked at her with pity. "How long have you been here now dear?" She asked.

Werner thought for a moment. "Five months? Maybe six?"

The healer thought for a moment. "I don't think the hero got his until right around that time either. And his powers didn't manifest until it was a life or death situation." She said. "It's a normal thing. Your body isn't as saturated with magic as us native Petravians. You might need a catalyst event." She pondered for a few seconds. "Don't know what kind of thing would have to happen to get a catalyst event for healing magic though."

"Catalyst event?" Werner wondered. "Like some kind of... do or die situation."

"Precisely." The young woman said with a smile. "For the captain it was a fight to the death AND a fight to save his lady love the princess Amina." She scrunched her face for a moment. "And he had another one when the Prince through his spear at him during training." She looked back at Werner. "Personally I think that one was just two fools doing what fools do. But apparently it worked."

The healer gently pressed Werner out of the way before holding her hand over Borsten's leg. Her hands glowed a bright amber, and only a few seconds later the light faded to reveal a healed injury, with only the faintest of scars.

"All better recruit." She said with a smile. "Now back to your Sergeant."

"Aye maa'm. Thank you." Borsten said, also smiling. Then he turned to Werner. "Keep training. You'll get it." He said cheerily.

Werner smiled in return. But it dropped off once he was walking away.

Her hand tamped at her leg a few times before she stuck it in her pocket.

"We'll try again tomorrow ambassador." Said the head instructor from behind her, startling her out of her self pity. "None of us became healing adepts in a single day. It takes time. Go rest. Practice the methods we've given you. And we'll try again when you're ready."

Werner nodded weakly before turning to leave.

\--------------------------

Vickers set the three drones up in the triangular formation in the courtyard that he'd been told to place them in. Then he lifted the pole up until it was as close to straight as he could get it, watching as the two securing lines tightened in the process. Once they were taut he grabbed the third line from off under his hand and pulled it tight. Then he began walking it out.

The pole was exactly fifty feet tall, with a series of alternating black and white markings all up its sides until it ended in a foot of red paint.

Vickers walked until he was nearly fifty yards away before the line in his hand tightened and ran out. He kneeled down with the end and sank the stake at the end of the line into the dirt, pressing it in with his booted heel.

He pulled his tablet from his waist and opened the video feed.

"Alright guys. We're set up on this end." He said.

"Copy that chief." Said the lead scientist for this particular experiment, a Dr Bradley Oko-something. The doctor interacted with something at his computer. "Drones launching... now."

Vickers watched as the three drones rose straight up, and fast. None of them deviated more than an inch or so from their position, likely only having to correct for wind, and kept going upward with a loud buzz. Vickers watched them curiously for a minute or so before they were up above the light cloud cover.

"Acceleration and elevation gain are good." The doctor said on his side, likely speaking to himself Vickers knew. "Right where those models should be at. How are batteries reading?" He asked someone on the other side. "Alright good. Balloon team be ready."

"Anything else you need me here for doc?" Vickers asked curiously with one last glance upward.

"Hmm? Oh. No. You're good chief." The scientist assured him. "The process is gonna take a few hours at a minimum. And that's assuming everything goes RIGHT. We'll get in touch once we've got a confirmed drop. Then we'll have to get some numbers crunched before we even confirm anything."

"Got it." He said. "How's this gonna help us get back again?"

"Nice try chief. General said we'd tell you when we confirm our suspicion."

"Right. Right...." Vickers replied. "I'mma go grab some lunch."

"Call you in a few chief." The doctor said before Vickers disconnected.

Vickers looked up into the sky one more time, suspicious of the need to veil some kind of atmosphere test or whatever this was. Then he headed inside.

As he stepped through the nearby door he thought he felt the ground rumble, as if an earthquake was occuring. But it only lasted a split second and after a moment of waiting for it to continue or repeat, he realized that he must have been mistaken.

"Really hope Choi didn't find some new way to blow himself up." He said with a sigh. "Again."

\---

The tendrils protruding from the blight waved anxiously as they devoured the mountain that they'd managed to come into contact with. The "Entity" behind them luxuriated in the mass being added to its ever expanding, ever hungry, formless belly as the tumbling land feature fell into the tendrils and their openings.

It paused its journey long enough for the rest of the mountain to finish collapsing into it. Then it continued in its original direction.

But now it was minutely faster in its motion.

And several new blights blinked into existence. New, smaller, tendrils protruding from them.

The new appendages were just as hard to see as their larger counterparts.

A griffin rider by the name of Prigota Strongmaw, a young and reckless werewolf, had his mount in a hover nearby as he watched the mountain collapse in on itself before seemingly disappearing into thin air.

"What in the hells?" He asked himself as his griffin, Tira, flapped her wings to stay aloft. "You see that girl?" He asked.

Tira looked back at him before shaking her head in confusion.

"Come on. Let's take a look." He said, kicking her forward.

Neither of them ever saw the thing that made them cease existing. One moment they were flying. Then Prigota yelped as he saw Tira's beaked head disappear just like the mountain had.

Then they were gone.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wv4j3e/wait_is_this_just_gate_211/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (210/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Dun! DUN! DUNNNNNN!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

"-anyways that's how things are here. Eighty caliber pistols in the hands of rookies and... patching up lizards." James said into the new phone that Earth had sent over to replace the one the golem fight had broken. "How are things in Jadesport? You sure you don't want me to come over there?"

James waited the few moments that it took for his message to send through the drone network. Then Amina smiled a little.

"I'm sure." She said with an audible sigh. "We've got a new cordon set up around the blight zone. We've redistributed the arrows and rune stones." She shook her head. "There's been ZERO activity since the explosion. Nobody has gone missing in the area that couldn't be explained." She shrugged. "On the up side. Sig took the advice of your scientists and stuck his arm and hand into a blight. He has his hand back on now."

"That's-" James started. But he'd forgotten the lag and Amina continued.

"So they've managed to help a hand- sorry- Oh.- The connection-" She paused. "Anyways the healers have managed to heal a few of the people who were um... partially vanished. So.... some good news here." She said.

James waited to see if she said anymore. "Well, I'm glad to hear that." He said. "How much longer do you think you're gonna be there? It's getting warm here."

Another pause. Then a smile split Amina's face. "Eager to get married my love?" She yawned, covering her mouth as she did. "WWEee shOULD.... be leaving in three days." She said through the yawn.

"Eeehhhh maybe a little bit." He admitted. "Plus I think we could both use a vacation. Even if it does have ROYAL DUTIES attached to it."

Once her yawn was finished Amina nodded slowly. "I haven't had a real vacation since I joined the army." She said sleepily.

James smiled as he looked at the image of his fiance fighting off sleep. He moved his mouth closer to where the microphone on the phone was.

"Get some sleep." He whispered. "We can talk more tomorrow."

"Okay." She said as she laid back with her eyes close. "Love you. Glad you kicked that golem's ass."

James let out a small, quiet, laugh. "Love you too. Get back here fast. But be safe."

Amina was already snoring lightly, letting out small whistles every so often.

James looked around as if looking for observers, despite being alone in their room.

Then he recorded about thirty seconds of her snoring before disconnecting.

He set the sound on a loop as he went to bed. It was the perfect white noise to help him get to sleep.

\---------------

Werner held her hand over the injured soldier's leg, a simple laceration from a training incident, and listened to the healing instructor's guidance.

"Remember." The silver haired orc said from where she was walking past another trainee who was tending to a cook with a burned hand. "At these early stages of healing magic it's less about your medical knowledge, and more about your visualization process."

She stepped up near Werner who was focusing on the energy in her hand. Not that she'd managed to actually manifest any magical energy yet. At least not that she knew of.

"You know.... more or less.... what his leg SHOULD look like. How it SHOULD be put together." She said as she laid her hand over the leg as well. "Visualize that image, that movement, in your mind. Then push that image through the same thoughts that are focusing on your energy." Werner nodded eagerly.

But her hands still didn't glow with the amber light that other healers could.

"It's happening!" The other trainee said excitedly. Werner glanced over to see the boils on the chef's hand pulsating as the instructor quickly moved over to observe. "I've got it." The young man said as his hand glowed.

"Slow." The instructor said, causing the trainee to look back. "Focus, don't let your excitement break your concentr-"

She paused as Werner heard a distinctly wet -POP!- sound.

"AAAGH! Me Hand!" The cook bellowed before beginning to groan in pain.

"ation." Finished the instructor. "Back up please." She said as she calmly nudged the trainee, who looked terrified, out of the way. "It's okay Remus." She said to the injured cook. "It's still just a blown blister. Nothing we can't have fixed easily." Only her pointer finger glowed the amber light. But it was brighter than even the trainee's hand had been. Remus immediately began to look relieved as it moved over his affected hand.

"Focus." Said one of the other healers who had taken up a position next to Werner, who had gotten distracted. "A good healer must learn to maintain a cool head even in times of chaos. Or else they risk losing the patient in front of them." The healer placed a reassuring hand on the shoulder of the soldier. "Though I doubt that recruit Borsten needs to worry quite THAT much for a wee little cut on the shin."

Borsten smiled for a moment before wincing. "I think I'll live." He said. Then he nodded to the commotion in the other bed. "Long as none of that happens." He added with a laugh.

"Right. Sorry." Werner said as she channeled her focus back into visualizing the cut knitting itself shut and scarring over.

The new instructors eyes glowed with a red light as she watched, which Werner had to admit was a touch distracting. But she knew that it was just the magic user's way of inspecting another person's magical energy.

After a few minutes Werner sagged.

"I don't have it yet. Do I?" She asked.

The healer looked at her with pity. "How long have you been here now dear?" She asked.

Werner thought for a moment. "Five months? Maybe six?"

The healer thought for a moment. "I don't think the hero got his until right around that time either. And his powers didn't manifest until it was a life or death situation." She said. "It's a normal thing. Your body isn't as saturated with magic as us native Petravians. You might need a catalyst event." She pondered for a few seconds. "Don't know what kind of thing would have to happen to get a catalyst event for healing magic though."

"Catalyst event?" Werner wondered. "Like some kind of... do or die situation."

"Precisely." The young woman said with a smile. "For the captain it was a fight to the death AND a fight to save his lady love the princess Amina." She scrunched her face for a moment. "And he had another one when the Prince threw his spear at him during training." She looked back at Werner. "Personally I think that one was just two fools doing what fools do. But apparently it worked."

The healer gently pressed Werner out of the way before holding her hand over Borsten's leg. Her hands glowed a bright amber, and only a few seconds later the light faded to reveal a healed injury, with only the faintest of scars.

"All better recruit." She said with a smile. "Now back to your Sergeant."

"Aye maa'm. Thank you." Borsten said, also smiling. Then he turned to Werner. "Keep training. You'll get it." He said cheerily.

Werner smiled in return. But it dropped off once he was walking away.

Her hand tamped at her leg a few times before she stuck it in her pocket.

"We'll try again tomorrow ambassador." Said the head instructor from behind her, startling her out of her self pity. "None of us became healing adepts in a single day. It takes time. Go rest. Practice the methods we've given you. And we'll try again when you're ready."

Werner nodded weakly before turning to leave.

\-------------------------

Vickers set the three drones up in the triangular formation in the courtyard that he'd been told to place them in. Then he lifted the pole up until it was as close to straight as he could get it, watching as the two securing lines tightened in the process. Once they were taut he grabbed the third line from off under his hand and pulled it tight. Then he began walking it out.

The pole was exactly fifty feet tall, with a series of alternating black and white markings all up its sides until it ended in a foot of red paint.

Vickers walked until he was nearly fifty yards away before the line in his hand tightened and ran out. He kneeled down with the end and sank the stake at the end of the line into the dirt, pressing it in with his booted heel.

He pulled his tablet from his waist and opened the video feed.

"Alright guys. We're set up on this end." He said.

"Copy that chief." Said the lead scientist for this particular experiment, a Dr Bradley Oko-something. The doctor interacted with something at his computer. "Drones launching... now."

Vickers watched as the three drones rose straight up, and fast. None of them deviated more than an inch or so from their position, likely only having to correct for wind, and kept going upward with a loud buzz. Vickers watched them curiously for a minute or so before they were up above the light cloud cover.

"Acceleration and elevation gain are good." The doctor said on his side, likely speaking to himself Vickers knew. "Right where those models should be at. How are batteries reading?" He asked someone on the other side. "Alright good. Balloon team be ready."

"Anything else you need me here for doc?" Vickers asked curiously with one last glance upward.

"Hmm? Oh. No. You're good chief." The scientist assured him. "The process is gonna take a few hours at a minimum. And that's assuming everything goes RIGHT. We'll get in touch once we've got a confirmed drop. Then we'll have to get some numbers crunched before we even confirm anything."

"Got it." He said. "How's this gonna help us get back again?"

"Nice try chief. General said we'd tell you when we confirm our suspicion."

"Right. Right...." Vickers replied. "I'mma go grab some lunch."

"Call you in a few chief." The doctor said before Vickers disconnected.

Vickers looked up into the sky one more time, suspicious of the need to veil some kind of atmosphere test or whatever this was. Then he headed inside.

As he stepped through the nearby door he thought he felt the ground rumble, as if an earthquake was occuring. But it only lasted a split second and after a moment of waiting for it to continue or repeat, he realized that he must have been mistaken.

"Really hope Choi didn't find some new way to blow himself up." He said with a sigh. "Again."

\------------------

The tendrils protruding from the blight waved anxiously as they devoured the mountain that they'd managed to come into contact with. The "Entity" behind them luxuriated in the mass being added to its ever expanding, ever hungry, formless belly as the tumbling land feature fell into the tendrils and their openings.

It paused its journey long enough for the rest of the mountain to finish collapsing into it. Then it continued in its original direction.

But now it was minutely faster in its motion.

And several new blights blinked into existence. New, smaller, tendrils protruding from them.

The new appendages were just as hard to see as their larger counterparts.

A griffin rider by the name of Prigota Strongmaw, a young and reckless werewolf, had his mount in a hover nearby as he watched the mountain collapse in on itself before seemingly disappearing into thin air.

"What in the hells?" He asked himself as his griffin, Tira, flapped her wings to stay aloft. "You see that girl?" He asked.

Tira looked back at him before shaking her head in confusion.

"Come on. Let's take a look." He said, kicking her forward.

Neither of them ever saw the thing that made them cease existing. One moment they were flying. Then Prigota yelped as he saw Tira's beaked head disappear just like the mountain had.

Then they were gone.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wv4hd1/wait_is_this_just_gate_211/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (209/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look at that. Ole Jimmy boy knows how to lead a class.

Enjoy.

\~

BANG!

James grabbed the massive pistol with his left hand, holding it by its wooden furniture, as he shook his right hand. The recoil on the antique looking weapon was intense and the palm of his hand stung from the impact. But as he looked he saw the massive hole just off center of the dummy's chest.

Veliry looked on eagerly as he pulled back the simplistic bolt and let the spent casing fall out and a new round fall into the chamber. The bolt was actually quite nice. A simply quarter twist before pulling back, then a return to the original position. And it was only barely audible. He'd fired marksman pistols that weren't as smooth as it was.

He braced the pistol in the classic teacup grip that he'd been taught when he first started firing pistols.

Then he reconsidered. The grip was comfortable enough, but the length and angle of it was awkward for the grip. Instead he slid his hand forward, just past the opening that the spent casings dropped out of, and held it almost like a sub machine gun.

BANG!

The recoil was slightly improved by the two handed grip, but it was still harsh compared to any other pistol he'd ever fired. The only thing that compared was a shotgun revolver he'd fired at a range day a few years before. But that weapon had just been built as a proof of concept. It was never intended for full blown production.

James switched the pistol over to his wolf hand after chambering a new round.

The lefthanded grip made aiming awkward. It always had been, even with normal pistols. But the vertical magazine sticking out of the top made it hard to even see.

But for James, a pistol was still a pistol.

BANG!

James watched the helmet of the dummy disintegrate on its left side.

Just as he'd expected, the wolf hand didn't seem to care about the recoil.

He pulled the magazine off of the top, making sure to hold the small pin in place to keep the rounds from falling out. Then he cleared the chamber.

"Well?" Veliry asked as she moved up to inspect it as he handed it back to her. "What do you think?"

James looked at her as he took a deep breath. He tilted his head a bit.

"As a pistol it sucks." He said with a grimace.

Veliry was crestfallen, just as he'd suspected she would be.

"BUT!" He said before she could respond. She looked up hopefully. "As a firearm? It's not bad. Action on the bolt is about as slick as you can ask for." He gestured at the dummy. "In a trained hand its accurate enough." He shrugged. "But it's heavy and it kicks hard enough that a smaller person would probably brake their wrist, or at least some metacarpals." He flexed his right hand to make a point.

Veliry's smile had grown as he'd said the first few points. But it had been lessened by the last few.

"I know." She said with a hint of sadness. "I've been working on that."

James looked back to where Werner was watching from the balcony. He hadn't seen her for the past few days, and he'd been a bit curious when one of the castle staff had said she was in the healing ward. But that was her business.

"Make it a rifle." He said as leaned into Veliry.

"A rifle?" She asked. "But those are huge. With our materials they'll be heavy."

"They're already heavy." James reminded her. "But with rifles heavy is alright, so long as you keep the accuracy up." He pointed at the dummy again, then turned the pistol in her hands so that the end of the barrel was visible. "Big firepower... High accuracy... And a smooth ass bolt? That's sniper rifle territory." He said.

"Sniper Rifle?" She repeated curiously.

"I've probably already said too much." James said. "I know the General gave you some hints on these things. I.... assume... you're already adapting them?" He asked.

Veliry nodded eagerly.

James just nodded in return.

"Make the barrel about a foot and a half longer. Add a stock. You know? A shoulder piece for it." He nodded with a grin. "You'll be blasting baddies from half a mile away." He shook his head lightly. "I can't give you any more than that."

"What about the pistols?" She asked.

James held up his left hand in front of her.

"Wolves and orcs only?" He said with a smirk.

Veliry nodded sadly. "That's fair." She agreed.

"It is a sweet piece." He consoled her. "It's just a bit of a cannon."

"What's a cannon?" She asked.

James looked at her awkwardly. "Now I've really said too much." He said before abruptly turning about face and retreating.

\---

A few hours later James smiled as he peeled back what he thought was probably the last of Steve's bandages.

"Look at that boy." He said with a grin as he cut off the massive, no longer glowing, bandage from the side of Steve's rib cage.

Steve's head was turned back and watching him with what he thought was eagerness. The flesh underneath the bandage was no longer the purplish black that it had been before. Instead it was a dark tan that James guessed marked a newly formed scar. He wondered if it would fade over time.

"Well boy." He said as his hand brushed the hair away from the scarred side of his head. "Looks like we both have some visible damage now."

Steve sniffed the side of James's head before licking it with his massive forked tongue, leaving a trail of saliva there and slicking his hair up.

James turned to face the massive lizard with a grim face.

"You know I hate it when you do that." He said flatly. He tried to slick the hair back down, but Steve's saliva was like gel. "Ohhhh I hate that."

\-------------------------

The next day James found himself, at the General's orders, teaching some of the Petravian soldiers.

"Okay." James said with a hint of concern as he looked at the small group of people in front of him. "So. Tell me what Arch Mage Veliry's first rule was when it comes to these things.

Each of the soldiers had belts with the, now familiar, triangular bottomless bags on them.

Nobody spoke.

James arched his eyebrows and held his hands out in a "Well?" gesture.

"Anyone?" He asked.

Suddenly a large, muscular, stern faced elf raised their hand.

James gestured to them. "Yeah?"

"That these weapons are dangerous sir!" The elf responded. James was surprised to hear a woman's voice emanate from the massive, armored, form.

James nodded, tilting his head a bit as he did.

"Well. That's not wrong." He agreed. He nodded at the elf. "What's your name?" He asked.

"Royal Guardian Ira'Nyl!' She responded in a yell.

"Cool." James replied. "Guardian Ira'Nyl." He said, marvelling at how simply saying her name made her straighten up noticeably. "Draw your pistol."

The elf didn't hesitate, her hands moving down and into the "holster" so fast that James KNEW she had drilled the motion. He wondered for just a moment how she would do if she entered a quick-draw competition with a normal pistol and holster setup. Before he knew it she was moving to hold the pistol up near her shoulder.

"STOP!" He yelled, causing her to freeze mid motion. He had a feeling that her title as guardian meant that she was some kind of elite warrior int he castle. He doubted that any of the other soldiers present would follow orders so efficiently.

James held his right hand up, all of his fingers clenched except for his pointer.

"Everyone look at Guardian Ira'Nyl's grip on that pistol." He ordered. He gave them a moment as they all craned to look at the elf warrior's hand. "Where is her trigger finger?"

A dwarf a few spaces away answered hesitantly. "On her trigger?"

James nodded. "On her trigger." He agreed. He pointed at the elf. "Ready to fire if there's a threat. Right?"

"Yes sir!" She responded eagerly.

"Is there a threat up above you?" James asked, making an exaggerated show of looking up into the sky as if looking for something. "A dragon maybe? Angry griffin momma?"

All the soldiers looked up, confused.

"I.... don't believe so sir." Ira'Nyl replied.

"So is there anything up there to kill?" He asked.

"No?" She asked in return as she looked at him.

"So do you NEED your finger on your trigger?" He asked. "It's only an itty bitty movement to go from a straight finger," He held his finger up as if pointing at the sky. Then he curled it. "to a shooting finger."

The elf seemed to get the message and pulled her finger off of the trigger, resting it against the wooden side of the pistol.

"Alright!" He said as he stepped back to his original position. He turned back. "Sorry to single you out guardian. Just needed an example. You're not in trouble or anything. You can put that away for now." She nodded minutely and re-holstered the weapon as James took his spot.

"NEW RULE!" He yelled, causing some of them to jump before they all straightened again. "ALWAYS!.... ALWAYS!... Treat these weapons as if they are loaded!"

He ignored the slight glance that Ira'Nyl gave towards her own weapon. He'd known that it was probably loaded. But that was a problem for later, when it was unholstered again.

"These are deadly weapons." He continued, repeating the message from the beginning of the training session. "They can kill people.... Almost any people... Trust me I know that for a fact. With only a single shot." He nodded grimly. "And I know that.... because I've done it myself since I've gotten here."

He watched as the looks on the soldier's faces shifted. He thought he might be able to tell which ones had ever been in a battle before from those new expressions. He knew that vickers would.

"All it takes for one of these weapons to kill someone.... friend or foe... is a single mistake." He said sternly. "One round being loaded wrong. A single piece of the mechanism being improperly installed or cared for." He held his finger up. "A slip of the finger..... And if YOU'RE LUCKY.... you might only end up embarrassing yourself by shooting the dirt." He lowered the finger and pointed it at the Ira'Nyl. "Been in battle before guardian. Yes or no."

"YES SIR!" She replied eagerly as she puffed up with pride.

"How often did you go into that fight COUNTING on luck?"

She practically scoffed.

"Only fools count fate as an ally." She said flatly.

James nodded. "I like that." He said. "I'm gonna use that. Well guess what? We don't count fate as an ally when we're handling things that can kill people faster than we can blink."

He withdrew the pistol that Veliry had had him test the day before. It didn't have a magazine in it. But he still made a show of checking the chamber and leaving the slide in its rear position.

And he STILL kept his finger off the trigger.

"UNLESS... You are ready AND WILLING.... to kill whatever is at the wrong end of the barrel." He tapped the end of the barrel with his left hand. "Keep your booger hook off the bang bang trigger." He added as he grabbed the pistol with his left and, poked up his trigger finger, then pointed at the trigger. Then he mockingly pretended to pick his nose.

The soldiers laughed, though they were still uncomfortable.

"Safety first." He said, bringing the laughter to a halt. "Always. That way when things do go bad you knows that it either isn't your fault, or is at least intentional because you're in a fight."

They nodded, understanding the implication.

"Now. Let's run through some safety drills... and then you guys can show me how shitty your aim is." He said as he put his pistol back in its bottomless holster. "Go ahead and draw, then unload.... SAFELY... your pistols."

The soldiers broke into motion as James stepped forward to observe.

James didn't know it, but Vickers watched silently from a doorway nearby with a small grin. Then he nodded and headed back inside.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wspq4l/wait_is_this_just_gate_210/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (209/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look at that. Ole Jimmy boy knows how to lead a class.

Enjoy.

\~

BANG!

James grabbed the massive pistol with his left hand, holding it by its wooden furniture, as he shook his right hand. The recoil on the antique looking weapon was intense and the palm of his hand stung from the impact. But as he looked he saw the massive hole just off center of the dummy's chest.

Veliry looked on eagerly as he pulled back the simplistic bolt and let the spent casing fall out and a new round fall into the chamber. The bolt was actually quite nice. A simple quarter twist before pulling back, then a return to the original position. And it was only barely audible. He'd fired marksman pistols that weren't as smooth as it was.

He braced the pistol in the classic teacup grip that he'd been taught when he first started firing pistols.

Then he reconsidered. The grip was comfortable enough, but the length and angle of it was awkward for the second hand grip. Instead he slid his hand left hand forward, just past the opening that the spent casings dropped out of, and held it almost like a sub machine gun.

BANG!

The recoil was slightly improved by the two handed grip, but it was still harsh compared to any other pistol he'd ever fired. The only thing that compared was a shotgun revolver he'd fired at a range day a few years before. But that weapon had just been built as a proof of concept. It was never intended for full blown production.

James switched the pistol over to his wolf hand after chambering a new round.

The lefthanded grip made aiming awkward. It always had been, even with normal pistols. But the vertical magazine sticking out of the top made it hard to even see.

But for James, a pistol was still a pistol.

BANG!

James watched the helmet of the dummy disintegrate on its left side.

Just as he'd expected, the wolf hand didn't seem to care about the recoil.

He pulled the magazine off of the top, making sure to hold the small pin in place to keep the rounds from falling out. Then he cleared the chamber.

"Well?" Veliry asked as she moved up to inspect it as he handed it back to her. "What do you think?"

James looked at her as he took a deep breath. He tilted his head a bit.

"As a pistol it sucks." He said with a grimace.

Veliry was crestfallen, just as he'd suspected she would be.

"BUT!" He said before she could respond. She looked up hopefully. "As a firearm? It's not bad. Action on the bolt is about as slick as you can ask for." He gestured at the dummy. "In a trained hand its accurate enough." He shrugged. "But it's heavy and it kicks hard enough that a smaller person would probably break their wrist, or at least some metacarpals." He flexed his right hand to make a point.

Veliry's smile had grown as he'd said the first few points. But it had been lessened by the last few.

"I know." She said with a hint of sadness. "I've been working on that."

James looked back to where Werner was watching from the balcony. He hadn't seen her for the past few days, and he'd been a bit curious when one of the castle staff had said she was in the healing ward. But that was her business.

"Make it a rifle." He said as leaned into Veliry.

"A rifle?" She asked. "But those are huge. With our materials they'll be heavy."

"They're already heavy." James reminded her. "But with rifles heavy is alright, so long as you keep the accuracy up." He pointed at the dummy again, then turned the pistol in her hands so that the end of the barrel was visible. "Big firepower... High accuracy... And a smooth ass bolt? That's sniper rifle territory." He said.

"Sniper Rifle?" She repeated curiously.

"I've probably already said too much." James said. "I know the General gave you some hints on these things. I.... assume... you're already adapting them?" He asked.

Veliry nodded eagerly.

James just nodded in return.

"Make the barrel about a foot and a half longer. Add a stock. You know? A shoulder piece for it." He nodded with a grin. "You'll be blasting baddies from half a mile away." He shook his head lightly. "I can't give you any more than that."

"What about the pistols?" She asked.

James held up his left hand in front of her.

"Wolves and orcs only?" He said with a smirk.

Veliry nodded sadly. "That's fair." She agreed.

"It is a sweet piece." He consoled her. "It's just a bit of a cannon."

"What's a cannon?" She asked.

James looked at her awkwardly. "Now I've really said too much." He said before abruptly turning about face and retreating.

\---

A few hours later James smiled as he peeled back what he thought was probably the last of Steve's bandages.

"Look at that boy." He said with a grin as he cut off the massive, no longer glowing, bandage from the side of Steve's rib cage.

Steve's head was turned back and watching him with what he thought was eagerness. The flesh underneath the bandage was no longer the purplish black that it had been before. Instead it was a dark tan that James guessed marked a newly formed scar. He wondered if it would fade over time.

"Well boy." He said as his hand brushed the hair away from the scarred side of his head. "Looks like we both have some visible damage now."

Steve sniffed the side of James's head before licking it with his massive forked tongue, leaving a trail of saliva there and slicking his hair up.

James turned to face the massive lizard with a grim face.

"You know I hate it when you do that." He said flatly. He tried to slick the hair back down, but Steve's saliva was like gel. "Ohhhh I hate that."

\---

The next day James found himself, at the General's orders, teaching some of the Petravian soldiers.

"Okay." James said with a hint of concern as he looked at the small group of people in front of him. "So. Tell me what Arch Mage Veliry's first rule was when it comes to these things.

Each of the soldiers had belts with the, now familiar, triangular bottomless bags on them.

Nobody spoke.

James arched his eyebrows and held his hands out in a "Well?" gesture.

"Anyone?" He asked.

Suddenly a large, muscular, stern faced elf raised their hand.

James gestured to them. "Yeah?"

"That these weapons are dangerous sir!" The elf responded. James was surprised to hear a woman's voice emanate from the massive, armored, form.

James nodded, tilting his head a bit as he did.

"Well. That's not wrong." He agreed. He nodded at the elf. "What's your name?" He asked.

"Royal Guardian Ira'Nyl!' She responded in a yell.

"Cool." James replied. "Guardian Ira'Nyl." He said, marvelling at how simply saying her name made her straighten up noticeably. "Draw your pistol."

The elf didn't hesitate, her hands moving down and into the "holster" so fast that James KNEW she had drilled the motion. He wondered for just a moment how she would do if she entered a quick-draw competition with a normal pistol and holster setup. Before he knew it she was moving to hold the pistol up near her shoulder.

"STOP!" He yelled, causing her to freeze mid motion. He had a feeling that her title as guardian meant that she was some kind of elite warrior in the castle. He doubted that any of the other soldiers present would follow orders so efficiently.

James held his right hand up, all of his fingers clenched except for his pointer.

"Everyone look at Guardian Ira'Nyl's grip on that pistol." He ordered. He gave them a moment as they all craned to look at the elf warrior's hand. "Where is her trigger finger?"

A dwarf a few spaces away answered hesitantly. "On her trigger?"

James nodded. "On her trigger." He agreed. He pointed at the elf. "Ready to fire if there's a threat. Right?"

"Yes sir!" She responded eagerly.

"Is there a threat up above you?" James asked, making an exaggerated show of looking up into the sky as if looking for something. "A dragon maybe? Angry griffin momma?"

All the soldiers looked up, confused.

"I.... don't believe so sir." Ira'Nyl replied.

"So is there anything up there to kill?" He asked.

"No?" She asked in return as she looked at him.

"So do you NEED your finger on your trigger?" He asked. "It's only an itty bitty movement to go from a straight finger," He held his finger up as if pointing at the sky. Then he curled it. "to a shooting finger."

The elf seemed to get the message and pulled her finger off of the trigger, resting it against the wooden side of the pistol.

"Alright!" He said as he stepped back to his original position. He turned back. "Sorry to single you out guardian. Just needed an example. You're not in trouble or anything. You can put that away for now." She nodded minutely and re-holstered the weapon as James took his spot.

"NEW RULE!" He yelled, causing some of them to jump before they all straightened again. "ALWAYS!.... ALWAYS!... Treat these weapons as if they are loaded!"

He ignored the slight glance that Ira'Nyl gave towards her own weapon. He'd known that it was probably loaded. But that was a problem for later, when it was unholstered again.

"These are deadly weapons." He continued, repeating the message from the beginning of the training session. "They can kill people.... Almost any people... Trust me I know that for a fact. With only a single shot." He nodded grimly. "And I know that.... because I've done it myself since I've gotten here."

He watched as the looks on the soldier's faces shifted. He thought he might be able to tell which ones had never been in a battle before from those new expressions. He knew that Vickers would.

"All it takes for one of these weapons to kill someone.... friend or foe... is a single mistake." He said sternly. "One round being loaded wrong. A single piece of the mechanism being improperly installed or cared for." He held his finger up. "A slip of the finger..... And if YOU'RE LUCKY.... you might only end up embarrassing yourself by shooting the dirt." He lowered the finger and pointed it at the Ira'Nyl. "Been in battle before guardian. Yes or no."

"YES SIR!" She replied eagerly as she puffed up with pride.

"How often did you go into that fight COUNTING on luck?"

She practically scoffed.

"Only fools count fate as an ally." She said flatly.

James nodded. "I like that." He said. "I'm gonna use that. Well guess what? We don't count fate as an ally when we're handling things that can kill people faster than we can blink."

He withdrew the pistol that Veliry had had him test the day before. It didn't have a magazine in it. But he still made a show of checking the chamber and leaving the slide in its rear position.

And he STILL kept his finger off the trigger.

"UNLESS... You are ready AND WILLING.... to kill whatever is at the wrong end of the barrel." He tapped the end of the barrel with his left hand. "Keep your booger hook off the bang bang trigger." He added as he grabbed the pistol with his left hand, poked up his right trigger finger, then pointed at the trigger itself. Then he mockingly pretended to pick his nose.

The soldiers laughed, though they were still uncomfortable.

"Safety first." He said, bringing the laughter to a halt. "Always. That way when things do go bad you knows that it either isn't your fault, or is at least intentional because you're in a fight."

They nodded, understanding the implication.

"Now. Let's run through some safety drills... and then you guys can show me how shitty your aim is." He said as he put his pistol back in its bottomless holster. "Go ahead and draw, then unload.... SAFELY... your pistols."

The soldiers broke into motion as James stepped forward to observe.

James didn't know it, but Vickers watched silently from a doorway nearby with a small grin. Then he nodded and headed back inside.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wspo4d/wait_is_this_just_gate_210/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (208/?)

Previous

Writer's note: What? A bunch of characters sharing a ton of info in a way that's easily presentable to the readers? What do you think I am, some kind of hand holding softy?

^(And yeah. I am keeping last chapters spoiler unfulfilled for a bit longer. Deal with it.)

Enjoy.

\~

"The golemancers controlling the... golems... that attacked Captain Choi were NOT members of the Agency themselves." Arch Mage Marcos said in his characteristically slow droll. "It would be more accurate to say that they are.... umm... affiliates to the Agency. Like a loyal mercenary band, so to speak."

James sipped at the slightly bitter, dark, faintly spicy, coffee that Veliry had brewed at his request only minutes before they'd come to the command room of the castle to hear the old mage's briefing on the interrogation of the captured golem. She'd finally managed to create a cup of coffee that both he and Vickers could actually enjoy. It helped him sit through the slow, somewhat rambling, information that Marcos was dispensing.

He hadn't slept much the night before, and based on the faces around the room not many other people present had either. So the coffee was a life saver.

"What is worse." Marcos continued. "Is that the massive, conjoined, golem that we encountered on arrival, was the result of a process of amalgamation that the captured soul referred to as a 'Congruency'."

He held his hand up and a series of lights floated in the air in front of him in the shape of a set of people. His other hand presented a set of larger, more blob-like, people shapes that James knew represented the golems.

"During this process, the controlling golemmancers meld not just their golems." He moved his hands and the golem illustrations slammed into eachother, forming a massless shape. Then the people shapes did the same. "But also their own souls as well." After a moment the two floating illustrations formed into a much larger golem, and a human body with multiple faces shifting on its form, all of which looked malevolent.

"Now." He continued. "If you kill a golem that is being controlled, typically the controller dies as well. Their soul becoming untethered with the destruction of their controlled vessel." He nodded his head at James, who raised an eyebrow. "Much like how your drake will die if you do. Because his soul is bound to yours, even if neither of you is using your soul to control the other. But it is the same notion."

James nodded acknowledgment, though his face was grim from the idea.

"But in a congruency, ALL the souls are bound to eachother. And the golem's form is, as Captain Choi knows, MUCH tougher to destroy." He moved his hand and a set of smaller human forms surrounded the multi-faced one. "Additionally the golemmancers knew all of this, and had their bodies surrounded by attendants who could.... recover their souls.... while severing their connection safely should their golems die." The smaller human forms pulled faces from the larger form before moving away and dissapearing. "We managed to isolate and steal one of these souls inside its golem flesh form. But the attendants were capable of safely retrieving the others before they were killed."

The illustration of the golem crumbled to pieces and the multi-faced form split back into its original human forms as the attendant forms tugged at it.

"But souls cannot mix with eachother without.... uh... changing." Marcos said as he changed the image. A series of identical people formed a line. One of them moved to scratch its head and the other forms matched the motion identically with only a slight lag. "They are, for all intents and purposes, a gestalt mind now. Their souls all echoes of each other. From this point on, any golems they manifest will not require any special ritual to amalgamate. And should any of them find their golems destroyed unexpectedly, their souls will not be untethered from their bodies like before."

He dismissed the light images he'd been presenting with a wave.

"We have rebuffed the Agency's.... agents... this time." He nodded at James. "And we have gained valuable information. Namely the location of the golemmancer's location." He shrugged slightly. "Though I doubt that they will still be their by the time we arrive, as it is quite far away." He shook his head gravely. "But I fear that the surviving golemmancers will be much deadlier should we face them again."

King Farrick nodded his acknowledgement from where he was sitting. Like James he was drinking a cup of the Earth-Style coffee, though he grimaced each time he took a sip.

"And we've already sent orders to a detachment from the nearest garrison sir." Said a grey haired dwarf that James knew to be the Commander of the guard in Amina's absence. "It'll take near to a week to get there, even on griffins. Like the arch mage said, they'll likely be cleared out by then. But if they're fool enough to stick around, we'll have em."

King Farrick nodded again. "I applaud the hard work from our Arch mages." He said as he looked first at Marcos, and then Veliry. Then he turned to the dwarf as well as Alixan's lieutenant. "As well as our troops and riders. And of course," He turned to James and Vickers, who was leaning against the wall a few feet behind him. Captain Choi and Chief Vickers. Defeating a group of golems is no small feat." He turned back to face the rest of them. "We shall have to keep an eye out for any golem activity in the future. Hopefully their location can grant us more insight into this groups operations."

The room stayed silent for a moment as they all considered what they'd learned.

Naturally, Vickers was the one to break the silence.

"So what's the situation in near Jadesport?" He asked as he pulled his tablet out.

James spoke up as Vickers tinkered with pulling up the feed from the re-positioned drones there.

"I heard from one of the guards here last night that Amina left a few days back with a small army to back them up. How are they doing? What's the plan sir?" He asked the King.

"She did." He said with a nod. "They left nearly four days ago. They should be arriving within the next day or so. Primarily griffin cavalry and archers, armed with some of the arrows your people were kind enough to supply. Plus, some of our explosives and mages."

James nodded before looking back at Vickers. "Any movement in the blight?"

Vickers shook his head. "I see some of the city's troops moving around. Looks like they've got a new position set up further back from the stuff." He maneuvered around the menu a bit. "But it doesn't look like a fight."

"Hopefully it stays that way." The King interjected.

James turned back, his eyebrows furrowed. "Why would the 'Cleanser'... or whatever... send out that bomb and detonate it?"

"That's not the real issue." Vickers said before the King could reply.

James looked back at him curiously. "The box?"

Vickers nodded. "Yeah. You said before that they couldn't affect you. And your pistol rounds killed em easy enough, same for the princess." James nodded affirmative. "One even outright tackled you and made all your other gear disappear. But not you."

"Yeah, all my local stuff dissappearred. Minus my bottomless bags." James confirmed.

"You have any stuff from earth in those bags?" Vickers asked.

"Yeah, a ton of stuff." James admitted. He hadn't thought of that before.

"So before they couldn't effect stuff from our world. But now they can." Vickers said, intentionally stating the obvious. "And we saw it tanking arrow shots from OUR arrows. They had that missile for what? Three or four months? Five tops?"

"You think they managed to adapt to materials from your world?" Veliry said from where she'd been blearily spacing out through the meeting.

Vickers shrugged. "They had access to an incredibly advanced bit of tech that also has a ton of mass from our world." He tilted his head with a wince. "Plus they somehow controlled it. Detonating it DESPITE our people transmitting emergency shut down protocols." He stood up straight, spreading his arms a bit. "We know that they can uh... repurpose anything that goes into the blight spots, or gets disappeared by their powers." He shrugged again, letting them draw the obvious conclusion.

"We might not be immune to their abilities anymore." James said.

"At least our guns should still work." Vickers added.

James raised an eyebrow. "How do you figure?" He asked.

He showed the footage leading up to the explosion. "It survived the arrows." He said. "But it didn't dissappear them like it did the soldier's other weapons." He looked around at the other people in the room. "Maybe it can't QUITE effect them as well." He shrugged again. "Or maybe it just didn't care because it knew it was about to go all explodey. I don't know."

"We can only hope that's not the case." The King said. He stood up and signalled to Veliry. "Now. If everyone else would give us the room for a moment. I need to have a word with Captain Choi."

James looked at him curiously as everyone else shuffled out except Veliry.

Once the room was empty save for him, the King, and Veliry, and the doors had closed, James asked the obvious question.

"Is everything okay?" He asked.

"It is." King Farrick said with a nod. "But you've given me several warnings about the potential for your people to..... connive... in their favor over us." He said as he stepped over in front of James. He signalled for Veliry to hand him something.

"Uh. Yeah." James said hesitantly as Veliry reached into a bottomless bag on her waist that looked familiar to him somehow. "Why?"

He watched, eyes widening as he saw what Veliry retrieved from the bag. He sat forward as he watched her check the chamber of the thing, just like he had with his own a million times, before handing it to the King. Suddenly he understood the vaguely triangular shape of the bag.

The king inspected it for a moment, then held it out to James.

"Because now it's my turn to return the favor." The King said as James gingerly took the long, rudimentary, weapon in his hands. It was startlingly light for its size.

"When the hell did you guys manage to put this together?" He asked as he looked it over.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wrw118/wait_is_this_just_gate_209/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (208/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: What? A bunch of characters sharing a ton of info in a way that's easily presentable to the readers? What do you think I am, some kind of hand holding softy?

^(And yeah. I am keeping last chapters spoiler unfulfilled for a bit longer. Deal with it.)

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"But also their own souls as well." After a moment the two floating illustrations formed into a much larger golem, and a human body with multiple faces shifting on its form, all of which looked malevolent.

"Now." He continued. "If you kill a golem that is being controlled, typically the controller dies as well. Their soul becoming untethered with the destruction of their controlled vessel." He nodded his head at James, who raised an eyebrow. "Much like how your drake will die if you do. Because his soul is bound to yours, even if neither of you is using your soul to control the other. But it is the same notion."

James nodded acknowledgment, though his face was grim from the idea.

"But in a congruency, ALL the souls are bound to eachother. And the golem's form is, as Captain Choi knows, MUCH tougher to destroy." He moved his hand and a set of smaller human forms surrounded the multi-faced one. "Additionally the golemmancers knew all of this, and had their bodies surrounded by attendants who could.... recover their souls.... while severing their connection safely should their golems die." The smaller human forms pulled faces from the larger form before moving away and dissapearing. "We managed to isolate and steal one of these souls inside its golem flesh form. But the attendants were capable of safely retrieving the others before they were killed."

The illustration of the golem crumbled to pieces and the multi-faced form split back into its original human forms as the attendant forms tugged at it.

"But souls cannot mix with eachother without.... uh... changing." Marcos said as he changed the image. A series of identical people formed a line. One of them moved to scratch its head and the other forms matched the motion identically with only a slight lag. "They are, for all intents and purposes, a gestalt mind now. Their souls all echoes of each other. From this point on, any golems they manifest will not require any special ritual to amalgamate. And should any of them find their golems destroyed unexpectedly, their souls will not be untethered from their bodies like before."

He dismissed the light images he'd been presenting with a wave.

"We have rebuffed the Agency's.... agents... this time." He nodded at James. "And we have gained valuable information. Namely the location of the golemmancer's hideout." He shrugged slightly. "Though I doubt that they will still be their by the time we arrive, as it is quite far away." He shook his head gravely. "But I fear that the surviving golemmancers will be much deadlier should we face them again."

King Farrick nodded his acknowledgement from where he was sitting. Like James he was drinking a cup of the Earth-Style coffee, though he grimaced each time he took a sip.

"And we've already sent orders to a detachment from the nearest garrison sir." Said a grey haired dwarf that James knew to be the Commander of the guard in Amina's absence. "It'll take near to a week to get there, even on griffins. Like the arch mage said, they'll likely be cleared out by then. But if they're fool enough to stick around, we'll have em."

King Farrick nodded again. "I applaud the hard work from our Arch mages." He said as he looked first at Marcos, and then Veliry. Then he turned to the dwarf as well as Alixan's lieutenant. "As well as our troops and riders. And of course," He turned to James and Vickers, who was leaning against the wall a few feet behind him. "Captain Choi and Chief Vickers. Defeating a group of golems is no small feat." He turned back to face the rest of them. "We shall have to keep an eye out for any golem activity in the future. Hopefully their location can grant us more insight into this groups operations."

The room stayed silent for a moment as they all considered what they'd learned.

Naturally, Vickers was the one to break the silence.

"So what's the situation near Jadesport?" He asked as he pulled his tablet out.

James spoke up as Vickers tinkered with pulling up the feed from the re-positioned drones there.

"I heard from one of the guards here last night that Amina left a few days back with a small army to back them up. How are they doing? What's the plan sir?" He asked the King.

"She did." He said with a nod. "They left nearly four days ago. They should be arriving within the next day or so. Primarily griffin cavalry and archers, armed with some of the arrows your people were kind enough to supply. Plus, some of our explosives and mages."

James nodded before looking back at Vickers. "Any movement in the blight?"

Vickers shook his head. "I see some of the city's troops moving around. Looks like they've got a new position set up further back from the stuff." He maneuvered around the menu a bit. "But it doesn't look like a fight."

"Hopefully it stays that way." The King interjected.

James turned back, his eyebrows furrowed. "Why would the 'Cleanser'... or whatever... send out that bomb and detonate it?"

"That's not the real issue." Vickers said before the King could reply.

James looked back at him curiously. "The box?"

Vickers nodded. "Yeah. You said before that they couldn't affect you. And your pistol rounds killed em easy enough, same for the princess." James nodded affirmative. "One even outright tackled you and made all your other gear disappear. But not you."

"Yeah, all my local stuff dissappearred. Minus my bottomless bags." James confirmed.

"You have any stuff from earth in those bags?" Vickers asked.

"Yeah, a ton of stuff." James admitted. He hadn't thought of that before.

"So, before they couldn't affect stuff from our world. But now they can." Vickers said, intentionally stating the obvious. "And we saw it tanking arrow shots from OUR arrows. They had that missile for what? Three or four months? Five tops?"

"You think they managed to adapt to materials from your world?" Veliry said from where she'd been blearily spacing out through the meeting.

Vickers shrugged. "They had access to an incredibly advanced bit of tech that also has a ton of mass from our world." He tilted his head with a wince. "Plus they somehow controlled it. Detonating it DESPITE our people transmitting emergency shut down protocols." He stood up straight, spreading his arms a bit. "We know that they can uh... repurpose anything that goes into the blight spots, or gets disappeared by their powers." He shrugged again, letting them draw the obvious conclusion.

"We might not be immune to their abilities anymore." James said.

"At least our guns should still work." Vickers added.

James raised an eyebrow. "How do you figure?" He asked.

He showed the footage leading up to the explosion. "It survived the arrows." He said. "But it didn't dissappear them like it did the soldier's other weapons." He looked around at the other people in the room. "Maybe it can't QUITE effect them as well." He shrugged again. "Or maybe it just didn't care because it knew it was about to go all explodey. I don't know."

"We can only hope that's not the case." The King said. He stood up and signalled to Veliry. "Now. If everyone else would give us the room for a moment. I need to have a word with Captain Choi."

James looked at him curiously as everyone else shuffled out except Veliry.

Once the room was empty save for him, the King, and Veliry, and the doors had closed, James asked the obvious question.

"Is everything okay?" He asked.

"It is." King Farrick said with a nod. "But you've given me several warnings about the potential for your people to..... connive... in their favor over us." He said as he stepped over in front of James. He signalled for Veliry to hand him something.

"Uh. Yeah." James said hesitantly as Veliry reached into a bottomless bag on her waist that looked familiar to him somehow. "Why?"

He watched, eyes widening as he saw what Veliry retrieved from the bag. He sat forward as he watched her check the chamber of the thing, just like he had with his own a million times, before handing it to the King. Suddenly he understood the vaguely triangular shape of the bag.

The king inspected it for a moment, then held it out to James.

"Because now it's my turn to return the favor." The King said as James gingerly took the long, rudimentary, weapon in his hands. It was startlingly light for its size.

"When the hell did you guys manage to put this together?" He asked as he looked it over.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wrvz1v/wait_is_this_just_gate_209/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (207/?)

Previous

Writer's note: A lot of small, yet significant, things occur in this chapter.

Or maybe it's the other way around.

Eh, you'll figure it out.

Enjoy

\~

It was mid day when the royal soldiers made it to the camp.

"Hello there!" Said the Sergeant of the guard, a large darkly skinned elf who carried a massive hammer on his back, as he approached. "Is this the cartographer's camp?"

Nguyen approached, hand held out in greeting, and clamped onto the Sergeant's wrist.

"It is." He said as his greeting was reciprocated. "I'm Arix. I'm leading this expedition."

"Good to meet you." The elf said in response. "I'm Sergeant Vhiner'ys. "

Behind him the other soldiers were taking knees, drinking water, and generally relaxing during the break. But Nguyen noticed the handful of werewolves that were sniffing at the air.

"What can I do for you sergeant?" He asked with a smile.

"Oh nothing too crazy." Vhiner'ys said as he looked around. "We're mostly here to oversee the clan dunebasher expedition, make sure they don't actually open anything too crazy down there that causes problems." He turned back to look at Nguyen. "But we'd also heard that there was a cartography camp that had been set up in the desert for some reason and figured we would check it out, make sure you guys are being safe. It can be dangerous being so isolated."

"Well, we appreciate the check up-" Nguyen began. But the soldier cut him off.

"You're all humans?" He asked unexpectedly. Nguyen was about to answer when he continued. "No dwarves? Elves? And no griffins?" He looked around as if to make a point. "Most cartographers just use griffins to map. A quick record from a student's crystal and you can map a whole province in a single day."

"Our employer wanted things done a more traditional way." Nguyen answered. "And we actually have so-"

"Who is your employer?" Vhiner'ys interrupted again. "Who would be interested in this desert beside the Dunebashers?"

"I'm not at liberty to-" Nguyen attempted to say.

"And since when does the Cartographer's Association allow their people to work freelance at this level?" The elf asked. "Director Tilden doesn't even like his map makers doing their own personal studies, much less leading entire freelance expeditions."

"I'm sorry." Nguyen said, his voice suddenly stern. "Am I being interrogated here? I thought you were just checking up on us? If you'd like I have all the necessary paperwork allowing us to be here." He saw Isaacs standing near the tent that was over the box with half of their weapons in it.

"I'd like to see that." Vhiner'ys said without missing a beat. Then he paused as he took a long breath and his shoulder's slumped. "Sorry. We've been marching for days now. I'm just tired, and my eyes don't like all this light. I suppose I'm a bit frustrated." He held his hand up. "Please, forgive my gruffness. I would like to see that paperwork if you get a chance, but I'm not here to hassle you."

"It's.... fine." Nguyen said hesitantly. "Please, follow me. Would you like some refreshments? We have some sweetened tea that we keep chilled."

"That sounds lovely actually." The Sergeant replied with a grin as he moved to follow Nguyen's direction. "Seriously though. An all human expedition?"

"I didn't pick the team." Nguyen replied. "I got hired and put in charge. Those kinds of decisions were above my level."

"Sounds like life as a soldier if you ask me." The elf replied with a chuckle.

You have no idea. Nguyen thought as he led the sergeant into their dining tent.

\----------

It was well into the night when James and Vickers walked back into the castle.

They'd been walking for nearly three days and had actually opted to simply continue through the previous night, much to the griffin riders' protests. But neither of them wanted to be out of the loop of what was happening. Plus Vickers was still worried about additional attacks by the Agency.

He set Steve up in his spot at the stables, glad to see that the drake was mostly healed under the glowing green bandages. Another day or two and he'd likely be good to go. Steve happily crawled into his den, forgoing the goat carcass that James threw out for him, an curled into a ball.

James checked in with the guards near the castle's command room. Amina was gone, already riding to Jadesport with a portion of the army to reinforce it against the blight. So, after stopping at the communication room to send a few quick messages, James simply headed up to his and Amina's room and collapsed into their bed.

He was too tired to care about the sense of dread that was suffusing the entirety of the castle grounds.

Or the way his sword danced and jittered, causing a clattering noise from where he'd set down his gear.

Many floors below in the castle's basement Veliry and Marcos were "interrogating" the lump of golem flesh that they'd captured.

And James didn't want to know why that required the use of necromancy.

\----------

Amina rolled over in her tent when her tablet dinged with a message. She'd taken it from Veliry before leaving so that she could be kept updated on James's status and so she could check the footage from the blighted zone.

>Hey. Heard you're already on the road towards Jadesport.I'm back safe and sound.Will figure out what everything looks like tomorrow. Then I'll catch up to you.Stay safe.Love, James.

Amina clutched the tablet to her chest for a moment as she yawned. Then she sent a short, three word, response so he'd know she'd read his message.

James and Steve would have to ride fast to catch up to them.

She smiled at the thought as she drifted back into sleep.

\----------

Margaret Choi hadn't gotten any update on James in nearly a month at this point.

She'd known that he was going to be on the road for a while due to some kind of memorial service for one of his friends. She also knew that he hadn't been doing too well the last time they'd spoken.

She'd watched as he and Joey had caught up, talking about all the crazy things he'd seen and done.

But while Joey had been, in his own words, stoked about how cool James's new arm was. She had only seen a perversion of the arm he was supposed to have. And one that had only come as a result of him LOSING his arm in the first place.

She'd known when he joined the Army that he might get hurt as a result some day. But the tale he'd told of being burned near to death, and losing a hand as a result, had shocked her. The fact that he'd somehow magically gotten the arm back, but in the form of a "werewolf" arm, had scared her.

She still didn't completely believe the fact that in this other world werewolves were not only real, but were actually considered just normal members of society. And this was despite that fact that James had sent them pictures and videos of him and his now dead werewolf companion.

And now he had one of their arms instead of the one he'd been born with.

She'd scolded the General for letting her son get hurt like that, even as she'd had to admit to herself that it sounded like James had done the damage to himself.

He was so like his father in that way.

And now he'd been off the radar for almost a month, even though it was clear that the staff at the compound were still in touch with him. So, really, it was more accurate to say that she was being kept in the dark.

Then she'd gone in today and actually been told that she wouldn't be allowed into the facility because of a development on the other side that required their attention.

That sounded like bullshit for "we need you to stop bugging us" to her.

What were they up to in there.

It was these thoughts that took up her mind as she walked back into the house that had been provided for them. As a result she hadn't actually paid any attention to the small package that she picked up from the doorstep. In her distraction she'd simply assumed that it was another delivery of one of Joey's games or computer parts or something.

It was only as she sat at the kitchen counter with a fresh cup of coffee that she finally gave it any attention.

On it was a simple, hand written, note in sharpie black.

>We may need to use what you were given before soon. Put these with the other things-K

She picked the package up and was surprised to finally notice how heavy it was. It also sounded like a bag full of coins.

She opened it, and a set of odd gold, silver, and brown coins fell out. They had odd symbols on them, surrounding an image of a crown wreathed in what looked like flowers of some kind on one side. The other side had a picture of a man with a beard on it. It looked like something out of a medieval movie.

Why would they give me these? She wondered as she quietly put them back in the padded envelope and took them to her room. What is going on in that facility?

\----------

Dr. Bradley Oikonomou panted as he sprinted through the hallway and toward the command room.

A soldier raised their hand to challenge him as he rounded a corner. But he just ignored them and kept running, folder clutched in his hands with a death grip.

"NO TIME!" He yelled as he ran past the agitated soldier.

He swiped his access badge eagerly, and as soon as he heard the lock disengage he burst into the command room hard enough to knock on of the techs on their back, spilling their coffee on them in the process.

"I'm so sorry!" He exclaimed as the entire room looked at him in surprise, the guards in the corners reaching for the pistols on their hips. "We've figured it out!" He said with a smile.

"Figured what out?" Colonel Muhammed asked as she glared at him. "Who the hell are you and why did you just charge into this command room." She turned to the guards. "Restrain this man!" She ordered them as they were already moving toward him.

"Wait!" Bradley interjected, holding the folder up in front of him like a shield. "We've figured out why they can't come back through!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wqzdgy/wait_is_this_just_gate_208/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (207/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: A lot of small, yet significant, things occur in this chapter.

Or maybe it's the other way around.

Eh, you'll figure it out.

Enjoy

\~

It was mid day when the royal soldiers made it to the camp.

"Hello there!" Said the Sergeant of the guard, a large darkly skinned elf who carried a massive hammer on his back, as he approached. "Is this the cartographer's camp?"

Nguyen approached, hand held out in greeting, and clamped onto the Sergeant's wrist.

"It is." He said as his greeting was reciprocated. "I'm Arix. I'm leading this expedition."

"Good to meet you." The elf said in response. "I'm Sergeant Vhiner'ys. "

Behind him the other soldiers were taking knees, drinking water, and generally relaxing during the break. But Nguyen noticed the handful of werewolves that were sniffing at the air.

"What can I do for you sergeant?" He asked with a smile.

"Oh nothing too crazy." Vhiner'ys said as he looked around. "We're mostly here to oversee the clan dunebasher expedition, make sure they don't actually open anything too crazy down there that causes problems." He turned back to look at Nguyen. "But we'd also heard that there was a cartography camp that had been set up in the desert for some reason and figured we would check it out, make sure you guys are being safe. It can be dangerous being so isolated."

"Well, we appreciate the check up-" Nguyen began. But the soldier cut him off.

"You're all humans?" He asked unexpectedly. Nguyen was about to answer when he continued. "No dwarves? Elves? And no griffins?" He looked around as if to make a point. "Most cartographers just use griffins to map. A quick record from a student's crystal and you can map a whole province in a single day."

"Our employer wanted things done a more traditional way." Nguyen answered. "And we actually have so-"

"Who is your employer?" Vhiner'ys interrupted again. "Who would be interested in this desert beside the Dunebashers?"

"I'm not at liberty to-" Nguyen attempted to say.

"And since when does the Cartographer's Association allow their people to work freelance at this level?" The elf asked. "Director Tilden doesn't even like his map makers doing their own personal studies, much less leading entire freelance expeditions."

"I'm sorry." Nguyen said, his voice suddenly stern. "Am I being interrogated here? I thought you were just checking up on us? If you'd like I have all the necessary paperwork allowing us to be here." He saw Isaacs standing near the tent that was over the box with half of their weapons in it.

"I'd like to see that." Vhiner'ys said without missing a beat. Then he paused as he took a long breath and his shoulder's slumped. "Sorry. We've been marching for days now. I'm just tired, and my eyes don't like all this light. I suppose I'm a bit frustrated." He held his hand up. "Please, forgive my gruffness. I would like to see that paperwork if you get a chance, but I'm not here to hassle you."

"It's.... fine." Nguyen said hesitantly. "Please, follow me. Would you like some refreshments? We have some sweetened tea that we keep chilled."

"That sounds lovely actually." The Sergeant replied with a grin as he moved to follow Nguyen's direction. "Seriously though. An all human expedition?"

"I didn't pick the team." Nguyen replied. "I got hired and put in charge. Those kinds of decisions were above my level."

"Sounds like life as a soldier if you ask me." The elf replied with a chuckle.

You have no idea. Nguyen thought as he led the sergeant into their dining tent.

\----------

It was well into the night when James and Vickers walked back into the castle.

They'd been walking for nearly three days and had actually opted to simply continue through the previous night, much to the griffin riders' protests. But neither of them wanted to be out of the loop of what was happening. Plus Vickers was still worried about additional attacks by the Agency.

He set Steve up in his spot at the stables, glad to see that the drake was mostly healed under the glowing green bandages. Another day or two and he'd likely be good to go. Steve happily crawled into his den, forgoing the goat carcass that James threw out for him, an curled into a ball.

James checked in with the guards near the castle's command room. Amina was gone, already riding to Jadesport with a portion of the army to reinforce it against the blight. So, after stopping at the communication room to send a few quick messages, James simply headed up to his and Amina's room and collapsed into their bed.

He was too tired to care about the sense of dread that was suffusing the entirety of the castle grounds.

Or the way his sword danced and jittered, causing a clattering noise from where he'd set down his gear.

Many floors below in the castle's basement Veliry and Marcos were "interrogating" the lump of golem flesh that they'd captured.

And James didn't want to know why that required the use of necromancy.

\------------------------

Amina rolled over in her tent when her tablet dinged with a message. She'd taken it from Veliry before leaving so that she could be kept updated on James's status and so she could check the footage from the blighted zone.

>Hey. Heard you're already on the road towards Jadesport.
>
>I'm back safe and sound.
>
>Will figure out what everything looks like tomorrow. Then I'll catch up to you.
>
>Stay safe.
>
>Love, James.

Amina clutched the tablet to her chest for a moment as she yawned. Then she sent a short, three word, response so he'd know she'd read his message.

James and Steve would have to ride fast to catch up to them.

She smiled at the thought as she drifted back into sleep.

\----------

Margaret Choi hadn't gotten any update on James in nearly a month at this point.

She'd known that he was going to be on the road for a while due to some kind of memorial service for one of his friends. She also knew that he hadn't been doing too well the last time they'd spoken.

She'd watched as he and Joey had caught up, talking about all the crazy things he'd seen and done.

But while Joey had been, in his own words, stoked about how cool James's new arm was. She had only seen a perversion of the arm he was supposed to have. And one that had only come as a result of him LOSING his arm in the first place.

She'd known when he joined the Army that he might get hurt as a result some day. But the tale he'd told of being burned near to death, and losing a hand as a result, had shocked her. The fact that he'd somehow magically gotten the arm back, but in the form of a "werewolf" arm, had scared her.

She still didn't completely believe the fact that in this other world werewolves were not only real, but were actually considered just normal members of society. And this was despite that fact that James had sent them pictures and videos of him and his now dead werewolf companion.

And now he had one of their arms instead of the one he'd been born with.

She'd scolded the General for letting her son get hurt like that, even as she'd had to admit to herself that it sounded like James had done the damage to himself.

He was so like his father in that way.

And now he'd been off the radar for almost a month, even though it was clear that the staff at the compound were still in touch with him. So, really, it was more accurate to say that she was being kept in the dark.

Then she'd gone in today and actually been told that she wouldn't be allowed into the facility because of a development on the other side that required their attention.

That sounded like bullshit for "we need you to stop bugging us" to her.

What were they up to in there.

It was these thoughts that took up her mind as she walked back into the house that had been provided for them. As a result she hadn't actually paid any attention to the small package that she picked up from the doorstep. In her distraction she'd simply assumed that it was another delivery of one of Joey's games or computer parts or something.

It was only as she sat at the kitchen counter with a fresh cup of coffee that she finally gave it any attention.

On it was a simple, hand written, note in sharpie black.

>We may need to use what you were given before soon. Put these with the other things
>
>\-K

She picked the package up and was surprised to finally notice how heavy it was. It also sounded like a bag full of coins.

She opened it, and a set of odd gold, silver, and brown coins fell out. They had odd symbols on them, surrounding an image of a crown wreathed in what looked like flowers of some kind on one side. The other side had a picture of a man with a beard on it. It looked like something out of a medieval movie.

Why would they give me these? She wondered as she quietly put them back in the padded envelope and took them to her room. What is going on in that facility?

\---

Dr. Bradley Oikonomou panted as he sprinted through the hallway and toward the command room.

A soldier raised their hand to challenge him as he rounded a corner. But he just ignored them and kept running, folder clutched in his hands with a death grip.

"NO TIME!" He yelled as he ran past the agitated soldier.

He swiped his access badge eagerly, and as soon as he heard the lock disengage he burst into the command room hard enough to knock on of the techs on their back, spilling their coffee on them in the process.

"I'm so sorry!" He exclaimed as the entire room looked at him in surprise, the guards in the corners reaching for the pistols on their hips. "We've figured it out!" He said with a smile.

"Figured what out?" Colonel Muhammed asked as she glared at him. "Who the hell are you and why did you just charge into this command room." She turned to the guards. "Restrain this man!" She ordered them as they were already moving toward him.

"Wait!" Bradley interjected, holding the folder up in front of him like a shield. "We've figured out why they can't come back through!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wqzc0c/wait_is_this_just_gate_208/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (206/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Sympathy for the Devil? Isn't that a (fantastic) Rolling Stones song?

Enjoy.

Edit and PS: I have made my decision and Vickers looks like a young Josh Brolin. I HAVE SPOKEN!

\~\~\~

A technician, one of the new arrivals by the name of Hill, was hanging from the rungs of the ladder inside. She looked around curiously for a moment.

"Scrambling Chief Arix?" She asked.

"Yeah." Nguyen replied with a frustrated sigh as he kneeled down. "Head back down, tell everyone we're going stealth for the next few days. Then set everything to dead. And wire the other boxes."

Hill nodded. "Got it boss. Give us twenty tops, can't speak for the other boxes." She said before descending back down.

"Faster'd be better." He said just before he heard her begin relaying the orders to the other two that were down below with her. He stood up and looked at the other two present. "Sticky go spread the word. Isaacs you're on double check duty."

The two nodded before heading out of the tent flap. Nguyen began packing and concealing everything in the tent he was in since it had actual intel in it. He tossed the stuff that needed real hiding down the hatch with a warning before he was done.

A little over fifteen minutes later he watched as Hill and the other two clambered out of the hatch.

"Eighty six the burgers until we get our next shipment of buns." He said into the open hatch. He hated how restaurant-ish all the code-words for the boxes were. He'd spent three years working at a diner after high school and as much as he'd liked the crew there, he'd hated the actual job.

The door to the hatch hinged back up and sealed with a light clank. Then the entire thing descended back into the ground, vibrating as it did. While it was doing this, he and the others headed outside the tent to ensure that it completed its job. Nguyen watched as sections of sand around the tent lowered several inches as the box compressed itself down to its smallest size possible.

Nguyen looked over the camp, and its now bustling crew, to gaze in the direction of the pass. He couldn't see it from there, but he knew that danger was coming from that direction.

He didn't see Sherk flying overhead and watching the camp move about. Even from as high as he was, he could see the sand shifting around the tents.

After all, he was a Dunebasher.

\----------

"So. How do you do the fire?" Vickers asked as he and James walked down the road.

Veliry and a few of the griffin riders were riding along in front of and behind them, while the rest were in the air above them. Marcos and one of them had already flown back to the capital so that the elderly mage could begin studying the clump of golem that they'd captured and preserved.

"I think of heat." James replied simply. "I think of campfires, and blowtorches and cigar lighters and things like that." He paused. "I tried thinking of flamethrowers one time."

"Fuck that." Vickers replied. "Flamethrowers explode."

"How do you think I learned to fly?" James responded. "I was thinking of a flamethrower emitting from the bottom of my foot. Then that scene from that old Nick Cage, World War Two movie popped into my head. Ruined the whole visualization process. And now.... I fly with explosions."

"Really?" Vickers said with a hint of judgment. "That's so fuckin' stupid. And that movie was awful."

"Says the wannabe subzero cosplayer." James countered."And it's not like IIIII made the magical rules around here." He said with a nod back to where Veliry was riding.

"Eh. Fair enough." Vickers agreed.

"By the way. How did YOU get magic?" James asked. "And why ice?"

"Real talk?" Vicker asked. "I wanted to punch the shit out of you one day."

James furrowed his eyebrows at the confession.

"I think the rest is me just being cold blooded." Vickers continued.

James stopped walking, causing Steve to stop behind him, as he cringed.

"Dude." James said with a shake of his head. "Do you even hear yourself just now?"

Vickers thought for a moment, stopping as he did. Then he shook his head too. "Holy shit I just sounded like a massive douchebag."

"Yeah you did." James agreed as he began walking again.. "What the hell man?"

"God. Does magic mess with your brain too?" Vickers wondered. "Like. I know it's doin' something weird with our blood and stuff. But what the hell was that?"

James kept walking but stayed a few steps further away, drawing a look of confusion from the SEAL.

"What?" James said as he noticed the expression. "I didn't wanna get to close to Mr Cool Ice." He added with his arms up in mock surrender.

"I fuckin hate you." Vickers said.

\------------------------

Werner walked into the healing ward awkwardly.

She'd never been in it before. Not even when James or Vickers had been recovering after the battle with the elemental. It had been packed and she had no real medical experience, so she hadn't wanted to get in the way.

But that wasn't the real reason she'd avoided the place.

The truth was that she hated hospitals. And as rustic as parts of the castle may have looked, the healing ward looked like a hospital ward, and smelled like one too.

She looked around for a moment, startled at how much the room reminded her of some of the clinics she'd seen in other countries around the world.

She didn't notice her hand start shaking.

"Can I help you miss?" A soft voice asked, causing her to jump.

Werner looked back to see what looked like a child, wearing the tell tale white robes with green trim that marked a healer.

"Um. Yes." Werner said hesitantly. "You're one of the healers?"

"I am." The small woman said with a small smile. "I am healer Opila Longwalker. Are you hurt or sick? How can I help you?"

"Uh, No." Werner answered. Then she reconsidered. "Well. Kind of. I'm ambassador Werner. From Earth." Werner introduced herself. "I was wondering if I could ask some questions about healing magic. Is there somewhere we can talk?"

"Certainly." Opila said. She gestured to a door "Please."

Werner went in and saw the familiar site of an exam room. Opila ushered her in and gestured at the bed and the stool next to it. Once Werner was sitting on the stool Opila sat on one of her own.

"What would you like to know?" Opila asked. "The King has authorized us to assist you and your companions as much as we can. You mentioned that you were 'kind of' sick?"

"That's.... very nice of him." Werner said. "And yeah..." She paused as she thought of what to say. Her hands gripped at the hem of her blazer. "Um. What do you know about the brain?" She asked. "Or genetics?"

"Well I know that the brain is one of the two most important organs in a human," She gestured at Werner with her hand. "body. And, genetics?" Opila wondered. "Like familial lineage?"

Werner nodded. "It's... a bit more complex." She said. "Have you had a chance to read the medical textbooks that Captain Choi had sent over?" She asked.

"I've read the translated versions." Opila gestured at the ward outside. "But sadly most of my time, and as a result my study of it, has been focused on the mundane aspects." She admitted before grinning a bit. "Especially the stuff that helps our soldiers recover from their days off." She said slyly.

Werner chuckled. It seemed that no matter what universe you were in, soldiers were still soldiers.

"Well." She said, her face hardening again. "I... I have this.... condition. With my brain." Opila's eyebrows raised and her hand rested on top of Werner's, stilling it.

"It's okay." Opila said with a nod. "Take your time."

Werner let out a small smile. She pulled a small, worn out, pamphlet from her purse. She'd read it a million times. "It's... well, we call it Huntington's disease."

And she told Opila everything about it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wq8x86/wait_is_this_just_gate_207/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (206/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Sympathy for the Devil? Isn't that a (fantastic) Rolling Stones song?

Enjoy.

Edit and PS: I have made my decision and Vickers looks like a young Josh Brolin. I HAVE SPOKEN!

\~

Master Sergeant Nguyen was in the "Cartography" tent going over a map of the camp's expected expansion when Sticky came rushing in, practically ripping the toggles off he was so anxious.

"Sarge!" Sticky exclaimed in a failed attempt at a whisper.

"What is it Sticky?" Nguyen replied as he and Isaacs turned to look at the intruding specialist. Then he hissed. "And why aren't you using my NAME?"

"Sorry.... Chief Arix." Sticky corrected himself as he stood up straighter. "But we have a slight problem." He paused as he remembered the name of one of the new arrivals. "Um.... Sten.... the uh, new guy. Well he was on a 'mapping trip' over near the pass."

"Spit it out sticky." Isaacs said"

Sticky swallowed nervously. "There's a patrol of Royal Guard forces coming up the pass. Sten said that he was able to see a couple of uh, werewolves, with them."

The two seniors shared a glance with each other.

"Secret squirrel stuff." Isaacs said with a hint of exasperation.

"Yeah." Nguyen confirmed.

Isaacs walked a few steps away before turning back and pulling on the rug he'd been standing on. "Burger and fries. No pickles." He said into the toggle on his jacket collar. Nguyen shook his head at the ridiculous phrase that had been programmed into the system on Earth.

There was a slight humming noise from where Isaacs had been standing before. A few seconds after it had started a rectangular metal tube protruded from the ground, roughly three feet wide in each direction. A jet of compressed air cleared the sand off of the top of it. A noise came from inside and after a moment the top of the tube lowered and then hinged off to the side.

A technician, one of the new arrivals by the name of Hill, was hanging from the rungs of the ladder inside. She looked around curiously for a moment.

"Scrambling Chief Arix?" She asked.

"Yeah." Nguyen replied with a frustrated sigh as he kneeled down. "Head back down, tell everyone we're going stealth for the next few days. Then set everything to dead. And wire the other boxes."

Hill nodded. "Got it boss. Give us twenty tops, can't speak for the other boxes." She said before descending back down.

"Faster'd be better." He said just before he heard her begin relaying the orders to the other two that were down below with her. He stood up and looked at the other two present. "Sticky go spread the word. Isaacs you're on double check duty."

The two nodded before heading out of the tent flap. Nguyen began packing and concealing everything in the tent he was in since it had actual intel in it. He tossed the stuff that needed real hiding down the hatch with a warning before he was done.

A little over fifteen minutes later he watched as Hill and the other two clambered out of the hatch.

"Eighty six the burgers until we get our next shipment of buns." He said into the open hatch. He hated how restaurant-ish all the code-words for the boxes were. He'd spent three years working at a diner after high school and as much as he'd liked the crew there, he'd hated the actual job.

The door to the hatch hinged back up and sealed with a light clank. Then the entire thing descended back into the ground, vibrating as it did. While it was doing this, he and the others headed outside the tent to ensure that it completed its job. Nguyen watched as sections of sand around the tent lowered several inches as the box compressed itself down to its smallest size possible.

Nguyen looked over the camp, and its now bustling crew, to gaze in the direction of the pass. He couldn't see it from there, but he knew that danger was coming from that direction.

He didn't see Sherk flying overhead and watching the camp move about. Even from as high as he was, he could see the sand shifting around the tents.

After all, he was a Dunebasher.

\---

"So. How do you do the fire?" Vickers asked as he and James walked down the road.

Veliry and a few of the griffin riders were riding along in front of and behind them, while the rest were in the air above them. Marcos and one of them had already flown back to the capital so that the elderly mage could begin studying the clump of golem that they'd captured and preserved.

"I think of heat." James replied simply. "I think of campfires, and blowtorches and cigar lighters and things like that." He paused. "I tried thinking of flamethrowers one time."

"Fuck that." Vickers replied. "Flamethrowers explode."

"How do you think I learned to fly?" James responded. "I was thinking of a flamethrower emitting from the bottom of my foot. Then that scene from that old Nick Cage, World War Two movie popped into my head. Ruined the whole visualization process. And now.... I fly with explosions."

"Really?" Vickers said with a hint of judgment. "That's so fuckin' stupid. And that movie was awful."

"Says the wannabe subzero cosplayer." James countered."And it's not like IIIII made the magical rules around here." He said with a nod back to where Veliry was riding.

"Eh. Fair enough." Vickers agreed.

"By the way. How did YOU get magic?" James asked. "And why ice?"

"Real talk?" Vicker asked. "I wanted to punch the shit out of you one day."

James furrowed his eyebrows at the confession.

"I think the rest is me just being cold blooded." Vickers continued.

James stopped walking, causing Steve to stop behind him, as he cringed.

"Dude." James said with a shake of his head. "Do you even hear yourself just now?"

Vickers thought for a moment, stopping as he did. Then he shook his head too. "Holy shit I just sounded like a massive douchebag."

"Yeah you did." James agreed as he began walking again.. "What the hell man?"

"God. Does magic mess with your brain too?" Vickers wondered. "Like. I know it's doin' something weird with our blood and stuff. But what the hell was that?"

James kept walking but stayed a few steps further away, drawing a look of confusion from the SEAL.

"What?" James said as he noticed the expression. "I didn't wanna get too close to Mr Cool Ice." He added with his arms up in mock surrender.

"I fuckin hate you." Vickers said.

\----------

Werner walked into the healing ward awkwardly.

She'd never been in it before. Not even when James or Vickers had been recovering after the battle with the elemental. It had been packed and she had no real medical experience, so she hadn't wanted to get in the way.

But that wasn't the real reason she'd avoided the place.

The truth was that she hated hospitals. And as rustic as parts of the castle may have looked, the healing ward looked like a hospital ward, and smelled like one too.

She looked around for a moment, startled at how much the room reminded her of some of the clinics she'd seen in other countries around the world.

She didn't notice her hand start shaking.

"Can I help you miss?" A soft voice asked, causing her to jump.

Werner looked back to see what looked like a child, wearing the tell tale white robes with green trim that marked a healer.

"Um. Yes." Werner said hesitantly. "You're one of the healers?"

"I am." The small woman said with a small smile. "I am healer Opila Longwalker. Are you hurt or sick? How can I help you?"

"Uh, No." Werner answered. Then she reconsidered. "Well. Kind of. I'm ambassador Werner. From Earth." Werner introduced herself. "I was wondering if I could ask some questions about healing magic. Is there somewhere we can talk?"

"Certainly." Opila said. She gestured to a door "Please."

Werner went in and saw the familiar site of an exam room. Opila ushered her in and gestured at the bed and the stool next to it. Once Werner was sitting on the stool Opila sat on one of her own.

"What would you like to know?" Opila asked. "The King has authorized us to assist you and your companions as much as we can. You mentioned that you were 'kind of' sick?"

"That's.... very nice of him." Werner said. "And yeah..." She paused as she thought of what to say. Her hands gripped at the hem of her blazer. "Um. What do you know about the brain?" She asked. "Or genetics?"

"Well I know that the brain is one of the two most important organs in a human," She gestured at Werner with her hand. "body. And, genetics?" Opila wondered. "Like familial lineage?"

Werner nodded. "It's... a bit more complex." She said. "Have you had a chance to read the medical textbooks that Captain Choi had sent over?" She asked.

"I've read the translated versions." Opila gestured at the ward outside. "But sadly most of my time, and as a result my study of it, has been focused on the mundane aspects." She admitted before grinning a bit. "Especially the stuff that helps our soldiers recover from their days off." She said slyly.

Werner chuckled. It seemed that no matter what universe you were in, soldiers were still soldiers.

"Well." She said, her face hardening again. "I... I have this.... condition. With my brain." Opila's eyebrows raised and her hand rested on top of Werner's, stilling it.

"It's okay." Opila said with a nod. "Take your time."

Werner let out a small smile. She pulled a small, worn out, pamphlet from her purse. She'd read it a million times. "It's... well, we call it Huntington's disease."

And she told Opila everything about it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wq8vvv/wait_is_this_just_gate_207/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (205/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James makes waves. Also, soon enough you'll get to know what Werner's deal is. Mostly.

Enjoy.

\~

Unbeknownst to either; both Veliry and General Krick watched the footage of James's fight frame by frame as the light faded from the day.

Veliry had long since learned how to operate the startlingly intuitive recording and play back programs on the tablets that Earth had supplied them with. It had seemed like a magic of its own at first. But the absolute lack of any magical energy in the devices always amazed her, even if she more or less understood how it worked.

But right now her focus was on what the tablet showed.

For James to not only have survived a fight with a group of the golems, but also their commander, and their resulting fused form was nothing short of incredible. She doubted even Amina or Kela could manage such a feat of fighting prowess. Though she would admit that his possession of the Mage's Blade definitely put him at an advantage, its capabilities making it the bane of magically created creatures of all kinds.

Still, his movements and tactics in the footage spoke to his capabilities.

She watched as he moved so fast the camera struggled to track him, his form blurring in between different frames of as he blasted around the area.

His explosions were larger and more violent, yet also more controlled, than they had been during the fight with the elemental months earlier.

She saw him flipping and spinning like a top, is arms and legs tightening or relaxing to increase or decrease his rotations as needed.

She couldn't help but be amazed at how fluidly he controlled his chain weapon with his wind magic even as he continued flying about and wielding other weapons. Even using wind magic to move a chain like he did spoke to a focus and control that most mages would struggle to even initiate. Yet James did it as though by instinct.

She looked over to where he was sleeping, his body tucked into the side of Steve's body as they both rested. Steve had draped his furred tail over him to keep him warm. She knew that his sword was just underneath that tail, in arms reach. The site reminded her of how Gixelle had often slept when they'd all been traveling together.

She thought back to her own training as a mage. It had been years before she'd even been capable of creating a consistent wind spray from her hand. In fact, most mages she knew didn't get past the apprentice stage until they were well into their thirties. Some never got past that point. She was considered by many to be a prodigy because once she'd finally unlocked her magical abilities she'd progressed rapidly. She simply attributed it to studiousness.

But James was something different.

She wanted to think that he was his world's equivalent of a prodigy as well. That maybe his physiology, which was designed NOT to require magical energy, was simply stronger once it got it. Vickers being able to somehow manifest frost magic, and in combat no less, seemed to confirm the theory.

But that still didn't explain the footage that she was watching.

Between his explosive flight style, his reflex enhancing vision power, his wind magic, his weapons, and his own sheer combat prowess, James was fighting at a level that was on the Arch-Mage level. In fact, she thought it might have been even higher. After all, his newfound skills would carry over even if he went back to Earth somehow. Even if his magic was completely absent, his new skills would make him an absolutely dangerous opponent.

She looked over to the campfire where Vickers was sitting and listening to the jokes of the griffin riders quietly.

James was considered a standard soldier on his world. Vickers was considered to be his world's Elite warrior. What would happen if the large, abrasive, man accelerated through magical skills like James had.

She liked James. During his time in this world he had become someone she considered a close friend, and knew from previous travels with him that she could likely trust him with her life if she needed to. She certainly trusted both Amina and Kela that way, and James had won both of them over. And in Amina's case had even overcome her initial anger at him and become her lover and betrothed. The King liked him, and even the people of the land spoke of him as a hero.

But she'd also heard the warnings he'd given them about the people of his world, their greed, their cleverness, their violence.

Looking at the footage, thinking of how Vickers had engaged the golem, remembering the devastation outside of Jadesport, Veliry began to worry about these people from this other world.

She liked and trusted James.

But the things she'd seen him and Vickers do made her worry for her own world despite the fact that she KNEW James was here to save it.

\----------

As Veliry contemplated the safety of her world, General Krick was thinking in a startlingly similar fashion.

He watched Choi's footage with fascination as he saw the superhuman movements and attacks.

It was like something out of the old superhero movies he'd watched as a young man. The speed, the relentless attacks, hell even the enemy.

He'd been surprised to hear of Choi's advancements through the other world. His fights seemed to be escalating to higher and higher levels and yet despite that the young mustang continued to rise to every challenge.

And now Vickers was some kind of ice boxer. And he knew that a few of the desert team had also managed to figure out magic, albeit not as expansively as Choi had.

And even though the General wanted nothing more than continuing peace, the idea of super-powered soldiers was something that even he couldn't deny the desire for.

What was worse, was that he knew the Secretary would see the footage and think the exact same thing. Grant had holed up at the third site and had complete control over a doorway that the King and his people had no knowledge of. On top of that Grant was ensuring that all the data from all three sites was being routed directly to him at all times. He would see this footage and know what it meant compared to past reports.

General Krick suspected that he might have to do something about that soon enough.

And they still needed to figure out how to get their people back.

\----------

Werner was in bed when her phone went off. She rolled over to grab it as she yawned. She couldn't deny that despite their otherwise medieval stylings, the Petravians knew how to make a bed.

She looked at the simple message on the phone as she licked her lips, trying to get moisture back in them as she slowly came back to consciousness.

>You need to convince the locals to teach you magic.-S.G.

What? She wondered.

She was about to reread the message when her phone dinged again. This time it had received a video.

She tapped her finger on the icon and brought the footage up. She'd been in the communication room monitoring the situation with Choi. But the communication hub was basically just a massive router that served to relay data from one side to the other. It's capacity for processing footage or data was about as minimal as it got. So the footage she'd been seeing from the drones had been choppy and pixelated as the massive amounts of data had been controlled by the techs on Earth.

This new footage on her phone had clearly been allowed to parse over the long chain of drones from the capital to where the fight had been. Each bit and byte had been allowed to send and compile in its own time, then someone had compiled it all and processed out any errors.

She didn't like Choi, but she couldn't deny what she was seeing. The young man was a magical powerhouse.

She looked back at the message.

Getting her hands on magic, whether via training or books or scrolls or whatever other form, had always been an objective. But it had been one that had specifically been set on a back burner. Going after it too early was a touch aggressive for a political gain.

But Secretary Grant had seen Choi's footage too. And he wanted more magic in Earth's arsenal.

Watching it again, she understood why.

She yawned again, and as her muscles tensed her hand spasmed, cracking a knuckle unintentionally. She also felt one of her feet kick the other.

She groaned and grabbed a pill from the night stand.

Fine. She thought. But if I'm asking for magic, it's gonna be the healing kind. Leave the explosions and ice fists to those two neanderthals.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wpezbv/wait_is_this_just_gate_206/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (205/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James makes waves. Also, soon enough you'll get to know what Werner's deal is. Mostly.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

over him to keep him warm. She knew that his sword was just underneath that tail, in arms reach. The site reminded her of how Gixelle had often slept when they'd all been traveling together.

She thought back to her own training as a mage. It had been years before she'd even been capable of creating a consistent wind spray from her hand. In fact, most mages she knew didn't get past the apprentice stage until they were well into their thirties. Some never got past that point. She was considered by many to be a prodigy because once she'd finally unlocked her magical abilities she'd progressed rapidly. She simply attributed it to studiousness.

But James was something different.

She wanted to think that he was his world's equivalent of a prodigy as well. That maybe his physiology, which was designed NOT to require magical energy, was simply stronger once it got it. Vickers being able to somehow manifest frost magic, and in combat no less, seemed to confirm the theory.

But that still didn't explain the footage that she was watching.

Between his explosive flight style, his reflex enhancing vision power, his wind magic, his weapons, and his own sheer combat prowess, James was fighting at a level that was on the Arch-Mage level. In fact, she thought it might have been even higher. After all, his newfound skills would carry over even if he went back to Earth somehow. Even if his magic was completely absent, his new skills would make him an absolutely dangerous opponent.

She looked over to the campfire where Vickers was sitting and listening to the jokes of the griffin riders quietly.

James was considered a standard soldier on his world. Vickers was considered to be his world's Elite warrior. What would happen if the large, abrasive, man accelerated through magical skills like James had.

She liked James. During his time in this world he had become someone she considered a close friend, and knew from previous travels with him that she could likely trust him with her life if she needed to. She certainly trusted both Amina and Kela that way, and James had won both of them over. And in Amina's case had even overcome her initial anger at him and become her lover and betrothed. The King liked him, and even the people of the land spoke of him as a hero.

But she'd also heard the warnings he'd given them about the people of his world, their greed, their cleverness, their violence.

Looking at the footage, thinking of how Vickers had engaged the golem, remembering the devastation outside of Jadesport, Veliry began to worry about these people from this other world.

She liked and trusted James.

But the things she'd seen him and Vickers do made her worry for her own world despite the fact that she KNEW James was here to save it.

\----------

As Veliry contemplated the safety of her world, General Krick was thinking in a startlingly similar fashion.

He watched Choi's footage with fascination as he saw the superhuman movements and attacks.

It was like something out of the old superhero movies he'd watched as a young man. The speed, the relentless attacks, hell even the enemy.

He'd been surprised to hear of Choi's advancements through the other world. His fights seemed to be escalating to higher and higher levels and yet despite that the young mustang continued to rise to every challenge.

And now Vickers was some kind of ice boxer. And he knew that a few of the desert team had also managed to figure out magic, albeit not as expansively as Choi had.

And even though the General wanted nothing more than continuing peace, the idea of super-powered soldiers was something that even he couldn't deny the desire for.

What was worse, was that he knew the Secretary would see the footage and think the exact same thing. Grant had holed up at the third site and had complete control over a doorway that the King and his people had no knowledge of. On top of that Grant was ensuring that all the data from all three sites was being routed directly to him at all times. He would see this footage and know what it meant compared to past reports.

General Krick suspected that he might have to do something about that soon enough.

And they still needed to figure out how to get their people back.

\----------

Werner was in bed when her phone went off. She rolled over to grab it as she yawned. She couldn't deny that despite their otherwise medieval stylings, the Petravians knew how to make a bed.

She looked at the simple message on the phone as she licked her lips, trying to get moisture back in them as she slowly came back to consciousness.

>You need to convince the locals to teach you magic.
>
>\-S.G.

What? She wondered.

She was about to reread the message when her phone dinged again. This time it had received a video.

She tapped her finger on the icon and brought the footage up. She'd been in the communication room monitoring the situation with Choi. But the communication hub was basically just a massive router that served to relay data from one side to the other. It's capacity for processing footage or data was about as minimal as it got. So the footage she'd been seeing from the drones had been choppy and pixelated as the massive amounts of data had been controlled by the techs on Earth.

This new footage on her phone had clearly been allowed to parse over the long chain of drones from the capital to where the fight had been. Each bit and byte had been allowed to send and compile in its own time, then someone had compiled it all and processed out any errors.

She didn't like Choi, but she couldn't deny what she was seeing. The young man was a magical powerhouse.

She looked back at the message.

Getting her hands on magic, whether via training or books or scrolls or whatever other form, had always been an objective. But it had been one that had specifically been set on a back burner. Going after it too early was a touch aggressive for a political gain.

But Secretary Grant had seen Choi's footage too. And he wanted more magic in Earth's arsenal.

Watching it again, she understood why.

She yawned again, and as her muscles tensed her hand spasmed, cracking a knuckle unintentionally. She also felt one of her feet kick the other.

She groaned and grabbed a pill from the night stand.

Fine. She thought. But if I'm asking for magic, it's gonna be the healing kind. Leave the explosions and ice fists to those two neanderthals.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wpevw2/wait_is_this_just_gate_206/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (204/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Things continue moving forward regardless of how fun the action sequences are.

Bit of a short one. But that's kind of how the post fight scenes always are.

Enjoy.

\~

"They were with the Agency, right?" James asked as Veliry and Marcos came over, having finished whatever ritual they'd used to seal the last piece of golem away.

He and Vickers had finished bandaging Steve up nearly twenty minutes ago and James was now leaning up against Steve's side as one of the griffin riders ran their glowing hands along James's injuries which Vickers had already wrapped with the familiar green bandages. Marcos split off with his eyes still glowing as he surveyed the area.

"They were. Or at least that's the most likely scenario." Veliry said with a nod as she lifted James's foot and inspected the black veins running up to his ankle. "How are you?"

James grunted as she prodded at the black lines. "I'm fine." He replied. The griffin ride, Amurik, grunted as he moved James's arm, drawing a wince from him with the motion. James's jaw clenched at the sudden pain. "Okay.... I'm.... not terrible." Amurik raised an eyebrow. "Fine.... I'll live."

The elf simply shrugged as he continued his healing.

"What happened?" Veliry asked. "What were blood stone golems doing here?"

"I didn't exactly have time to ask." James replied. "They started attacking pretty much on sight. But I recognized them from the Chief's footage of the raid on their compound." He said, nodding in the direction of the SEAL as he kicked over some of the burnt out remains of the massive golem.

"How many of them were there when you started?" She asked curiously.

"Started with eight, I think." James replied. "Then I got out to this clearing and there were even more. Maybe ten or so?" He wondered. Things had been too much of a hectic blur for him to keep track. "One of them had wings." He said absently.

"A commander subtype?" She said in amazement. "Where was that? Did it join with the rest of them in the merger?" She asked.

"No." James replied. "No he got turned into a pile of ashes."

"You defeated a blood stone golem commander?" She asked incredulously, shaking her head. She stood up, looking at the pile of ashen dirt nearby that Vickers and Marcos were inspecting. "And based on the size of the amalgam that had to have been at least six or seven of the remaining ones, maybe less. How big were they?" She asked.

James shrugged. "I don't know." He admitted. "At least ten feet. Maybe taller."

"And that's a projectile. So they had harden-able form detachment capabilities." She said as she walked over to the nearby spike that was still in the ground. The one that had caused Steve's greatest injury.

He thought that was the end of it. That Veliry was spiraling into her typical, over analytical, way of inspecting things. But several minutes later she came back.

"Do you have your communication device with you?" She asked, startling James out of the beginning of a nap.

James reached down to the pouch on his belt and pulled out his phone.

"Oops." He said as he retrieved the remains of the device. At some point in the fight it had taken an impact that had shattered the screen and practically bent it at a right angle. "Guess I need a new one."

Veliry didn't even linger. "Chief Vickers!" She yelled as she jogged over to where the large man was leaning on a tree. "I need to speak to the General!"

James simply leaned back against Steve, careful not to press against any of the drake's bandages, and closed his eyes, thankful that they'd already planned on waiting until the next morning to head back.

\----------

Amina stood atop the walls of the castle looking down at the soldiers below her. The units she'd rearranged for the deployment to Jadesport were all present and equipped, ready for the order to move.

The archers all had arrows from Earth. They could only afford to give each of them fifteen, but it was still better than nothing.

The non archers had rune stones, each of them carrying at least twenty alternating types of the small magical explosives in a pouch on their belt.

On top of that, each column had a mage attached to them for additional firepower. These mages were meant to help spot incoming attacks with their enhanced detection abilities, and to help supplement the amount of rune stones on the trip over, crafting them on the way.

Even still Amina knew from the previous battle that their chances of winning another battle against the blight possessed were slim.

And she could tell from the faces below that they knew the odds as well. After all, the results of the previous battle hadn't exactly been kept secret.

"Men and women of Petravus!" She said from the wall. "You know why you're here." She looked around the formation as they all straightened up. "You know where we're going. Our talon of griffin riders already took off yesterday to beat us there and gather information on what we're heading into."

She paused, allowing them to murmur for a moment. She saw her father on the castle balcony overlooking the courtyard. Alixan was sitting atop his new griffin on the same balcony, armored and ready to go.

"Word from General Sigbert is good." She continued. "So far the attack on the monitoring site hasn't resulted in any changes. But he also admits that his forces are diminished enough that he can no longer monitor the blight lands. Not while rebuilding the city and defending his people at the same time."

She paused again, looking around at them once more.

"That's what we're going to do." She said. "We signed on as soldiers to help our country. To defend its people.... To fight back the dark and unknown things that would threaten our homes and families." She watched as the soldiers nodded solemnly.

"Or!.... If you're like me you just did it to get out from under your parent's thumbs and get drunk with a bunch of fellow degenerates while playing with swords!" She said with a devilish grin. Laughter broke out amongst the soldiers as she saw her father press his hand over his eyes and shake his head. Alixan was beaming, a smile spread across his face.

"We're going into the unknown." She said, bringing the laughter to an end. "To fight things out of our nightmares."

She let the words sink in.

"So let's do it right and make our fellow degenerates proud, yeah?" She said finally.

The men below released a series of whoops and cries of "Yeah!"

She stepped up to the edge of the wall and dropped off, landing next to her horse before taking the reins from her new Captain and climbing into the saddle.

"MOVE OUT!" She yelled over her shoulder as the other soldiers hopped into their saddles, or rushed into the backs of wagons and began moving to follow.

\----------

Jadesport was not the only place that Blight had manifested in Petravus. And it most certainly wasn't the only place in the world that it had manifested.

But it was one of the few places where the forces of the Cleansing had been successfully rebuffed.

And it was the largest example of the blight's manifestation.

Unknown to the King and his forces there was an area of blight set high in the mountains on the western side of the country.

There were no communities nearby. No nearby roads.

The only living beings who even noticed anything happen were a handful of goats who called the mountains their home. But even they left once they sensed the blights appearance

So nobody was there to notice the patches of unfathomable emptiness begin to spread.

While hard to look directly at, a determined person may have noticed that the blight began to take on the appearance of a set of long, writhing, tendrils.

Everything they touched vanished as they spread and moved, causing an avalanche that went unnoticed.

Then, the almost invisible tendrils began to slowly move eastward, devouring everything in their path.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wmtlo6/wait_is_this_just_gate_205/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (204/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Things continue moving forward regardless of how fun the action sequences are.

Bit of a short one. But that's kind of how the post fight scenes always are.

Enjoy.

\~

"They were with the Agency, right?" James asked as Veliry and Marcos came over, having finished whatever ritual they'd used to seal the last piece of golem away.

He and Vickers had finished bandaging Steve up nearly twenty minutes ago and James was now leaning up against Steve's side as one of the griffin riders ran their glowing hands along James's injuries which Vickers had already wrapped with the familiar green bandages. Marcos split off with his eyes still glowing as he surveyed the area.

"They were. Or at least that's the most likely scenario." Veliry said with a nod as she lifted James's foot and inspected the black veins running up to his ankle. "How are you?"

James grunted as she prodded at the black lines. "I'm fine." He replied. The griffin rider, Amurik, grunted as he moved James's arm, drawing a wince from him with the motion. James's jaw clenched at the sudden pain. "Okay.... I'm.... not terrible." Amurik raised an eyebrow. "Fine.... I'll live."

The elf simply shrugged as he continued his healing.

"What happened?" Veliry asked. "What were blood stone golems doing here?"

"I didn't exactly have time to ask." James replied. "They started attacking pretty much on sight. But I recognized them from the Chief's footage of the raid on their compound." He said, nodding in the direction of the SEAL as he kicked over some of the burnt out remains of the massive golem.

"How many of them were there when you started?" She asked curiously.

"Started with eight, I think." James replied. "Then I got out to this clearing and there were even more. Maybe ten or so?" He wondered. Things had been too much of a hectic blur for him to keep track. "One of them had wings." He said absently.

"A commander subtype?" She said in amazement. "Where was that? Did it join with the rest of them in the merger?" She asked.

"No." James replied. "No he got turned into a pile of ashes."

"You defeated a blood stone golem commander?" She asked incredulously, shaking her head. She stood up, looking at the pile of ashen dirt nearby that Vickers and Marcos were inspecting. "And based on the size of the amalgam that had to have been at least six or seven of the remaining ones, maybe less. How big were they?" She asked.

James shrugged. "I don't know." He admitted. "At least ten feet. Maybe taller."

"And that's a projectile. So they had harden-able form detachment capabilities." She said as she walked over to the nearby spike that was still in the ground. The one that had caused Steve's greatest injury.

He thought that was the end of it. That Veliry was spiraling into her typical, over analytical, way of inspecting things. But several minutes later she came back.

"Do you have your communication device with you?" She asked, startling James out of the beginning of a nap.

James reached down to the pouch on his belt and pulled out his phone.

"Oops." He said as he retrieved the remains of the device. At some point in the fight it had taken an impact that had shattered the screen and practically bent it at a right angle. "Guess I need a new one."

Veliry didn't even linger. "Chief Vickers!" She yelled as she jogged over to where the large man was leaning on a tree. "I need to speak to the General!"

James simply leaned back against Steve, careful not to press against any of the drake's bandages, and closed his eyes, thankful that they'd already planned on waiting until the next morning to head back.

\----------

Amina stood atop the walls of the castle looking down at the soldiers below her. The units she'd rearranged for the deployment to Jadesport were all present and equipped, ready for the order to move.

The archers all had arrows from Earth. They could only afford to give each of them fifteen, but it was still better than nothing.

The non archers had rune stones, each of them carrying at least twenty alternating types of the small magical explosives in a pouch on their belt.

On top of that, each column had a mage attached to them for additional firepower. These mages were meant to help spot incoming attacks with their enhanced detection abilities, and to help supplement the amount of rune stones on the trip over, crafting them on the way.

Even still Amina knew from the previous battle that their chances of winning another battle against the blight possessed were slim.

And she could tell from the faces below that they knew the odds as well. After all, the results of the previous battle hadn't exactly been kept secret.

"Men and women of Petravus!" She said from the wall. "You know why you're here." She looked around the formation as they all straightened up. "You know where we're going. Our talon of griffin riders already took off yesterday to beat us there and gather information on what we're heading into."

She paused, allowing them to murmur for a moment. She saw her father on the castle balcony overlooking the courtyard. Alixan was sitting atop his new griffin on the same balcony, armored and ready to go.

"Word from General Sigbert is good." She continued. "So far the attack on the monitoring site hasn't resulted in any changes. But he also admits that his forces are diminished enough that he can no longer monitor the blight lands. Not while rebuilding the city and defending his people at the same time."

She paused again, looking around at them once more.

"That's what we're going to do." She said. "We signed on as soldiers to help our country. To defend its people.... To fight back the dark and unknown things that would threaten our homes and families." She watched as the soldiers nodded solemnly.

"Or!.... If you're like me you just did it to get out from under your parent's thumbs and get drunk with a bunch of fellow degenerates while playing with swords!" She said with a devilish grin. Laughter broke out amongst the soldiers as she saw her father press his hand over his eyes and shake his head. Alixan was beaming, a smile spread across his face.

"We're going into the unknown." She said, bringing the laughter to an end. "To fight things out of our nightmares."

She let the words sink in.

"So let's do it right and make our fellow degenerates proud, yeah?" She said finally.

The men below released a series of whoops and cries of "Yeah!"

She stepped up to the edge of the wall and dropped off, landing next to her horse before taking the reins from her new Captain and climbing into the saddle.

"MOVE OUT!" She yelled over her shoulder as the other soldiers hopped into their saddles, or rushed into the backs of wagons and began moving to follow.

\----------

Jadesport was not the only place that Blight had manifested in Petravus. And it most certainly wasn't the only place in the world that it had manifested.

But it was one of the few places where the forces of the Cleansing had been successfully rebuffed.

And it was the largest example of the blight's manifestation.

Unknown to the King and his forces there was an area of blight set high in the mountains on the western side of the country.

There were no communities nearby. No nearby roads.

The only living beings who even noticed anything happen were a handful of goats who called the mountains their home. But even they left once they sensed the blights appearance

So nobody was there to notice the patches of unfathomable emptiness begin to spread.

While hard to look directly at, a determined person may have noticed that the blight began to take on the appearance of a set of long, writhing, tendrils.

Everything they touched vanished as they spread and moved, causing an avalanche that went unnoticed.

Then, the almost invisible tendrils began to slowly move eastward, devouring everything in their path.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wmtkao/wait_is_this_just_gate_205/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (203/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Bah Gawd! Vickers just jumped from the top rope. He damn near broke the Golem in half! Oh the humanity!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

eyes with his rifle, lessening their effect minutely. But the golem learned quickly, and after James had taken five of the eyes from it it had learned to retract them any time he brought his rifle to his shoulder. James adjusted in turn, raising the rifle any time he needed to blind the creature even momentarily to buy himself time.

But he could feel himself tiring, and knew Steve was beginning to suffer the same effect.

He'd been running, casting, and fighting for what had to have been damn near half a day at this point. And that wasn't even counting the initial running skirmish before he and Steve had managed to find open ground. He'd taken to casting most of his ranged spells with his wolf hand, as he'd begun feeling the familiar pain and seen the beginning of the black veins that marked magical overuse, on his right hand. The wolf hand didn't seem to suffer from the same limitation, at least not yet anyways.

He could feel the same discomfort on his legs.

He was flying through the air, angry at missing a strike with his sword due to the enemy's shifting form, when he felt a lance of pain run down his left side. It ran from his shoulder all the way down his chest and onto his hip before ending.

James glanced down and searched for a split second before finding Steve. The drake had bright red blood flowing from a long laceration down his left side, matching the pain James felt. A massive spike was lanced into the ground only a few yards to the side of the drake, who had apparently been grazed by the projectile. James watched as Steve writhed in pain as James's saddle slid off of him.

He saw the creature pulling back one of its five arms, another massive spike forming at the end of it.

Steve was wide open as he recovered from the pain.

He rolled, readying a blast from his feet.

NO! He thought as he felt the energy building up.

He was too distracted to feel or see the new arrival.

THUNK!.... THUNK! THUNK! THUNK!

James's head shot up into the sky towards the source of the familiar sound.

Four projectiles impacted the golem, releasing clouds of thick white vapor that were so cold James could feel the temperature shift from where he was at.

The golem stepped back, trying to make space as glowing red eyes emerged on the top of its "head".

The flesh inside the white cloud began to freeze, frost forming all over it even as the vapor sank to the ground.

Then a fifth, and much large object plummeted down from nearly fifty feet above the golem. The griffin that had been carrying it continuing on past the site before banking.

Vickers slammed into the frozen projectile arm of the golem like something out of a superhero movie.

His ice coated fist impacted the now frozen arm of the golem like an anvil, the entire weight of the massive SEAL behind it, and lending it extra force.

James watched in awe as the outer layers of the arm shattered like glass, spraying bits of frozen golem flesh over the area like shrapnel.

Then Vickers, standing on the golem's shoulder, began unleashing a flurry of ice imbued strikes that were so fast that even James's enhanced vision could barely see them. He unleashed jabs, hooks, and even haymakers in a blur of icy fog and shattering, spraying golem flesh as he battered his way into the golem's shoulder.

The golem reeled from the sudden and unexpected viciousness of the ambush. Red eyes appearred on the golem's body in clusters as it tried to comprehend what was happening to it.

Vickers was unrelenting in his barrage of pugilistic destruction.

James blasted back in toward the massive creature as he saw two of its other arms coming in to fend off the enraged SEAL's onslaught.

"GO FOR THE RED SPOTS!" He yelled as he flew in, blade digging deeply into one of the arms and driving it back. "THEY'RE ITS EYES!"

Vickers didn't respond, to busy with his attack to give acknowledgment as he pivoted on his heels and began blasting punches into the other arm that had come in to fight him off. To the golem's surprise its attack was not only halted, but was actually being driven back by the rapid, precise, and startlingly powerful icy punches.

But only for a moment. Vickers may have surprised it, and been much stronger than most people it encountered. But it was still nearly fifty feet tall, and a golem.

Vickers leaped up and away from his position as the massive limb continued moving forward.

He landed some twenty yards from the golem, rolling like a parkour enthusiast before raising the launcher back up to his shoulder and releasing another set of the freezing rounds it utilized.

THUNK! THUNK! THUNK!

James watched as the creature was hit by the first of the rounds on its torso, the flesh there freezing. But it managed to shift its flesh out of the way of the other two, breaking off some of its own frozen mass in the process.

Then a maelstrom of inky black bolts flared into existence from behind it.

They weren't the random, uncontrolled lightning of James's attacks.

These bolts writhed and coiled and dug in less like random lightning and more like serpents made of lightning. Where the creature shifted to avoid them, the deathbolts would alter course to ensure a connection anyways. Where they burned flesh away they would then shift over to find more. Bands of the black lightning wrapped around its many limbs and burned their way through like constrictors made of electric death energy.

And in the hands of Veliry, that was basically what they were.

James smiled even as he land on the ground and almost collapsed to the ground next to Steve, who was now curled up behind the trunk of a large tree licking his new wound.

"Hey boy." He said as he staggered over to the bleeding drake. "Cavalry's here."

Between Vickers' continued volleys of icy grenade rounds and Veliry's relentless deathbolts the golem never stood a chance. Only a few minutes later its massive form had been reduced to a large pile of ashy soil and a small lump of still living flesh with a single red eye glowing on its surface.

This last piece Veliry, and the newly arrived Marcos cast a spell on, chanting an incantation before placing it into a wooden casket that seemed to resize itself to fit the piece of golem. James saw the confusion and fear in the things eye as she placed it into the box. Then she placed the box in the bottomless bag that she had on her belt.

James watched all of this from where he and Steve sat at the edge of the clearing. James had guided him there so he could get the supplies from his saddle more easily as he began applying ointments and bandages to the massive gash in Steve's flank. James could feel the pain of it in a massive burning tightness on his left side. After a few minutes Vickers joined him, helping him hold pressure or tension on Steve's injury or the bandages and wrappings that James applied as needed.

"Pretty badass entry dude." James said as the two of them worked on Steve's first aid. "Thanks for the backup."

Vickers grunted in acknowledgement as he applied tension to a length of bandage that James had fed him from the other side of Steve's belly. The drake was doing a startlingly good job of standing still as the two of them worked. James was constantly amazed by how intuitive and intelligent Steve seemed to be.

"No problem kid." Vickers said after he handed the roll back to James, who pulled it down and tightened it over a glowing green bandage. "Saw that thing crankin' back for a fast ball and knew that it was going for scaly here." He crouched back down to wait for James to pass the roll again. "Plus the redhead told me that you were startin' to flag a bit."

"She could tell from way up there?" James asked.

"Dude. She could sense you doin' your thing from like... fifty miles away." Vickers responded.

"That's.... disturbing." James admitted. "Well. Like I said; thanks." He repeated.

"Eh. It's no big deal." Vickers said casually. "Us earth guys gotta stick together."

The two of them continued working together in silence for several minutes before Vickers' tablet dinged with an incoming message. As it did James heard the faint buzz of a drone flying nearby, most likely landing on a nearby tree.

Vickers placed the tablet on top of Steve's back before hitting the button on it and resuming the work to patch up the massive lizard.

"Chief?" General Krick's voice said from the tablet's speaker. "Captain Choi? You two okay?"

James looked up at the tablet as he packed more of the green bandages into Steve's injury. He scanned around for a moment before spotting the small black form of the drone, anchored on a tree branch nearby. He saw the glint of its camera lense looking at him. He raised a thumbs up at it.

"All good sir." Vickers said as he tied a knot on one of the wrappings. "All present and accounted for." He peered over Steve's back. "Cap. You good?"

James looked up, startled to hear the Seal actually use his "rank" for the first time when referencing him.

"All good General." He answered. "Got some broken ribs and a few other bits and pieces that are gonna be black and blue." He added. "But I'm good."

"Glad to hear." Krick responded. "What the hell happened?"

James recounted the events as he continued to work on healing his partner in crime. He watched absently as the two mages and the men and women of the talon that had come with them, which he assumed were with Alixan from their garb, scoured the area for evidence of what happened.

He was so damned tired.

\-------------------------

The attendant arrived in the room on the other side of the door next to the corpse of Master Patril's initial attendant.

One of the masters present gestured for her to speak.

"My masters. Master Patril and his subordinates have failed in their endeavor." She said, doing what she could to hide her fear. She could already feel her lungs burning from the poisonous air present. "The summoned hero was SIGNIFICANTLY more capable... and... powerful, than the reports suggested. He was capable of singlehandedly killing several of the golemmancers through sheer strength, and his drake killed several more. Master Patril initiated the congruency before he himself was slain. But unfortunately the hero was still capable of withstanding its attacks, and managed to buy himself enough time for his companions to arrive and turn battle in their favor most demonstrably."

She clutched at her neck as she felt the flesh inside burning. Each breath was a struggle. This wasn't the same gas as they'd used in the other location.

"So your masters DIDN'T capture him? Or even kill him?" One of the darkness shrouded members asked.

"No master." She replied with a slight gurgle.

"Did they at least record the encounter?" Another asked.

She struggled to reply as she sank to a knee, clutching at her chest. She settled for a nod.

The nearest of them sighed as they moved their hands. Amber light encompassed her body as the air around her face cleared. She felt her lungs and throat mending even as she gulped in the suddenly fresh air.

"Go on then." The caster said from where they were sitting. "Fetch the vision crystal with the recording. We'll need the information on how he fights."

She gasped before stammering a response. "Yes masters." She said as she rapidly retreated through the door, glad to be out of the toxin filled room.

She collapsed to her knees once she was on the other side. The other attendants looked at her dispassionately as she recovered her breath.

"Orders?" The nearest one asked in a monotone.

"They desire the vision crystal with our masters' memory of the encounter." She said before entering a coughing fit.

A moment later she stood up to see one of her fellows holding the large, jagged, pink crystal out to her.

"Send someone else." She said. "I'll die if I go back there."

The seven doors of the ritual rooms slammed open simultaneously. She wondered why the eighth one didn't open.

Seven of her masters stepped out in unison and turned to look at her with an odd synchronicity. A product of the congruency.

"The order was given to you." They said simultaneously. "It is yours to obey." Her masters paused, all of them looking to the eighth door that should have opened with theirs. "While you are there. Inform them of our... ultimate failure." They added. "Our eighth, has been isolated and captured"

She gulped at the implication. The crystal was pressed into her hands and she was forcibly turned to face the door.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wm2zg8/wait_is_this_just_gate_204/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (203/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Bah Gawd! Vickers just jumped from the top rope. He damn near broke the Golem in half! Oh the humanity!

Enjoy.

\~

James had thought that the new form of the golem, or whatever it would be called now, would have been easier to deal with. It was bigger, and the spikes it threw were massive. But it was also slower, and seemed incredibly uncoordinated.

But everywhere he moved the glowing red eyes formed on its body and tracked him.

And any time he tried to attack, the massive creature would shift its form, creating holes or repositioning limbs to avoid the brunt of the damage. He was still getting little hits in, slices with his blade that devoured its flesh, blasts of black lightning and flames that charred it. But it was being kept to a minimum.

It didn't help that it was getting faster and more sure footed as the fight drew on.

The massive creature also proved more than capable of handling both James and Steve at the same time. Even as James sprinted and blasted his way around the area harassing it, it managed to engage with the massive black drake using the spike attacks. To his credit Steve seemed to realize the inherent danger in the situation and had fallen back into the thick coverage of the trees, using them to avoid direct attacks and forcing the golem to work. But the downside of this tactic was that Steve wasn't capable of directly engaging with it, not being in range to use his flames, much less to get a hold of the thing.

If there was one up side to the creature's split focus it was the fact that James was capable of scoring several direct hits on the glowing eyes with his rifle, lessening their effect minutely. But the golem learned quickly, and after James had taken five of the eyes from it it had learned to retract them any time he brought his rifle to his shoulder. James adjusted in turn, raising the rifle any time he needed to blind the creature even momentarily to buy himself time.

But he could feel himself tiring, and knew Steve was beginning to suffer the same effect.

He'd been running, casting, and fighting for what had to have been damn near half a day at this point. And that wasn't even counting the initial running skirmish before he and Steve had managed to find open ground. He'd taken to casting most of his ranged spells with his wolf hand, as he'd begun feeling the familiar pain and seen the beginning of the black veins that marked magical overuse, on his right hand. The wolf hand didn't seem to suffer from the same limitation, at least not yet anyways.

He could feel the same discomfort on his legs.

He was flying through the air, angry at missing a strike with his sword due to the enemy's shifting form, when he felt a lance of pain run down his left side. It ran from his shoulder all the way down his chest and onto his hip before ending.

James glanced down and searched for a split second before finding Steve. The drake had bright red blood flowing from a long laceration down his left side, matching the pain James felt. A massive spike was lanced into the ground only a few yards to the side of the drake, who had apparently been grazed by the projectile. James watched as Steve writhed in pain as James's saddle slid off of him.

He saw the creature pulling back one of its five arms, another massive spike forming at the end of it.

Steve was wide open as he recovered from the pain.

He rolled, readying a blast from his feet.

NO! He thought as he felt the energy building up.

He was too distracted to feel or see the new arrival.

THUNK!.... THUNK! THUNK! THUNK!

James's head shot up into the sky towards the source of the familiar sound.

Four projectiles impacted the golem, releasing clouds of thick white vapor that were so cold James could feel the temperature shift from where he was at.

The golem stepped back, trying to make space as glowing red eyes emerged on the top of its "head".

The flesh inside the white cloud began to freeze, frost forming all over it even as the vapor sank to the ground.

Then a fifth, and much larger object plummeted down from nearly fifty feet above the golem. The griffin that had been carrying it continuing on past the site before banking.

Vickers slammed into the frozen projectile arm of the golem like something out of a superhero movie.

His ice coated fist impacted the now frozen arm of the golem like an anvil, the entire weight of the massive SEAL behind it, and lending it extra force.

James watched in awe as the outer layers of the arm shattered like glass, spraying bits of frozen golem flesh over the area like shrapnel.

Then Vickers, standing on the golem's shoulder, began unleashing a flurry of ice imbued strikes that were so fast that even James's enhanced vision could barely see them. He unleashed jabs, hooks, and even haymakers in a blur of icy fog and shattering ice, spraying golem flesh as he battered his way into the golem's shoulder.

The golem reeled from the sudden and unexpected viciousness of the ambush. Red eyes appearred on the golem's body in clusters as it tried to comprehend what was happening to it.

Vickers was unrelenting in his barrage of pugilistic destruction.

James blasted back in toward the massive creature as he saw two of its other arms coming in to fend off the enraged SEAL's onslaught.

"GO FOR THE RED SPOTS!" He yelled as he flew in, blade digging deeply into one of the arms and driving it back. "THEY'RE ITS EYES!"

Vickers didn't respond, too busy with his attack to give acknowledgment as he pivoted on his heels and began blasting punches into the other arm that had come in to fight him off. To the golem's surprise its attack was not only halted, but was actually being driven back by the rapid, precise, and startlingly powerful icy punches.

But only for a moment. Vickers may have surprised it, and been much stronger than most people it encountered. But it was still nearly fifty feet tall, and a golem.

Vickers leaped up and away from his position as the massive limb continued moving forward.

He landed some twenty yards from the golem, rolling like a parkour enthusiast before raising the launcher back up to his shoulder and releasing another set of the freezing rounds it utilized.

THUNK! THUNK! THUNK!

James watched as the creature was hit by the first of the rounds on its torso, the flesh there freezing. But it managed to shift its flesh out of the way of the other two, breaking off some of its own frozen mass in the process.

Then a maelstrom of inky black bolts flared into existence from behind it.

They weren't the random, uncontrolled lightning of James's attacks.

These bolts writhed and coiled and dug in less like random lightning and more like serpents made of lightning. Where the creature shifted to avoid them, the deathbolts would alter course to ensure a connection anyways. Where they burned flesh away they would then shift over to find more. Bands of the black lightning wrapped around its many limbs and burned their way through like constrictors made of electric death energy.

And in the hands of Veliry, that was basically what they were.

James smiled even as he landed on the ground and almost collapsed to his knees next to Steve, who was now curled up behind the trunk of a large tree licking his new wound.

"Hey boy." He said as he staggered over to the bleeding drake. "Cavalry's here."

Between Vickers' continued volleys of icy grenade rounds and Veliry's relentless deathbolts the golem never stood a chance. Only a few minutes later its massive form had been reduced to a large pile of ashy soil and a small lump of still living flesh with a single red eye glowing on its surface.

This last piece Veliry, and the newly arrived Marcos cast a spell on, chanting an incantation before placing it into a wooden casket that seemed to resize itself to fit the piece of golem. James saw the confusion and fear in the things eye as she placed it into the box. Then she placed the box in the bottomless bag that she had on her belt.

James watched all of this from where he and Steve sat at the edge of the clearing. James had guided him there so he could get the supplies from his saddle more easily as he began applying ointments and bandages to the massive gash in Steve's flank. James could feel the pain of it in a massive burning tightness on his left side. After a few minutes Vickers joined him, helping him hold pressure or tension on Steve's injury or the bandages and wrappings that James applied as needed.

"Pretty badass entry dude." James said as the two of them worked on Steve's first aid. "Thanks for the backup."

Vickers grunted in acknowledgement as he applied tension to a length of bandage that James had fed him from the other side of Steve's belly. The drake was doing a startlingly good job of standing still as the two of them worked. James was constantly amazed by how intuitive and intelligent Steve seemed to be.

"No problem kid." Vickers said after he handed the roll back to James, who pulled it down and tightened it over a glowing green bandage. "Saw that thing crankin' back for a fast ball and knew that it was going for scaly here." He crouched back down to wait for James to pass the roll again. "Plus the redhead told me that you were startin' to flag a bit."

"She could tell from way up there?" James asked.

"Dude. She could sense you doin' your thing from like... fifty miles away." Vickers responded.

"That's.... disturbing." James admitted. "Well. Like I said; thanks." He repeated.

"Eh. It's no big deal." Vickers said casually. "Us earth guys gotta stick together."

The two of them continued working together in silence for several minutes before Vickers' tablet dinged with an incoming message. As it did James heard the faint buzz of a drone flying nearby, most likely landing on a nearby tree.

Vickers placed the tablet on top of Steve's back before hitting the button on it and resuming the work to patch up the massive lizard.

"Chief?" General Krick's voice said from the tablet's speaker. "Captain Choi? You two okay?"

James looked up at the tablet as he packed more of the green bandages into Steve's injury. He scanned around for a moment before spotting the small black form of the drone, anchored on a tree branch nearby. He saw the glint of its camera lense looking at him. He raised a thumbs up at it.

"All good sir." Vickers said as he tied a knot on one of the wrappings. "All present and accounted for." He peered over Steve's back. "Cap. You good?"

James looked up, startled to hear the Seal actually use his "rank" for the first time when referencing him.

"All good General." He answered. "Got some broken ribs and a few other bits and pieces that are gonna be black and blue." He added. "But I'm good."

"Glad to hear." Krick responded. "What the hell happened?"

James recounted the events as he continued to work on healing his partner in crime. He watched absently as the two mages and the men and women of the talon that had come with them, which he assumed were with Alixan from their garb, scoured the area for evidence of what happened.

He was so damned tired.

\--------------------------

The attendant arrived in the room on the other side of the door next to the corpse of Master Patril's initial attendant.

One of the masters present gestured for her to speak.

"My masters. Master Patril and his subordinates have failed in their endeavor." She said, doing what she could to hide her fear. She could already feel her lungs burning from the poisonous air present. "The summoned hero was SIGNIFICANTLY more capable... and... powerful, than the reports suggested. He was capable of singlehandedly killing several of the golemmancers through sheer strength, and his drake killed several more. Master Patril initiated the congruency before he himself was slain. But unfortunately the hero was still capable of withstanding its attacks, and managed to buy himself enough time for his companions to arrive and turn the battle in their favor most demonstrably."

She clutched at her neck as she felt the flesh inside burning. Each breath was a struggle. This wasn't the same gas as they'd used in the other location.

"So your masters DIDN'T capture him? Or even kill him?" One of the darkness shrouded members asked.

"No master." She replied with a slight gurgle.

"Did they at least record the encounter?" Another asked.

She struggled to reply as she sank to a knee, clutching at her chest. She settled for a nod.

The nearest of them sighed as they moved their hands. Amber light encompassed her body as the air around her face cleared. She felt her lungs and throat mending even as she gulped in the suddenly fresh air.

"Go on then." The caster said from where they were sitting. "Fetch the vision crystal with the recording. We'll need the information on how he fights."

She gasped before stammering a response. "Yes masters." She said as she rapidly retreated through the door, glad to be out of the toxin filled room.

She collapsed to her knees once she was on the other side. The other attendants looked at her dispassionately as she recovered her breath.

"Orders?" The nearest one asked in a monotone.

"They desire the vision crystal with our masters' memory of the encounter." She said before entering a coughing fit.

A moment later she stood up to see one of her fellows holding the large, jagged, pink crystal out to her.

"Send someone else." She said. "I'll die if I go back there."

The seven doors of the ritual rooms slammed open simultaneously. She wondered why the eighth one didn't open.

Seven of her masters stepped out in unison and turned to look at her with an odd synchronicity. A product of the congruency.

"The order was given to you." They said simultaneously. "It is yours to obey." Her masters paused, all of them looking to the eighth door that should have opened with theirs. "While you are there. Inform them of our... ultimate failure." They added. "Our eighth, has been isolated and captured"

She gulped at the implication. The crystal was pressed into her hands and she was forcibly turned to face the door.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wm2xmp/wait_is_this_just_gate_204/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (202/?)

Previous

Writer's Note: Just a reminder that this has always been a cliche Isekai story. That is all.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

The two of them slammed into each other like titans from a story, James's explosive speed, deathbolt breath, and magic devouring blade allowing him to hit the golem like an uppercut to its stomach.

But the Golem was nearly fifteen feet tall before taking its wings into account, and made of some kind of stone and liquid slurry that looked like clotted blood. And it had lead with its arms and legs forward to strike at him.

James was driven back, feeling like he'd been hit by a freight train as the two of them plowed through the burning devastation of the forest, rolling over and over like fighting cats as they went.

James felt the wind get knocked out of him as the creatures arms slammed into his chest, past his sword. The Mage's Blade pierced the chest of the golem as easily as if it wasn't there, causing the magic infused flesh to hiss and sizzle before falling away. James followed up by thrashing the blade about like a fencer. His head struck the ground, missing a tree root by mere inches, and caused his vision to darken for a moment. He didn't let it disturb the blast of dark lightning pouring out of his mouth, blackening the monster's neck as it took the full force of the magic point blank.

He felt its arm latch onto his shoulder and fought to bring his sword in to sever it, but one of its legs slammed into his side, causing his breath out forcefully as he felt his ribs break there. The golem was oddly limber for being nearly three times his height.

James brought his feet up and planted them on its waist as though he was going to kick off of it, and in a way he was.

BO-BO-BO-BOOM!

He released a series of burst explosions from the soles of his feet, blasting holes from the golem's torso and pushing it back and away from him, but the hand didn't release his shoulder. Instead it seemed to tighten, and James felt the bones begin to shift and creak from the pressure.

But it didn't matter, his blasts had had the desired effect. The creatures other arm and legs had been knocked and battered backwards even as massive pieces of its torso had been incinerated.

His sword arm flashed back and up, and the shimmering edge of the Mage's Blade sliced through the golem's arm, severing it just below the spot that would be its wrist.

But James didn't stop there.

Even as the creature stumbled up and back on its suddenly unstable body, James emitted a jet of air from his right hand. It blasted ash and debris away behind him even as it lifted him up to his feet faster than he could normally stand up. Once he was vertical his feet let out another light blast, sending him into the air even as his hand angled to the side and sent him into a spin.

He reveled in the look on the golem's face. Even without eyes he could read the shock there.

James spun like a top, his sword flashed out numerous times as he did. He watched as the first strike took off the moth-like antennae on its head, crisping them to dust as his blade drank the energy there. His second strike scored a long gash across the golem's torso, just above the already healing craters of his blast attack. His third strike severed its other arm midway up, causing it to drop to the ground.

James tucked the sword in, speeding his spin up minutely even as he raised his leg up high before bringing it down in a sort of angled axe kick. It impacted the golem's face hard enough that he feared he might break it. It sank into the semi-soft flesh of the side of the golem's head, causing the head to jerk that direction at an angle.

"You fucked up." He said as the energy in his foot built up to a crescendo.

BOOM!

\--------------------

Veliry had been right about Vickers being angry.

When Telyon's griffin had first swooped down and grabbed the large man, he had flailed and cursed at them.

It had taken several minutes of yelling, and Veliry had even had to fly down next to him for a moment, to get him to understand what had happened and what the plan was. After that Vickers had calmed down and let himself sag as the griffin carried him aloft.

He checked his tablet for just a moment and read the few scant messages that command had sent him.

Apparently Choi was giving the enemy hell.

"Fuckin eh wrench monkey." He said to himself as he looked at a short clip that they'd cleaned up and sent to him. He watched Choi move like something out of a movie, marveling at the frequency of the explosions and the sheer dissarray he frequently left the cluster of clay monsters in from his rapid attacks.

He doesn't fight like one of us anymore. Not like a Soldier of our world. Now he fights like the wolf did in the bar. He realized as the clip finished. Looks like my rifle aint gonna do much either.

Vickers reached into his bottomless bag and pulled out the fire suppression launcher that was there, making sure to clip it to his vest before he accidentally dropped it. Once it was secure he checked to ensure it was loaded. He only had twenty or so rounds left for it, but that'd be fine.

He held his hand up and focused on it, smiling as frost formed into spikes on his knuckles.

\----------

Patril emerged from his room in a rage.

His face was covered in the black veins of magical overuse and backlash. He had the timid attendants throat gripped in his hand as he dragged their lifeless body.

"TELL THEM TO BEGIN THE CONGRUENCE!" He yelled at the other attendants standing outside.

They seemed to understand his fury, none of them questioning him or even hesitating before moving into action as he tossed the limp corpse aside and stormed back into his ritual room.

The attendants slipped into the rooms of their other masters, passing the message of the leader along in whispers.

Patril seated himself back at the control node roughly.

His head pounded from the damage the target had done to his golem. He had been a fool to enhance his hearing against someone so reliant on explosions for their fighting style. But he'd had no choice, having no sight otherwise. Luckily the golem's blood stone flesh had dampened the pain somewhat, but it had still been there.

He channeled back into control as another attendant silently stepped to their position behind him.

Fuck capturing him. We're going to kill this man. And I shall turn his drake into a carpet for out meeting hall.

\----------

James massaged his ankle as he caught his breath. The flyer's body was in shambles on the ground, flailing weakly as it continued succumbing to the damage he'd done to it.

He reeled as he felt a stabbing pain in his shoulder and was suddenly reminded of Steve's fight. He'd been feeling bits of pain here and there, but he'd been too caught up in his own part of the battle to pay them any mind. After all, he couldn't help Steve if he got killed himself.

He looked over and saw something that actually confused him for a moment.

Steve had been hit, that much was accurate. He could see the spike sticking out of the drake's right shoulder, even as Steve blasted fire at the attacker to little effect.

But the other golems seemed to be pulling back away from the massive lizard. As if the one that had attacked him was simply buying time for them.

What the fuck? He thought. Are they... retreating?

Suddenly a gravelly chatter began to rumble into being behind him.

James spun around, sword held high in preparation for an attack.

The mangled head of the golem was shaking on the remnants of its shoulders. It had a smile on its eyeless face as the bat ears sank back into the side of its head.

It was laughing.

James quickly turned to look at the other golems and was surprised to see all of them, minus the one engaged with Steve, standing in a circle, their arms interlocked.

Their bodies began to flow together.

"Good luck stopping us now." The golem behind him said menacingly.

James turned back, a look of anger on his face.

"Man, that's some dumb ass power rangers shit." He said, drawing a confused look from the golem as it attempted to knit itself back together. "Real. Fuckin'. Cheesy."

The golem tried to speak again. But James cut it off as a burst of flames jetted out of his wolf hand, empowered by a series of focused, high pressure, jets of pure oxygen from his right. These lanced holes into the battered body of the golem even as they ignited from the flames of his other hand.

A few moments later the golem was a pile of ashes and crumbled dirt.

The ground trembled from an impact behind him.

James turned back to see Steve, his prey clenched in his jaws as he tore them apart, backing away in reverse, a look of mild fear on his reptilian face.

James knew why as he looked over at the nearly fifty foot tall mass of reddish black flesh that bent and flexed as it adjusted to its new form. It took a slow, wobbly, step toward the drake before falling to a knee.

"Pffffff." James scoffed. "Not even the biggest thing I've ever killed."

He whistled loudly as he shot a blast of fire at the side of the massive creature.

A series of red glowing spots, which he knew were eyes, suddenly appeared on the side closest to him.

"Oh." He said in mild surprise. "That's.... kinda gross."

It stood up and James watched as an arm sprouted from the side of its torso towards him.

It had a massive spike at the end of it.

James began moving again, drawing his rifle back out of his bag as he did.

\-------------------------

Patril's body slumped over sideways as his soul died within his body.

The attendant in the room moved over to the rune on the wall nearby and powered down the ritual room before quietly exiting.

When they got outside amongst the other attendants they looked to the nearest one.

"Master Patril is gone." They said calmly. "Is the congruence in effect?"

The other attendants all nodded and they took their place among them, ready to serve as needed.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wl5w24/wait_is_this_just_gate_203/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (202/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's Note: Just a reminder that this has always been a cliche Isekai story. That is all.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

The two of them slammed into each other like titans from a story, James's explosive speed, deathbolt breath, and magic devouring blade allowing him to hit the golem like an uppercut to its stomach.

But the Golem was nearly fifteen feet tall before taking its wings into account, and made of some kind of stone and liquid slurry that looked like clotted blood. And it had lead with its arms and legs forward to strike at him.

James was driven back, feeling like he'd been hit by a freight train as the two of them plowed through the burning devastation of the forest, rolling over and over like fighting cats as they went.

James felt the wind get knocked out of him as the creatures arms slammed into his chest, past his sword. The Mage's Blade pierced the chest of the golem as easily as if it wasn't there, causing the magic infused flesh to hiss and sizzle before falling away. James followed up by thrashing the blade about like a fencer. His head struck the ground, missing a tree root by mere inches, and caused his vision to darken for a moment. He didn't let it disturb the blast of dark lightning pouring out of his mouth, blackening the monster's neck as it took the full force of the magic point blank.

He felt its arm latch onto his shoulder and fought to bring his sword in to sever it, but one of its legs slammed into his side, causing his breath out forcefully as he felt his ribs break there. The golem was oddly limber for being nearly three times his height.

James brought his feet up and planted them on its waist as though he was going to kick off of it, and in a way he was.

BO-BO-BO-BOOM!

He released a series of burst explosions from the soles of his feet, blasting holes from the golem's torso and pushing it back and away from him, but the hand didn't release his shoulder. Instead it seemed to tighten, and James felt the bones begin to shift and creak from the pressure.

But it didn't matter, his blasts had had the desired effect. The creatures other arm and legs had been knocked and battered backwards even as massive pieces of its torso had been incinerated.

His sword arm flashed back and up, and the shimmering edge of the Mage's Blade sliced through the golem's arm, severing it just below the spot that would be its wrist.

But James didn't stop there.

Even as the creature stumbled up and back on its suddenly unstable body, James emitted a jet of air from his right hand. It blasted ash and debris away behind him even as it lifted him up to his feet faster than he could normally stand up. Once he was vertical his feet let out another light blast, sending him into the air even as his hand angled to the side and sent him into a spin.

He reveled in the look on the golem's face. Even without eyes he could read the shock there.

James spun like a top, his sword flashed out numerous times as he did. He watched as the first strike took off the moth-like antennae on its head, crisping them to dust as his blade drank the energy there. His second strike scored a long gash across the golem's torso, just above the already healing craters of his blast attack. His third strike severed its other arm midway up, causing it to drop to the ground.

James tucked the sword in, speeding his spin up minutely even as he raised his leg up high before bringing it down in a sort of angled axe kick. It impacted the golem's face hard enough that he feared he might break it. It sank into the semi-soft flesh of the side of the golem's head, causing the head to jerk that direction at an angle.

"You fucked up." He said as the energy in his foot built up to a crescendo.

BOOM!

\----------

Veliry had been right about Vickers being angry.

When Telyon's griffin had first swooped down and grabbed the large man, he had flailed and cursed at them.

It had taken several minutes of yelling, and Veliry had even had to fly down next to him for a moment, to get him to understand what had happened and what the plan was. After that Vickers had calmed down and let himself sag as the griffin carried him aloft.

He checked his tablet for just a moment and read the few scant messages that command had sent him.

Apparently Choi was giving the enemy hell.

"Fuckin eh wrench monkey." He said to himself as he looked at a short clip that they'd cleaned up and sent to him. He watched Choi move like something out of a movie, marveling at the frequency of the explosions and the sheer dissarray he frequently left the cluster of clay monsters in from his rapid attacks.

He doesn't fight like one of us anymore. Not like a Soldier of our world. Now he fights like the wolf did in the bar. He realized as the clip finished. Looks like my rifle aint gonna do much either.

Vickers reached into his bottomless bag and pulled out the fire suppression launcher that was there, making sure to clip it to his vest before he accidentally dropped it. Once it was secure he checked to ensure it was loaded. He only had twenty or so rounds left for it, but that'd be fine.

He held his hand up and focused on it, smiling as frost formed into spikes on his knuckles.

\----------

Patril emerged from his room in a rage.

His face was covered in the black veins of magical overuse and backlash. He had the timid attendants throat gripped in his hand as he dragged their lifeless body.

"TELL THEM TO BEGIN THE CONGRUENCE!" He yelled at the other attendants standing outside.

They seemed to understand his fury, none of them questioning him or even hesitating before moving into action as he tossed the limp corpse aside and stormed back into his ritual room.

The attendants slipped into the rooms of their other masters, passing the message of the leader along in whispers.

Patril seated himself back at the control node roughly.

His head pounded from the damage the target had done to his golem. He had been a fool to enhance his hearing against someone so reliant on explosions for their fighting style. But he'd had no choice, having no sight otherwise. Luckily the golem's blood stone flesh had dampened the pain somewhat, but it had still been there.

He channeled back into control as another attendant silently stepped to their position behind him.

Fuck capturing him. We're going to kill this man. And I shall turn his drake into a carpet for our meeting hall.

\----------

James massaged his ankle as he caught his breath. The flyer's body was in shambles on the ground, flailing weakly as it continued succumbing to the damage he'd done to it.

He reeled as he felt a stabbing pain in his shoulder and was suddenly reminded of Steve's fight. He'd been feeling bits of pain here and there, but he'd been too caught up in his own part of the battle to pay them any mind. After all, he couldn't help Steve if he got killed himself.

He looked over and saw something that actually confused him for a moment.

Steve had been hit, that much was accurate. He could see the spike sticking out of the drake's right shoulder, even as Steve blasted fire at the attacker to little effect.

But the other golems seemed to be pulling back away from the massive lizard. As if the one that had attacked him was simply buying time for them.

What the fuck? He thought. Are they... retreating?

Suddenly a gravelly chatter began to rumble into being behind him.

James spun around, sword held high in preparation for an attack.

The mangled head of the golem was shaking on the remnants of its shoulders. It had a smile on its eyeless face as the bat ears sank back into the side of its head.

It was laughing.

James quickly turned to look at the other golems and was surprised to see all of them, minus the one engaged with Steve, standing in a circle, their arms interlocked.

Their bodies began to flow together.

"Good luck stopping us now." The golem behind him said menacingly.

James turned back, a look of anger on his face.

"Man, that's some dumb ass power rangers shit." He said, drawing a confused look from the golem as it attempted to knit itself back together. "Real. Fuckin'. Cheesy."

The golem tried to speak again. But James cut it off as a burst of flames jetted out of his wolf hand, empowered by a series of focused, high pressure, jets of pure oxygen from his right. These lanced holes into the battered body of the golem even as they ignited from the flames of his other hand.

A few moments later the golem was a pile of ashes and crumbled dirt.

The ground trembled from an impact behind him.

James turned back to see Steve, his prey clenched in his jaws as he tore them apart, backing away in reverse, a look of mild fear on his reptilian face.

James knew why as he looked over at the nearly fifty foot tall mass of reddish black flesh that bent and flexed as it adjusted to its new form. It took a slow, wobbly, step toward the drake before falling to a knee.

"Pffffff." James scoffed. "Not even the biggest thing I've ever killed."

He whistled loudly as he shot a blast of fire at the side of the massive creature.

A series of red glowing spots, which he knew were eyes, suddenly appeared on the side closest to him.

"Oh." He said in mild surprise. "That's.... kinda gross."

It stood up and James watched as an arm sprouted from the side of its torso towards him.

It had a massive spike at the end of it.

James began moving again, drawing his rifle back out of his bag as he did.

\-------------------------

Patril's body slumped over sideways as his soul died within his body.

The attendant in the room moved over to the rune on the wall nearby and powered down the ritual room before quietly exiting.

When they got outside amongst the other attendants they looked to the nearest one.

"Master Patril is gone." They said calmly. "Is the congruence in effect?"

The other attendants all nodded and they took their place among them, ready to serve as needed.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wl5uj3/wait_is_this_just_gate_203/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (201/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah, James is still kickin ass. The Agency done fucked up.

Enjoy.

\~

"Drone conga line is reading signs of movement and temperature spikes sir. Pulling up visual.... now." Said one of the techs as their team manipulated the drone network that Choi and Vickers had set up on their trip out to the Lunar Council City. As they finished the statement the main display screen in the control room switched over to a somewhat jittery camera feed. It started out pointing straight down before quickly swiveling over to where the action was.

"Holy shit." One of the soldiers present said as they saw the footage. "That's like something out of a comic book."

General Krick couldn't admonish the young Sergeant for putting words to the exact thing he was thinking, simply sparing a sidelong glance at the soldier for the outburst.

On the screen Choi was charging toward what looked like a moving statue. He was reminded of Korg from the Marvel movies he'd watched as a kid. Only this one had wings and seemed to be made out of some kind of dark material that reminded him of the color of dried blood.

As he watched there was a massive explosion centered on Choi's position. The feed skipped as its processors tried to parse the sudden change in visual and thermal data. Krick had just a split second of concern before the feed picked back up.

When it did Choi was only inches above the ground with his hand reaching out to something.

Then there was another skip as another explosion occured.

Suddenly Choi was some twenty yards past the "Golem" and it was staggering as one of its wings flew past it and landed on the ground.

Choi didn't stop though. Instead, he seemed to land on the ground with a single leg, before using his momentum to spin in a sort of cartwheel that was too fast for the camera to see clearly with its limited capability.

Another explosion and feed break and Choi was slamming into the things chest, a long slender sword in his hand and impaling the enemy. There was a series of flashes from something Choi was holding, followed by another explosion. After the feed cleared again Choi was soaring through the air like a mortar round as the creature below writhed on the ground clutching its face.

"Jesus Christ." Krick said under his breath. The shocked statement was audible to all despite its whispered volume as he realized just how silent the room had become.

"Look at the dragon." Someone else said, drawing everyone's attention to the skirmish happening in the background. Something that would have been fascinating if it hadn't been for the superhero-like display of powers Choi had been putting on in the foreground.

Krick looked at the secondary fight just in time to see one of the golem creatures get thrown some twenty feet in the air, Choi's massive black furred drake companion having clamped it in its jaws before thrashing it about and sending it flying.

The creature hadn't even landed before it was engulfed in flames that made the camera stutter again.

Just what has he turned into over there? The General wondered as he saw Choi explosively propel himself toward the main group of enemies that were moving around the clearing.

\--------------------------------

"AAAAAAAAHHHHH!"

Patril screamed as he subconsciously clutched at his eyes.

Physically they were fine. But his connection to his golem form had caused the pain of it getting its eyes shot out by the Hero's damnable attack to transfer to him via his very soul.

The eyes were one of the few components of the golems that were susceptible to physical damage. Magic was capable of a lot, but recreating the complex visual organs was something that was not easy to accomplish. For ease, and cost saving, most golems had eyes that had been harvested from living creatures. Theirs were from griffins, granting them some of the best vision in the world. Typically they could protect the eyes by withdrawing them into the bodies of the golems, like they had for the drake's fire attack. But the weapons the hero was using had the ability to penetrate that flesh easily, and had scored direct attacks on the soft, vulnerable, organs.

The hero had picked up on that weakness quickly after it had swiped one of Patril's out with his clawed hand.

What was worse was that unlike the rest of the golem's blood stone crafted body, they wouldn't reassemble or repair.

"Master. Is all well?" His new attendant asked with a hint of fear.

Patril turned to them with a snarl.

"DOES ANYTHING ABOUT ME SCREAMING AND CLUTCHING MY EYES STRIKE YOU AS OKAY?!?" He chastised them. As he turned to them they saw the black veins in and around his red and puffy eyes. He hated to admit that he could barely see them through the haze of the magical damage.

The attendant took a step back.

"Do..." They stammered. "Do you need to be withdrawn master?" They asked. He wondered if this was a new attendant to the Agency, or if they just weren't cut out for this work.

"NO!" He yelled back even as he placed his hands back on the mound of golem flesh that allowed his connection.

"Yes master." They said feebly as they resumed their former position near the door. He would have to talk to Navim about this one's future when this was over.

Fine. He thought as he felt his soul siphoning into the golem again. The hard way. He focused some magical energy into it, to use an old trick that his former golemmancy master had taught him decades before.

He flowed into a world of darkness, his golem form having gotten confused at its blindness while he'd been away.

He continued pouring magic into it through his soul bond.

The golem's began to form four large protrusions on its head.

Two large, bat-like, ears began to form on the side of its head. At the same time as long stems protruded from the top of its head before they spread, flatting like fans before splitting into a series of fine hairs that feathered out to the sides.

His golem stood up, listening to the clash of the hero, his drake, and its fellow golems some fifty yards away.

It walked over to the wing the hero had cut from its back only moments before and absorbed it into itself.

\---

James moved through the throng of golems like a dervish.

He used his explosions to keep himself moving at speed, and to keep his opponents spaced out, with occasional blasts of wind from his off hand to redirect or speed up. His wolf arm, no longer aching, was gripping the mage's blade like a vice as he spun, dipped, cartwheeled, leaped and, most importantly, cut his way through the group of monsters.

Each strike from the Mage's Blade bit deep, doing more damage than almost anything except his eye attacks had done. He made sure to sprinkle those into the mayhem as well, occasionally running his blade across the faces of the golems to try to score strikes against the vulnerable spots.

He felt the air grow hot and heard the telltale rumble of Steve's impending breath attack and leapt up into the air, spinning end over end like an Olympic gymnast, leaving the golems confused just as a swathe of black tinged fire washed over them.

James landed next to Steve, who'd been pushed damn near into the forest again, before moving to stab into the golem that was trying to blind side him. His sword rammed through its punching arm as easily as if it were cutting through wet clay, arresting its momentum just in time for Steve to spin around. His tail slammed into the startled creature just as James jumped into a cartwheel, sword still in the golems arm as he spun sideways over Steve's tail. The creature flew sideways, James's sword tearing our of it easily. It slammed into a tree, toppling its already burning mass over in a burst of cinders and ash.

James jumped back over Steve's tail as it swept back the other direction and opened his mouth as he landed, spraying deathbolts out of it and engulfing the now burning golem in the inky black lightning. It struggled to right itself among the inferno of the jagged tree stump until the combination of heat and magical death energy made its form begin crumbling to nothingness.

He felt another series of impacts as Steve clamped down on another golem and began rapidly rolling sideways, toppling the remaining enemies even as he rapidly began battering and tearing at the one in his mouth as he death-rolled it.

James turned as he watched the golem in front of him falling apart, struggling to move even as bits of its body crumbled away. He was about to charge back into the fray to help Steve when he saw something unexpected.

The flyer was rushing toward him like a falcon striking its prey, its arms and legs reached out to grab him even as it crashed down from the sky. It had grown a pair of massive ears and a pair of antennae that reminded him of pictures he'd seen of moths. He had a split second to realize that it must have formed them to compensate for the eyes he'd taken from it, as they were no longer glowing red on its face.

He gripped his sword in both hands, dropping the pistol in favor of the magic devouring weapon, and raised it up in a stab even as black lightning once again began flowing out of his mouth as he roared in anger.

Then it was on him.

BOOOOOM!!!

\----------

Veliry sat atop the startlingly soft griffin, gripping the waist of one of Alixan's faster riders as they flew together.

Her magical senses reached out in the direction they were traveling as she sat in a trance.

The magic of the air around her, and the land below her, opened up like a map of energy in her mind. She could feel the energy of the sun, the wind, the plants, the smattering of people traveling the road below, and so much more as she became a living sensor.

And off in the distance she could faintly feel the rapid, jerky, and disturbingly familiar energy of the explosions that marked James's style of magical energy management.

She was surprised to sense it from so far away.

She'd already advised the King on how rapidly James's magical skills were progressing. He wasn't magically minded himself, being only slightly better than a novice mage himself, but the king still understood the importance of such growth.

Still, the fact that she could sense him even from what had to be nearly one hundred miles away was a testament to how powerful he'd become. It didn't matter that she was only able to sense it because of her high level of training and experience, being an arch-mage. But still it impressed her.

Then she sensed something below her that was unexpected.

She tapped on the shoulders of the rider, Telyon, to get his attention and he turned his head back minutely to give her his ear.

"Is there someone running very fast below us?" She yelled over the wind. "A large, heavily equipped man in odd clothes perhaps?"

Telyon listened, then his griffin tilted ever so slightly as he looked down, his eyes glowing as he did.

He looked back. "Aye. He's moving like a bloody dire-steed." He confirmed.

She pondered the odd change to the man's magical flow, some kind of shift having occured since the last time she'd been around him.

"He's going to be mad." She yelled. "But pick him up and bring him with us. He's Captain Choi's subordinate."

Telyon nodded. Then he signaled to the other riders. They acknowledged him. Then Telyon's griffin banked into a dive.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wk9sd8/wait_is_this_just_gate_202/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (201/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah, James is still kickin ass. The Agency done fucked up.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"Holy shit." One of the soldiers present said as they saw the footage. "That's like something out of a comic book."

General Krick couldn't admonish the young Sergeant for putting words to the exact thing he was thinking, simply sparing a sidelong glance at the soldier for the outburst.

On the screen Choi was charging toward what looked like a moving statue. He was reminded of Korg from the Marvel movies he'd watched as a kid. Only this one had wings and seemed to be made out of some kind of dark material that reminded him of the color of dried blood.

As he watched there was a massive explosion centered on Choi's position. The feed skipped as its processors tried to parse the sudden change in visual and thermal data. Krick had just a split second of concern before the feed picked back up.

When it did Choi was only inches above the ground with his hand reaching out to something.

Then there was another skip as another explosion occured.

Suddenly Choi was some twenty yards past the "Golem" and it was staggering as one of its wings flew past it and landed on the ground.

Choi didn't stop though. Instead, he seemed to land on the ground with a single leg, before using his momentum to spin in a sort of cartwheel that was too fast for the camera to see clearly with its limited capability.

Another explosion and feed break and Choi was slamming into the things chest, a long slender sword in his hand and impaling the enemy. There was a series of flashes from something Choi was holding, followed by another explosion. After the feed cleared again Choi was soaring through the air like a mortar round as the creature below writhed on the ground clutching its face.

"Jesus Christ." Krick said under his breath. The shocked statement was audible to all despite its whispered volume as he realized just how silent the room had become.

"Look at the dragon." Someone else said, drawing everyone's attention to the skirmish happening in the background. Something that would have been fascinating if it hadn't been for the superhero-like display of powers Choi had been putting on in the foreground.

Krick looked at the secondary fight just in time to see one of the golem creatures get thrown some twenty feet in the air, Choi's massive black furred drake companion having clamped it in its jaws before thrashing it about and sending it flying.

The creature hadn't even landed before it was engulfed in flames that made the camera stutter again.

Just what has he turned into over there? The General wondered as he saw Choi explosively propel himself toward the main group of enemies that were moving around the clearing.

\--------------------------------

"AAAAAAAAHHHHH!"

Patril screamed as he subconsciously clutched at his eyes.

Physically they were fine. But his connection to his golem form had caused the pain of it getting its eyes shot out by the Hero's damnable attack to transfer to him via his very soul.

The eyes were one of the few components of the golems that were susceptible to physical damage. Magic was capable of a lot, but recreating the complex visual organs was something that was not easy to accomplish. For ease, and cost saving, most golems had eyes that had been harvested from living creatures. Theirs were from griffins, granting them some of the best vision in the world. Typically they could protect the eyes by withdrawing them into the bodies of the golems, like they had for the drake's fire attack. But the weapons the hero was using had the ability to penetrate that flesh easily, and had scored direct attacks on the soft, vulnerable, organs.

The hero had picked up on that weakness quickly after it had swiped one of Patril's out with his clawed hand.

What was worse was that unlike the rest of the golem's blood stone crafted body, they wouldn't reassemble or repair.

"Master. Is all well?" His new attendant asked with a hint of fear.

Patril turned to them with a snarl.

"DOES ANYTHING ABOUT ME SCREAMING AND CLUTCHING MY EYES STRIKE YOU AS OKAY?!?" He chastised them. As he turned to them they saw the black veins in and around his red and puffy eyes. He hated to admit that he could barely see them through the haze of the magical damage.

The attendant took a step back.

"Do..." They stammered. "Do you need to be withdrawn master?" They asked. He wondered if this was a new attendant to the Agency, or if they just weren't cut out for this work.

"NO!" He yelled back even as he placed his hands back on the mound of golem flesh that allowed his connection.

"Yes master." They said feebly as they resumed their former position near the door. He would have to talk to Navim about this one's future when this was over.

Fine. He thought as he felt his soul siphoning into the golem again. The hard way. He focused some magical energy into it, to use an old trick that his former golemmancy master had taught him decades before.

He flowed into a world of darkness, his golem form having gotten confused at its blindness while he'd been away.

He continued pouring magic into it through his soul bond.

The golem's began to form four large protrusions on its head.

Two large, bat-like, ears began to form on the side of its head. At the same time as long stems protruded from the top of its head before they spread, flatting like fans before splitting into a series of fine hairs that feathered out to the sides.

His golem stood up, listening to the clash of the hero, his drake, and its fellow golems some fifty yards away.

It walked over to the wing the hero had cut from its back only moments before and absorbed it into itself.

\---

James moved through the throng of golems like a dervish.

He used his explosions to keep himself moving at speed, and to keep his opponents spaced out, with occasional blasts of wind from his off hand to redirect or speed up. His wolf arm, no longer aching, was gripping the mage's blade like a vice as he spun, dipped, cartwheeled, leaped and, most importantly, cut his way through the group of monsters.

Each strike from the Mage's Blade bit deep, doing more damage than almost anything except his eye attacks had done. He made sure to sprinkle those into the mayhem as well, occasionally running his blade across the faces of the golems to try to score strikes against the vulnerable spots.

He felt the air grow hot and heard the telltale rumble of Steve's impending breath attack and leapt up into the air, spinning end over end like an Olympic gymnast, leaving the golems confused just as a swathe of black tinged fire washed over them.

James landed next to Steve, who'd been pushed damn near into the forest again, before moving to stab into the golem that was trying to blind side him. His sword rammed through its punching arm as easily as if it were cutting through wet clay, arresting its momentum just in time for Steve to spin around. His tail slammed into the startled creature just as James jumped into a cartwheel, sword still in the golems arm as he spun sideways over Steve's tail. The creature flew sideways, James's sword tearing out of it easily. It slammed into a tree, toppling its already burning mass over in a burst of cinders and ash.

James jumped back over Steve's tail as it swept back the other direction and opened his mouth as he landed, spraying deathbolts out of it and engulfing the now burning golem in the inky black lightning. It struggled to right itself among the inferno of the jagged tree stump until the combination of heat and magical death energy made its form begin crumbling to nothingness.

He felt another series of impacts as Steve clamped down on another golem and began rapidly rolling sideways, toppling the remaining enemies even as he rapidly began battering and tearing at the one in his mouth as he death-rolled it.

James turned as he watched the golem in front of him falling apart, struggling to move even as bits of its body crumbled away. He was about to charge back into the fray to help Steve when he saw something unexpected.

The flyer was rushing toward him like a falcon striking its prey, its arms and legs reached out to grab him even as it crashed down from the sky. It had grown a pair of massive ears and a pair of antennae that reminded him of pictures he'd seen of moths. He had a split second to realize that it must have formed them to compensate for the eyes he'd taken from it, as they were no longer glowing red on its face.

He gripped his sword in both hands, dropping the pistol in favor of the magic devouring weapon, and raised it up in a stab even as black lightning once again began flowing out of his mouth as he roared in anger.

Then it was on him.

BOOOOOM!!!

\----------

Veliry sat atop the startlingly soft griffin, gripping the waist of one of Alixan's faster riders as they flew together.

Her magical senses reached out in the direction they were traveling as she sat in a trance.

The magic of the air around her, and the land below her, opened up like a map of energy in her mind. She could feel the energy of the sun, the wind, the plants, the smattering of people traveling the road below, and so much more as she became a living sensor.

And off in the distance she could faintly feel the rapid, jerky, and disturbingly familiar energy of the explosions that marked James's style of magical energy management.

She was surprised to sense it from so far away.

She'd already advised the King on how rapidly James's magical skills were progressing. He wasn't magically minded himself, being only slightly better than a novice mage himself, but the king still understood the importance of such growth.

Still, the fact that she could sense him even from what had to be nearly one hundred miles away was a testament to how powerful he'd become. It didn't matter that she was only able to sense it because of her high level of training and experience, being an arch-mage. But still it impressed her.

Then she sensed something below her that was unexpected.

She tapped on the shoulders of the rider, Telyon, to get his attention and he turned his head back minutely to give her his ear.

"Is there someone running very fast below us?" She yelled over the wind. "A large, heavily equipped man in odd clothes perhaps?"

Telyon listened, then his griffin tilted ever so slightly as he looked down, his eyes glowing as he did.

He looked back. "Aye. He's moving like a bloody dire-steed." He confirmed.

She pondered the odd change to the man's magical flow, some kind of shift having occured since the last time she'd been around him.

"He's going to be mad." She yelled. "But pick him up and bring him with us. He's Captain Choi's subordinate."

Telyon nodded. Then he signaled to the other riders. They acknowledged him. Then Telyon's griffin banked into a dive.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wk9gwm/wait_is_this_just_gate_202/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (200/?)

Previous / Lore Dump Chapter

Writer's note: play this real quick on a separate tab

TWO HUNDRED CHAPTERS!!!!!!!

But real talk. Really happy to be here. Looking forward to whatever our favorite super powered forever specialist (don't let the bars fool you) gets up to.

Some of y'all have pointed out that with all his combined skill sets, James should be a crazy powerhouse.

Someone shoulda gave that memo to the Agency.

Now watch as our boy shines.

Enjoy.

\~

When James met the golems in combat he did so well ahead of Steve. That was intentional. He didn't even want Steve in this fight. So he'd used his explosive flying style to rush ahead like a rocket as soon as he'd seen the flying golem ignore his rifle shots.

From his previous encounter with the Agency, Vickers had theorized that the golem he'd dealt with was being controlled. He'd told them about how the golem had seemed lax and idle whenever its eyes hadn't been glowing, but had seemed much more attentive and aggressive whenever they were. Veliry had confirmed that most golems either operated under their creator's control, or by a preset set of commands.

James didn't know whether the golems in front of him were being controlled, or simply running on some kind of programming.

He didn't care.

They were here for a fight, and he intended to give them one.

Whatever the case was they, or the people controlling them, clearly didn't know about his speed.

James's eyes glowed with reflex enhancing vision as he hurtled toward them, sword in his right hand, chain whip wrapped around the his wolf-like left arm.

The golems closest to him tried to jump out of the way, their glowing inhuman eyes widening in what he thought was shock as they realized how rapidly he'd gotten to them.

His blade bit deep into the neck of the first golem he attacked. He hadn't had too many opportunities to use the blade in the previous fight in the forest. Steve was a bit too big and the blade was just a normal length sword, so he'd only gotten a few light hits in with it before. But they'd been effective enough, and the Mage's Blade had practically begged for more, wanting to go back to the golems each time.

It proved just as magic thirsty, practically dragging back at James's arm as he continued rocketing past the now confused group of monstrosities. But he'd grown used to the sword's appetite, and knew that it would change direction in only a moment as he neared his real target, the flyer.

He landed startlingly lightly, only barely touching down with his lead leg long enough to push off and flip over, his already abused right leg complaining the whole way. He felt the blade begin pulling toward where he was going just as he released another explosion from the landing foot, sending him cartwheeling through the air at speed before another blast stabilized him.

He had another split second of enhanced vision to see the flyer's seemingly shocked expression as it realized what he was doing. It tried to pull away. But it was too late, and too slow, as the sword stabbed into its shoulder while James continued flying over it and between its beating wings.

He didn't release the sword, but instead gripped it even tighter as he let another blast push him past the flying golem. The result caused the sword to tear its way out of the flyer's shoulder by angling upward, ripping through the remaining "flesh" of its body before ripping its way out.

James landed some fifty yards past the now confused and slightly scattered group of constructs as a series of small, controlled, blasts stabilized him before he touched the ground. The flyer slammed to the ground, gripping its mangled shoulder as it picked itself up and looked at him with what he thought was anger.

"You the Agency?" James asked, pointing the Mage's Blade at them as the last few scraps of magically imbued golem bits melted off of it, their magical energy devoured by the blade's enchantment.

The flyer snarled as the other golems moved to stand next to it. James watched as the flyer's shoulder knit itself back together from whatever material the creatures were made of.

"If so, then I gotta ask; didn't you get my warning back when you were inside my head?" He said with a smile that could have been considered manic. "Or maybe the one that my guy Vickers gave you with that lil brick of C4?" He brought his back and up, into an attacking position. "You're fucking with the wrong person."

BOOM!

And he was in the air again.

\----------

Vickers was having a great time on his run. And he was making great time too.

He'd passed the first of the small, outlying villages that were outside of the capital roughly two hours back. He didn't know the exact distance, but he knew that on the trip out, that journey had taken a full day and a half to get to. He'd just done it in five hours. He didn't know how fast the odd horse/monster creatures Trelen had brought with him had been pulling the carriage that had set the trip's pace. But he knew he was going way faster.

He was surprised that he didn't feel winded yet. He knew he could run a long distance even normally. He knew that this world had imbued almost every cell in his body with some kind of ambient magical energy. It was believed to be the reason they couldn't safely go home yet. But as a result he could run faster, jump higher, lift more, and hit harder.

But he hadn't really expected it to enhance his stamina, even though logically that made sense. The realization that he could probably run until the sun exploded was a bit of a mind boggler to him.

He vaulted over a section of road that was bogged down with mud as he continued running.

He just had to hope Choi could hold out for a while longer.

\-------------------------

James groaned as he slammed into the ground, rolling once before catching his feet and sliding the last few yards.

Before he could think, and let the pain into his mind, he spun and blasted off again, sword angled out and chain whip trailing behind him.

Steve had learned from the first encounter and knew not to stay near the main group of golems. Instead he'd slammed into one with his entire weight as it had been distracted by James. James had felt the impact as if he'd just tried to tackle someone made of stone. But Steve had succeeded in knocking the golem onto its face and had then latched onto its back with his massive jaws and carried the thing away at great effort, blasting flames out of his mouth and around the golem in the process.

James dug his sword into the side of one of the flailing golems as he flew, using the resistance and a few controlled blasts from his feet to re-angle his momentum. Another blast sent him flying off almost at a right angle as he ripped the blade from the creature's chest. He blasted himself into a rapid spin just in time to bring the blade around to his open side and deflect an incoming spike that had been thrown by one of the others. He stopped it in time, but it was a close thing.

And they were figuring out his speed.

But they weren't figuring out his plan.

Still trailing the chain, James cut into another golem and once again re-angled himself, cutting into another golem and causing the spiked end of his chain whip to dig into the first one with its spiked links.

James rolled under the swinging arm of a third one and adjusted his plan minutely. He leapt up into the air once he was past it, let off a tiny blast to send him backwards just a few feet, dropped down, sprung off of the ground and blasted back in the direction he'd originally come from.

He gripped the handle of his chain whip with both hands as he rolled so that he was holding it behind him.

BOOM!

He flew even faster than before, angled up and away from the golems that were now entangled in the chain's spiked length.

The chain slammed them into each other as it pulled taut. He heard several of them release odd noises that he thought might have been roars of anger.

But he wasn't done.

He landed on the ground, ignoring the other golems that were already moving toward him, though he did notice several moving toward Steve as he continued savaging his prey as he dragged it away.

He used his magically enhanced strength to keep the chain taut as he positioned himself. But the golems were significantly stronger than he was, and he could feel himself being pulled off balance.

So he went with that.

James leaped up off the ground and laid flat, his feet slamming into each other and locking onto the chain.

BOOM!... BOOM! BOOM! BOOOOOM!

The first blast had pulled the chain back a few feet, causing the entangled golems to stagger where they were.

The second blast had pulled them hard enough to cause one of them to arch its head back and begin roaring again.

The third and fourth blasts had done what James had hoped as the chain had suddenly lost tension.

He watched with a smile as the chain first dug into the golems' flesh, then had begun to pull THROUGH it.

By the time he rolled over backwards and landed on his feet the chain was completely slack, the golems now on the ground behind him in multiple pieces. He jerked the chain back, spinning it as he did, and brought its spiked end to him.

To his surprise, and disgust, the golems were still moving, even torn to pieces.

But another of the thrown spikes interrupted his somewhat lessened celebration as he moved to dodge out of its way.

He began channeling wind magic out of his left arm as he began charging at the nearest of the whole golems, which was only twenty or so yards away and closing. His chain began to move as if alive, the wind magic causing it to coil and writhe like a snake, even as he brought his sword up to meet an incoming projectile.

He'd just managed to intercept the foot long spike of golem flesh when James felt a piercing pain in the right side of his rib cage. His eyes shot down in surprise only to find nothing there.

He blasted into the air, leaving the encroaching attacker behind as he scanned over and saw that Steve was now engaged with the two golems that had chased him down to pursue him as he'd been dragging, clawing, and burning the one in his mouth.

One of them had thrown a spike that was now embedded in Steve's side almost halfway.

James moved his leg out at an angle and blasted again, sending him crashing down toward them like a meteor.

He lashed out with the whip as he flew, using his wind magic to get it to the target before he arrived. It slammed into the non-throwing golem and immediately began wrapping around its neck like a boa constrictor. He didn't know if these things needed to breath, but if they did that one would begin choking any time now. Just as he began pulling on the chain he slammed into the arm of the other golem, his sword leading the way.

He sliced its throwing arm clean off at the elbow, sending it flying away in front of him with a spray of dark fluids as he impacted the ground. But James didn't stop there.

He immediately began running around as fast as he could, getting the chain wrapped around the second one even as the first began struggling with the spiked weapon wrapped around its throat.

"Drop it boy!" He shouted at Steve who snarled as he did just that, letting the charred remains of the golem in his mouth drop to the ground. To James's joy, the creature appeared to be completely dead. He leaped into the air past Steve, running the chain between his still open jaws as he flew.

"PULL!" He yelled as he clambered up Steve's side with the last few yards of chain whip in his hand.

He'd never used that command with Steve before. After all, he wasn't exactly a pack animal, and Steve didn't exactly seem to understand what it meant. Then he thought of the game they'd played with a few of the carcasses he'd fed the massive lizard.

"TUG!" He yelled instead.

Steve understood immediately.

Unlike the last time, there was no real delay in the effect of the attack. Steve was many times larger than the golems, significantly stronger than James, and he had what was effectively four wheel drive.

The chain dug through their flesh and left them in ragged, flailing, pieces on the ground as it freed itself from their bodies.

James pulled Steve to turn and face the other golems and his jaw dropped as he did.

The golems that he'd left behind were already advancing on them. But two of them had stayed behind, and were reassembling the three golems that he'd dismembered with his chain. As he watched, the reformed golems began to aide in their own rebuilding, and before he knew it they were standing on their feet again, and turning to join their comrades.

"Well, shit." He said. He looked down at the mess he and Steve had just made at the same time as the drake did. Apparently Steve had noticed the same thing. "Burn these ones to a crisp like that first one you took down boy." He said to the agitated dragon-kin. "Napalm."

Steve got the message and began dousing the two destroyed golems in his black tinged fire breath.

James leaped off of Steve's back just as the flying golem took to the sky again.

As he flew the chain began writhing again. His sword pulled him forward, eager to devour more golem flesh.

And James began releasing inky, dark blue, bolts of lightning from his mouth as if he was a dragon of his own. Just like he'd done against the elemental.

BOOM!

\----------

The doors slammed open as Amina ran in to the strategy room.

She was only mildly surprised by the fact that the communication hub from Earth had been brought in. She was pleasantly surprised to see Alixan still present as he and her father turned to look at her, startled by her violent entrance.

"Have you heard of what's happening with James?" She asked as she strode up to join them at the table. "Have we dispatched troops to his aid?"

"I've informed them of his message." General Krick said from his screen.

"And I've already sent the members of my talon to his location." Alixan said. "Plus the capital's third."

"And the fifth and sixth are already on their way to Jadesport to bolster the defenses and get a visual on the blight, respectively." King Farrick added before going back to the maps they had been looking at.

"Veliry and Marcos are with the third." Alixan whispered as she stepped up next to him.

"How bad is the damage to the watch camp?" She asked as she looked at the data that the General had printed off for them regarding the explosion.

"Most of the watch camps were destroyed outright." One of the soldiers, a captain, said as he handed her a smaller map of the camps. It had red marks to indicate the destroyed positions. "General Sigbert has already moved in with reinforcements armed with the Earth arrows and runestone stores."

"Good." She said as she began comparing information. "Having your talon here isn't leaving your hold too weak is it?" She asked her brother.

"No. The Orcragg is working to bolster things a bit. They know how hard we've been hit. Plus we just graduated a new class of riders before the winter hit. They should be breaking their saddles in already." He replied.

"Our last read of Choi's position showed him moving out of the forest." General Krick cut in. "We think he was trying to find open ground so he could utilize his um.... bombastic... fighting style." He paused as he looked at more data. "We're readjusting the drone network you guys set up on your way to the wolf city."

"Lunar Council City." Amina corrected absently.

"Right. Lunar Council City." Krick replied, mildly annoyed. "Our other drones show Chief Vickers moving in to intercept. Based on current estimates he should be there in.... a day?" He paused as he looked at something on his screen. "His movements are eratic. And they show him on the ground. Why isn't he flying?"

"His griffin was too exhausted." Amina replied as she rubbed her hands on her temples while reading a report. "He's on foot."

"He's-" General Krick shook his head. "Did you say he's on foot?" He asked incredulously. "He's gotta be doing eighty five. How the hell?"

"It seems that in the heat of battle against the Elemental he finally managed to hit the point of magical saturation that James was at when he sent you that recording of him running and jumping onto the castle wall." Amina said simply. "I'm surprised he didn't inform you." She said with a hint of sarcasm. She turned back to Alixan. "A day isn't fast enough. How soon will your talon get there?" She asked, ignoring the noise of General Krick speaking with some of his techs.

"I've told them to move in broken formation." He said softly. "Most of them will take about half of that time. But I have a few, Captain Toyner and a new claw named Telyon. They have variants. They should be there in a matter of hours."

Amina's brow furrowed as she thought of what that meant for James. He was facing golems, most likely from the Agency, and at least eight of them. And he had to continue doing so for at least a few more hours.

She knew he was strong. He was more powerful than even he seemed to realize. Or at least more than he seemed to be able to acknowledge.

But even the weakest of golems was still a force of nature in a fight. Their hardiness, strength, and adaptability made them a threat at almost any level. And the Agency wasn't shy about using magical items and spells that were beyond most people.

Her heart wanted nothing more than to hop on the nearest griffin, preferably while Alixan did the same, and fly back to join James.

But Vickers had been right. James had sent her ahead for a reason.

Her place was here. Leading her people against the greater threat of the blight.

She turned back to the table, and the people around it. She slid forth a troop count that she'd read.

"Have the fourth halberds and the eighth cavalry join together to recoup their losses from the previous blight incursion. If we don't have enough mounts for the halberds than they can ride back saddle to the cavalrymen. We can drill en route." She said. "Reequip our second archers with as many of the Earth arrows as we can spare. Have troop carts drawn up and ready within three days. Plus as many rune stones as we can get. They'll be the next wave of soldiers we send to reinforce Jadesport." She looked at her father who simply nodded. "And I'll go with them."

\----------

James flew low and fast as he worked his way around the flyer. His plan was to blast the ground golems with the explosions from his feet while also spraying them with the deathbolts emitting from his mouth. While he was doing that he was also wrapping the entirety of the chain whip around the flyer as tightly as he could, and slashing it with his sword whenever he could.

He wasn't as well off as he'd been before. He had a spike sticking out of his left thigh, joining the other similar injury he'd gotten on the same leg earlier. But he knew that while long, the spikes weren't serrated or jagged, and were actually fairly narrow. So he ignored the new wound.

The flying golem didn't seem to mind the whip, though it did flail and spasm as the Mage's Blade repeatedly bit into its odd, dark flesh.

James wasn't targeting the wings this time. He needed the flyer to stay airborne so he could focus on it without the other golems being able to reach him. He'd expected the flyer to figure that out, but if it had then it didn't seem to care.

He was about to finish the last lap around the flying monstrosity, when he'd repeat the trick from earlier and pull it to pieces, when he was stopped dead in his tracks. The chain suddenly jerked to a halt, practically ripping his arm out of its socket despite its now werewolf-like strength.

He began to fall for a moment as his momentum was unexpectedly cancelled, and he was about to emit another blast to get back on track, when he was suddenly jerked up and back.

Towards the flyer.

Then he saw the chain in its massive hand.

And he saw the other arm stretched out in front of it, one of the foot long spikes gripped in its hand.

James just barely had enough time to pull his arm up between him and the sharp weapon, releasing the handle of the chain whip in the process.

"AAAAAAGH!" He yelled in pain as the spike stabbed clean through his hand.

Then the flyer's other hand dropped the length of chain it had been holding and clamped onto his neck. James immediately felt his throat being crushed.

It began speaking in a deep, gravelly, voice that sounded like rocks being ground in some kind of machine.

"The Agency shall have its vengeance upon you, your allies, and eventually your whole world James Choi."

"You got..." He wheezed out through gritted teeth as everything started to narrow. "the wrong-"

It pulled him in closer, momentarily loosening its grip as it shifted, though not enough for his liking.

"We know you are the one we desire. No games." It said, bits of some kind of green saliva splattering against his cheek as it spoke.

"I was gonna say." He replied as he felt something shifting in his neck that he was pretty sure wasn't meant to shift. "You got..." He let out a small gurgling noise as his throat continued being squeezed. He squinted his right eye shut so he could focus on looking the golem in the eye with his left. "The wrong hand."

The golem's head tilted in confusion. Then it looked at the hand that had the spike in it.

James's wolf hand.

It looked back at him just in time for James to flex his left hand, shattering the spike. He swung the clawed appendage at the golem's face, raking across its eyes and ripping one of them completely out of its head. It released James in surprise.

James fell for a moment as his consciousness rushed back into focus. A small part of his brain wondered why he hadn't hit the ground yet when they'd only been twenty feet or so off the ground.

Then he got things back in focus.

He rolled over as fast as he could and was shocked to see that he was almost two hundred feet off the ground now. The flyer had lifted both of them off of the ground and had apparently been prepared to drop his unconscious body.

Steve was fighting down below.

He felt something move on his hand and looked down to see the eyeball, which was no longer glowing red, stuck on the nail of one of his clawed fingers. It looked more like an actual eye than he'd expected. That gave him an idea even as it disgusted him.

"Ew!" He exclaimed before focusing energy in the hand and burning it away with fire.

He looked back down and saw the other golems pressing in on his partner. He switched the Mage's Blade to his wolf hand, marveling at how little the still open wound hurt. Then he drew his pistol from its holster and flicked the safety off.

"I'm comin' boy." He said to himself.

BOOM!

\----------

Patril snarled from where he was sitting.

The nerve of that out-worlder, that interloper.

He clutched at his eyes even though he knew that they were uninjured. That was the downside of golemmancy. In order to be in direct control you had to put your soul on the line, binding it to the golem regardless of where you were.

"Are you alright?" Asked one of the attendants in the room with him. Their job was to pass messages from one controller to the others and to ensure that his body was cared for while he was doing this. But also to pull him out if anything occurred that might jeopardize the ritual room.

"I'M FINE!" He snapped at them.

The attendant didn't balk at the outburst, they were professionals after all, and strong casters in their own right.

He calmed himself. He needed to get back in control. He took a deep breath.

"Who has been lost so far?" He asked, forcing calm back into his voice.

"Masters Inwyth and Dray't have both lost their golems. However Dray't was capable of severing the connection before it occurred." The attendant replied calmly.

Two of their Blood Stone golems destroyed, and one of their controllers with them? How could this single man and his pet drake accomplish such a feat?

"Inform the Doors that their information about the Summoned Hero is VASTLY outdated and incomplete." Patril hissed at the attendant. "The outworlder is significantly more powerful than they lead us to believe."

"They will inquire as to whether or not you believe you can still complete the task sir." The Attendant said in return.

Patril turned and glared at the attendant. "And you shall inform them that I shall. Then you shall remain there until I send for you."

Despite the implied death sentence, the attendant showed no sign of fear or hesitation at the command.

"As you say master." They replied before calmly exiting the room and being replaced by another attendant.

Patril heard a scream reverberate through the wall.

Malaki's golem must have just taken a terrible injury if HE'S screaming. He thought.

He turned back to the piece of golem flesh sitting in his lap and placed his hands on it as he entered the trance necessary to resume the connection.

He'd finish this task or die trying.

\---

James landed by slamming the Mage's Blade down directly into the head of the golem nearest to Steve. He rammed the blade in up to its hilt, using his own body weight to press it in. The impact made his teeth rattle, but it also forced the golem to its knees and startled the others around it.

Before they could react his right hand flashed up and he fired his pistol faster than he ever had before, his enhanced reflexes and movement speed causing it to cycle so fast that he was fairly certain it was at its mechanical limit.

When he'd fired at them before, the bullets had practically been ignored. But that was when he hadn't known their weakness.

This time most of the rounds impacted on their eyes, causing the red glow to die in each one that he shot.

He unleashed bursts, his finger moving too fast for him to switch targets. It was a mistake, he knew, but it was one he could rectify on the next magazine. Either way, three of the nearest golems lost their eyes before they'd even realized he was there.

He wrenched the blade sideways as hard as he could with his wolf hand, nearly severing the head of the golem he was standing on and leaving it hanging at an odd angle as the creature staggered forward.

James jumped up onto Steve again.

"NAPALM!" He commanded, and Steve unleashed his breath attack again as he reloaded.

He looked up as a shadow fell over in him.

Just in time for the now one eyed flyer to slam into him. It bore him to the ground with bone breaking force, literally as James felt his sword arm crack and the blade flew out of his grip. Steve was likewise knocked onto his side, his flames momentarily aiming upwards into the sky as his aim was thrown off from the impact.

"Enough tricks boy!" It snarled at him as it brought its arm back to hit him.

"It wasn't a trick!" He yelled back. "My arm is goddam public knowledge! But how 'bout this?!?"

James breathed deathbolts directly into the golem's face even as his newly reloaded pistol pressed against its knee and unloaded its entire magazine point blank.

BOOM!

James skidded across the dirt, grass and melted snow, and out from under the now toppled golem leader, leaving a trail of smoking ground and a small crater behind him before rolling to a stop.

He tried to stand up on shaky legs before falling back to a knee. His arm throbbed from the break that had his hand hanging limply. He set the pistol down for a moment as he looked over at where the flyer was already beginning to pick itself up.

He grabbed his wolf arm by the wrist.

He gritted his teeth. "Eeergh." He groaned. "This is gonna suck."

He took a deep breath.

And set the broken fur coated arm.

"FFFFFFUCK!" He yelled through his clenched teeth.

But the regenerative properties of the arm were already getting to work, and the pain began to fade almost immediately.

James picked up his pistol and dropped the magazine. He gingerly placed it in his opposite armpit and pressed a new magazine into the grip. Then he grabbed it and slammed the bottom of the mag against his leg. He hit the switch on the side and the slide snapped shut, chambering a round in the process.

"Round three bitch." He said as he stood up again and began running toward the flyer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wjh5l3/wait_is_this_just_gate_201/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (200/?)

Previous / Lore dump chapter / First

Writer's note: play this real quick on a separate tab

TWO HUNDRED CHAPTERS!!!!!!!

But real talk. Really happy to be here. Looking forward to whatever our favorite super powered forever specialist (don't let the bars fool you) gets up to.

Some of y'all have pointed out that with all his combined skill sets, James should be a crazy powerhouse.

Someone shoulda gave that memo to the Agency.

Now watch as our boy shines.

Enjoy.

\~

When James met the golems in combat he did so well ahead of Steve. That was intentional. He didn't even want Steve in this fight. So he'd used his explosive flying style to rush ahead like a rocket as soon as he'd seen the flying golem ignore his rifle shots.

From his previous encounter with the Agency, Vickers had theorized that the golem he'd dealt with was being controlled. He'd told them about how the golem had seemed lax and idle whenever its eyes hadn't been glowing, but had seemed much more attentive and aggressive whenever they were. Veliry had confirmed that most golems either operated under their creator's control, or by a preset set of commands.

James didn't know whether the golems in front of him were being controlled, or simply running on some kind of programming.

He didn't care.

They were here for a fight, and he intended to give them one.

Whatever the case was they, or the people controlling them, clearly didn't know about his speed.

James's eyes glowed with reflex enhancing vision as he hurtled toward them, sword in his right hand, chain whip wrapped around the his wolf-like left arm.

The golems closest to him tried to jump out of the way, their glowing inhuman eyes widening in what he thought was shock as they realized how rapidly he'd gotten to them.

His blade bit deep into the neck of the first golem he attacked. He hadn't had too many opportunities to use the blade in the previous fight in the forest. Steve was a bit too big and the blade was just a normal length sword, so he'd only gotten a few light hits in with it before. But they'd been effective enough, and the Mage's Blade had practically begged for more, wanting to go back to the golems each time.

It proved just as magic thirsty, practically dragging back at James's arm as he continued rocketing past the now confused group of monstrosities. But he'd grown used to the sword's appetite, and knew that it would change direction in only a moment as he neared his real target, the flyer.

He landed startlingly lightly, only barely touching down with his lead leg long enough to push off and flip over, his already abused right leg complaining the whole way. He felt the blade begin pulling toward where he was going just as he released another explosion from the landing foot, sending him cartwheeling through the air at speed before another blast stabilized him.

He had another split second of enhanced vision to see the flyer's seemingly shocked expression as it realized what he was doing. It tried to pull away. But it was too late, and too slow, as the sword stabbed into its shoulder while James continued flying over it and between its beating wings.

He didn't release the sword, but instead gripped it even tighter as he let another blast push him past the flying golem. The result caused the sword to tear its way out of the flyer's shoulder by angling upward, ripping through the remaining "flesh" of its body before ripping its way out.

James landed some fifty yards past the now confused and slightly scattered group of constructs as a series of small, controlled, blasts stabilized him before he touched the ground. The flyer slammed to the ground, gripping its mangled shoulder as it picked itself up and looked at him with what he thought was anger.

"You the Agency?" James asked, pointing the Mage's Blade at them as the last few scraps of magically imbued golem bits melted off of it, their magical energy devoured by the blade's enchantment.

The flyer snarled as the other golems moved to stand next to it. James watched as the flyer's shoulder knit itself back together from whatever material the creatures were made of.

"If so, then I gotta ask; didn't you get my warning back when you were inside my head?" He said with a smile that could have been considered manic. "Or maybe the one that my guy Vickers gave you with that lil brick of C4?" He brought his back and up, into an attacking position. "You're fucking with the wrong person."

BOOM!

And he was in the air again.

\----------

Vickers was having a great time on his run. And he was making great time too.

He'd passed the first of the small, outlying villages that were outside of the capital roughly two hours back. He didn't know the exact distance, but he knew that on the trip out, that journey had taken a full day and a half to get to. He'd just done it in five hours. He didn't know how fast the odd horse/monster creatures Trelen had brought with him had been pulling the carriage that had set the trip's pace. But he knew he was going way faster.

He was surprised that he didn't feel winded yet. He knew he could run a long distance even normally. He knew that this world had imbued almost every cell in his body with some kind of ambient magical energy. It was believed to be the reason they couldn't safely go home yet. But as a result he could run faster, jump higher, lift more, and hit harder.

But he hadn't really expected it to enhance his stamina, even though logically that made sense. The realization that he could probably run until the sun exploded was a bit of a mind boggler to him.

He vaulted over a section of road that was bogged down with mud as he continued running.

He just had to hope Choi could hold out for a while longer.

\------------------------

James groaned as he slammed into the ground, rolling once before catching his feet and sliding the last few yards.

Before he could think, and let the pain into his mind, he spun and blasted off again, sword angled out and chain whip trailing behind him.

Steve had learned from the first encounter and knew not to stay near the main group of golems. Instead he'd slammed into one with his entire weight as it had been distracted by James. James had felt the impact as if he'd just tried to tackle someone made of stone. But Steve had succeeded in knocking the golem onto its face and had then latched onto its back with his massive jaws and carried the thing away at great effort, blasting flames out of his mouth and around the golem in the process.

James dug his sword into the side of one of the flailing golems as he flew, using the resistance and a few controlled blasts from his feet to re-angle his momentum. Another blast sent him flying off almost at a right angle as he ripped the blade from the creature's chest. He blasted himself into a rapid spin just in time to bring the blade around to his open side and deflect an incoming spike that had been thrown by one of the others. He stopped it in time, but it was a close thing.

And they were figuring out his speed.

But they weren't figuring out his plan.

Still trailing the chain, James cut into another golem and once again re-angled himself, cutting into another golem and causing the spiked end of his chain whip to dig into the first one with its spiked links.

James rolled under the swinging arm of a third one and adjusted his plan minutely. He leapt up into the air once he was past it, let off a tiny blast to send him backwards just a few feet, dropped down, sprung off of the ground and blasted back in the direction he'd originally come from.

He gripped the handle of his chain whip with both hands as he rolled so that he was holding it behind him.

BOOM!

He flew even faster than before, angled up and away from the golems that were now entangled in the chain's spiked length.

The chain slammed them into each other as it pulled taut. He heard several of them release odd noises that he thought might have been roars of anger.

But he wasn't done.

He landed on the ground, ignoring the other golems that were already moving toward him, though he did notice several moving toward Steve as he continued savaging his prey as he dragged it away.

He used his magically enhanced strength to keep the chain taut as he positioned himself. But the golems were significantly stronger than he was, and he could feel himself being pulled off balance.

So he went with that.

James leaped up off the ground and laid flat, his feet slamming into each other and locking onto the chain.

BOOM!... BOOM! BOOM! BOOOOOM!

The first blast had pulled the chain back a few feet, causing the entangled golems to stagger where they were.

The second blast had pulled them hard enough to cause one of them to arch its head back and begin roaring again.

The third and fourth blasts had done what James had hoped as the chain had suddenly lost tension.

He watched with a smile as the chain first dug into the golems' flesh, then had begun to pull THROUGH it.

By the time he rolled over backwards and landed on his feet the chain was completely slack, the golems now on the ground behind him in multiple pieces. He jerked the chain back, spinning it as he did, and brought its spiked end to him.

To his surprise, and disgust, the golems were still moving, even torn to pieces.

But another of the thrown spikes interrupted his somewhat lessened celebration as he moved to dodge out of its way.

He began channeling wind magic out of his left arm as he began charging at the nearest of the whole golems, which was only twenty or so yards away and closing. His chain began to move as if alive, the wind magic causing it to coil and writhe like a snake, even as he brought his sword up to meet an incoming projectile.

He'd just managed to intercept the foot long spike of golem flesh when James felt a piercing pain in the right side of his rib cage. His eyes shot down in surprise only to find nothing there.

He blasted into the air, leaving the encroaching attacker behind as he scanned over and saw that Steve was now engaged with the two golems that had chased him down to pursue him as he'd been dragging, clawing, and burning the one in his mouth.

One of them had thrown a spike that was now embedded in Steve's side almost halfway.

James moved his leg out at an angle and blasted again, sending him crashing down toward them like a meteor.

He lashed out with the whip as he flew, using his wind magic to get it to the target before he arrived. It slammed into the non-throwing golem and immediately began wrapping around its neck like a boa constrictor. He didn't know if these things needed to breath, but if they did that one would begin choking any time now. Just as he began pulling on the chain he slammed into the arm of the other golem, his sword leading the way.

He sliced its throwing arm clean off at the elbow, sending it flying away in front of him with a spray of dark fluids as he impacted the ground. But James didn't stop there.

He immediately began running around as fast as he could, getting the chain wrapped around the second one even as the first began struggling with the spiked weapon wrapped around its throat.

"Drop it boy!" He shouted at Steve who snarled as he did just that, letting the charred remains of the golem in his mouth drop to the ground. To James's joy, the creature appeared to be completely dead. He leaped into the air past Steve, running the chain between his still open jaws as he flew.

"PULL!" He yelled as he clambered up Steve's side with the last few yards of chain whip in his hand.

He'd never used that command with Steve before. After all, he wasn't exactly a pack animal, and Steve didn't exactly seem to understand what it meant. Then he thought of the game they'd played with a few of the carcasses he'd fed the massive lizard.

"TUG!" He yelled instead.

Steve understood immediately.

Unlike the last time, there was no real delay in the effect of the attack. Steve was many times larger than the golems, significantly stronger than James, and he had what was effectively four wheel drive.

The chain dug through their flesh and left them in ragged, flailing, pieces on the ground as it freed itself from their bodies.

James pulled Steve to turn and face the other golems and his jaw dropped as he did.

The golems that he'd left behind were already advancing on them. But two of them had stayed behind, and were reassembling the three golems that he'd dismembered with his chain. As he watched, the reformed golems began to aide in their own rebuilding, and before he knew it they were standing on their feet again, and turning to join their comrades.

"Well, shit." He said. He looked down at the mess he and Steve had just made at the same time as the drake did. Apparently Steve had noticed the same thing. "Burn these ones to a crisp like that first one you took down boy." He said to the agitated dragon-kin. "Napalm."

Steve got the message and began dousing the two destroyed golems in his black tinged fire breath.

James leaped off of Steve's back just as the flying golem took to the sky again.

As he flew the chain began writhing again. His sword pulled him forward, eager to devour more golem flesh.

And James began releasing inky, dark blue, bolts of lightning from his mouth as if he was a dragon of his own. Just like he'd done against the elemental.

BOOM!

\----------

The doors slammed open as Amina ran in to the strategy room.

She was only mildly surprised by the fact that the communication hub from Earth had been brought in. She was pleasantly surprised to see Alixan still present as he and her father turned to look at her, startled by her violent entrance.

"Have you heard of what's happening with James?" She asked as she strode up to join them at the table. "Have we dispatched troops to his aid?"

"I've informed them of his message." General Krick said from his screen.

"And I've already sent the members of my talon to his location." Alixan said. "Plus the capital's third."

"And the fifth and sixth are already on their way to Jadesport to bolster the defenses and get a visual on the blight, respectively." King Farrick added before going back to the maps they had been looking at.

"Veliry and Marcos are with the third." Alixan whispered as she stepped up next to him.

"How bad is the damage to the watch camp?" She asked as she looked at the data that the General had printed off for them regarding the explosion.

"Most of the watch camps were destroyed outright." One of the soldiers, a captain, said as he handed her a smaller map of the camps. It had red marks to indicate the destroyed positions. "General Sigbert has already moved in with reinforcements armed with the Earth arrows and runestone stores."

"Good." She said as she began comparing information. "Having your talon here isn't leaving your hold too weak is it?" She asked her brother.

"No. The Orcragg is working to bolster things a bit. They know how hard we've been hit. Plus we just graduated a new class of riders before the winter hit. They should be breaking their saddles in already." He replied.

"Our last read of Choi's position showed him moving out of the forest." General Krick cut in. "We think he was trying to find open ground so he could utilize his um.... bombastic... fighting style." He paused as he looked at more data. "We're readjusting the drone network you guys set up on your way to the wolf city."

"Lunar Council City." Amina corrected absently.

"Right. Lunar Council City." Krick replied, mildly annoyed. "Our other drones show Chief Vickers moving in to intercept. Based on current estimates he should be there in.... a day?" He paused as he looked at something on his screen. "His movements are eratic. And they show him on the ground. Why isn't he flying?"

"His griffin was too exhausted." Amina replied as she rubbed her hands on her temples while reading a report. "He's on foot."

"He's-" General Krick shook his head. "Did you say he's on foot?" He asked incredulously. "He's gotta be doing eighty five. How the hell?"

"It seems that in the heat of battle against the Elemental he finally managed to hit the point of magical saturation that James was at when he sent you that recording of him running and jumping onto the castle wall." Amina said simply. "I'm surprised he didn't inform you." She said with a hint of sarcasm. She turned back to Alixan. "A day isn't fast enough. How soon will your talon get there?" She asked, ignoring the noise of General Krick speaking with some of his techs.

"I've told them to move in broken formation." He said softly. "Most of them will take about half of that time. But I have a few, Captain Toyner and a new claw named Telyon. They have variants. They should be there in a matter of hours."

Amina's brow furrowed as she thought of what that meant for James. He was facing golems, most likely from the Agency, and at least eight of them. And he had to continue doing so for at least a few more hours.

She knew he was strong. He was more powerful than even he seemed to realize. Or at least more than he seemed to be able to acknowledge.

But even the weakest of golems was still a force of nature in a fight. Their hardiness, strength, and adaptability made them a threat at almost any level. And the Agency wasn't shy about using magical items and spells that were beyond most people.

Her heart wanted nothing more than to hop on the nearest griffin, preferably while Alixan did the same, and fly back to join James.

But Vickers had been right. James had sent her ahead for a reason.

Her place was here. Leading her people against the greater threat of the blight.

She turned back to the table, and the people around it. She slid forth a troop count that she'd read.

"Have the fourth halberds and the eighth cavalry join together to recoup their losses from the previous blight incursion. If we don't have enough mounts for the halberds than they can ride back saddle to the cavalrymen. We can drill en route." She said. "Reequip our second archers with as many of the Earth arrows as we can spare. Have troop carts drawn up and ready within three days. Plus as many rune stones as we can get. They'll be the next wave of soldiers we send to reinforce Jadesport." She looked at her father who simply nodded. "And I'll go with them."

\----------

James flew low and fast as he worked his way around the flyer. His plan was to blast the ground golems with the explosions from his feet while also spraying them with the deathbolts emitting from his mouth. While he was doing that he was also wrapping the entirety of the chain whip around the flyer as tightly as he could, and slashing it with his sword whenever he could.

He wasn't as well off as he'd been before. He had a spike sticking out of his left thigh, joining the other similar injury he'd gotten on the same leg earlier. But he knew that while long, the spikes weren't serrated or jagged, and were actually fairly narrow. So he ignored the new wound.

The flying golem didn't seem to mind the whip, though it did flail and spasm as the Mage's Blade repeatedly bit into its odd, dark flesh.

James wasn't targeting the wings this time. He needed the flyer to stay airborne so he could focus on it without the other golems being able to reach him. He'd expected the flyer to figure that out, but if it had then it didn't seem to care.

He was about to finish the last lap around the flying monstrosity, when he'd repeat the trick from earlier and pull it to pieces, when he was stopped dead in his tracks. The chain suddenly jerked to a halt, practically ripping his arm out of its socket despite its now werewolf-like strength.

He began to fall for a moment as his momentum was unexpectedly cancelled, and he was about to emit another blast to get back on track, when he was suddenly jerked up and back.

Towards the flyer.

Then he saw the chain in its massive hand.

And he saw the other arm stretched out in front of it, one of the foot long spikes gripped in its hand.

James just barely had enough time to pull his arm up between him and the sharp weapon, releasing the handle of the chain whip in the process.

"AAAAAAGH!" He yelled in pain as the spike stabbed clean through his hand.

Then the flyer's other hand dropped the length of chain it had been holding and clamped onto his neck. James immediately felt his throat being crushed.

It began speaking in a deep, gravelly, voice that sounded like rocks being ground in some kind of machine.

"The Agency shall have its vengeance upon you, your allies, and eventually your whole world James Choi."

"You got..." He wheezed out through gritted teeth as everything started to narrow. "the wrong-"

It pulled him in closer, momentarily loosening its grip as it shifted, though not enough for his liking.

"We know you are the one we desire. No games." It said, bits of some kind of green saliva splattering against his cheek as it spoke.

"I was gonna say." He replied as he felt something shifting in his neck that he was pretty sure wasn't meant to shift. "You got..." He let out a small gurgling noise as his throat continued being squeezed. He squinted his right eye shut so he could focus on looking the golem in the eye with his left. "The wrong hand."

The golem's head tilted in confusion. Then it looked at the hand that had the spike in it.

James's wolf hand.

It looked back at him just in time for James to flex his left hand, shattering the spike. He swung the clawed appendage at the golem's face, raking across its eyes and ripping one of them completely out of its head. It released James in surprise.

James fell for a moment as his consciousness rushed back into focus. A small part of his brain wondered why he hadn't hit the ground yet when they'd only been twenty feet or so off the ground.

Then he got things back in focus.

He rolled over as fast as he could and was shocked to see that he was almost two hundred feet off the ground now. The flyer had lifted both of them off of the ground and had apparently been prepared to drop his unconscious body.

Steve was fighting down below.

He felt something move on his hand and looked down to see the eyeball, which was no longer glowing red, stuck on the nail of one of his clawed fingers. It looked more like an actual eye than he'd expected. That gave him an idea even as it disgusted him.

"Ew!" He exclaimed before focusing energy in the hand and burning it away with fire.

He looked back down and saw the other golems pressing in on his partner. He switched the Mage's Blade to his wolf hand, marveling at how little the still open wound hurt. Then he drew his pistol from its holster and flicked the safety off.

"I'm comin' boy." He said to himself.

BOOM!

\----------

Patril snarled from where he was sitting.

The nerve of that out-worlder, that interloper.

He clutched at his eyes even though he knew that they were uninjured. That was the downside of golemmancy. In order to be in direct control you had to put your soul on the line, binding it to the golem regardless of where you were.

"Are you alright?" Asked one of the attendants in the room with him. Their job was to pass messages from one controller to the others and to ensure that his body was cared for while he was doing this. But also to pull him out if anything occurred that might jeopardize the ritual room.

"I'M FINE!" He snapped at them.

The attendant didn't balk at the outburst, they were professionals after all, and strong casters in their own right.

He calmed himself. He needed to get back in control. He took a deep breath.

"Who has been lost so far?" He asked, forcing calm back into his voice.

"Masters Inwyth and Dray't have both lost their golems. However Dray't was capable of severing the connection before it occurred." The attendant replied calmly.

Two of their Blood Stone golems destroyed, and one of their controllers with them? How could this single man and his pet drake accomplish such a feat?

"Inform the Doors that their information about the Summoned Hero is VASTLY outdated and incomplete." Patril hissed at the attendant. "The outworlder is significantly more powerful than they lead us to believe."

"They will inquire as to whether or not you believe you can still complete the task sir." The Attendant said in return.

Patril turned and glared at the attendant. "And you shall inform them that I shall. Then you shall remain there until I send for you."

Despite the implied death sentence, the attendant showed no sign of fear or hesitation at the command.

"As you say master." They replied before calmly exiting the room and being replaced by another attendant.

Patril heard a scream reverberate through the wall.

Malaki's golem must have just taken a terrible injury if HE'S screaming. He thought.

He turned back to the piece of golem flesh sitting in his lap and placed his hands on it as he entered the trance necessary to resume the connection.

He'd finish this task or die trying.

\---------------------------

James landed by slamming the Mage's Blade down directly into the head of the golem nearest to Steve. He rammed the blade in up to its hilt, using his own body weight to press it in. The impact made his teeth rattle, but it also forced the golem to its knees and startled the others around it.

Before they could react his right hand flashed up and he fired his pistol faster than he ever had before, his enhanced reflexes and movement speed causing it to cycle so fast that he was fairly certain it was at its mechanical limit.

When he'd fired at them before, the bullets had practically been ignored. But that was when he hadn't known their weakness.

This time most of the rounds impacted on their eyes, causing the red glow to die in each one that he shot.

He unleashed bursts, his finger moving too fast for him to switch targets. It was a mistake, he knew, but it was one he could rectify on the next magazine. Either way, three of the nearest golems lost their eyes before they'd even realized he was there.

He wrenched the blade sideways as hard as he could with his wolf hand, nearly severing the head of the golem he was standing on and leaving it hanging at an odd angle as the creature staggered forward.

James jumped up onto Steve again.

"NAPALM!" He commanded, and Steve unleashed his breath attack again as he reloaded.

He looked up as a shadow fell over in him.

Just in time for the now one eyed flyer to slam into him. It bore him to the ground with bone breaking force, literally as James felt his sword arm crack and the blade flew out of his grip. Steve was likewise knocked onto his side, his flames momentarily aiming upwards into the sky as his aim was thrown off from the impact.

"Enough tricks boy!" It snarled at him as it brought its arm back to hit him.

"It wasn't a trick!" He yelled back. "My arm is goddam public knowledge! But how 'bout this?!?"

James breathed deathbolts directly into the golem's face even as his newly reloaded pistol pressed against its knee and unloaded its entire magazine point blank.

BOOM!

James skidded across the dirt, grass and melted snow, and out from under the now toppled golem leader, leaving a trail of smoking ground and a small crater behind him before rolling to a stop.

He tried to stand up on shaky legs before falling back to a knee. His arm throbbed from the break that had his hand hanging limply. He set the pistol down for a moment as he looked over at where the flyer was already beginning to pick itself up.

He grabbed his wolf arm by the wrist.

He gritted his teeth. "Eeergh." He groaned. "This is gonna suck."

He took a deep breath.

And set the broken fur coated arm.

"FFFFFFUCK!" He yelled through his clenched teeth.

But the regenerative properties of the arm were already getting to work, and the pain began to fade almost immediately.

James picked up his pistol and dropped the magazine. He gingerly placed it in his opposite armpit and pressed a new magazine into the grip. Then he grabbed it and slammed the bottom of the mag against his leg. He hit the switch on the side and the slide snapped shut, chambering a round in the process.

"Round three bitch." He said as he stood up again and began running toward the flyer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wjh2xr/wait_is_this_just_gate_201/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (199.5/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Back that garbage truck on up and tip the bucket. Cause we're at the dump.

THE LORE DUMP!

Again, this is mainly so that I can devote a bit more brainstorming/writing to chapter 200, and so that it can drop on either friday or saturday.

Ready for some..... forbidden knowledge? Relax it's only forbidden because it falls outside the scope of what any of the established characters know/bring to the story. Or it's just something they haven't had reason to reveal in their own narratives.

These aren't actual IN WORLD historical documents or anything, I'm not gonna pretend they are. They're literally just me giving you guys details so you can have some context on different things.

Anyway HEREWEGO!

Enjoy.

\~

Subject #1: Earth.

The Earth of the setting is vastly different than the one we know of IRL. Namely the story takes place roughly 25\~ years in the future, and society exists in the aftermath of a globally inclusive war that was primarily for control of sources of water. This escalating set of conflicts, ultimately culminating in a series of tactical nuclear detonations and numerous destroyed cities, came to be known as the Water Wars.

The Water Wars not only involved almost every country on the planet, but also drastically rearranged the borders on the maps. Numerous weaker countries were either conquered or else absorbed into their larger, stronger neighbors. On top of that, more than a few small coastline or island countries were destroyed outright.

America, home of James and more than a few other focal characters, has likewise been changed by the wars.

Most of the west coast has been destroyed by attacks from a combination of Chinese and Russian attacks, as well as raids from Polynesian Insurgents who had already had a troubled past with the U.S. Military.

Los Angeles, once the largest port in the country, was a prime target for enemy attack and was destroyed outright. All that remains is a massive, glassy, crater of irradiated land and burned superstructure. The resulting inflow of ocean water has resulted in it being called the L.A. Bay.

San Diego, a crucial military strong hold in the Water Wars, Suffered a startlingly similar fate. However the Military was able to fortify its positions there AND intercept incoming attacks effectively enough to prevent complete devastation. The once vibrant city became a deadly battlefield, with land, air, and sea battles that would last several years before culminating in a successful defense. However, only a very small civilian population is left in what is now one of the strongest Military Posts on the West Coast.

Seattle followed San Diego's lead and fortified itself almost beyond recognition, attempting to hold off attacks from the same militaries. But a well placed nuclear strike from a Chinese submarine resulted in a lack of viable options for transporting land goods to support the besieged city, resulting in one of the costliest sieges in the war. To the surprise of their attackers, Seattle prevailed, and ever since its citizens carried great pride in the resolve they showed.

San Francisco remained remarkably untouched throughout the war. Many people think that this may be a result of the large population of Chinese Immigrants that were known to live in the city before hostilities became open, however that has never been confirmed. Whatever the case most Americans, especially Water War veterans, look at San Fransisco with intense suspicion to this day. More than a few bar fights have broken out over the subject.

Moving away from the west coast. The center of America was called upon as it hadn't been since World War Two. Farms were devoted to producing mass quantities of food and materials both to support the war effort, and to feed and clothe the civilian population that was rapidly fleeing inland from the coasts to escape the violence and devastation. Factories popped up seemingly overnight to produce everything from weapons and armor for the troops, to cots and instant shelters for refugees.

Many cities in the central states were overwhelmed by the influx of refugees and became massive shanty towns that have yet to recover. But several, like Denver, Topeka, and Minneapolis managed to adapt to the change. Most impressive was Detroit. Once the butt of jokes for its crime rate, deserted buildings, failed economy, and poor living quality, the Motor City saw the biggest resurgence. Once empty buildings were filled with new residents. Plants and factories were brought to life to produce what they'd once produced en masse, vehicles. Vehicles from the newly repopulated Detroit became the backbone of the military's mobile forces. Even in the aftermath of the war, Detroit has clung to its renewed title as the Motor City.

The east coast, while not as devastated as the west, was still devastated by the war. While opposing forces, such as the somewhat allied Russian and Chinese navies were capable of engaging in strikes on the coast, most of their western (our eastern) focus was on holding off the combined forces of the European and African Alliance forces. However America still came under attack from the two Communist states, as well as attacks from, of all places, South America. This multi direction conflict was largely rebuffed by the incredibly condensed forces of the various military bases on the east coast, though it did ultimately result in nuclear strikes against New York, Florida, and most devastatingly Washington D.C.

The Water Wars lasted the better part of two decades for the U.S., starting in the late 2020's and for some countries lasting well into the 2040's, only seeing a decline in combat once numerous nuclear strikes across the globe took several former super powers to the brink of actually utilizing M.A.D. and wiping the planet clean of livable land.

This escalation, and increasing civilian deaths and their resulting riots ultimately brought the war to its end. Each nation being forced to choose between either continuing to fight, and risking their governmental dissolution as a result Or ceasing the violence, and turning inward to repair their damage, and utilize newfound technologies to attempt a recovery. Not all of them were capable of doing so, and several countries saw massive reforms into new governmental organizations, the most drastic of which was the massive number of southeast Asian countries that ended up conglomerating as they pushed back against both American AND Chinese control as well as solidified their hold on the ocean around their borders.

Current America, where a lot of our characters are from and work for, is a vastly different country than we currently know. Some parts look like 40k hive cities, while other parts look like they've been ripped straight from a fallout game. For many, like James and a lot of the desert team, joining the military was the best way to ensure themselves a future that didn't require fighting for every scrap of food and drop of water they could get.

\[Writer's note: That should give you guys a good idea of the world James and the Earth gang came from. It's incomplete, as I'm not a Poli-Sci major or anything. Plus, you really only need to know how this stuff fits into James's back story. Since he's kinda the main character if you haven't noticed. And it is kind of the KEY difference between OUR world and theirs. Anyways, moving on.\]

\---

Subject #2: The world of Petravus.

For the record, the world of Petravus doesn't actually have a name. The people there understand the concept of celestial bodies AKA planets and moons and things. And they have named those things, just like we have (RIP Pluto, you're still a planet to me buddy). But they haven't named their planet, typically simply referring to is as "The World". IDK what yall expected here. We call our planet "Dirt".

\-Sub-subject: Were-folk.

There's tons of were-folk the world over. Probably a few million during the point of time the story is set in.

Wolves ARE the most populous of them. As mentioned in recent chapters, primarily because their instincts are a bit harder for them to control during their youthful years, resulting in more incidental bites. AGAIN, unsancioned bites/infections are SUPER TABOO amongst were-folk

A were-folks truest weakness is SILVER. Though they can also be killed via; beheading, incineration, crushing, and basically anything that's going to cause massive damage on a level that will overwhelm their regenerative ability. Yall saw Kela get literally disemboweled and she lived, so you know.... it takes a lot... to get past that.

Also there's a spell, that's super old, and wont come into play in the story. Certain rare, high power, casters know it. The Lunar Council knows it for REASONS. But it is possible to cut a were-person off from the moon's power. Resulting in them being reverted to their non beast form and being INCREDIBLY weakened for the rest of their lives. (Think, fire-lord once he lost his bending. ATLA rules!)

That being said, HERE'S A LIST OF ALL THE BEAST TYPES THAT HAVE A WERE-FOLK FORM (or at least our world's equivalent) arranged from most common to rarest.

1. Wolves
2. Lions
3. Tigers
4. Boars
5. Foxes
6. Jaguars/Panthers
7. Giraffes (They're a touch different though. Probably not gonna elaborate.)
8. Gorillas (Typically red or gold furred.)
9. Squirrels (including rare "flying" variants)
10. Bears
11. Deer
12. Golden Eagles
13. Lynxes
14. Tapirs (Actually thought to be extinct, though that's not confirmed.)
15. Pangolin (Currently only 1 exists.)

\-Sub-Subject #2: MAGIC (I know yall want more details on that)

The simplest way to explain Magic in this setting is to say that it is THE PUREST version of mind over matter.

It taps into the ambient magical energy that infuses every aspect of the world, from the world itself, the more mundane energies that we Earth type folk would know, thermal, hydro, wind, electricity, all that stuff. But also on more esoteric energies such as death, the moon, the soul of the person casting >!(or being sacrificed, but that's a surprise tool that we'll need later)!< And as such a person who gets good at drawing in this energy Cough Cough JAMES Cough Cough can become very powerful very quickly.

Once energy has been drawn in a skilled mage/caster can basically do (to a limited extent) anything they can imagine. However they DO have to imagine it in relation to their own body and location. Also, the more complex and powerful the spell the more energy is required to pull it off.

THE BIG LIMITATION ON MAGIC.... is the fact that certain powers clash with numerous factors in the world around the person casting them. These factors can include things like; rules put in place by gods/other more powerful entities, other magical effects in the area, chemical substances in the area, whether or not other casters are drawing from the same energy source, and of course basic physics (Sorry, but James is never gonna explode his way to light speed. Yeah, I know, it'd be dope as hell.)

Now, the workaround for these limitations is rituals and material aides. Believe it or not, Everyone's favorite little red headed mage is actually afraid of heights. This puts a huge damper on her ability to use her flight magic because it gets all up in her visualization process. That's why she has the magical tattoos on her legs. They act like energy stabilizers for those times when she gets inside her own head and freaks out, and basically keep her from falling to her death. They also allow her to fly faster on less energy, cause (quoting Vickers here) she's wicked smaht.

But that's a very mundane, minimal, example of material aides for magic. What about rituals?

Well, rituals are basically a caster's way of asking the gods/forces of nature to let them break rules for a spell. The most obvious examples of this idea are Kela's transformation into a champion, which drew the Moon Goddess's attention directly AND... James getting Steve bonded to his soul. Soul alteration magic like that is super difficult and watched over by an CURRENTLY unnamed extra-dimensional deity. But the tattoo and the bonding process of actually taming a dragon-kin is used as a sort of combo of physical material, physical pain, and a show of courage from the attempted rider. Plus it does have the caveat of shared pain and the drake dying if its rider does.

\-Sub-Subject #Tres: The Deep Dark

Now I don't wanna SPOIL too much. But very soon we are going to get a much more in depth look at this mysterious realm.

It is pretty much just the Great Value Brand ^(TM) version of the Underdark from D&D. I'm not even gonna deny it.

However where the Underdark is primarily run by dark elves and their spider/drider simpy boiz. The deep dark is actually mostly run by the monsters inhabiting it. What few bastions of "Civilization" exist in the deep are primarily just defensive strong holds chosen for their ability to either hide from the monsters, or give a massive defensive advantage to whoever is in control of it.

The most common denizens of the deep dark are Deep Orcs, Dwelfs (Google it), goblins, Yarbogs (Basically spiny hobgoblins), and of course Dark Elves.

I will say that Dark Elves are actually homies. They're like, the one faction in the Deep Dark that aren't INHERENTLY evil. Don't get me wrong, their elves, they're gonna be judgmental, but... they're alright. They've also got some other stuff going on that we'll get to later.

Then of course there's the fact that THE AGENCY likes to set its most secretive of locations in the deep dark. That said, as Vickers and the Petravian investigators/mages found out. THEY BUNKER UP HAAAAARD. If Vickers hadn't been walking behind an undead MS PAINT erase tool he wouldn't have gotten to where he was going. Not many things can.

Also, some of y'all were right about the Agency's little meeting room/treasury. It was full of poisonous gas that was heavier than normal air, and the whole place was designed to keep that stuff trapped there. Funny thing is. It wouldn't have killed Vickers. Least not for a few more months. Yall know enough to know why. Just gotta think about it.

\---

That's all I got for you guys in this INFODUMP chapter. We'll be resuming tomorrow and MAYBE Saturday. Chapter 200 (yay me) is gonna be FIGHT NIGHT!

And if yall think James was OP before, just remember that in most of the fights he's been in up until now, he's been either too weak (magically) or too inexperienced to actually use his full skill set.

That aint gonna be the case in this next chapter. Shit's gonna go off the rails.

Queue up whatever anime sakuga scene music you want. Or heavy metal. Or hardcore, OG West Coast (none of that weak ass east coast garbage) gangster rap you like to listen to during fight sequences and boss fights.

Because that same thing I said about James's fighting style..... is gonna be applied to my fight scene writing style.

Looking forward to writing it guys. Still have no idea when we're gonna replace the question mark in the title numbers.

[\[Back to the story\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wiurmu/wait_is_this_just_gate_200/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (199/?)

Previous

Writer's note: LET'S GET READY TO RRRUUUUUMMMMBBBLLLLEEEE!!!!

Enjoy.

PS: I kinda want chapter 200 (W00T) to be a bit longer. So I'm probably gonna have tomorrow be a (.5) chapter where I do a tiny bit of lore dumping. Just kinda, fill yall in on some stuff, and maybe answer some questions you didn't know you had. >!Don't worry, I'm not gonna go full JK Rowling on you.!< Then I'm probably gonna release the 200th chapter either late friday or early saturday.

\~

James recognized the enemies surrounding him as he and Steve rode and fought.

He'd seen one similar to them in the footage of Vickers' encounter with the agency. These looked different, but they had the same glowing eyes and their basic structure was more or less the same.

Golems.

Vickers had blasted a series of rounds into the head and chest of the one he'd dealt with and dropped it immediately.

These ones were clearly made of something tougher. He'd already loosed several rounds from his pistol at one, only for them to bounce off of its hard exterior, leaving little more than chips on the things hide. He'd quickly holstered the pistol in favor of his magic.

On top of that, Steve's flames had done little more than blacken the one that James had unleashed him upon first. It had still fallen back, but only for a moment.

Now he was dealing with eight of the damned things.

James and Steve ran, hoping to get away from the massive, armored, damage resistant monstrosities and their glowing eyes. He'd expected them to be slow. They were golems after all, anyone who'd ever played any kind of fantasy game knew that golems were slow, tough, tank monsters.

These things apparently hadn't gotten the message on the first part.

Once he'd realized the disadvantage he was up against James had ordered Steve to charge THROUGH the golem that they'd burned. The creature had barely staggered from the impact with the drake that was nearly three times its size. And James had felt an impact on his shoulder that felt like he'd tackled part of the King's castle.

But there'd been nothing he could do, so he'd simply ordered Steve to keep going, despite his anger at the opponent.

Then the golems had begun sprinting, and they had NOT been slow.

And one of them had begun FLYING.

James put the jittering sword away for a moment and reached into the bottomless bag that he had on the back of his right shoulder, retrieving his rifle in the hopes that the larger caliber weapon would have some effect, though he doubted it.

He also pulled out his phone with his left hand and began rapidly typing, hoping that his signal hadn't been taken away again.

>sosambush by golems like agency thing1 day from reaching gald-whatever village on way to castlegoing to continue tocpitalwill avoid village8 aholes 1 of em flys.bullets/fire not working.on runhelp.

He was temporarily distracted as one of the golems got next to him and Steve and swung its massive limb out at him.

He focused his magic on his eyes and the arm slowed to a crawl as his right hand rose up, leaving the rifle hanging from its strap. He began lowering back and away from the attack, counting on his saddle to hold him on as he practically laid flat.

The attack missed him by centimeters as he ducked under it. As soon as it passed James blasted a deathbolt into the creatures flank, causing it to bring the arm up to protect itself from the inky blue lightning.

He quickly glanced down at the phone still in his left hand.

>asap would be cool

He hit send and dropped the phone into a pouch on his belt just in time to send a blast of highly compressed air through a tree that one of the golems had leapt into, blasting the tree to pieces and sending both of them tumbling to the ground.

"You motherfuckers are in for a show." He said through gritted teeth as he picked up his rifle again.

\--------------------------

Amina and Vickers had barely reached the outskirts of the city when Vickers' tablet began buzzing.

At first it was just the two buzzes to indicate an incoming text. He slowed Tom down a bit so he could check it, but before he could it began rapidly buzzing with call.

"What's going on?" Amina asked curiously from behind him.

"I don't know." He admitted as he pulled the device out of his saddle bag.

"Go ahead and land while you're at it." She said, pointing over his shoulder at one of the city guard posts. "I can get a griffin there and we can let Tom rest for a bit." Vickers nodded as he absently angled Tom down toward the post.

He looked at the tablet to see that Command was calling.

"What the hell?" He asked as he hit the green button.

Colonel Muhammed was on the camera, it lagged a bit as the tablet struggled with its weak connection.

"Vickers where are you?" She asked.

"Just getting to the capital ma'am. Choi and I split up so I could rush the princess here." He replied. "What's going on?"

She looked at Amina, whose head was over his shoulder to look at the tablet. She switched to English.

"\[Choi is in trouble. Some kind of ambush. He said that he was about a day from some...\]" She looked at one of the techs in the room. "\[Gaaaldwaesh village?\]" She said hesitantly. "\[Something like that. Apparently his weapons are proving ineffective and he's on the run. How fast can you get there?\]"

"\[Two days.\]" Amina responded before Vickers could. At the Colonel's shocked expression she added. "\[It's rude to intentionally cut someone out of a conversation Colonel.\]"

The Colonel clenched her jaw before resuming in Petravian.

"Regardless. He's in trouble." She said, just as Tom touched down. "He needs help, he's even asked for it himself."

"Shit." Vickers said as Amina hopped off of Tom's back. Tom immediately sank down to the ground and began panting.

"You there. Sergeant!" Amina shouted at the guards that were already rushing over. "You have griffins right?"

"Aye General!" The soldier in question, a fish scaled man responded with a salute.

"Fetch one and bring it here, saddled and ready!" She commanded. "And bring some feed and water for this one!"

The soldier, as well as several others rushed to follow the orders.

Vickers was busy pulling gear from Tom's saddle bags.

"I got him ma'am. Let me just button some stuff up here." He said to the tablet.

"Double time it chief." The Colonel responded before cutting her feed.

"Eh. I can do a little better than double." Vickers said as he pulled out the fire suppression launcher and a pouch full of rounds for it and transferred them to his own bottomless bag. Then he reached into the saddlebag again and pulled out several familiar white bricks. He kissed one before also putting them in his bag.

A few moments later he walked over to Amina who was speaking to the Sergeant again as one of the other soldiers was walking over the requested griffin.

"Aight princess. This is where we part ways. Get Tom back to the stables for me yeah?" He said as he checked the chamber on his pistol and stretching his legs.

"What?" She asked as she looked at him confused. "What are you talking about?"

Vickers let out a quick sigh as he continued stretching.

"Choi sent you with me so you could get back here faster and respond to whatever is going on with the weird shit." He said with a hint of exasperation. "So, that's what's gonna happen. Get to the capital. I got Choi."

"You don't even know what you're heading into." She said. "And he's nearly two days away by griffin. Also, WHY are you stretching?"

"Because I aint takin' a griffin." He replied. "Also, heading into shit I don't know about is literally what I'm trained for. Plus I know more about what I'm heading into than you do. They're more of those weird golem things I already killed one of. At least according to Choi's message. And this time," He paused as he pulled out his rifle and checked it's magazine. "I aint tryin to be stealthy about it." Satisfied with the rifle's status, he put it back in it's bottomless bag. He actually liked that idea, though he wouldn't admit it to Choi.

Before she could respond Vickers was sprinting, as fast as she'd seen James run, back the direction they'd just come from.

"Are you going with him ma'am?" The Sergeant asked, reminding her of his presence.

She looked back to see him holding the reins of the griffin.

She was conflicted.

On the one hand her people needed her. Her father and the troops needed her. There was a disaster near Jadesport.... again. And the Blight was active again.

But on the other hand James was in danger..... also again. And if it was from some kind of golem like Vickers had implied, then that also implied the Agency being involved. After all, Golems weren't natural occurrences.

"Is Prince Alixan still in the city?" She asked.

"Believe so General." The Sergeant replied. "But I'm not certain."

She took the reins from him.

"Get that griffin taken care of and take him to the castle stables as soon as you can." She said as she mounted the new one. Send word that there's an attack of some kind near Geyldwsh Village. Mobilize any guards in the area."

"Aye ma'am." The Sergeant said as he ran to the nearby building that was their watch post.

Amina took to the air and flew to the castle.

She had to trust James to be as powerful and lucky as he had proven to be so far.

\----------

Vickers wasn't actually certain of his newfound speed. He'd seen Choi run a few times before and knew that he could go damn near fast enough to be highway legal.

He had no illusions that he was faster than a griffin either. But the idea of riding any griffin other than Tom just felt like a betrayal of their bond. He knew that was foolish, but human emotions were finicky like that.

He also knew that in terms of stamina, Choi would smoke him. It was odd to acknowledge that. But Choi was a marathon runner. Vickers was too, but he'd only ever done one marathon and it had just been to say he did it, and he'd felt like dying after. Whereas Choi had done them recreationally.

That said, Vickers was, in his own terms, hauling ass.

While he had to admit that Choi could beat him in stamina when it came to running. Vickers was built for speed. He'd always been quick off the line back in his younger, sports focused, days. And that trend had continued after his military career had started.

He couldn't be sure, but he thought that his newfound, magically enhanced, speed was getting him up to almost eighty miles per hour.

I'm on my way ya little grunt. He thought as he flew past a wagon of some kind, startling its driver.

\----------

Typically if James was in a fight, he'd want to find some cover or concealment. That was just Army combat training 101 when you were engaged.

But James wasn't fighting like a soldier. He was fighting with a mixture of magic, and swipes of his Mage's blade.

Oh, and he was riding on the back of a forty foot tall, fire breathing, lizard.

So cover and especially concealment weren't really options.

Instead he needed to do something at least mildly illogical and get these things out in the open. Steve was just fast enough that he'd managed to pull away from the massive creatures, minus the flying one, which had yet to move in and engage. But Steve couldn't ESCAPE them. They were keeping up just enough that as long as they coordinated, which they seemed preternaturally good at, they could still get the occasional hit in.

The attacks took all their effort, and seemed to favor simply punches, slams, and grab attempts. But they would rotate. Whenever one of them slowed long enough to attempt an attack, another would come flying in from a different direction.

James had to let the mages blade point him towards whichever one was coming in. It's hunger to devour sources of magic that were targeting him meant that it was constantly pulling his sword hand towards incoming attacks. His wolf hand was doing a good job of keeping a hold of it. Whenever it would pull in a different direction James would turn that way and hit the attacker with deathbolts or blasts of air if they were in a tree.

His eyes glowed with the magic of his reflex enhancing vision, making the creatures look as though they were moving only about two thirds of their normal speed.

Even still, they were getting closer.

He needed to find an open field to remove some of their mobility, and get them where his rifle might be able to track them easier. He'd had to let it hang after he'd realized that he had too many targets in too many directions for it to be effective in the thick foliage of the forest as they moved. But the one burst of shots he had gotten off had at least proven deadlier to the creatures. One of them had an arm hanging limply at its side, having taken three rounds to its shoulder and chest.

Unfortunately, that hadn't stopped the golem from continuing to attack.

James tilted to the side, kicking on the left side a bit to get Steve to follow. Steve quickly jumped sideways, narrowly dodging a slam attack from one of the golems as it leaped at them from a tree on the side James hadn't been looking at.

Steve instinctively spun, whipping his tail at the creature to try and knock it over. But his tail stopped dead and he roared in anger as James felt an impact on his own tail bone.

"AAAGH!" He yelled. "No more slams boy!" He shouted at Steve as he kicked him back into movement and simultaneously hit the golem with deathbolts. The outer skin, or maybe it was chitin he wasn't sure, scorched and blackened where they hit. But the golem didn't seem to mind too much as it recovered from its attack.

James turned and sent a blast of air scything out at a tree that one of the golems was jumping toward, cutting its limbs off and sending the golem skidding as it landed on a tree that didn't have any holds for it.

Then he saw light.

He kicked Steve towards the light, knowing that it had to be the edge of the forest.

He cried out in pain as he felt a phantom pain in his shoulder and looked back to see what looked like a spike sticking out of Steve's shoulder. It wasn't big, but it was definitely a new attack that the creatures hadn't been using before.

He looked up and saw one of the monsters standing a few yards away, it was pulling its arm back as if it was going to throw something.

James instinctively grabbed the rifle and let loose a burst just as the golem released its attack.

His three rounds slammed into the throwing arm, hoping to cripple it and prevent more of the ranged attacks.

James's enhanced vision saw the nearly foot long spike, seemingly made out of the golem's own body mass, flying toward them.

He tried to kick Steve into motion. But he knew it was too late.

Pain exploded in his mind as the spike slammed into his calf, impaling it and also pinning it to Steve's ribs.

Steve and James both spasmed as they both took double doses of the pain the attack inflicted.

Then a massive fist slammed into Steve's ribs on the other side, missing James's OTHER leg only because of how the drake had bucked from the spike.

James felt a pain that he was certain had broken his ribs on the matching side.

"RIDE!" He yelled, kicking with the only good leg he had left. "FUCK!"

He dropped the rifle again and lashed out with the foot that was on the side that had just been slammed.

BOOM!

An explosion emanated from the foot, and for the first time James saw one of the attackers actually get thrown back, landing on its back. He felt pain shoot through his leg as the violent recoil of the detonation, usually used to propel him through the air, wrenched his knee violently into Steve's side.

Then as Steve continued running for the light, James watched the golem slowly pick itself back up, seemingly unscathed.

As Steve finally got to the clearing James gripped the spike in his leg, wincing as Steve's movement jostled it sending pain coursing up the limb, and wrenched it out with his wolf hand.

Blood spurted from the, startlingly neat, hole in his leg. James dropped the, luckily narrow, spike and an amber glow engulfed his wolf hand as he poured healing magic into the leg. Slowly, the blood flow slowed, until eventually it stopped entirely.

He knew he would need more healing than that. But for now, simply not bleeding out would be fine. Steve needed healing more, and he quickly transitioned the healing spell over to the drakes side.

He felt his sword pulling against where it was resting under some of the packing on his saddle and turned to see something concerning.

The flying golem was finally moving in.

At least now they were in the open. James hoped that was the right move as he grabbed his rifle again and swiveled to try and get a shot on the massive, winged, monstrosity.

But it was gone.

In fact, he didn't see any of the creatures.

"What the fuck?" He asked.

And then Steve skidded to a halt. James turned to see what was happening.

"Well, shit." He said to himself.

Standing only a few hundred yards or so in front of him, were the entire contingent of golems. In fact, he thought that there might've even been a few extra. The flyer was flapping its wings as it hovered above them.

And they all looked good as new.

The flyer's eyes flared, their red glow intensifying.

And they all began charging towards him simultaneously.

James slid off of Steve's saddle, drawing a confused look from the winded drake.

"Stay here boy." He said as he patted Steve's side. "In fact." He said as he looked at the drakes confused face. "Better yet, head back to the capital. Get to safety."

Steve continued looking at him. James slapped him on the side.

"Go." He said softly. "I got this."

Steve looked back at the approaching golems. Then back at James. His neck puffed out for a moment and he blew piping hot air at James, ruffling his hair. Then he turned back forward and James felt the heat rise around him as his chest began to rumble.

"Alright then. Stay." James said, realizing that that was what Steve meant to do. "But don't fuckin die on me."

The Golems were already halfway.

"I gotta stop gettin into shit like this." He said to himself as he raised the rifle and sighted the first target. The rifle's cross-hairs settled on the flyer's face.

James squeezed the trigger.

[\[Lore Dump Chapter\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wgdz40/wait_is_this_just_gate_1995/) [\[Next Actual Chapter\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wiurmu/wait_is_this_just_gate_200/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (199/?)

Previous / First

Writer's note: LET'S GET READY TO RRRUUUUUMMMMBBBLLLLEEEE!!!!

Enjoy.

^(PS: If you have ACTUAL criticism, I'm all ears. If you're just being a jerk I will shut that shit down. Most of y'all are chill in this regard. Also, this goes for any story/writer, not just me and mine. I do this because I enjoy it. And that's the only reason I NEED to continue doing it.)

^(Alright. Soapbox over. Back to the story.)

Edit and PPS: I kinda want chapter 200 (W00T) to be a bit longer. So I'm probably gonna have tomorrow be a (.5) chapter where I do a tiny bit of lore dumping. Just kinda, fill yall in on some stuff, and maybe answer some questions you didn't know you had. >!Don't worry, I'm not gonna go full JK Rowling on you.!< Then I'm probably gonna release the 200th chapter either late friday or early saturday.

\~

James recognized the enemies surrounding him as he and Steve rode and fought.

He'd seen one similar to them in the footage of Vickers' encounter with the agency. These looked different, but they had the same glowing eyes and their basic structure was more or less the same.

Golems.

Vickers had blasted a series of rounds into the head and chest of the one he'd dealt with and dropped it immediately.

These ones were clearly made of something tougher. He'd already loosed several rounds from his pistol at one, only for them to bounce off of its hard exterior, leaving little more than chips on the things hide. He'd quickly holstered the pistol in favor of his magic.

On top of that, Steve's flames had done little more than blacken the one that James had unleashed him upon first. It had still fallen back, but only for a moment.

Now he was dealing with eight of the damned things.

James and Steve ran, hoping to get away from the massive, armored, damage resistant monstrosities and their glowing eyes. He'd expected them to be slow. They were golems after all, anyone who'd ever played any kind of fantasy game knew that golems were slow, tough, tank monsters.

These things apparently hadn't gotten the message on the first part.

Once he'd realized the disadvantage he was up against James had ordered Steve to charge THROUGH the golem that they'd burned. The creature had barely staggered from the impact with the drake that was nearly three times its size. And James had felt an impact on his shoulder that felt like he'd tackled part of the King's castle.

But there'd been nothing he could do, so he'd simply ordered Steve to keep going, despite his anger at the opponent.

Then the golems had begun sprinting, and they had NOT been slow.

And one of them had begun FLYING.

James put the jittering sword away for a moment and reached into the bottomless bag that he had on the back of his right shoulder, retrieving his rifle in the hopes that the larger caliber weapon would have some effect, though he doubted it.

He also pulled out his phone with his left hand and began rapidly typing, hoping that his signal hadn't been taken away again.

>sos
>
>ambush by golems like agency thing
>
>1 day from reaching gald-whatever village on way to castle
>
>going to continue tocpital
>
>will avoid village
>
>8 aholes 1 of em flys.
>
>bullets/fire not working.
>
>on run
>
>help.

He was temporarily distracted as one of the golems got next to him and Steve and swung its massive limb out at him.

He focused his magic on his eyes and the arm slowed to a crawl as his right hand rose up, leaving the rifle hanging from its strap. He began lowering back and away from the attack, counting on his saddle to hold him on as he practically laid flat.

The attack missed him by centimeters as he ducked under it. As soon as it passed James blasted a deathbolt into the creatures flank, causing it to bring the arm up to protect itself from the inky blue lightning.

He quickly glanced down at the phone still in his left hand.

>asap would be cool

He hit send and dropped the phone into a pouch on his belt just in time to send a blast of highly compressed air through a tree that one of the golems had leapt into, blasting the tree to pieces and sending both of them tumbling to the ground.

"You motherfuckers are in for a show." He said through gritted teeth as he picked up his rifle again.

\--------------------------

Amina and Vickers had barely reached the outskirts of the city when Vickers' tablet began buzzing.

At first it was just the two buzzes to indicate an incoming text. He slowed Tom down a bit so he could check it, but before he could it began rapidly buzzing with call.

"What's going on?" Amina asked curiously from behind him.

"I don't know." He admitted as he pulled the device out of his saddle bag.

"Go ahead and land while you're at it." She said, pointing over his shoulder at one of the city guard posts. "I can get a griffin there and we can let Tom rest for a bit." Vickers nodded as he absently angled Tom down toward the post.

He looked at the tablet to see that Command was calling.

"What the hell?" He asked as he hit the green button.

Colonel Muhammed was on the camera, it lagged a bit as the tablet struggled with its weak connection.

"Vickers where are you?" She asked.

"Just getting to the capital ma'am. Choi and I split up so I could rush the princess here." He replied. "What's going on?"

She looked at Amina, whose head was over his shoulder to look at the tablet. She switched to English.

"\[Choi is in trouble. Some kind of ambush. He said that he was about a day from some...\]" She looked at one of the techs in the room. "\[Gaaaldwaesh village?\]" She said hesitantly. "\[Something like that. Apparently his weapons are proving ineffective and he's on the run. How fast can you get there?\]"

"\[Two days.\]" Amina responded before Vickers could. At the Colonel's shocked expression she added. "\[It's rude to intentionally cut someone out of a conversation Colonel.\]"

The Colonel clenched her jaw before resuming in Petravian.

"Regardless. He's in trouble." She said, just as Tom touched down. "He needs help, he's even asked for it himself."

"Shit." Vickers said as Amina hopped off of Tom's back. Tom immediately sank down to the ground and began panting.

"You there. Sergeant!" Amina shouted at the guards that were already rushing over. "You have griffins right?"

"Aye General!" The soldier in question, a fish scaled man responded with a salute.

"Fetch one and bring it here, saddled and ready!" She commanded. "And bring some feed and water for this one!"

The soldier, as well as several others rushed to follow the orders.

Vickers was busy pulling gear from Tom's saddle bags.

"I got him ma'am. Let me just button some stuff up here." He said to the tablet.

"Double time it chief." The Colonel responded before cutting her feed.

"Eh. I can do a little better than double." Vickers said as he pulled out the fire suppression launcher and a pouch full of rounds for it and transferred them to his own bottomless bag. Then he reached into the saddlebag again and pulled out several familiar white bricks. He kissed one before also putting them in his bag.

A few moments later he walked over to Amina who was speaking to the Sergeant again as one of the other soldiers was walking over the requested griffin.

"Aight princess. This is where we part ways. Get Tom back to the stables for me yeah?" He said as he checked the chamber on his pistol and began stretching his legs.

"What?" She asked as she looked at him confused. "What are you talking about?"

Vickers let out a quick sigh as he continued stretching.

"Choi sent you with me so you could get back here faster and respond to whatever is going on with the weird shit." He said with a hint of exasperation. "So, that's what's gonna happen. Get to the capital. I got Choi."

"You don't even know what you're heading into." She said. "And he's nearly two days away by griffin. Also, WHY are you stretching?"

"Because I aint takin' a griffin." He replied. "Also, heading into shit I don't know about is literally what I'm trained for. Plus I know more about what I'm heading into than you do. They're more of those weird golem things I already killed one of. At least according to Choi's message. And this time," He paused as he pulled out his rifle and checked

it's magazine. "I aint tryin to be stealthy about it." Satisfied with the rifle's status, he put it back in it's bottomless bag. He actually liked that idea, though he wouldn't admit it to Choi.

Before she could respond Vickers was sprinting, as fast as she'd seen James run, back the direction they'd just come from.

"Are you going with him ma'am?" The Sergeant asked, reminding her of his presence.

She looked back to see him holding the reins of the griffin.

She was conflicted.

On the one hand her people needed her. Her father and the troops needed her. There was a disaster near Jadesport.... again. And the Blight was active again.

But on the other hand James was in danger..... also again. And if it was from some kind of golem like Vickers had implied, then that also implied the Agency being involved. After all, Golems weren't natural occurrences.

"Is Prince Alixan still in the city?" She asked.

"Believe so General." The Sergeant replied. "But I'm not certain."

She took the reins from him.

"Get that griffin taken care of and take him to the castle stables as soon as you can." She said as she mounted the new one. Send word that there's an attack of some kind near Geyldwsh Village. Mobilize any guards in the area."

"Aye ma'am." The Sergeant said as he ran to the nearby building that was their watch post.

Amina took to the air and flew to the castle.

She had to trust James to be as powerful and lucky as he had proven to be so far.

\----------

Vickers wasn't actually certain of his newfound speed. He'd seen Choi run a few times before and knew that he could go damn near fast enough to be highway legal.

He had no illusions that he was faster than a griffin either. But the idea of riding any griffin other than Tom just felt like a betrayal of their bond. He knew that was foolish, but human emotions were finicky like that.

He also knew that in terms of stamina, Choi would smoke him. It was odd to acknowledge that. But Choi was a marathon runner. Vickers was too, but he'd only ever done one marathon and it had just been to say he did it, and he'd felt like dying after. Whereas Choi had done them recreationally.

That said, Vickers was, in his own terms, hauling ass.

While he had to admit that Choi could beat him in stamina when it came to running. Vickers was built for speed. He'd always been quick off the line back in his younger, sports focused, days. And that trend had continued after his military career had started.

He couldn't be sure, but he thought that his newfound, magically enhanced, speed was getting him up to almost eighty miles per hour.

I'm on my way ya little grunt. He thought as he flew past a wagon of some kind, startling its driver.

\----------

Typically if James was in a fight, he'd want to find some cover or concealment. That was just Army combat training 101 when you were engaged.

But James wasn't fighting like a soldier. He was fighting with a mixture of magic, and swipes of his Mage's blade.

Oh, and he was riding on the back of a forty foot tall, fire breathing, lizard.

So cover and especially concealment weren't really options.

Instead he needed to do something at least mildly illogical and get these things out in the open. Steve was just fast enough that he'd managed to pull away from the massive creatures, minus the flying one, which had yet to move in and engage. But Steve couldn't ESCAPE them. They were keeping up just enough that as long as they coordinated, which they seemed preternaturally good at, they could still get the occasional hit in.

The attacks took all their effort, and seemed to favor simple punches, slams, and grab attempts. But they would rotate. Whenever one of them slowed long enough to attempt an attack, another would come flying in from a different direction.

James had to let the mages blade point him towards whichever one was coming in. It's hunger to devour sources of magic that were targeting him meant that it was constantly pulling his sword hand towards incoming attacks. His wolf hand was doing a good job of keeping a hold of it. Whenever it would pull in a different direction James would turn that way and hit the attacker with deathbolts or blasts of air if they were in a tree.

His eyes glowed with the magic of his reflex enhancing vision, making the creatures look as though they were moving only about two thirds of their normal speed.

Even still, they were getting closer.

He needed to find an open field to remove some of their mobility, and get them where his rifle might be able to track them easier. He'd had to let it hang after he'd realized that he had too many targets in too many directions for it to be effective in the thick foliage of the forest as they moved. But the one burst of shots he had gotten off had at least proven deadlier to the creatures. One of them had an arm hanging limply at its side, having taken three rounds to its shoulder and chest.

Unfortunately, that hadn't stopped the golem from continuing to attack.

James tilted to the side, kicking on the left side a bit to get Steve to follow. Steve quickly jumped sideways, narrowly dodging a slam attack from one of the golems as it leaped at them from a tree on the side James hadn't been looking at.

Steve instinctively spun, whipping his tail at the creature to try and knock it over. But his tail stopped dead and he roared in anger as James felt an impact on his own tail bone.

"AAAGH!" He yelled. "No more slams boy!" He shouted at Steve as he kicked him back into movement and simultaneously hit the golem with deathbolts. The outer skin, or maybe it was chitin he wasn't sure, scorched and blackened where they hit. But the golem didn't seem to mind too much as it recovered from its attack.

James turned and sent a blast of air scything out at a tree that one of the golems was jumping toward, cutting its branches off and sending the golem skidding as it landed on a tree that didn't have any holds for it.

Then he saw light.

He kicked Steve towards the light, knowing that it had to be the edge of the forest.

He cried out in pain as he felt a phantom pain in his shoulder and looked back to see what looked like a spike sticking out of Steve's shoulder. It wasn't big, but it was definitely a new attack that the creatures hadn't been using before.

He looked up and saw one of the monsters standing a few yards away, it was pulling its arm back as if it was going to throw something.

James instinctively grabbed the rifle and let loose a burst just as the golem released its attack.

His three rounds slammed into the throwing arm, hoping to cripple it and prevent more of the ranged attacks.

James's enhanced vision saw the nearly foot long spike, seemingly made out of the golem's own body mass, flying toward them.

He tried to kick Steve into motion. But he knew it was too late.

Pain exploded in his mind as the spike slammed into his calf, impaling it and also pinning it to Steve's ribs.

Steve and James both spasmed as they both took double doses of the pain the attack inflicted.

Then a massive fist slammed into Steve's ribs on the other side, missing James's OTHER leg only because of how the drake had bucked from the spike.

James felt a pain that he was certain had broken his ribs on the matching side.

"RIDE!" He yelled, kicking with the only good leg he had left. "FUCK!"

He dropped the rifle again and lashed out with the foot that was on the side that had just been slammed.

BOOM!

An explosion emanated from the foot, and for the first time James saw one of the attackers actually get thrown back, landing on its back. He felt pain shoot through his leg as the violent recoil of the detonation, usually used to propel him through the air, wrenched his knee violently into Steve's side.

Then as Steve continued running for the light, James watched the golem slowly pick itself back up, seemingly unscathed.

As Steve finally got to the clearing James gripped the spike in his leg, wincing as Steve's movement jostled it sending pain coursing up the limb, and wrenched it out with his wolf hand.

Blood spurted from the, startlingly neat, hole in his leg. James dropped the, luckily narrow, spike and an amber glow engulfed his wolf hand as he poured healing magic into the leg. Slowly, the blood flow slowed, until eventually it stopped entirely.

He knew he would need more healing than that. But for now, simply not bleeding out would be fine. Steve needed healing more, and he quickly transitioned the healing spell over to the drakes side.

He felt his sword pulling against where it was resting under some of the packing on his saddle and turned to see something concerning.

The flying golem was finally moving in.

At least now they were in the open. James hoped that was the right move as he grabbed his rifle again and swiveled to try and get a shot on the massive, winged, monstrosity.

But it was gone.

In fact, he didn't see any of the creatures.

"What the fuck?" He asked.

And then Steve skidded to a halt. James turned to see what was happening.

"Well, shit." He said to himself.

Standing only a few hundred yards or so in front of him was the entire contingent of golems. In fact, he thought that there might've even been a few extra. The flyer was flapping its wings as it hovered above them.

And they all looked good as new.

The flyer's eyes flared, their red glow intensifying.

And they all began charging towards him simultaneously.

James slid off of Steve's saddle, drawing a confused look from the winded drake.

"Stay here boy." He said as he patted Steve's side. "In fact." He said as he looked at the drakes confused face. "Better yet, head back to the capital. Get to safety."

Steve continued looking at him. James slapped him on the side.

"Go." He said softly. "I got this."

Steve looked back at the approaching golems. Then back at James. His neck puffed out for a moment and he blew piping hot air at James, ruffling his hair. Then he turned back forward and James felt the heat rise around him as his chest began to rumble.

"Alright then. Stay." James said, realizing that that was what Steve meant to do. "But don't fuckin die on me."

The Golems were already halfway.

"I gotta stop gettin into shit like this." He said to himself as he raised the rifle and sighted the first target. The rifle's cross-hairs settled on the flyer's face.

James squeezed the trigger.

[\[Lore Dump Chapter\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wgdwum/wait_is_this_just_gate_1995/) [\[Next ACTUAL chapter\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wh74de/wait_is_this_just_gate_200/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (198/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look, action sequences. I love those.

Anyways. Things are moving again. Here's hoping that things don't get too dangerous for our favorite idiot.

>!Little hint: They almost definitely will.!<

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were still luxuriating in each other's company as they continued riding home. Even with the light, cold, drizzle that was falling on them throughout the day.

James and Amina were wearing their rain cloaks, and Steve had been equipped with his canvas cover to help him with the rain, which had always agitated him. Vickers and Tom were a touch less covered. Vickers had simply put on a poncho that he'd gotten as part of his equipment for the raid on the Agency. Tom had no cover at all, but unlike Steve actually seemed to enjoy the rain, much to Vickers' frustration. The griffin would frequently splash in big puddles and puff his feathers up to get the water into the undercoat. This drew no end of laughter from the doting couple as they rode along in peace, watching the typically stoic SEAL get increasingly frustrated with his mount.

Eventually Vickers got frustrated enough that he told James and Amina to give him a minute as he kicked Tom into flight and flew up into the air.

They watched in confusion as the pair flew around in a rapid mixture of climbs, dives, and circles.

"What's he doing?" Amina asked as she watched.

"I think....." James started. "That he's trying to smoke Tom."

"Smoke him?" Amina repeated, confused. "Like with meat?"

"Eeeeeh... sure." James replied, not entirely sure how the term had come into military jargon.

Before he could say anything else he heard the telltale buzzing of his phone going off under his cloak. He didn't notice, but Vickers and Tom suddenly stabilized too.

"Weird." James said as he fished the phone out. "Wonder why Werner gave me signal."

He finally got the phone out and covered with his hand just as Vickers and Tom landed.

"Princess. Hop on." He said sternly. "Choi. You see it?"

"Wha-" James said as he read the text. "Shit." He said before clicking on the video attachment. Amina looked at it over his shoulder.

"Oh no." Amina said as she saw the footage from the camera feeds outside of the blighted zone.

"Get on the griffin." James said. But Amina was already sliding down Steve's side.

"We're close enough. Tom should be able to get us there in two days." Vickers said as he reached down to her hand. "Three if this weather gets any worse."

"I'll only be a couple days behind." James said as he kicked Steve into a run. "Keep her safe Vickers!"

"Roger that." Vickers replied just as Amina got seated behind him. "Ready princess?" He asked.

He felt Amina messing with the back of his belt. He looked back curiously and saw her attaching a clip strap to her own belt, before reaching down and clipping it to his.

"Strapped in." She said. "Let's go."

"Guess I need to get me one of those." Vickers said. "Never thought about clipping in spare riders."

"I'm sure Atrafar would appreciate it." She said with a grin. "Now come on. Let's make haste."

Vickers bit his tongue at the joke. "Come on boy." He said as he kicked Tom back into the air.

\----------

"Your highness." General Krick began. "Typically I'd be viewing your development of weapons as just a bit of a threat."

King Farrick stiffened minutely at the notion, even though he understood it perfectly.

"However. It was almost guaranteed to happen at some point." The General continued. "And given the current circumstances, your people having firearms, even rudimentary ones, will be a boon against the blight possessed."

"Glad to hear on both accounts." The King said. "For the record. Arch Mage Veliry's designs are a result of her own personal research and innovation. Admittedly they are still based on the weapons that she was capable of witnessing both Captain Choi and Chief Vickers use."

"I kind of figured as much sir." General Krick responded. "And I've spoken to the Secretary." He stood up a bit straighter. "We've been approved to have Ambasador Werner give you several designs for somewhat more... effective... weapon designs. They don't take into account the changes that your Arch Mage has made due to the reliability on magic. But they should still give you some ideas to use."

King Farrick nodded. "We are most grateful." He said. "It is good that your cameras, and our scouts, haven't seen any further signs of incursions. With any luck, we should be able to equip sat least SOME of our soldiers with them in time to stop any blight possessed from gaining any ground."

"It is good that the arrows still seemed to have an effect on the one that came through, even if it was only minimal. But the ones that were fired at it weren't vanished." General Krick added.

"Indeed." King Farrick agreed. "That said, that missile devastated the area. Luckily it was only the one this time."

"Yes." General Krick said sadly. "We're currently looking into the signals that we were picking up from that." He ran his fingers through his hair in frustration. "How they got enough control of it to detonate it, I don't know. The fact that it ignored our emergency shut down protocols is even more worrying."

"Well. I don't think we can do too much to help you on that front." The King admitted. "But we'll do what we can. For now we've got a cordon set around the affected area. As soon as we can we'll have them move in and see if anything is recoverable."

"Sounds good. your majesty. I think that's all there is to cover at this time." Krick hit something on his side of the communication. Werner's pad pinged as she received the designs specs with Petravian note translations. "Werner, go ahead and print those out for the mages. Keep us updated on Choi, Vickers, and the princess." He looked back at the camera. "Good luck sir." He said to the King.

And with that, he cut the line.

"Yes sir." She said with a nod right before the signal cut off then she moved over to the small printer that had been sent over a while back and queued up the print job.

Veliry moved over and began looking at the designs before the full print job was even done, grabbing sheets off almost as soon as they printed.

"Guidlines inside a longer barrel?" She asked nobody in particular. She looked off into the distance for a moment as she thought. "That'd stabilize the rounds. Just like an arrow, or James when he was fighting the Elemental."

She grabbed another and looked at it. After a moment she began muttering technical terms as Werner slowly backed away.

"She's like that." The King said. "Will the rest of it print on its own?"

Werner nodded. "Yes your majesty." She replied.

He gave a small smile. "We can leave her to it than. Now, if you don't mind, I need to go begin making arrangements for Jadesport."

He turned and left.

Werner stayed just a moment longer as Veliry continued furiously studying the printouts before also retreating from the room.

Veliry didn't even notice. "Why would you drill holes in the barrel?" She asked nobody. "And why wouldn't you use something more durable than flint?" She shook her head. "Doesn't matter. My design doesn't require an external spark source anyways."

\---

"So the hero is alone?" One of the Agency's members asked as they met once again. "We're sure?"

"One of our agents saw his body guard land at a town with the princess, but not with him." Replied the communication pool that one of their currently unavailable members was using to take part. "They believe that something may have called her back to the capital faster. Apparently she seemed quite frantic to stay moving."

"Most likely due to the explosion outside of Jadesport." Another member in the room added. "It would appear that the.... Cleanser... is making moves again."

"So it would seem." Another agreed.

"Petravus's Arch Mage has created some new weapon based on the Hero's weapon of choice." Another said.

"Beside the point." The first speaker interjected. "The hero is alone. And miles away from anyone who can help him."

"He's been caught in an ambush before. By the grabber clan that he vanquished." The communication pool chimed in.

"We should do the same." Said a scratchy voice that came from a member who still bore scars from the Earth Warrior's trick. "After all. I think we can do a touch better than some foolish grabber clan."

\---

James sensed the change before he saw or heard anything.

He'd been traveling almost nonstop for two days now. Another day and he'd be at the next village. He'd planned on stopping there for at least a few hours to let him and Steve to rest a bit and eat something besides jerky and bottomless bag stored meat.

He was tired. Steve was tired. And the rain hadn't exactly lightened too much so they were both soaked as well. Even in the small forest they were in, with ample tree cover, the rain was getting through.

But something in his senses told him to stop.

He pulled back on Steve's reins and brought him to a halt.

He listened for a moment as the hairs on the back of his neck stood on end, and he was filled with a sense of.... well, he didn't know really.

Then the ground trembled, causing both he and Steve to look down at the rattling rocks and trembling puddles.

The mage's blade began to rattle in its sheath on his back.

Steve's chest began to rumble beneath him.

"What in the fuck?" James said to himself as his head began scanning the area around him.

He drew the sword, knowing that it would guide him to whatever was going on.

He also drew his pistol with his left hand and kept it under his cloak where it couldn't be seen.

The sword tugged at his hand, drawing him toward whatever magical energy was making the area feel so odd.

It pointed straight ahead.

With both hands occupied James lightly kicked Steve's sides to get him moving. Even as the drake began to warm the air around him.

"Slow boy." He said gently. "Lets see whatever this thing is before we get too close."

Suddenly the sword pulled back, stopping just short of smacking him in the face before trying to pull his arm up and over him.

The rumble in the ground began to speed up. But at an odd cadence. Not like a drummer going faster. But like a second drummer had been added and was off tempo.

The blade seemed to want to leap from behind him to in front of him. And then only a few moments later it began pulling to the side as well, leaping from one to the other, seemingly at random.

"Fucking hell, sword." James said. "Which fuckin' way?"

Then a tree snapped off to his right. His head snapped that way at the same moment that the sword pulled him back around and practically off of Steve's saddle.

James didn't hesitate as he saw what it was.

He kicked Steve in the direction of the mysterious new arrival and gave a command.

"Napalm!" He shouted at Steve.

And Steve obliged.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wfi3q5/wait_is_this_just_gate_199/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (198/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look, action sequences. I love those.

Anyways. Things are moving again. Here's hoping that things don't get too dangerous for our favorite idiot.

>!Little hint: They almost definitely will.!<

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"What's he doing?" Amina asked as she watched.

"I think....." James started. "That he's trying to smoke Tom."

"Smoke him?" Amina repeated, confused. "Like with meat?"

"Eeeeeh... sure." James replied, not entirely sure how the term had come into military jargon.

Before he could say anything else he heard the telltale buzzing of his phone going off under his cloak. He didn't notice, but Vickers and Tom suddenly stabilized too.

"Weird." James said as he fished the phone out. "Wonder why Werner gave me signal."

He finally got the phone out and covered with his hand just as Vickers and Tom landed.

"Princess. Hop on." He said sternly. "Choi. You see it?"

"Wha-" James said as he read the text. "Shit." He said before clicking on the video attachment. Amina looked at it over his shoulder.

"Oh no." Amina said as she saw the footage from the camera feeds outside of the blighted zone.

"Get on the griffin." James said. But Amina was already sliding down Steve's side.

"We're close enough. Tom should be able to get us there in two days." Vickers said as he reached down to her hand. "Three if this weather gets any worse."

"I'll only be a couple days behind." James said as he kicked Steve into a run. "Keep her safe Vickers!"

"Roger that." Vickers replied just as Amina got seated behind him. "Ready princess?" He asked.

He felt Amina messing with the back of his belt. He looked back curiously and saw her attaching a clip strap to her own belt, before reaching down and clipping it to his.

"Strapped in." She said. "Let's go."

"Guess I need to get me one of those." Vickers said. "Never thought about clipping in spare riders."

"I'm sure Atrafar would appreciate it." She said with a grin. "Now come on. Let's make haste."

Vickers bit his tongue at the joke. "Come on boy." He said as he kicked Tom back into the air.

\----------

"Your highness." General Krick began. "Typically I'd be viewing your development of weapons as just a bit of a threat."

King Farrick stiffened minutely at the notion, even though he understood it perfectly.

"However. It was almost guaranteed to happen at some point." The General continued. "And given the current circumstances, your people having firearms, even rudimentary ones, will be a boon against the blight possessed."

"Glad to hear on both accounts." The King said. "For the record. Arch Mage Veliry's designs are a result of her own personal research and innovation. Admittedly they are still based on the weapons that she was capable of witnessing both Captain Choi and Chief Vickers use."

"I kind of figured as much sir." General Krick responded. "And I've spoken to the Secretary." He stood up a bit straighter. "We've been approved to have Ambasador Werner give you several designs for somewhat more... effective... weapon designs. They don't take into account the changes that your Arch Mage has made due to the reliability on magic. But they should still give you some ideas to use."

King Farrick nodded. "We are most grateful." He said. "It is good that your cameras, and our scouts, haven't seen any further signs of incursions. With any luck, we should be able to equip sat least SOME of our soldiers with them in time to stop any blight possessed from gaining any ground."

"It is good that the arrows still seemed to have an effect on the one that came through, even if it was only minimal. But the ones that were fired at it weren't vanished." General Krick added.

"Indeed." King Farrick agreed. "That said, that missile devastated the area. Luckily it was only the one this time."

"Yes." General Krick said sadly. "We're currently looking into the signals that we were picking up from that." He ran his fingers through his hair in frustration. "How they got enough control of it to detonate it, I don't know. The fact that it ignored our emergency shut down protocols is even more worrying."

"Well. I don't think we can do too much to help you on that front." The King admitted. "But we'll do what we can. For now we've got a cordon set around the affected area. As soon as we can we'll have them move in and see if anything is recoverable."

"Sounds good your majesty. I think that's really all there is to cover at this time." Krick hit something on his side of the communication.

Werner's pad pinged as she received the designs specs with Petravian note translations. "Werner, go ahead and print those out for the mages. Keep us updated on Choi, Vickers, and the princess." He looked back at the camera. "Good luck sir." He said to the King.

And with that, he cut the line.

"Yes sir." She said with a nod right before the signal cut off then she moved over to the small printer that had been sent over a while back and queued up the print job.

Veliry moved over and began looking at the designs before the full print job was even done, grabbing sheets off almost as soon as they printed.

"Guidlines inside a longer barrel?" She asked nobody in particular. She looked off into the distance for a moment as she thought. "That'd stabilize the rounds. Just like an arrow, or James when he was fighting the Elemental."

She grabbed another and looked at it. After a moment she began muttering technical terms as Werner slowly backed away.

"She's like that." The King said. "Will the rest of it print on its own?"

Werner nodded. "Yes your majesty." She replied.

He gave a small smile. "We can leave her to it than. Now, if you don't mind, I need to go begin making arrangements for Jadesport."

He turned and left.

Werner stayed just a moment longer as Veliry continued furiously studying the printouts before also retreating from the room.

Veliry didn't even notice. "Why would you drill holes in the barrel?" She asked nobody. "And why wouldn't you use something more durable than flint?" She shook her head. "Doesn't matter. My design doesn't require an external spark source anyways."

\---

"So the hero is alone?" One of the Agency's members asked as they met once again. "We're sure?"

"One of our agents saw his body guard land at a town with the princess, but not with him." Replied the communication pool that one of their currently unavailable members was using to take part. "They believe that something may have called her back to the capital faster. Apparently she seemed quite frantic to stay moving."

"Most likely due to the explosion outside of Jadesport." Another member in the room added. "It would appear that the.... Cleanser... is making moves again."

"So it would seem." Another agreed.

"Petravus's Arch Mage has created some new weapon based on the Hero's weapon of choice." Another said.

"Beside the point." The first speaker interjected. "The hero is alone. And miles away from anyone who can help him."

"He's been caught in an ambush before. By the grabber clan that he vanquished." The communication pool chimed in.

"We should do the same." Said a scratchy voice that came from a member who still bore scars from the Earth Warrior's trick. "After all. I think we can do a touch better than some foolish grabber clan."

\---

James sensed the change before he saw or heard anything.

He'd been traveling almost nonstop for two days now. Another day or so and he'd be at the next village. He'd planned on stopping there for at least a few hours to let him and Steve rest a bit and eat something besides jerky and bottomless bag stored meat.

He was tired. Steve was tired. And the rain hadn't exactly lightened too much so they were both soaked as well. Even in the small forest they were in, with ample tree cover, the rain was getting through.

But something in his senses told him to stop.

He pulled back on Steve's reins and brought him to a halt.

He listened for a moment as the hairs on the back of his neck stood on end, and he was filled with a sense of.... well, he didn't know really.

Then the ground trembled, causing both he and Steve to look down at the rattling rocks and trembling puddles.

The mage's blade began to rattle in its sheath on his back.

Steve's chest began to rumble beneath him.

"What in the fuck?" James said to himself as his head began scanning the area around him.

He drew the sword, knowing that it would guide him to whatever was going on.

He also drew his pistol with his left hand and kept it under his cloak where it couldn't be seen.

The sword tugged at his hand, drawing him toward whatever magical energy was making the area feel so odd.

It pointed straight ahead.

With both hands occupied James lightly kicked Steve's sides to get him moving. Even as the drake began to warm the air around him.

"Slow boy." He said gently. "Lets see whatever this thing is before we get too close."

Suddenly the sword pulled back, stopping just short of smacking him in the face before trying to pull his arm up and over him.

The rumble in the ground began to speed up. But at an odd cadence. Not like a drummer going faster. But like a second drummer had been added and was off tempo.

The blade seemed to want to leap from behind him to in front of him. And then only a few moments later it began pulling to the side as well, leaping from one to the other, seemingly at random.

"Fucking hell, sword." James said. "Which fuckin' way?"

Then a tree snapped off to his right. His head snapped that way at the same moment that the sword pulled him back around and practically off of Steve's saddle.

James didn't hesitate as he saw what it was.

He kicked Steve in the direction of the mysterious new arrival and gave a command.

"Napalm!" He shouted at Steve.

And Steve obliged.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wfhyc9/wait_is_this_just_gate_199/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (197/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Ruh Roh Raggy.

Enjoy.

\~

Werner left the room that the King's aides had been in with a bit of swagger.

She'd finally managed to get the King's people to relent on some of the mineral rights that they'd disguised as simply being interest in soil samples. One of the negotiators had admitted that the King suspected the Earth scientists of being interested in more than simple "soil samples" but also admitted that if their people weren't already using whatever they were looking for, then there wasn't much use in denying it. Though they did ensure that the contract had to be renegotiated on a yearly basis.

That had been a bit of a gut punch, she'd hoped for at least three years. But the negotiator had been adamant about the annual limit. At the end of it all, she was willing to take what she could get. After all, if they could find even traces of rare earth metals then they would be vastly boosting the U.S.'s funds and technological development..... As soon as they could figure out how to retrieve materiel without its magical energy detonating.

In her excitement she missed the sound of the gunfire outside. She was in a wing that wasn't directly next to the training yard, so all she heard was a light pop that echoed down the hall and outside the windows. She dismissed it without even realizing as she typed into her tablet, letting the General and Secretary know about the win.

Her attention was drawn away, and her mood ruined when her hand jittered, causing her to drop her stylus.

"Dammit!" She hissed out in frustration as she clenched her fist and pressed it to her leg. It was a habit, a bad one, that she'd gained in the early days of her.... symptoms.

She had to focus and calm herself as she lifted the spasming hand up so she could massage and flex the tremors away.

It took a few moments, and one of the castle maids walked past with a curious look. Werner had to force herself to smile in greeting as she massaged the hand.

"Just jammed my thumb." She lied to the young dwarf. "No big deal."

The maid simply smiled and continued on.

"\[Idiot.\]" She scolded herself in English.

She bent down and picked up the stylus, tucking it into the side of the tablet's case. Then she reached into her jacket pocket and pulled out her medicine, popping two of the pills into her mouth and swallowing them dry.

They wouldn't help with the current episode. But they'd at least calm them down for the rest of the day.

She had to admit that since coming here her symptoms had lessened. They weren't gone, and she was beginning to think that they never would. But she would take the improvement, and once she was more... trusting... or once things were more under their control, she might even broach the subject with a healer.

But for now, she would focus on her work. It had always helped before.

P-P-P-POPO-POP!

Her head snapped toward the window at the sound of the overlapping group of noises.

That sounded like gunfire. She thought. She looked down at her tablet, checking the dual date displayed on top. One was an earth date, the other a Petravian date.

They're not due back for another week or two based on their last report in. So who the hell is firing weapons?

She began walking toward the wing that would allow her to look out over the training yard.

The sound repeated again, this time louder.

She rounded the corner and saw the windowed door leading out to the balcony she was looking for.

The sound repeated one more time before she got to it.

She stepped out, joining several of the castle staff and a mixture of soldiers and visitors who were watching the drills below.

What she saw changed things.

She quickly lifted her tablet up and began typing, hands once again steady as she focused.

>What we were worried about has occurred.The Petravians have figured out how to make firearms, specifically pistols.Looks like they're being lead in the training by Arch-Mage Veliry.

She looked back and watched the soldiers as they ran through the drill.

>Appear to be some kind of bolt action. Though they aren't reloading between shots. Top loading magazines from the looks of their design.

Then she looked at the dummies they were hitting. Most of their shots missed. But the damage they were imparting, both on the dummies AND on the wall behind them, was impressive.

>Accuracy is poor. But the damage looks devastating. Will need to have Chief Vickers take a closer look upon his return.

She was startled to hear a familiar voice behind her. As she realized who it was she looked around and saw the handful of soldiers standing at attention, and the other people had pulled back.

"I assume." The King began. "That your people will be most interested in this development Ambassador Werner." He smiled warmly as she looked at him with her own smile. "Care to take a closer look?" He held his hand out to her.

She nodded as she gently took his hand and curtsied. "Indeed your majesty. I think that would be a good idea."

"Then please." He replied. "Come with me." As he took his hand back. "Perhaps your General and his people can give us some... feedback... on their design." He said with a slight grin.

And he lead her out the balcony door and down to the training yard.

As she placed the tablet back into her satchel she pressed a few buttons using muscle memory.

>Never mind. King showing off.

Then she hit send.

\--------------------------

Sherk rode next to Danil as the dwarves moved their supplies across the desert after their bit of relaxation with the cartographers. Sticky and a few of the other younger, newer, members of the camp had been sent with them to help move the supplies. Sticky was a few yards back talking to one of the other dwarves, Runer, about his battle hammer. Apparently Sticky liked hammers as his weapon of choice.

The two dwarves spoke in the sand based code that was unique to their clan. Their hands flashed out and left impressions on the sand in front of them, then quickly erased them only seconds later as they made to pass the symbols.

\-You felt those boxes right?- Sherk asked as they walked.

\-I'm a Dunebasher aint I?- Danil replied, his hands moving in jerky, agitated motions.

\-Don't be a sog.- Sherk imprinted. -Anyone figure out what they were besides metal boxes?-

Danil nodded before his hands began moving. -Tyri spotted hatches, and some kind of retractable channel. But she doesn't know how they would be accessed. Magic?-

Sherk considered it. He hadn't sensed any magic, though he wasn't exactly a mage. -Maybe.- He replied. -I sensed one under each of the main tents. Plus a few smaller ones scattered about. Ten total I think.-

Danil nodded again in agreement. -That was my count as well.- He looked back at Sticky. -They seem friendly enough. Are you sure they're the ones the guards are looking for?-

Sherk shook his head. -No. But I don't think they're cartographers either.-

Danil thought back to the "cartography tent" that Arix had shown him. It had been well crafted. But he'd been to cartographer camps before. And that wasn't one. -Free dessert maps?- He imprinted. -If they're cartographers then I'm Dusty's long lost father.-

Sherk let out a quiet chuckle at the joke.

\-You ever known cartographers to just GIVE their maps away for free before reporting to whoever hired them?- Danil asked.

\-Not in my three centuries of life.- Sherk agreed.

\-NOT- Danil imprinted as he looked at Sherk sternly. -CARTOGRAPHERS-

Sherk nodded as he looked back at Sticky.

\-No. But also not OUR problem.- He imprinted.

Danil shrugged in indifference.

Sherk sighed. -But I'll at least make sure the soldiers know what to look for when they get here.-

Danil just nodded as the two of them kept making their way forward.

\----------

On Earth, in the control room of the primary doorway to the capital, a red light went off on one of the computers.

The tech at the computer immediately minimized the windows they'd been working on as he yelled out, "We got movement in the box!" To get everyone's attention.

One of the soldiers positioned near the door ran to retrieve the Colonel, as General Krick was currently at the other site meeting with Secretary Grant. The other guard radioed ahead.

The tech whose computer it was, put the camera feed up.

On the screen a tall orc stepped out of the vanishing blight. It was holding something long and cylindrical that ended in a point.

"What is that?" One of the other techs asked.

"One second." The tech at the computer said as he adjusted the night vision settings on the camera. It took a few moments for the signal to reach the camera and kick in. Then the image cleared minutely.

"Is that out missile?" One of the soldiers asked just as the orc looked up at the camera.

The orc pulled more of the missile out, almost seven feet of the nearly fifteen foot long missile. A twitchy, and creepy, smile spread across the orc's face as it lowered the missile to the ground.

It reached its hand up and the feed from the camera cut out.

"What the fuck?" Another tech asked. "What did it do?"

"Did that thing just 'Vanish' our camera?" The Colonel said as she entered the room. She was wearing her PT uniform and looked half asleep.

"Looks that way ma'am." One of the techs answered. "Switching to external feed." They said only moments before the feed switched to one of the camera's nearby that was set to watch the blight field.

The camera panned over and saw the orc creature stepping out of the side of the steel cube, which now sported a massive hole in its side.

Some of the King's soldiers moved in to challenge the creature as it continued to pull out the rest of the missile. They could see the soldiers moving in with their bows aimed at the creature, loaded with the arrows they'd supplied them with.

The orc staggered a bit as one of the arrows struck it in the chest. But it ignored the damage and continued pulling the missile out.

"Are we getting any signal from that thermo?" The Colonel asked as she stepped up to her control station.

"No ma'am." An airmen replied from their station. "No signal. We're already trying emergency shutdown codes. No success."

Before Colonel Muhammed could give any further instructions the missile detonated.

The metal cube, the orc, the soldiers, and everything else in the feed, including the camera, were immediately destroyed by the thermobaric explosion as the feed cut off.

They all watched in silent horror.

After a few moments the Colonel spoke, breaking the shocked silence.

"Bring up the camera positioned on the wall at Jadesport." She commanded the tech who'd switched the views before. "Someone get Werner and the King on the line and let them know what's happening. Someone contact the tertiary site, they should already know what's going on. But let's just make sure."

And the silence shattered as everyone began rushing to move.

"Somebody get me some fucking coffee." She demanded as she rubbed her eyes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/weqx7f/wait_is_this_just_gate_198/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (197/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Ruh Roh Raggy.

Enjoy.

PS: I recently posted
this in r/GATEhouse if anyone wants an idea of what Kela looked like.

\~

Werner left the room that the King's aides had been in with a bit of swagger.

She'd finally managed to get the King's people to relent on some of the mineral rights that they'd disguised as simply being interest in soil samples. One of the negotiators had admitted that the King suspected the Earth scientists of being interested in more than simple "soil samples" but also admitted that if their people weren't already using whatever they were looking for, then there wasn't much use in denying it. Though they did ensure that the contract had to be renegotiated on a yearly basis.

That had been a bit of a gut punch, she'd hoped for at least three years. But the negotiator had been adamant about the annual limit. At the end of it all, she was willing to take what she could get. After all, if they could find even traces of rare earth metals then they would be vastly boosting the U.S.'s funds and technological development..... As soon as they could figure out how to retrieve materiel without its magical energy detonating.

In her excitement she missed the sound of the gunfire outside. She was in a wing that wasn't directly next to the training yard, so all she heard was a light pop that echoed down the hall and outside the windows. She dismissed it without even realizing as she typed into her tablet, letting the General and Secretary know about the win.

Her attention was drawn away, and her mood ruined when her hand jittered, causing her to drop her stylus.

"Dammit!" She hissed out in frustration as she clenched her fist and pressed it to her leg. It was a habit, a bad one, that she'd gained in the early days of her.... symptoms.

She had to focus and calm herself as she lifted the spasming hand up so she could massage and flex the tremors away.

It took a few moments, and one of the castle maids walked past with a curious look. Werner had to force herself to smile in greeting as she massaged the hand.

"Just jammed my thumb." She lied to the young dwarf. "No big deal."

The maid simply smiled and continued on.

"\[Idiot.\]" She scolded herself in English.

She bent down and picked up the stylus, tucking it into the side of the tablet's case. Then she reached into her jacket pocket and pulled out her medicine, popping two of the pills into her mouth and swallowing them dry.

They wouldn't help with the current episode. But they'd at least calm them down for the rest of the day.

She had to admit that since coming here her symptoms had lessened. They weren't gone, and she was beginning to think that they never would. But she would take the improvement, and once she was more... trusting... or once things were more under their control, she might even broach the subject with a healer.

But for now, she would focus on her work. It had always helped before.

P-P-P-POPO-POP!

Her head snapped toward the window at the sound of the overlapping group of noises.

That sounded like gunfire. She thought. She looked down at her tablet, checking the dual date displayed on top. One was an earth date, the other a Petravian date.

They're not due back for another week or two based on their last report in. So who the hell is firing weapons?

She began walking toward the wing that would allow her to look out over the training yard.

The sound repeated again, this time louder.

She rounded the corner and saw the windowed door leading out to the balcony she was looking for.

The sound repeated one more time before she got to it.

She stepped out, joining several of the castle staff and a mixture of soldiers and visitors who were watching the drills below.

What she saw changed things.

She quickly lifted her tablet up and began typing, hands once again steady as she focused.

>What we were worried about has occurred.
>
>The Petravians have figured out how to make firearms, specifically pistols.
>
>Looks like they're being lead in the training by Arch-Mage Veliry.

She looked back and watched the soldiers as they ran through the drill.

>Appear to be some kind of bolt action. Though they aren't reloading between shots. Top loading magazines from the looks of their design.

Then she looked at the dummies they were hitting. Most of their shots missed. But the damage they were imparting, both on the dummies AND on the wall behind them, was impressive.

>Accuracy is poor. But the damage looks devastating. Will need to have Chief Vickers take a closer look upon his return.

She was startled to hear a familiar voice behind her. As she realized who it was she looked around and saw the handful of soldiers standing at attention, and the other people had pulled back.

"I assume." The King began. "That your people will be most interested in this development Ambassador Werner." He smiled warmly as she looked at him with her own smile. "Care to take a closer look?" He held his hand out to her.

She nodded as she gently took his hand and curtsied. "Indeed your majesty. I think that would be a good idea."

"Then please." He replied. "Come with me." As he took his hand back. "Perhaps your General and his people can give us some... feedback... on their design." He said with a slight grin.

And he lead her out the balcony door and down to the training yard.

As she placed the tablet back into her satchel she pressed a few buttons using muscle memory.

>Never mind. King showing off.

Then she hit send.

\-------------------------

Sherk rode next to Danil as the dwarves moved their supplies across the desert after their bit of relaxation with the cartographers. Sticky and a few of the other younger, newer, members of the camp had been sent with them to help move the supplies. Sticky was a few yards back talking to one of the other dwarves, Runer, about his battle hammer. Apparently Sticky liked hammers as his weapon of choice.

The two dwarves spoke in the sand based code that was unique to their clan. Their hands flashed out and left impressions on the sand in front of them, then quickly erased them only seconds later as they made to pass the symbols.

\-You felt those boxes right?- Sherk asked as they walked.

\-I'm a Dunebasher aint I?- Danil replied, his hands moving in jerky, agitated motions.

\-Don't be a sog.- Sherk imprinted. -Anyone figure out what they were besides metal boxes?-

Danil nodded before his hands began moving. -Tyri spotted hatches, and some kind of retractable channel. But she doesn't know how they would be accessed. Magic?-

Sherk considered it. He hadn't sensed any magic, though he wasn't exactly a mage. -Maybe.- He replied. -I sensed one under each of the main tents. Plus a few smaller ones scattered about. Ten total I think.-

Danil nodded again in agreement. -That was my count as well.- He looked back at Sticky. -They seem friendly enough. Are you sure they're the ones the guards are looking for?-

Sherk shook his head. -No. But I don't think they're cartographers either.-

Danil thought back to the "cartography tent" that Arix had shown him. It had been well crafted. But he'd been to cartographer camps before. And that wasn't one. -Free desert maps?- He imprinted. -If they're cartographers then I'm Dusty's long lost father.-

Sherk let out a quiet chuckle at the joke.

\-You ever known cartographers to just GIVE their maps away for free before reporting to whoever hired them?- Danil asked.

\-Not in my three centuries of life.- Sherk agreed.

\-NOT- Danil imprinted as he looked at Sherk sternly. -CARTOGRAPHERS-

Sherk nodded as he looked back at Sticky.

\-No. But also not OUR problem.- He imprinted.

Danil shrugged in indifference.

Sherk sighed. -But I'll at least make sure the soldiers know what to look for when they get here.-

Danil just nodded as the two of them kept making their way forward.

\---------------------------------

On Earth, in the control room of the primary doorway to the capital, a red light went off on one of the computers.

The tech at the computer immediately minimized the windows they'd been working on as he yelled out, "We got movement in the box!" To get everyone's attention.

One of the soldiers positioned near the door ran to retrieve the Colonel, as General Krick was currently at the other site meeting with Secretary Grant. The other guard radioed ahead.

The tech whose computer it was, put the camera feed up.

On the screen a tall orc stepped out of the vanishing blight. It was holding something long and cylindrical that ended in a point.

"What is that?" One of the other techs asked.

"One second." The tech at the computer said as he adjusted the night vision settings on the camera. It took a few moments for the signal to reach the camera and kick in. Then the image cleared minutely.

"Is that our missile?" One of the soldiers asked just as the orc looked up at the camera.

The orc pulled more of the missile out, almost seven feet of the nearly fifteen foot long missile. A twitchy, and creepy, smile spread across the orc's face as it lowered the missile to the ground.

It reached its hand up and the feed from the camera cut out.

"What the fuck?" Another tech asked. "What did it do?"

"Did that thing just 'Vanish' our camera?" The Colonel said as she entered the room. She was wearing her PT uniform and looked half asleep.

"Looks that way ma'am." One of the techs answered. "Switching to external feed." They said only moments before the feed switched to one of the camera's nearby that was set to watch the blight field.

The camera panned over and saw the orc creature stepping out of the side of the steel cube, which now sported a massive hole in its side.

Some of the King's soldiers moved in to challenge the creature as it continued to pull out the rest of the missile. They could see the soldiers moving in with their bows aimed at the creature, loaded with the arrows they'd supplied them with.

The orc staggered a bit as one of the arrows struck it in the chest. But it ignored the damage and continued pulling the missile out.

"Are we getting any signal from that thermo?" The Colonel asked as she stepped up to her control station.

"No ma'am." An airmen replied from their station. "No signal. We're already trying emergency shutdown codes. No success."

Before Colonel Muhammed could give any further instructions the missile detonated.

The metal cube, the orc, the soldiers, and everything else in the feed, including the camera, were immediately destroyed by the thermobaric explosion as the feed cut off.

They all watched in silent horror.

After a few moments the Colonel spoke, breaking the shocked silence.

"Bring up the camera positioned on the wall at Jadesport." She commanded the tech who'd switched the views before. "Someone get Werner and the King on the line and let them know what's happening. Someone contact the tertiary site, they should already know what's going on. But let's just make sure."

And the silence shattered as everyone began rushing to move.

"Somebody get me some fucking coffee." She demanded as she rubbed her eyes.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wequxr/wait_is_this_just_gate_198/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (196/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Heeeeeeyyyy! Governmental shenanigans. WooHoo!

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright lads!" Sherk yelled at the row of marching dwarves below him. Dusty had a large crate clamped into his front hands and several other crates and bundles strapped to his back. Sherk was almost crowded him out of his saddle. "Just a few more dunes and we'll be at the cartographer's camp. Then we can take a break."

The dwarves below grumbled loud enough to be heard even from where Nguyen was watching them approach. One of them actually threw what

Nguyen thought was a shovel at the slowly circling dragon, though the projectile didn't even come close to reaching the flying creature.

After a few more minutes the first of the dwarves finally made it to the camp. Dusty set down his crate a few yards away before setting down next to it, and Sherk slid over the side of the dragon.

"How's it going?" Nguyen said as he stepped forward and reached out his hand in greeting.

The dwarf, a burly grey haired dwarf extended their hand and accepted the greeting. "Nice to meet ya." They said. "Take it you're the head cartographer here?" He asked.

"Head of the expedition. But not much of a cartographer. Just.... the most level head in the group." Nguyen said truthfully. "I'm Arix. Nice to meet you too." He said, giving his new-ish cover name for this world, while also prompting the dwarf to give their name.

"Danil Dunebasher, and I can understand that." He said as he tapped his knuckles on his own head. "Sherk's told us a lot about you lot." Danil replied. "Still don't understand why the cartographers'd want a map of this sandbox." He held his hands up and looked back at his companions who were all dropping their gear and taking knees so they could drink water. "But if it gives us a spot to rest for a few hours, and friends in the desert, then I won't worry about it to much."

Nguyen gestured at the camp around him. Now comes the smoke and mirrors. He thought. "Well our camp is yours to wander. We'll be fixing lunch in the next hour or so, cooks are already on it. Please, kick off your boots and rest for a bit. We'll send a couple of our younger workers with you to help you get your supplies to your base camp." He looked over Danil's shoulder, easy to do with his stature, and looked at Sherk. "No sign of any Deep Dark intrusions. All's quiet on the desert front." To which Sherk nodded gratefully.

"Well." Danil said. "You aint gotta do that. But... I aint one to look a gift griffin in the beak." He turned back to the other party members. "Alright boys. You heard the man. Kick up your heels for a bit. We'll take our gear out after a bit o grub from our new friends here."

With that Danil turned and launched his pack at one of the other nearby dwarves before plopping down onto one of the crates that was next to the, former, communication tent.

One of the soldiers that Nguyen had sent out to scout out the desert, under the guise of keeping an eye on it for Sherk, had spotted the dwarves coming up the pass into the desert only a day before.

Nguyen had called everyone together and given them instructions that he'd worked out with the General after his suspicion about Sherk. Together they'd all worked together to setup the supplies that had been sent over by the staff on the other side of the door.

It had taken a lot of manual labor, more than a little bit of welding and power-tool use, and a bit of clever, and fast, work from the people on Earth. But they'd gotten the camp disguised with time to spare.

Now the camp was virtually indistinguishable from any standard camp that would be found anywhere else in this world. And none of the personnel present had even a hint of Earth technology on their person. The closest thing to technology was the various bits of magical gear that the original party had managed to gather during their travel.

Everything else was hidden in "Instant" Desert vaults. Back during his few tours in the Water Wars Nguyen had come to think of them like most soldiers who'd used em, "Pain in the ass Altoid tins". Each one took at least three hours to set up, negating the manufacturer's "Instant" claim. But once they were set up they could be placed as deep as thirty feet under the sand, with laddered tunnels that were designed to be set only a few feet under the surface of the sand. At a specific voice command, received in this case by microphones disguised as various buttons and toggles on their clothes, the tunnel would either blast compressed air out to clear the sand above it enough for the entrance to be used, or would begin vibrating to cause the sand around the entrance to collapse on top of it and hide it. Nguyen had programmed the vaults to only work with Earth language based words, assuring that only members of the team would be able to activate them.

All of their Earth gear had been placed in a series of these vaults that were hidden inside the tents that were on the surface. Additionally, the crew on Earth was currently excavating the site on their side so that they could move the doorway entrance down to match the position of the largest of the vaults, which had become the default Communication room.

The camp above was now nothing but the various colored canvas tents, furniture made of simple materials, and a series of tools and materials that would match the more or less medieval setting of the world and their cartographer group cover. Including several maps of the country and several of the major cities in the country, and one map of the desert they were in. These had all been printed based on the data Chief Vickers had given to them during his trip to the capital. Then they'd been artificially made to look old and worn out.

This was only aided by the fact that Isaacs and the Doctor had managed to procure several minor magical items that were common for travelers and adventurers, including a decanter that seemed to supply water anytime it was tipped over, despite being empty. Nguyen had a suspicion that Isaacs' idea of "procuring" things might have been a bit sketchy. But given the circumstances, he wasn't going to question it.

Nguyen made a point of showing Sherk and Danil about the camp. He apologized to Sherk for not letting him in several of the tents before, but covered for it by telling him that they hadn't quite unloaded some of their more sensitive gear at the time. He assured Sherk that he could enter any tent he wanted now, so long as he had the tent occupant's permission, though he did request that he not enter the primary cartography tent without an escort.

Danil was actually excited to see the cartography tent. Apparently he was the leader of their group not JUST because he was the level head, like Nguyen, but also because he was the only one who was proficient enough with maps to keep the group from getting lost. Nguyen promised to have a copy of the desert map made for him once it was completely updated as he ushered the dwarf into the tent.

Nguyen was pleased at the fact that neither of the dwarves seemed to realize that they were now standing directly on top of the camp's communication room.

He wasn't aware of the fact that the dwarves weren't the only ones coming to the desert to look at things.

\-------------------------

"Now comes the real test." Veliry said as she guided King Farrick to the courtyard. "I've grabbed ten of our soldiers. They come from a range of races and experience levels. Guardian Ira'Nyl even joined."

"I'm surprised you could get her away from her post." The King replied as they exited the last doorway to the courtyard. "She takes her duties very seriously."

"You don't have to tell me that." She said. "Anyways, I had a few of our baggers mock up some custom fit pieces for them. I modeled them after the ones that James uses for his weapon." She pointed at the belt she was wearing, with a triangular leather pouch on her right hip and the square one on her left hip. "I also worked on the feed mechanism, which had a habit of jamming up after five or six shots. AAAAND I worked on the recoil. Turns out that a sequentially timed propulsion engraving-"

The King silenced her with a hand. "Normal words Veliry." He said simply, having grown accustomed to the mage's accelerating speech pattern over the years. "Slow down."

"Right. Sorry sir." She said. "I made it kick, as James calls it, a lot less. I also added a rudimentary aiming sight to it. It's still not AS accurate as the weapons from Earth. But it's better than the one I showed you last week."

At this point they'd reached the small cluster of soldiers standing in the archery range. They were all curiously strapping on the belts that they'd been supplied, though a few had gotten them backwards. Ira'Nyl, ever the professional, was already properly fitted and was helping one of the younger soldiers get his "holster" on the belt correctly.

"Alright everyone!" Veliry said, getting their attention. They turned to look at her and many of them jumped to salute the king. He quickly waved at them to go back to what they were doing. "I see a lot of you have your belts on. Some of you are struggling. Guardian, good job, and thank you for helping the others. If you're struggling, follow her lead, or look at the way I'm wearing mine." She watched as they continued putting the belts on, going faster now that they knew that Ira'Nyl had gotten hers correct.

After a few minutes Veliry told them all to form a line with each of them positioned in front of the dummies usually used for archery practice.

"So." She began, pacing in front of them and between where they stood and the dummies. "I know you're all wondering what these belts and pouches are about, and I'm glad that none of you have peeked at their contents. I know that being involved in a demonstration that's been arranged by an Arch-Mage likely has some of you nervous. But don't worry. As long as you follow my instructions, and practice a bit of caution, we should all be returning home," She nodded at Ira'Nyl. "Or to our posts, after this with all of our bits attached and the way they were when we got here."

This drew a few light chuckles, including from the King.

"That said." She continued. "The things you are testing today ARE DANGEROUS."

She reached down and pulled open the triangular pouch. From it she drew a much smaller, and much more refined, version of the weapon the King had fired the week before. She held it up above her shoulder, aimed at the sky.

"This is a pistol." She said sternly. "By now I'm sure that all of you have heard of them. The summoned hero, and his subordinate, both use them. The princess has learned to use one. And I'm sure you all got a good laugh at Prince Artair's suffering at the wrong end of one."

The soldiers, minus the guardian, all murmured as they spoke to each other in whispers.

"Silence!" The King said from where he was standing. The soldiers quieted almost immediately.

Veliry nodded at him in thanks.

"So I SHOULDN'T need to warn you of the kind of damage they can cause." She said as she resumed. "Listen to my instructions. AND LET ME QUOTE THE SUMMONED HERO HIMSELF!" She yelled, startling them. "That you DO NOT... EVER... aim these at anything that you don't want to kill. Because if you do... and if these weapons go off while you do.... You will kill whatever that thing is."

The second she was done saying this she spun around and aimed her pistol at the nearest dummy. She adjusted her aim for a moment, and fired.

BANG!

The shot didn't hit quite where she wanted. But it did still hit the dummy in the head. The bucket helmet that was on the dummy's stuffed head crumpled and flew off of the dummy, with bits of metal shrapnel flying off wildly.

She turned back slowly, smoking pistol once again above her shoulder and aimed at the sky.

"See what I mean?" She asked.

The soldiers all nodded. Even the guardian was wide eyed at the damage the pistol had done.

"Good." Veliry said with a smirk. She pointed at their waists. "Now. Draw your pistols. Don't worry. They aren't loaded right now. I'm going to run you through some basic functions. Then we'll get you started on ACTUALLY using them."

King Farrick looked at the annihilated helmet behind the dummy, impressed, before looking back to watch the soldiers take their lesson from the small mage.

He had a feeling that this was one of those moments that a Governmental Leader rarely got to experience AND actually take note of.

One of those moments where the lines on the map began to fade, as the powers that determined them began to shift.

He just hoped these shifts were for the better.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wdr8y4/wait_is_this_just_gate_197/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (196/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Heeeeeeyyyy! Governmental shenanigans. WooHoo!

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright lads!" Sherk yelled at the row of marching dwarves below him. Dusty had a large crate clamped into his front hands and several other crates and bundles strapped to his back. Sherk was almost crowded him out of his saddle. "Just a few more dunes and we'll be at the cartographer's camp. Then we can take a break."

The dwarves below grumbled loud enough to be heard even from where Nguyen was watching them approach. One of them actually threw what Nguyen thought was a shovel at the slowly circling dragon, though the projectile didn't even come close to reaching the flying creature.

After a few more minutes the first of the dwarves finally made it to the camp. Dusty set down his crate a few yards away before setting down next to it, and Sherk slid over the side of the dragon.

"How's it going?" Nguyen said as he stepped forward and reached out his hand in greeting.

The dwarf, a burly grey haired man, extended their hand and accepted the greeting. "Nice to meet ya." They said. "Take it you're the head cartographer here?" He asked.

"Head of the expedition. But not much of a cartographer. Just.... the most level head in the group." Nguyen said truthfully. "I'm Arix. Nice to meet you too." He said, giving his new-ish cover name for this world, while also prompting the dwarf to give their name.

"Danil Dunebasher, and I can understand that." He said as he tapped his knuckles on his own head. "Sherk's told us a lot about you lot." Danil replied. "Still don't understand why the cartographers'd want a map of this sandbox." He held his hands up and looked back at his companions who were all dropping their gear and taking knees so they could drink water. "But if it gives us a spot to rest for a few hours, and friends in the desert, then I won't worry about it to much."

Nguyen gestured at the camp around him. Now comes the smoke and mirrors. He thought. "Well our camp is yours to wander. We'll be fixing lunch in the next hour or so, cooks are already on it. Please, kick off your boots and rest for a bit. We'll send a couple of our younger workers with you to help you get your supplies to your base camp." He looked over Danil's shoulder, easy to do with his stature, and looked at Sherk. "No sign of any Deep Dark intrusions. All's quiet on the desert front." To which Sherk nodded gratefully.

"Well." Danil said. "You aint gotta do that. But... I aint one to look a gift griffin in the beak." He turned back to the other party members. "Alright boys. You heard the man. Kick up your heels for a bit. We'll take our gear out after a bit o grub from our new friends here."

With that Danil turned and launched his pack at one of the other nearby dwarves before plopping down onto one of the crates that was next to the, former, communication tent.

One of the soldiers that Nguyen had sent out to scout out the desert, under the guise of keeping an eye on it for Sherk, had spotted the dwarves coming up the pass into the desert only a day before.

Nguyen had called everyone together and given them instructions that he'd worked out with the General after his suspicion about Sherk. Together they'd all worked together to setup the supplies that had been sent over by the staff on the other side of the door.

It had taken a lot of manual labor, more than a little bit of welding and power-tool use, and a bit of clever, and fast, work from the people on Earth. But they'd gotten the camp disguised with time to spare.

Now the camp was virtually indistinguishable from any standard camp that would be found anywhere else in this world. And none of the personnel present had even a hint of Earth technology on their person. The closest thing to technology was the various bits of magical gear that the original party had managed to gather during their travel.

Everything else was hidden in "Instant" Desert vaults. Back during his few tours in the Water Wars Nguyen had come to think of them like most soldiers who'd used em, "Pain in the ass Altoid tins". Each one took at least three hours to set up, negating the manufacturer's "Instant" claim. But once they were set up they could be placed as deep as thirty feet under the sand, with laddered tunnels that were designed to be set only a few feet under the surface of the sand. At a specific voice command, received in this case by microphones disguised as various buttons and toggles on their clothes, the tunnel would either blast compressed air out to clear the sand above it enough for the entrance to be used, or would begin vibrating to cause the sand around the entrance to collapse on top of it and hide it. Nguyen had programmed the vaults to only work with Earth language based words, assuring that only members of the team would be able to activate them.

All of their Earth gear had been placed in a series of these vaults that were hidden inside the tents that were on the surface. Additionally, the crew on Earth was currently excavating the site on their side so that they could move the doorway entrance down to match the position of the largest of the vaults, which had become the default Communication room.

The camp above was now nothing but the various colored canvas tents, furniture made of simple materials, and a series of tools and materials that would match the more or less medieval setting of the world and their cartographer group cover. Including several maps of the country and several of the major cities in the country, and one map of the desert they were in. These had all been printed based on the data Chief Vickers had given to them during his trip to the capital. Then they'd been artificially made to look old and worn out.

This was only aided by the fact that Isaacs and the Doctor had managed to procure several minor magical items that were common for travelers and adventurers, including a decanter that seemed to supply water anytime it was tipped over, despite being empty. Nguyen had a suspicion that Isaacs' idea of "procuring" things might have been a bit sketchy. But given the circumstances, he wasn't going to question it.

Nguyen made a point of showing Sherk and Danil about the camp. He apologized to Sherk for not letting him in several of the tents before, but covered for it by telling him that they hadn't quite unloaded some of their more sensitive gear at the time. He assured Sherk that he could enter any tent he wanted now, so long as he had the tent occupant's permission, though he did request that he not enter the primary cartography tent without an escort.

Danil was actually excited to see the cartography tent. Apparently he was the leader of their group not JUST because he was the level head, like Nguyen, but also because he was the only one who was proficient enough with maps to keep the group from getting lost. Nguyen promised to have a copy of the desert map made for him once it was completely updated as he ushered the dwarf into the tent.

Nguyen was pleased at the fact that neither of the dwarves seemed to realize that they were now standing directly on top of the camp's communication room.

He wasn't aware of the fact that the dwarves weren't the only ones coming to the desert to look at things.

\-------------------------

"Now comes the real test." Veliry said as she guided King Farrick to the courtyard. "I've grabbed ten of our soldiers. They come from a range of races and experience levels. Guardian Ira'Nyl even joined."

"I'm surprised you could get her away from her post." The King replied as they exited the last doorway to the courtyard. "She takes her duties very seriously."

"You don't have to tell me that." She said. "Anyways, I had a few of our baggers mock up some custom fit pieces for them. I modeled them after the ones that James uses for his weapon." She pointed at the belt she was wearing, with a triangular leather pouch on her right hip and the square one on her left hip. "I also worked on the feed mechanism, which had a habit of jamming up after five or six shots. AAAAND I worked on the recoil. Turns out that a sequentially timed propulsion engraving-"

The King silenced her with a hand. "Normal words Veliry." He said simply, having grown accustomed to the mage's accelerating speech pattern over the years. "Slow down."

"Right. Sorry sir." She said. "I made it kick, as James calls it, a lot less. I also added a rudimentary aiming sight to it. It's still not AS accurate as the weapons from Earth. But it's better than the one I showed you last week."

At this point they'd reached the small cluster of soldiers standing in the archery range. They were all curiously strapping on the belts that they'd been supplied, though a few had gotten them backwards. Ira'Nyl, ever the professional, was already properly fitted and was helping one of the younger soldiers get his "holster" on the belt correctly.

"Alright everyone!" Veliry said, getting their attention. They turned to look at her and many of them jumped to salute the king. He quickly waved at them to go back to what they were doing. "I see a lot of you have your belts on. Some of you are struggling. Guardian, good job, and thank you for helping the others. If you're struggling, follow her lead, or look at the way I'm wearing mine." She watched as they continued putting the belts on, going faster now that they knew that Ira'Nyl had gotten hers correct.

After a few minutes Veliry told them all to form a line with each of them positioned in front of the dummies usually used for archery practice.

"So." She began, pacing in front of them and between where they stood and the dummies. "I know you're all wondering what these belts and pouches are about, and I'm glad that none of you have peeked at their contents. I know that being involved in a demonstration that's been arranged by an Arch-Mage likely has some of you nervous. But don't worry. As long as you follow my instructions, and practice a bit of caution, we should all be returning home," She nodded at Ira'Nyl. "Or to our posts, after this with all of our bits attached and the way they were when we got here."

This drew a few light chuckles, including from the King.

"That said." She continued. "The things you are testing today ARE DANGEROUS."

She reached down and pulled open the triangular pouch. From it she drew a much smaller, and much more refined, version of the weapon the King had fired the week before. She held it up above her shoulder, aimed at the sky.

"This is a pistol." She said sternly. "By now I'm sure that all of you have heard of them. The summoned hero, and his subordinate, both use them. The princess has learned to use one. And I'm sure you all got a good laugh at Prince Artair's suffering at the wrong end of one."

The soldiers, minus the guardian, all murmured as they spoke to each other in whispers.

"Silence!" The King said from where he was standing. The soldiers quieted almost immediately.

Veliry nodded at him in thanks.

"So I SHOULDN'T need to warn you of the kind of damage they can cause." She said as she resumed. "Listen to my instructions. AND LET ME QUOTE THE SUMMONED HERO HIMSELF!" She yelled, startling them. "That you DO NOT... EVER... aim these at anything that you don't want to kill. Because if you do... and if these weapons go off while you do.... You will kill whatever that thing is."

The second she was done saying this she spun around and aimed her pistol at the nearest dummy. She adjusted her aim for a moment, and fired.

BANG!

The shot didn't hit quite where she wanted. But it did still hit the dummy in the head. The bucket helmet that was on the dummy's stuffed head crumpled and flew off of the dummy, with bits of metal shrapnel flying off wildly.

She turned back slowly, smoking pistol once again above her shoulder and aimed at the sky.

"See what I mean?" She asked.

The soldiers all nodded. Even the guardian was wide eyed at the damage the pistol had done.

"Good." Veliry said with a smirk. She pointed at their waists. "Now. Draw your pistols. Don't worry. They aren't loaded right now. I'm going to run you through some basic functions. Then we'll get you started on ACTUALLY using them."

King Farrick looked at the annihilated helmet behind the dummy, impressed, before looking back to watch the soldiers take their lesson from the small mage.

He had a feeling that this was one of those moments that a Governmental Leader rarely got to experience AND actually take note of.

One of those moments where the lines on the map began to fade, as the powers that determined them began to shift.

He just hoped these shifts were for the better.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wdr66e/wait_is_this_just_gate_197/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (195/?)

Previous

Writer's note: This one's a touch short. (sighs) AND I've once again gotten complaints from the onion ninjas. Apparently I've been "abusing their rights" to a good night's sleep and lunch breaks.

So. Here's a bit of funny/cute stuff.

Side note: During James's last little joke, just imagine that he's channeling his inner 80's style BILL MURRAY. That's all.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"What? There's nothing wrong with it." James countered. "I mean.... I don't get it. But that's just me. There's plenty of furries out there. No judgment."

"I'm not a furry." Vickers replied as he kicked Tom into a trot.

James easily caught up with Steve. "If it makes you feel better; I made an almost identical, though significantly less extreme, version of the same mistake back when I first got here."

"It's true." Amina weighed in from where she sat behind him, before yawning. "He accidentally propositioned Kela without realizing she was a woman."

At that Vickers finally looked at him, one eyebrow raised.

"I did NOT proposition her!" James hissed. "I just didn't understand how packs worked yet. And didn't know what sleeping arrangements were going to be like."

"Was this before or AFTER you shoved your penis in her face?" Amina replied, making a point of looking down at his groin over his shoulder.

Vickers actually turned in his saddle to look at James.

"That is so NOT what happened." James replied, turning a bit red. "And it was AFTER... But that's beside the point." He said rapidly.

He looked over and saw Vickers' stare.

"It's not-" He stammered. "It was a combination of being naked AFTER you guys had taken all my gear and clothes." He said turning back to point at Amina. "And me trying to fight her."

"Whatever you need to call it dude." Vickers said, glad NOT to be the center of attention.

"Oh. Don't even give me that FURRY BOY." He countered.

"I'm not a goddam furry!" He replied, kicking Tom to move faster.

"It's not uncommon." Amina said calmly as Steve caught up again. "Plenty of people end up in relationships with were-folk here." She shrugged a bit. "My brother loved Kela when they were still young." She admitted. "Still does a bit. But... well. Obviously that's a bit complicated." She said with a shrug as she looked back at the city fading into the distance behind them.

"I'm not in love with Atra." Vickers replied calmly.

James looked over with a raised eyebrow. "Oh it's Atra now eh?"

Vickers glared daggers at him. "It was just a fling." He said, jaw clenched. "Besides. She started it."

"Is that how SHE feels?" Amina asked. "Did you go talk to her?"

"Yes." He replied quickly. "Spoke to her a few hours after the ceremony."

"And?" Amina prodded.

"Like I said." He began. "Just a fling. Bit of fun with an stranger from out of town."

"Is that why you didn't show up at the inn until only half an hour before we headed out?" James asked with a wry grin on his face.

Vickers looked over to glare at him only to see Amina also grinning at him.

He simply looked back forward and kept riding.

James's head tilted for a moment. "C'mon bud." He said in a mocking attempt at a Boston accent. "Gimme da deets." Amina actually thought he sounded eerily similar to Vickers.

"Fuck off Choi." Vickers snapped back. Before James could respond Vickers let out a click from his mouth and pulled up on Tom's reins. The Griffin bolted forward a few bounds before spreading its wings and lifting into the air.

"Aw come on!" James yelled after him, still using the exaggerated accent. "I wanna know what it's like to walk on the wild side! What's it like to get a HOT... DOG here!"

"Fuck you!" Vickers yelled back as he rode up higher into the sky. Leaving the two laughing on Steve's back as the massive drake watched the griffin rise up curiously.

He didn't want to admit that he'd had a pretty good time with the She-Wolf when they'd been sober.

"Still not a fuckin' furry." He said to himself as he continued to climb. "Fuckin' Choi."

\------------------------------

"Aaaaaah haha he fuckin hates me." James said with a laugh as he and Amina continued riding, watching Vickers and Tom fly away.

"You do give him good reason." Amina said from where she was leaning on his shoulder. "Still. It is good to see him loosen up a bit. Even if it's only for a few nights."

"It is... isn't it?" James agreed.

"Still. It was funny to mess with him." She admitted with a chuckle. "Glad that Trelen caught on to the joke."

James let out a laugh as he was reminded of the, admittedly somewhat cruel, prank they'd played on the massive SEAL.

"I have a feeling that that particular scenario has landed in his lap before." James said with a smile. "I'm just glad that me dying of laughter didn't give up the game."

"If anything I think it just helped to sell it." Amina said, also smiling.

The two of them continued riding in companionable silence for a moment.

"I think Kela would have had a blast with that joke." James said after a while. "Her seriousness would have sold that SO hard."

Amina laughed, but it was a quiet, somewhat sad, laugh. "She would have loved it." She said with another glance back at the now almost unseen city. "I'm glad we got a good laugh while we were here. She'd've liked that too."

"Yeah." He agreed. "By the way, what did you think of her title? I wanted to ask you when they prompted me to come up with one. But I didn't get the sense that it was a 'come back later' kind of option."

Amina snuggled into his back a bit. "It was perfect." She said. "Jurl will agree when he hears."

"Yeah." He said again.

They rode in silence a little while longer as they thought of how the previous night had gone.

James, wanting to alleviate the suddenly somber mood, broke it first.

"It's practically spring now." He said. "Our big day is coming up." He leaned back a bit and kissed her on the temple. "And our trip."

"Excited?" She asked, before returning the favor.

"About the trip? Hell yeah." He replied. "Can't wait to see what else is out there." He looked back at her with a mischievous grin. "The marriage?" He made a face of disgust. "Eeegh. I don't know about that one. My fiance is an ABSOLUTE troll face." He said while crossing his eyes and bobbing his head to emphasize each word.

Amina scoffed and slapped his shoulder in shock.

"You utter scoundrel!" She exclaimed. "I ought to feed you to Tom." She began laughing as James's grin only spread to a full on smile. "I am the best thing that's ever happened to you." She said, attempting, but failing, to sound stern.

James's wolf hand shot back on her blind side and grabbed her around the waist, causing her you yelp in surprise as he pulled her around him and across his lap.

"You're damn right you are." He said before planting a kiss on her lips.

The two stayed like that for a while, letting Steve guide himself down the road as they began the three week trip back to the capital.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/wbgy8b/wait_is_this_just_gate_196/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (195/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: This one's a touch short. (sighs) AND I've once again gotten complaints from the onion ninjas. Apparently I've been "abusing their rights" to a good night's sleep and lunch breaks.

So. Here's a bit of funny/cute stuff.

Side note: During James's last little joke, just imagine that he's channeling his inner 80's style BILL MURRAY. That's all.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"I did NOT proposition her!" James hissed. "I just didn't understand how packs worked yet. And didn't know what sleeping arrangements were going to be like."

"Was this before or AFTER you shoved your penis in her face?" Amina replied, making a point of looking down at his groin over his shoulder.

Vickers actually turned in his saddle to look at James.

"That is so NOT what happened." James replied, turning a bit red. "And it was AFTER... But that's beside the point." He said rapidly.

He looked over and saw Vickers' stare.

"It's not-" He stammered. "It was a combination of being naked AFTER you guys had taken all my gear and clothes." He said turning back to point at Amina. "And me trying to fight her."

"Whatever you need to call it dude." Vickers said, glad NOT to be the center of attention.

"Oh. Don't even give me that FURRY BOY." He countered.

"I'm not a goddam furry!" He replied, kicking Tom to move faster.

"It's not uncommon." Amina said calmly as Steve caught up again. "Plenty of people end up in relationships with were-folk here." She shrugged a bit. "My brother loved Kela when they were still young." She admitted. "Still does a bit. But... well. Obviously that's a bit complicated." She said with a shrug as she looked back at the city fading into the distance behind them.

"I'm not in love with Atra." Vickers replied calmly.

James looked over with a raised eyebrow. "Oh it's Atra now eh?"

Vickers glared daggers at him. "It was just a fling." He said, jaw clenched. "Besides. She started it."

"Is that how SHE feels?" Amina asked. "Did you go talk to her?"

"Yes." He replied quickly. "Spoke to her a few hours after the ceremony."

"And?" Amina prodded.

"Like I said." He began. "Just a fling. Bit of fun with an stranger from out of town."

"Is that why you didn't show up at the inn until only half an hour before we headed out?" James asked with a wry grin on his face.

Vickers looked over to glare at him only to see Amina also grinning at him.

He simply looked back forward and kept riding.

James's head tilted for a moment. "C'mon bud." He said in a mocking attempt at a Boston accent. "Gimme da deets." Amina actually thought he sounded eerily similar to Vickers.

"Fuck off Choi." Vickers snapped back. Before James could respond Vickers let out a click from his mouth and pulled up on Tom's reins. The Griffin bolted forward a few bounds before spreading its wings and lifting into the air.

"Aw come on!" James yelled after him, still using the exaggerated accent. "I wanna know what it's like to walk on the wild side! What's it like to get a HOT... DOG here!"

"Fuck you!" Vickers yelled back as he rode up higher into the sky. Leaving the two laughing on Steve's back as the massive drake watched the griffin rise up curiously.

He didn't want to admit that he'd had a pretty good time with the She-Wolf when they'd been sober.

"Still not a fuckin' furry." He said to himself as he continued to climb. "Fuckin' Choi."

\------------------------------

"Aaaaaah haha he fuckin hates me." James said with a laugh as he and Amina continued riding, watching Vickers and Tom fly away.

"You do give him good reason." Amina said from where she was leaning on his shoulder. "Still. It is good to see him loosen up a bit. Even if it's only for a few nights."

"It is... isn't it?" James agreed.

"Still. It was funny to mess with him." She admitted with a chuckle. "Glad that Trelen caught on to the joke."

James let out a laugh as he was reminded of the, admittedly somewhat cruel, prank they'd played on the massive SEAL.

"I have a feeling that that particular scenario has landed in his lap before." James said with a smile. "I'm just glad that me dying of laughter didn't give up the game."

"If anything I think it just helped to sell it." Amina said, also smiling.

The two of them continued riding in companionable silence for a moment.

